55954

The Nation

55954

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

VOLUME CXLI
JULY 3, 1935, to DECEMBER 25, 1935

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

83

INDEX TO VOLUME CXLI

JULY 3, 1935, to DECEMBER 25, 1935

(Nos. 3652-3677)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
Arc	Architecture
C	Correspondence
Ct	Cartoon
D	Drama
Dt	Driftway
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1- 28	July 3	365-392	October 2
29- 56	July 10	393-420	October 9
57- 84	July 17	421-448	October 16
85-112	July 24	449-492	October 23
113-140	July 31	493-520	October 30
141-168	August 7	521-548	November 6
169-196	August 14	549-576	November 13
197-224	August 21	577-604	November 20
225-252	August 28	605-632	November 27
253-280	September 4	633-660	December 4
281-308	September 11	661-696	December 11
309-336	September 18	697-724	December 18
337-364	September 25	725-752	December 25

A

AAA. See Agriculture
Aberhart, William. See Social credit
Abortions in disfavor in Soviet Russia. L. Fischer; S 212
Abyssinia. See Italo-Ethiopian war
Academic freedom
  American civil liberties union report shows spread of loyalty-oath laws; EP 198
  California; case of V. Jewett. H. M. Chevalier; C 353
  Loyalty oath, teachers'; EP........ 422
  Mexico; National university threatened; EP 367
  Municipal university of Omaha; President Sealock commits suicide; EP..143; see also C 354
  Pittsburgh university; academic cossacks. R. M. Stein; S..105; see also C.... 186
  Resolutions by National education association; E 61
  San Francisco objects to teachers taking part in politics; EP........ 551
  Stuyvesant high school, New York city; attack on meeting; EP........ 726
  "Teaching" and "advocating"; EP...... 635
  Westchester county. J. W.; S........ 107
Accidents. See Automobiles
Addams, Jane, memorial fund. R. M. Lovett; C 46
Advertising
  Drug advertising, by radio. R. L. Strout; S......65; see also C........ 510
  Radio sponsorship. H. Broun; S...... 245
Æ (G. W. Russell), death; E........ 117
Aeronautics
  Great Britain's boom in war planes. F. C. Hanighen; S........ 236
  Planes, popular, nearer; EP........ 143
Agricultural adjustment administration. See Agriculture
Agriculture
  AAA still popular; EP........ 522
  Agricultural adjustment administration, analysis of program, by Brookings institution; EP 338
  Cotton share-croppers to call strike. A. Jackson; C........ 158
  Production, increased, planning for; EP 522
  Share-cropper, southern, appeal for; EP 311
  Share-cropper, southern, learns his fate. H. L. Mitchell and J. R. Butler; S.. 328
Airplanes. See Aeronautics
Alabama
  Downs law against sedition passed in Birmingham, EP........ 143
  Terrorism in. B. Mitchell; C........ 46
  Terrorism in. B. Crawford; S..319; see also C........ 409
    See also Cotton; Cotton pickers' strike; Negroes
Alaska, class warfare in. I. Goodman; S.. 622
Alberta. See Social credit
Aliens
  And the law; Kerr bill; E........ 701
  Dies bill for deportation; EP..2; EP.. 85
  "Undesirable"; exclusion and deportation; E 341
Allen, Devere
  What socialist party wants; C........ 101
Allen, James S.
  Black chauvinism, by B. Stolberg; comment on; C........ 17
American civil liberties union
  Accuses radio stations of censoring labor. C. Reed; S........ 357
  Views on freedom of speech; E..453; see also C........ 565
American federation of labor
  Atlantic City convention. J. Hochman; S 539
  Butte, struggle in. K. Howard; S..... 514
  Convention, preface to. A. J. Muste; S 440
  Green, W., attitude toward communists. H. Broun; S........ 299
  Green, W., declaration against communists in local unions; EP........ 3
  Green, W., defeat in Minneapolis. C. Hudson; S........ 744
  Green, W., two defeats for. B. J. Widick; S........ 412
  Industrial unionism gaining; E........ 497
  Lewis, John L., resignation from executive council; E........ 665
  Racketeering in. I. The poultry racket. I. Feinstein; S........ 288
    II. Skulduggery in New York. I. Feinstein; S........ 316
  Report, annual, recommendations; EP.. 422
  Stepfather, new, the. Fritz; Ct........ 456
American institute of public opinion; poll on Roosevelt popularity; EP........ 521
American league against war and fascism; Chicago parade against war halted by police; EP........ 338
American legion, and patriotism. J. Hulitt; C....711; see also EP........ 579
  Rowdyism at convention; EP........ 395
American liberty league; conspiracy against national labor relations act; E...... 369
  Ode to. S. Chase; S........ 614
American Mercury, the; Nation, the, and the American Mercury; C, with editorial comment 128
American newspaper guild. See Newspapers
American-Russian relations. See Russian-American relations
Americanism, one hundred per cent; tests of; EP........ 311
Ames, Joseph, address on retirement; EP.. 87
Amsterdam News strike. A. Chase; S..567; see also C........ 711
Anarchy or treason. L. Marder and R. N. Baldwin; C....565; see also E...... 453
Anna Karenina. R. Giroux; MP........ 391
Anthracite. See Coal miners, American
Anthracite institute. See Coal
Anti-noise campaign, New York city; EP.. 423
Anti-semitism. See Jews
Arkansas; record of V. Miles; EP........ 367
    See also Cotton
Armament limitation and disarmament
  Conference, London; EP........ 521
    American offer for twenty per cent reduction; EP........ 697
    Japan demands supremacy in Pacific; AN 725
    Japanese-American war myth. V. Nash; S........ 671
    Sea power and the far east; E.... 636
    United States indifference; EP.... 634
  Naval accord, British-German; E........ 5
Armaments
  British jingoism revived; E........ 552
  Controlling arms makers. H. C. Engelbrecht; S........ 559
  Race, cut-throat. Low; Ct........ 148
  Roosevelt policy as seen in Armistice day address; EP........ 577
Armistice day, address of M. J. Kane against liberals; EP....579; see also C...... 711
Army, United States; deficiencies shown by war maneuvers; EP........ 255
    See also Freedom of speech and press
Art; eighteenth century. W. Pach; A...... 751
Asia, danger zones, new; E........ 664
Associated gas and electric company, lobby against holding-company bill. F. Woltman; S........ 154
Associated press; discharge of M. Watson for guild activity; EP........ 495
    See also Labor—National labor relations board
Astor project. See Housing
Asylum, right of; E........ 341
At home abroad. J. W. Krutch; D........ 392
Athletics, college, overemphasis on. P. Benton; C......711; see also S........ 615
Austria
  Great Britain committed to defense; EP 393
  Hapsburg restoration movement; EP..86; M. W. Fodor; S........ 462
Authors
  Cat's eye view; E........ 173
  Greatest living author; E........ 666
Automobiles
  Accidents, figures for 1934; EP........ 495
  Drivers, drunken; EP........ 87
  Strikes; General Motors hits back at unions. H. S. Grant; S........ 743
Aviation. See Aeronautics

B

Babcock, Mildred; dismissal from Valhalla, N. Y., school. J. W.; S........ 107
Baldwin, Roger, views on free speech; E......453; see also C........ 565
Ballets. See Dance, the Bank of France, tyranny of. R. Dell; S.. 43
Bargaining, collective. See Labor
Baron, Joseph L.
  On force in international relations; C.244; see also EP........ 59
Baron, Rose
  Persecution of political prisoners in California; C........ 355
  Political prisoners, appeal for; C...... 712
Baseball; Pitts, E. C., approval by Commissioner Landis; EP........ 3
Baskin, J.
  Workmen's circle; comment on article by B. Stolberg; C........ 18
Batista, Fulgencio, new Machado. C. Beals; S 152
Battles between haves and have-nots, dead in; E 89
Beals, Carleton
  Cuba, new Machado; S........ 152
  Long, Huey; sharing vice and votes; S.........377; see also C........ 536
  Panama, revolt in; S....99; see also C.. 270
Beals, Carleton, and A. Plenn
  Louisiana Negroes, abuse of; S........ 503
  Louisiana skin game; S........ 738
Becky Sharp. W. Troy; MP........ 28
Bedford-Jones, Nancy, and her father, E.285; see also C........ 383
Bee, Sacramento. See Sacramento Bee
Bennett, Premier Richard, attempted dictatorship. J. S. Gray; S........406
Benton, Paul
  Overemphasis on college athletics; C.711; see also S........ 615
Berman, Edward
  Pullman porters' fight; S........ 217
Berman, John
  On Committee to support southern textile organization; C........ 186
Bernhard, John H.
  Replies to C. Beals on inebriety and illiteracy in Louisiana; also reply by Beals; C......536; see also 377
Berryman, John McAlpin
  Note on E. A. Robinson; P........ 38
Besig, Ernest
  Case of J. Warnick; C........ 620
Bichowsky, Doctor F. Russell, book, "Is the navy ready?" O. G. Villard; S...... 175
Biddle, Anthony J. Drexel, junior. W. Francis; S......149; see also EP........ 663
Biro-Bidjan. See Jews
Bisson, T. A.
  India; Britain tightens control; S...... 210
Black chauvinism, Stolberg article on. See Negroes
Blackwell, Alice Stone
  Democracy versus autocracy in India; C 536
  India's poverty; C........ 157
Bland-Copeland bill. See Shipping
Blind alley. D. V. D.; D........ 490
Bonds. See Public finance
Book reviews; four on same book by A. Crosby; EP....395; see also........ 332

Books
  Fifty outstanding books of 1935........ 677
  Lists of "books worth knowing"; E.... 553
  Picture, for adults; E................ 426
    See also Critics, literary; Germany
Borah, William E., and presidential nomination in 1936; E.................. 285
Boudin, Louis B.
  Supreme court and democracy; S...... 40
Boy meets girl. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 722
Bremen, steamship; riot on, against swastika; EP....141; C....244; EP..... 310
Brenner, Anita
  Cuba, terror in; C.................. 466
Brewster, Representative; defection in opposition to ship-subsidy bill; EP........ 58
  Surrender on utilities bill; E.......... 60
Brindze, Ruth
  Consumers, facts for; S..541, 592, 652, 716; see aso E........526; C....... 591
Brite, Mary D., and others
  New Scottsboro case; C............... 215
Broadcasting. See Radio
Brodsky, Magistrate Louis I.; action in steamship Bremen riot case; EP..310; see also EP........141; C.......... 244
Brontē, Emily; "Wuthering heights" praised B. J. Fried; C..................... 620
Brookings institution; analysis of results of AAA program; EP................. 338
Broun, Heywood
  American newspaper guild, no membership restriction; S.................. 19
  Apology for not being a communist; S. 274
  Chamberlin, William Henry, change of view on Russia; S................. 441
  Dossier from Mrs. A. Dilling's "The red network"; S.................... 77
  Freedom of the press; S.............. 47
  Green, W., attitude toward communists; S 299
  Hearst, W. R.; letter to the Reverend E. J. Marvin; S..................... 651
  History, higher; S.................... 413
  Hundredth birthday, my; S............ 357
  Labor static; S....................... 190
  Lorain Journal, lockout; S............ 104
  Lorain, Ohio, lessons from; S......... 132
  New York Times, attitude toward American newspaper guild; S............. 385
  Olympic games, boycott; S............ 461
  Radio sponsorship; S.................. 245
  Reaction, tide against; S.............. 219
  Roosevelt, Russia and Roy Howard; S.. 326
  Unemployment relief and willingness to work; S.......................... 161
  Unions, craft, and American federation of labor; S........................ 713
  United front needed; S............... 673
Browder, Earl, at Madison square garden meeting. H. Broun; S.............. 673
Brown, James
  Walgreen company, treatment of employees; C.......................... 215
Brown, Sterling A.
  Black chauvinism, by B. Stolberg; comment on; C.......................... 17
Brownstein, Herman
  Squaring the circle; play; C....590; see also 490
Bryan, William Jennings, honor to. O. G. Villard; S.......................... 583
Budapest suicide rate; EP................. 86
Budenz, Louis F.
  Stands for American approach; C...... 187
Bunche, Ralph J.
  Black chauvinism, by B. Stolberg; comment on; C.......................... 17
Burck (cartoonist)
  Mussolini's "abolition" of slavery; Ct... 232
  Nicholas the Second and Hitler; Ct.... 174
Burke, Kenneth
  Records, recent; M.................... 692
Burke, Thomas
  Cotton pickers visit government; S.... 649
Business
  Big, and Roosevelt Santa Claus. Fritz; Ct 732
  Big, wins in congress; E.............. 60
  What it wants; E...................... 701
Business depression; recovery? E.......... 172
  Recovery, paradoxes of. M. S. Stewart; S 529
Butler, J. R., and H. L. Mitchell
  Southern share-cropper; S............. 328
Butler, Nicholas Murray; liberal, far from home; EP......................... 3
Butte remembers Haywood. K. Howard; S.. 514
Buxton, Franklin M.
  Sealock, W. E., dismissal from presidency of Municipal university of Omaha; C........354; see also EP.......... 143

C

Cahan, Abraham, his newspaper, Jewish Daily Forward, censured; EP..59; see also C 186
California
  EPIC; U. Sinclair replies to Stolberg; C..........535; see also............ 344
  Gallagher, L., and his "radical" cases. C. McWilliams; S................. 437
  Japanese in. G. P. West; C..130; see also C............................ 244
  Santa Rosa, tar-and-feather party against radical; E....................... 286
  Terror, cold, in. H. Klein and C. McWilliams; S....................... 97
  To have liberal newspaper; EP......... 311
    See also Academic freedom; Prisoners, political Calles, Plutarco Elias. See Mexico
Camden, New Jersey. See Shipworkers
Campbell, C. H.
  Long, H., and New Orleans; S........ 93
Canada
  Election; E.......................... 397
  Fascism narrowly averted. J. H. Gray; S 406
  Liberal party victory at polls; EP...... 450
  Reciprocity negotiations with the United States; EP....................... 311
  Reciprocity treaty with United States; EP 578
Canby, Henry S.
  Millay, Edna Saint Vincent, poems; C......711; see also................ 595
Capital
  And labor, as seen by Secretary Perkins and by a weaver.................. 78
  Middle class under capitalism. L. Corey; S 176
  What business wants; E............... 701
Cardenas, Lazaro. See Mexico
Carrel, Doctor A., on making of superman; E 370
Cartoons. See Burck; Fritz; Low
Casa Italiana, Columbia university. See Fascism
Catholics. See Germany
Censorship, theater; E..................... 90
  "Tobacco road" attacked and defended; E..........582; see also C.......... 741
Central republic bank and trust company; loan by Reconstruction finance corporation; EP........................... 310
Chain gangs. M. Page; S.................. 561
Chamberlin, William Henry; change of view on Russia. H. Broun; S............ 441
Chase, Allan
  Amsterdam News strike; S....567; see also C.............................. 711
Chase, Allan, and A. Goldsmith
  Milk racket; S....501; see also C.... 648
Chase, Stuart
  Ode to the Liberty league; S.......... 613
Chase national bank, loan to Cuba; EP.... 310
Chauvinism, black, Stolberg article on. See Negroes
Chevalier, Haakon M.
  Jewett, Victor, case of; C............ 353
Chiang Kai-shek. See China; Chinese-Japanese relations
Chicago; action of police against anti-war parade; EP........................ 338
Chicago conference. See Party, new, liberal
China
  Chiang kai-shek's reign weakens; EP.. 226
  Communist armies join; EP........... 2
  Financial crisis following abandonment of silver; EP...................... 550
  Newspapers, corrupt. A. Smedley; S.. 8
Chinese-Japanese relations
  Chiang Kai-shek's deal with Japan; EP.. 699
  Chinese students demonstrate; EP..... 725
  Chinese war lords unite; British policy shifts; EP......................... 634
  Danger zones, new; E................ 664
  Japanese plan renewed hostilities; E.... 497
  Japanese pronunciamento against communism in China; EP............... 338
  Japanese supremacy in north China; EP 310
  North China, absorption by Japan under way; EP.......................... 606
  North China, new Japanese drive imminent; EP........................... 423
  Shanghai and north China, Japanese renewed activity; EP................ 578
  Wang Ching-wei, attempted assassination; EP........................... 549
  "Willing" China. Fritz; Ct............ 668
Christian, Hans
  Wisconsin "people's front"; S.......... 714
Christmas letter prize awarded to S. J. Harris 536
Christmas toys for children of miners, appeal for. A. Sailer; C.............. 712
Churchman, the; imperilled by verdict in favor of motion picture producers and distributors; EP...................... 198
City college. See College of the city of New York
Civil liberties union. See American civil liberties union
Civil rights
  Battle for; E........................ 116
  Laws restricting; EP.................. 523
Civilian conservation camps; take the army out. R. G. Swing; S................. 459
Clemens, Samuel Langhorne. See Twain, M.
Clergymen. See Pacifism
Coal
  Anthracite institute fights bootleg coal; EP....394; see also C....566; EP... 662
  Guffey bill for standardization of industry; E 5
Coal miners, American
  Appeal for toys for children. A. Sailer; C 712
  Illinois miners work for unity. J. P. Mitchell; S 592
  Peace in anthracite fields; E........... 554
  Plight; EP 366
  Strike; EP 366
  Strike, success of; E......397; see also C 591
Coats, doffing called disorderly conduct in New York; EP 199
Cohen, Morris R.
  Fallacies about United States supreme court; S 39
Coleman, McAlister
  New Jersey public service rates, victory in fight; S 133
  Stolberg article, comment on; C 18
Collective bargaining. See Labor
College athletics. See Athletics
College of the City of New York
  Extirpation of communism urged; EP... 422
  Negroes, discrimination against. J. Johnson; C 244
  Officials deny use of Great hall for anti-fascist meeting; EP 550
Colleges; radicals, young, in college; E...... 285
Colombia. See Tariff, United States
Columbia encyclopedia; E 146
Columbia university; Romero, Manuel, dismissal; C 243
  Tax exemption; EP 59
    See also Fascism
Commerce, department of; investigation; EP. 1
Committee to support southern textile organization. J. Berman; C 186
Communism
  Apology for not being a communist. H. Broun; S.......................... 274
  Extirpation from schools, procedure urged; EP 422
  Green, W., attitude toward communists. H. Broun; S 299
  In local unions, W. Green's declaration against; EP 3
  Meeting with socialists in New York; EP 663
  International; olive branch to rest of world; E 145
  New Rochelle has "red" scare; EP...... 551
  Petrosky, Mrs. Stella, may be deported; E 341
  United front needed. H. Broun; S..... 673
  Washington, D. C.; anti-red law proposed; EP 31
    See also Chinese-Japanese relations
Companies, holding. See Holding companies
Company unions. See Labor unions
Conference, a notable. O. G. Villard; S.... 315
Congress
  Adjournment; work of session; EP..... 253
  Big business wins; E 60
  Conferences between senate and house, importance of; EP 142
  Senators Wagner, Nye, and others. O. G. Villard; S....................... 259
Conkling, Roscoe, and Senator Bruce. L. W. Hopkinson; C 185
Connecticut; labor party, formation of. N. Sherman; S 131
Connecticut state college rescinds action against suppression of opposition to military training; EP 551
Conservatives' view of government spending. S. Chase; S 613
"Conspiracy" charged in Brooklyn department store strike; EP 550
Constitution, United States
  Issue in next presidential campaign; EP 57
  Saving. R. G. Swing; S.............. 435
  Views of Sir J. Stamp; EP............ 87
Consumers
  Cooperation; EP 142
  Facts for. R. Brindze; S......526, 541, 592, 652; see also C......591; C..... 647
  Need for cooperation. J. A. De Brest; C.....647; see also E.....526; C.... 591
Consumers' research. strike and lockout; EP......309; EP.....339; S....356; C......439; EP......578; E........ 637
Convict labor. See Labor
Cooper, A. N.
  O'Connor, W., appointment as receiver, First national bank, Grand Forks, North Dakota; C....383; see also.... 182
Copyrights; Duffy bill passes senate; EP.... 226

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Index

- Corey, Lewis
  - Crisis of the middle class, the. I. Middle class under capitalism; S......... 176
  - II. Middle class under fascism; S...... 207; see also C.................... 297
  - III. Middle class under socialism; S......238; see also C............. 297
- Corporations; corporate Tammany halls. I. Feinstein; S 710
  - See also Labor
- Cost of living, and national income; EP..... 197
- Cotton: United States trade shrinking. F. C. Kelly; S 246
- Cotton pickers' strike. A. Jackson; C....158; S......329; see also EP............. 394
  - Delegates visit Washington; T. Burke; S 649
- Cotton-textiles industry; Committee to support southern textile organization. J. Berman; C 186
  - Freedom of the telegraph; C............ 621
- Coughlin, Father, breaks with New deal; EP 607
- Country wife, the; play; E 62
- Craft unions. See Labor unions
- Cramp, Arthur J.
  - On phenolphthalein; C......511; see also 65
- Crawford, Bruce
  - Alabama, terrorism in; S......319; see also C 409
- Crawford, Merritt
  - Lauste, E. A., and J. A. Le Roy; C.... 566; see also E 498
- Credit, social. See Social credit
- Crime and punishment. M. Van Doren; MP 658
- Crime marches on. J. W. Krutch; D...... 547
- Criminals, former, seeking work; EP....... 727
- Critics, drama. See Theater, the
- Critics, literary
  - Articles by M. Marshall and M. McCarthy; S........468, 542, 595, 653, 717; see also letters..........620, 621, 711
- Croix de feu. See France
- Croll, June
  - Thaelmann, E., fight for; C 130
- Crosby, Alexander L.
  - Consumers' research, strike; S 356
  - Review of "Freedom of the press," by G. Seldes; EP......395; see also.... 332
- Crosley radio corporation censors labor. C. Reed 357
- Crusades, the. R. Giroux; MP............ 391
- Cuba
  - Batista, F., new Machado. C. Beals; S. 152
  - Chase national bank loan; EP 310
  - Mendieta, President, resigns; EP 727
  - Terror in. A. Brenner; C........... 466
  - Vilar, C., persecution by government; EP 607
- Cummings, Attorney general Homer Stillé. P. W. Ward; S.................... 14
- Currency; gold influx into United States continues; EP 635
- Czecho-Slovakia, President Masaryk retires; E 730

D

- Damon, Anna
  - Appeal for milk for children of political prisoners; C 75
- Dance, the; ballet old and new. R. Pickering; S 520
- David gets the third degree. E. H. Lavine; S 644
- Davis, John W., saving the constitution. R. G. Swing; S 435
- Dawes bank in Chicago. See Central republic bank and trust company
- Dayton, Tennessee, anti-evolution trial ten years ago; E 118
- Dead end. J. W. Krutch; D.............. 575
- Dead in battles between haves and have-nots; E 89
- De Brest, J. A.
  - Consumers' need for cooperation; C...... 647; see also E......526; C......... 591
- Defense, national. See Militarism
- Dell, Robert
  - Bank of France, tyranny of; S......... 43
- Denmark; agrarian association march on Copenhagen, and its failure; EP.... 198
- Deportations
  - Law invoked against radical political opinion; EP 225
  - Warnick, J., deportaton follows acquittal. E. Besig; C 620
    - See also Petrosky, Mrs. S.
- Depression. See Business depression
- Dernier milliardaire, le. M. Van Doren; MP 548
- Detzer, Dorothy
  - Neutrality; S 642
- Deutsch, Bernard S., and Columbia university; EP 59
- Dewey, John
  - Liberalism and social action, book; review by R. Niebuhr; S 303
- Dies bill. See Aliens
- Dilling, Mrs. Albert, on H. Broun. H. Broun; S; 77
- Dodge, District attorney; advised to resign; EP 31
- Domestic labor. See Labor
- Dorsey, Emmett E.
  - Black chauvinism, by B. Stolberg; comment on; C 17
- Downs law. See Alabama
- Drama. See Theater, the
- Dressmakers' union, local 22. G. Simpson; S 384
- Dreyfus, Alfred, death; EP 87
- Drivers. See Automobiles
- Druckman, S., murder of. E. H. Lavine; S. 584
- Drugs; radio nostrum racket. R. L. Strout; S......65; see also C.............. 510
- Dubinsky, David
  - State-endowed music; C 244
- Dudley, Dorothy
  - Valéry, Paul, interview with; S........ 331
- Duffy bill. See Copyrights

E

- Earhart, Amelia, returns Italian medal; EP. 451
- Early, Stephen. P. W. Ward; S........... 347
- Earthquake, Helena, Montana, inadequate Red cross relief. K. Howard; S.......... 646
- Eccles, Marriner Stoddard. P. W. Ward; S......182; see also C 383
- Eden end. J. W. Krutch; D.............. 547
- Education
  - American; survey to be made by National education association; E............. 61
  - Views of A. Carrel; E................ 370
  - Vocational, as a "racket." R. G. Swing; S 11
- Ehlers, Peter
  - Government subsidy and Italian trade; S. 617
  - Leviathan, the, sabotage of; S.......... 122
- Eighteenth century art. W. Pach; A....... 751
- Elections, after the. R. G. Swing; S....... 587
- Elks save America. A. B. Magil; S........ 205
- Embargoes. See Italo-Ethiopian war
- Encyclopedia, Columbia; E 146
- Endowment policies. See Insurance, life
- Engelbrecht, H. C.
  - Controlling arms makers; S 559
- England. See Great Britain
- EPIC. See California
- Epstein, Abraham
  - "Social security" under the New deal; S 261
- Escapade. W. Troy; MP 112
- Ethiopia. See Italo-Ethiopian war
- Europe
  - Arms over Europe:
    - I. Britain takes the offensive. L. Fischer; S 669
    - II. Tragedy of France. L. Fischer; S 733
  - Naval accord between Great Britain and Germany; England drops Europe; E.. 5
- European war. See World war
- Evolution trial, ten years ago; E........... 118
- Ex-lax, dangerous or not? I. Maltz; C...... 510; see also 65

F

- F., E. H.
  - Labor and big corporations; C.......... 326
- Fargo, North Dakota, strike. S. P. Puner; S......20; see also C............... 157
- Farm mortgages. See Mortgages
- Farson, Negley
  - England's foreign policy; S 563
- Fascism
  - Middle class under fascism. L. Corey; S......207; see also C.............. 297
  - New Mexico. K. Gay; S.............. 537
  - Mussolini and the Casa Italiana, Columbia university; E 610
    - See also names of countries
- Feinstein, Isidor
  - Corporate Tammany halls; S 710
  - New York city transit; S 620
  - New York, New Haven and Hartford railroad financing; S 534
  - Racketeering in the American federation of labor:
    - I. The poultry racket; S............ 288
    - II. Skulduggery in New York; S.... 316
  - Unfit to print; S 740
- Few are chosen. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 392
- Filipinos in United States; exit. C. McWilliams; S 265
- Finance, public
  - Administration tax bill; E............. 173
  - New York city transit; S 620
  - Roosevelt and attempt to force through inheritance and corporation taxes; EP. 29
  - Roosevelt's tax program; EP 113
  - Spending, foolish program of Roosevelt administration; E 88
  - Tax bill, Roosevelt's, attacked; E...... 200
  - Tax program, Roosevelt's; EP 85
  - Tax-exempt bonds, menace of. W. Withers; S 241
  - Taxation, inheritance; E 33
  - Taxation, United States, philosophy wanted; E 4
- Finland at meeting of Scandinavian foreign ministers; EP 281
- Firewalking, and other "miracles"; E....... 526
- First lady. J. W. Krutch; D............... 694
- Fischer, Louis
  - Arms over Europe:
    - I. Britain takes the offensive; S.... 669
    - II. Tragedy of France; S........ 733
  - Russia, progress in 1935; S........... 464
  - Russian revolution comes of age; S.... 557
- Flag, salute to; Lynn, Massachusetts, expels boy member of Jehovah's witnesses from school for refusing to salute flag; EP 451
- Floyd, William
  - On Peace patriots; C 187
- Fodor, M. W.
  - Kings, traffic in; S 462
- Football, broadcasting. Left wing; S....... 405
- Football, college. Left wing; S.......615; see also C 711
- Foreign trade. See Trade, foreign
- Fort Peck, American Siberia. J. Rorty; S.. 300
- Fox, Mary
  - Herndon defense; C 467
- Fraenkel, Osmond K.
  - Value of judicial review; S 42
- France
  - Cooperation with Great Britain; EP.... 393
  - Fascism, decline and fall. E. Lengyel; S......380; see also EP 366
  - Fascism declines; Croix de feu meets; EP 366; see also S 380
  - Finances; EP 115
  - Laval and elections to senate; EP...... 495
  - Political crisis; EP 633
  - Politics; agreement reached by parties; EP 697
  - Resistance to economy measures; EP.... 198
  - Tragedy of, in relations with Germany; L. Fischer; S 733
    - See also Franco-German relations
- Francis, William
  - Biddle, Anthony J. Drexel, junior; S.... 149; see also EP 663
- Franco-German relations; rapprochement, reported, and possible effects; EP...... 577
  - Tragedy of. L. Fischer; S............ 733
- Frankfurter, Felix
  - Burlingham, C. C., public service; C.... 648; see also 501
- Frazier, E. Franklin
  - Black chauvinism, by B. Stolberg; comment on; C 17
- Frazier-Lemke act. See Mortgages
- Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
- Freedom and government. G. B. Shaw; S.. 37
- Freedom of assembly; violated in Chicago by police action against anti-war parade; EP 338
- Freedom of press
  - As exemplified in Binghamton Sun in treating of the Johnson family. H. Broun; S 47
- Freedom of speech
  - Views of R. Baldwin and American civil liberties union; E......453; see also C 565
- Freedom of speech and press
  - Principle violated by bill against action among United States soldiers and sailors; EP 57
  - Tydings-McCormick sedition bill, fight for and against; EP 141
- Freedom of telegraph; C 621
- Freihofer baking company, company union case; EP 635
- Freistater, Rose; teacher's license refused because of overweight; EP 115
- Fried, Bernard J.
  - On literary critics; C...620; see also... 542
- Friedlander, Herman
  - Furs, water-repellents on; C......591; see also 541
- Frisco kid. M. Van Doren; MP.......... 724
- Fritz (cartoonist)
  - Business and Roosevelt "Santa Claus"; Ct 732
  - Call of the desert; Ct.................. 611
  - China and Japan; Ct.................. 668
  - "Gentlemen's agreement" on Ethiopia; Ct 704
  - Labor; new step-father; Ct............ 456
  - Mars, masks of; Ct.................. 500
  - Peace, in the woods; Ct.............. 640
  - Sanctions, League of nations; Ct....... 556
  - War against crime, disease, poverty, et cetera suggested; Ct................ 528
  - War; dying for civilization and democracy; Ct 428
- Fülöp-Miller, René
  - On M. Nomad's review of his book; "Leaders, dreamers and rebels"; C.... 102
- Fulton, Arnold S.
  - Long, dictator, first month; S......179; see also C 297
- Fur workers. D. Scheyer; S.............. 191

Furs, water-repellents for. H. Friedlander; C......591; see also 541
    See also Louisiana

G

G., M.
  How beautiful with shoes; D.......... 722
  Remember the day; D.................. 420
Gale, Zona
  Gilman, Charlotte Perkins; S.......... 350
Gallagher, Leo. C. McWilliams; S.......... 437
Gallup, New Mexico; prisoners still in hands of the law; EP..................... 494
Gangsters and verse; E.................. 638
Gannett, Frank E.; creates foundation for public use of newspaper profits after his death; EP..................... 423
Garner, Vice president John Nance; advertises department store; EP.......... 283
Gas Sunday. S. P. Puner; S...........20; see also C......................... 157
Gay, Katharine
  Fascism in New Mexico; S........... 537
General motors corporation; hits back at unions. H. S. Grant; S............ 743
Geneva. See League of nations
Gerlach, Helmut von; death; E............. 230
German-French relations. See Franco-German relations
Germany
  Books in. I. A. Levitan; S.......... 127
  Catholics, persecution by Nazis. E. Lengyel; S..........532; EP............ 523
  Catholics, persecutions continued; EP.. 114
  Feelings against, in United States; EP. 141
  Finances; heavy burden; E............ 145
  Finances; Schacht's plans; EP......... 253
  Gerlach, Helmut von, death; E......... 230
  Government by gangsters. O. G. Villard; S.............................. 147
  Hitler, and Nicholas the Second. Burck; Ct 174
  Hitler, menace of. O. G. Villard; S.... 343
  Hitler, speech at Nürnberg; EP........ 337
  Hitler's defense of anti-Semitism; EP.. 662
  Industry; profits under Hitler regime; E 637
  Jews. See Jews
  Lynch law codified. E. Lengyel; S.... 263
  Memel. See Memel
  Naval accord with Great Britain; E.. 5
  Newspapers under Hitler. H. L. Schiller; S.............................. 12
  Olympic games. See Olympic games
  Political confusion; EP............... 226
  Ruin; Nazis seek scapegoats. Low; Ct. 260
  Schacht opposes Nazi Jew-baiting; EP.. 253
  Thaelmann, E., fight for. J. Croll; C. 130
  Underground movement. K. Rosenfeld; S 507
  Unemployment; Hitler's promise and nonfulfillment; EP..................... 197
    See also Franco-German relations
Gilbert, Mort and E. A.
  Life insurance; new offensive against policy-holders; S...120; see also C... 438
Gilman, Charlotte Perkins. Z. Gale; S...... 350
Gilman, James
  Consumers' research strike; C.......... 439
Giroux, Robert
  Anna Karenina; MP.................. 391
  Maria Chapdelaine; MP.............. 447
  Peasants; MP....................... 391
  William Tell; MP................... 447
Gold
  Mirage of; Klondike. O. G. Villard; S.. 91
  Supply, United States; vault at Fort Knox, Kentucky; EP................ 30
    See also Currency
Goldsmith, Alfred, and A. Chase
  Milk racket; S....501; see also C.... 648
Goodman, Irving
  Class warfare in Alaska; S........... 622
Government and freedom. G. B. Shaw; S.. 37
Grafton, Samuel
  Mortgage scandals and the new deal; S. 705
Grand Coulee dam; letters by R. Insinger and J. Rorty....................... 101
Grant, H. S.
  General motors hits back at unions; S. 743
Grattan, C. Hartley
  Relief, supplementary; S.............. 125
Gray, James H.
  Canada and fascism; S................ 406
Great Britain
  After Ethiopia—England? A. Viton; S. 429
  And the United States. O. G. Villard; S.........63; see also C............ 742
  Assumes world leadership; E.......... 452
  Cabinet, new. H. J. Laski; S......... 70
  Call of the desert. Fritz; Ct.......... 611
  Cooperation with France; EP.......... 393
  Election:
    A referendum on League of Nations. O. G. Villard; S................ 639
    General. H. J. Laski; S.......... 589
    Prospects; EP.................... 522
    Result of; E..................... 609
  Facing war. H. J. Laski; S........... 509
  Foreign policy. N. Farson; S.......... 563
  Jingoism, revival; E.................. 552
  Labor party, future of. H. J. Laski; S. 708
  Lloyd George's "New deal," rejection of; EP............................ 86
  Naval agreement with Germany; England drops Europe; E.............. 5
  War planes, boom in. F. C. Hanighen; S 236
    See also Europe
Greece, royalist restoration. M. W. Fodor; S 462
Green, Robert; exposed as "Thomas Walker," and lawbreaker; EP................ 115
Green, William
  Industrial unionism, case for; S........ 715
    See also American federation of labor
Griffith, Associate justice V. A.; opinion against legal lynching in Mississippi. R. W. Horton; S................... 674
Guffey bill. See Coal

H

Hale, Nathan, biographical material sought. G. D. Seymour; C.................. 467
Hamtramck, Michigan, meat strike; EP.... 171
Hanighen, Frank C.
  Britain's boom in war planes; S...... 236
Hapsburg restoration. See Austria
Hardy, Lamar, appointment, and the mortgage scandals. S. Grafton; S....705; E 729
Harlem. See Negroes
Harris, Sydney Justin, wins The Nation's Christmas letter prize.............. 536
Hays, Aline Davis
  Nation, The, and the American Mercury; C, with editorial comment........... 128
Hayward, Bill, remembered in Butte. K. Howard; S......................... 514
Hearst, William Randolph
  Green, Robert, employe and baiter of soviet Russia, exposed as lawbreaker; EP 115
  Instruction to editors; EP............. 227
  Pro-Hitlerism reflected in drop in advertising; EP.......................... 170
  Zeal against agitators and reds. H. Broun; S......................... 651
Heisler, Francis
  Fargo cases; C......157; see also...... 20
Helena, Montana, earthquake; inadequate Red cross relief. K. Howard; S.......... 646
Heller, James G.
  On attitude of religious bodies toward war; C......187; see also EP....... 59
Henderson, Arthur, death; EP............. 495
Hendley, Charles J.
  Teachers' union; C....591; see also.... 410
Herndon, Angelo
  Chain gangs. M. Page; S............. 561
  Defense committee, joint, formed. M. Fox; C............................. 467
  Pledge of continued support for release movement; EP...................... 494
  Statute under which he was convicted held unconstitutional; EP............ 699
Herrick, Elinore Morehouse
  Hotel workers; S...................... 159
  Need for federal labor laws; S........ 49
Hill, Wolfram
  On German steel and Hitler regime; C........742; see also EP.......... 605
Hirst, Albert
  Insurance twisting; C..438; see also.. 120
History, higher. H. Broun; S............. 413
Hitler, Adolf. See Germany
Hochman, Julius
  American federation of labor convention at Atlantic City; S.................. 539
Holding companies
  Constitution, saving the. R. G. Swing; S 435
  Lobby against dissolution bill, EP, 1; EP, 29; EP, 113; article by F. Woltman, 154; article by R. G. Swing, 155; article by P. W. Ward........ 233
  Supreme court and the poor investor; E. 581
Hoover, Herbert
  On 1936 campaign; EP................ 29
    See also Presidential election of 1936
Hopkins, Harry L.; conflict with Secretary Ickes; EP......................... 337
    See also Unemployment relief
Hopkinson, Leslie W.
  Conkling, R., and Senator Bruce; C.. 185
Hopson, H. C. See Public utilities
Horton, Robert W.
  Stewart, R., murder of, and torture of accused Negroes; S................. 674
Hotel workers, underpaid. E. M. Herrick; S 159
Housing
  Astor project, New York city; WPA workers riot against low wages; "renovation" unsuccessful; EP........339; see also EP....................... 395
  Program, possibility. A. Meyer; S..400; S 432
How beautiful with shoes. H. G.; D........ 722
Howard, Kinsey
  Butte remembers Hayward; S........... 514
  Red cross answers call; S............. 646
Howard, Roy, Roosevelt letter to. H. Broun; S 327
Howe, Louis McHenry. P. W. Ward; S.. 347
Hudson, Carlos
  Minneapolis; defeat for Green; S...... 744
  Minneapolis—one year later; S........ 510
Hulitt, Jacob
  Patriotism and American legion; C..711; see also EP........................ 579
Hull, Cordell. P. W. Ward; S............ 71
Hundred neediest cases. See New York Times
Hungary, royalist restoration movement. M. W. Fodor; S....................... 462
Hutton, Edward F.; article on "ganging up" by public utilities against opposition; EP 634

I

Ickes, Secretary Harold L.; conflict with Administrator Hopkins; EP.......... 337
"If this be treason," play. O. G. Villard; S 399
  Criticism by J. W. Krutch............ 420
Ilf and Petrov, Messrs.; coming to United States; E......................... 341
Illinois. See Coal miners, American
Immigration; aliens and the law; Kerr bill; E 701
Imperialism and security. F. H. Simonds; C........408; see also...........340, 343
Income, national, and cost of living; EP.... 197
Income tax
  Figures show decline in highest brackets; EP 698
  Senate committee action disappointing; EP 197
Index of labor welfare, The Nation's. See Labor
India
  Constitution, new; Great Britain tightens control. T. A. Bisson; S............ 210
  Democracy versus autocracy. A. S. Blackwell; C......................... 536
  Government bill passed; blow to moderates; EP........................... 170
  Poverty. A. S. Blackwell; C.......... 157
Indiana; Hitlerism; N. Thomas; S........ 324
  Martial law in labor troubles; EP.... 451
Indians, teaching them to make arrows; E.6; see also C......................... 103
Industrial unions. See Labor unions
Industry and labor. See Labor and industry
Inheritance taxes. See Finance, public
Injunctions; New York state law for jury trials upheld; EP................... 282
Insinger, R.
  Grand Coulee dam; reply to article by J. Rorty; with letter by Rorty; C.... 101
Institute of human relations conference. O. G. Villard; S....................... 315
Insurance, life
  Endowment policy as investment. M. Levine; S.......................... 531
  New offensive against policy-holders. M. and E. A. Gilbert; S..120; see also C. 438
International justice. Low; Ct............ 204
International mercantile marine; government waives right to collect fine; EP...... 365
Investors. See Holding companies
Italo-Ethiopian war
  After Ethiopia—England? A. Viton; S. 429
  British attitude; E.................. 452
  British jingoism revived; E........... 552
  Business, big, continues with Italy; EP. 493
  Chicago anti-war parade halted by police; EP.......................... 338
  College of the city of New York officials deny use of Great hall for anti-fascist meeting; EP........................ 551
  "Discussions." Low; Ct.............. 372
  Dissension, internal, in Ethiopia; EP.. 114
  Embargo against arms; EP........... 449
  Embargo followed by increase of trade with Italy; EP......605; EP........ 633
  Embargo on exports to Italy embarrasses United States; EP................. 493
  Europe and the dispute; EP........... 58
  Gamble, Mussolini's; E............... 34
  "Gentlemen's agreement." Fritz; Ct... 704
  Government subsidy and Italian trade. P. Ehlers; S...................... 617
  Great Britain and Italy, and league sanctions; EP...................... 549
  Great Britain faces war. H. J. Laski; S. 509
  Great Britain holds its ground; E.... 525
  Hoare-Laval "peace plan" for exchange of territory; EP................... 697
  Imperialism and security. F. H. Simonds; C........408; see also..........340, 343
  International justice. Low; Ct........ 204
  Italy, trade with, by Americans, exporters stubborn; EP............... 449

    Italy's economic difficulties. M. S. Stewart; S 457
    Laval works for peace; E 496
    League of nations, appeal to council by Abyssinia; E 89
    League of nations, council postpones consideration; EP 169
    League of nations, outlook for success in punishing aggressions; E 424
    League union against Italy; E......340; see also C 408
        See also Italo-Ethiopian war—Sanctions
    Lease of oil and mineral rights by Ethiopia; EP 281
    Military operations; EP 421
    Military operations resumed; EP 549
    Mussolini's "abolition" of slavery. Burck; Ct 232
    Mussolini's dream of empire. M. S. Stewart; S 402
    Neutrality, American; EP 393
    Neutrality resolution, United States; EP 337
    Oil supply the important factor; E 700
    "Peace" plan, Hoare-Laval, test of the League; E 728
    Pro-Italian meeting in New York; mayor attends; EP 727
    Protocol, secret, of 1891, for division of Abyssinia; EP 114
    Ravishment of Abyssinia. Low; Ct 92
    Rome defies powers; E 227
    Roosevelt and war in Africa; EP 421
    Sanctions, League of Nations:
        Against Italy, gradual; EP 393
        Against Mussolini. O. G. Villard; S........343; see also 408
        And Italy's need of imports; E 283
        And their consequences. F. H. Simonds; C..710; see also E 524
        Application against Italy; EP 449
        As possible causes of war; E 396
        For and against; R. G. Swing and D. Detzer; S 641
    Great Britain and Italy, and sanctions; EP 549
        In effect; EP 633
        League stands firm for sanctions against Italy; E 312
        Mussolini's retort to; EP 577
        Or war? E 256
        Peril to Italy; EP 661
        Showdown at Geneva; E 257
        Under neutrality; E 553
        Will they work? Fritz; Ct 556
    Settlement, negotiations for; EP 661
    Showdown at Geneva; E 257
    Suez canal blocked! O. G. Villard; S.. 371
    Suez canal, closing, possible, and control; EP 281
    United States helping Mussolini win his war; E 580
    War in Ethiopia. O. G. Villard; S 287
    War, on the brink of; E 368
    War, the, and pacifism. O. G. Villard; S 455
Italy
    After Ethiopia—England? A. Viton; S. 429
    Economic situation; can Italy avert bankruptcy? M. S. Stewart; S 457
    Mussolini's dream of empire. M. S. Stewart, S 402
        See also Italo-Ethiopian war

J

Jackson, Albert
    Cotton pickers on strike; C..158; S 329
Jackson, W. R., anti-semitism and anti-unionism; EP 115
Japan
    And opium. M. Lester; C 298
    Emperor, cartoon of, in Vanity fair; EP 169
    Political change expected to follow murder of T. Nagata; EP 226
    Red carpet. Low; Ct 64
Japanese in California. G. P. West; C.130; see also C 244
Japanese-American relations; war myth. V. Nash; S 671
Japanese-Chinese relations. See Chinese-Japanese relations
Japanese-Russian relations; friction along Manchoukuo-Siberian border; EP 58
Jaszi, Oscar
    Oppenheimer, F., in America; C 511
Jewett, Victor; loses teaching position for "radicalism." H. M. Chevalier; C.. 353
Jewish Daily Forward censured; EP....59; see also C 186
Jews
    German:
        Anti-semitism, in Der Stürmer and Der Judenkenner, Germany. H. L. Schiller; S 12
        Anti-semitism, eye-witness account. L. F. Sas; S 467
        Anti-semitism, recurrence of outbreaks; EP 114
        Further repression threatened; EP.. 366
        Hitler calls anti-semitism "defense against bolshevism"; EP 662
        New laws against; EP 337
        Regulations, anti-semitic, new; EP.. 607
        Schacht opposes Nazi Jew-baiting; EP 253
    Palestine and Transjordania only hope for Jews. L. Lewisohn; C......326; see also 231; C 409
    Russian, aided by government; establishment of Biro-Bidjan, Jewish state. O. G. Villard; S.231; see also C.326; C 409
    St. Louis postoffice, anti-semitism of postmaster; EP 115
Johnson, General Hugh S., in charge of Works progress administration in New York city; EP 31
Johnson, Jerry
    Discrimination against Negroes at College of the city of New York; C 244
Johnsons of the Endicott-Johnson shoe company. H. Broun; S 47
Jones, A. Vera
    On oppression of Negro domestic workers; C 75
Jones, Walter P.
    Sacramento Bee's handling of criminal-syndicalism case; letter, with editorial comment by The Nation 45
Journal, Lorain, Ohio. See Newspapers
Journalism. See Newspapers
Jumbo. J. W. Krutch; D 659

K

Kane, Michael J., Armistice day address against liberals of all shades; EP.579; see also C 711
Kellman, Leon
    Long, H., and prison labor; C....297; see also 179
Kellogg pact. See Peace
Kelly, Fred C.
    Cotton trade, shrinking; S 246
Kelly, John J., appointment, and the mortgage scandals. S. Grafton; S 705
Kennedy, Joseph P., record as chairman, Securities and exchange commission; EP 365
Kings, traffic in. M. W. Fodor; S 462
Killed in battles between haves and have-nots; E 89
Klein, Herbert, and C. McWilliams
    Terror in California; S 97
Klondike, mirage of gold. O. G. Villard; S. 91
Knickerbocker village, owners violate tenants' right; EP 395
Knowlton, Elizabeth
    Invasion, latest, of Mexico; S 707
Krauthoff, Edwin A.
    Farm mortgage moratorium act; C 242
Kringer, Ray L.
    In the deep middle west; S 569
Krumbein, Charles; case of; EP 171
Krutch, Joseph Wood
    At home abroad; D 392
    Boy meets girl; D 722
    Crime marches on; D 547
    Dead end; D 575
    Drama, modern, meaning of:
        I. Condescension of the critics; S. 269
        II. The Shavian dilemma; S 291
        III. The American tradition; S 320
        IV. The new dispensation; S 351
    Eden end; D 547
    Few are chosen; D 392
    First lady; D 694
    If this be treason; D 420
    Jumbo; D 659
    Life's too short; D 392
    Moon over Mulberry street; D 364
    Most of the game; D 448
    Mother; D 659
    Night of January 16, the; D 392
    On the stage; D 575
    Othello; D 448
    Paradise lost; D 752
    Parnell; D 630
    Porgy and Bess; D 519
    Pride and prejudice; D 603
    Slight case of murder, a; D 364
    Squaring the circle; D..490; see also 518; C 590
    Taming of the shrew, the; D 448
    Weep for the virgins; D 722
    Whatever goes up; D 694
    Winterset; D 420

L

Labor
    And capital, as seen by Secretary Perkins and by a weaver 78
    Bargaining, collective, made compulsory in Milwaukee; EP 663
    Censored by radio stations. C. Reed; S. 357
    Convict, H. Long's action; C......297; see also 179
    Corporations, large, labor conditions. E. H. F.; C 326
    Domestic, Negro, oppression of. A. V. Jones; C 75
    Laws, federal, need for. E. M. Herrick; S 49
    Long, H., and labor 192
    National labor relations act, conspiracy against, by Liberty league; E 369
    National labor relations board:
        Complaints, important, by board in two cases: Associated press and Pennsylvania greyhound lines; EP 699
    Prison. See Labor, convict
    Radio workers. H. Broun; S 190
    Stepfather, new. Fritz; Ct 456
    Unemployment relief and unwillingness to work. H. Broun; S 161
    Unwillingness to work, alleged; E 144
    Wagner law; can it be enforced? E 32
    Welfare, The Nation's Index....48, 216, 302, 443, 571, 715
        See also Injunctions
Labor and industry......19, 47, 76 (see also C, 186); 104, 131, 159, 188, 216, 245, 274, 299, 327, 356, 384, 410, 440, 512, 537, 567, 592, 622, 649, 713, 743
Labor party, British. See Great Britain
Labor party, Connecticut, formation. N. Sherman; S 131
Labor relations act, national. See Labor
Labor unions
    Company unions, Freihofer baking company case; EP 635
    Company unions, report on; EP 423
    Craft and the craft unions. H. Broun; S 713
    Dressmakers' union, local 22. G. Simpson; S 384
    Industrial-union victory, coal miners'; E....397; see also C 591
    Industrial unionism, case for. W. Green; S 715
    Industrial unions; W. Green loses in Minneapolis fight on them. C. Hudson; S 744
    Middle west, anti-union activities in. R. L. Kringer; S 569
    New form. New York telephone company; EP 30
    New York state federation of labor convention, and others; E....258; see also C 382
    Picketing, New York city; police illegal action against; EP 2
    Textile; committee to support southern textile organization. J. Berman; C.. 186
        See also American federation of labor; Injunctions
Labor welfare index. See Labor
LaGuardia, Mayor Fiorello H.; action against German masseur; EP 141
    Attends pro-Italian meeting in New York; EP 727
Lamont, Thomas W., defends Morgans. O. G. Villard; S 527
Landis, James M., becomes chairman, Securities and exchange commission; EP 365
Langstroth, Lorenzo; biography of, in Dictionary of American biography; C. Van Doren; C......103; see also E 6
Lansbury, George. O. G. Villard; S 499
Lansing, Robert, war memoirs. O. G. Villard; S 427
Laski, Harold J.
    British cabinet, new; S 70
    British general election; S 589
    British labor, future of; S 708
    England faces war; S 509
Lauste, Eugene Augustus, aided by The Nation's publication of his story; E..498; see also C 566
Laval, Pierre. See France; Italo-Ethiopian war
Lavine, Emanuel H.
    David gets the third degree; S 644
    Schultz, Dutch, killing of; S 584
Laws, labor. See Labor
Lawyers, conspiracy by, against national labor relations act; E 369
"Leaders, dreamers and rebels," book by R. Fülöp-Miller; letter by author in reply to review by M. Nomad; C 102
League of nations
    British vote a referendum on League. O. G. Villard; S 639
    Outlook for success in punishing aggressions; E 424
        See also Italo-Ethiopian war
Lefkowitz, Abraham
    Teachers' union, case for; S........410; see also C 591
Left wing
    Football broadcaster; S 405
    Football, college; S...615; see also C... 711
Lehman, Governor Herbert H., on national defense; E 314

- Lengyel, Emil
  - Catholic war on Hitler; S...532; EP... 523
  - Decline and fall of French fascism; S......380; see also EP... 366
  - Lynch law in Germany; S... 263
- LeRoy, Jean Acme; aid sought; E......498; see also C... 566
- Lester, Muriel
  - Japan and opium; C... 298
- Let freedom ring. M. M.; D... 630
- Leviathan, the; sabotage of. P. Ehlers; S.. 122
- Levine, Murry
  - Endowment policy as investment; S..... 531
- Levitan, I. A.
  - Books in Germany; S... 127
- Lewis, John L., resignation from executive council of American federation of labor; E... 665
- Lewisohn, Ludwig
  - Jewish refuge in Palestine or Biro-Bidjan; C....326; see also 231 and C.... 409
  - On Jewish national home in Palestine and Transjordania; C....326; see also.... 231
- Liberals; pathos of liberalism; review of Liberalism and social action, by J. Dewey; review by R. Reinhold; S... 303
- Liberty league. See American liberty league
- Life insurance. See Insurance, life
- Life's too short. J. W. Krutch; D... 392
- Lippmann, Walter; on "success" of battle against unemployment; EP... 282
- Literary critics. See Critics, literary
- Lithuania. See Memel
- Little orphan Annie; E... 454
- Lloyd George, David. See Great Britain
- Lobbying; EP... 255
  - See also Holding companies; Public utilities
- Loe, Kelly
  - Oregon labor and the Townsend plan; C... 382
- Long, Senator Huey
  - And labor... 192
  - Assassination; EP... 309
  - Doctor Huey and Mr. Long. B. Stolberg; S......344; see also C... 535
  - New Orleans, choking of. C. H. Campbell; S... 93
  - Sharing vice and votes. C. Beals; S......377; see also C... 536
    - See also Louisiana
- Lorain, Ohio, Journal. See Newspapers
- Lothian, Marquis of
  - Opposed to Anglo-American alliance; C......742; see also... 63
- Louisiana
  - Inebriety and illiteracy. C. J. H. Bernhard and C. Beals; letters........536; see also... 377
  - Long, dictator, first month of. A. S. Fulton; S......179; see also C...... 297
  - Negroes, abuse of. C. Beals and A. Plenn; S... 503
  - Prospects, after death of Long; EP...... 309
  - Skin game (fur trapping). C. Beals and A. Plenn; S... 738
- Lovett, Robert Morss
  - Addams, J., memorial fund; C... 46
- Low (cartoonist)
  - Arms race, cut-throat; Ct... 148
  - "Discussions" of Ethiopian situation; Ct 372
  - International justice; Ct... 204
  - Japan's red carpet; Ct... 64
  - Nazi system; seeking scapegoats for ruin of Germany; Ct... 260
  - Progress of man... 36
  - Ravishment of Abyssinia; Ct... 92
- Loyalty oaths. See Academic freedom
- Ludendorff, General Erich von; Jew-baiting; EP... 254
- Lumber strike, Tacoma, Washington; EP.... 31
  - Article on, by S. C. Menefee; S....76; see also C... 186
  - Breaking of. S. C. Menefee; S... 275
- Lynchings; Louisiana. C. Beals and A. Plenn; S... 503
- Lynn, Massachusetts. See Flag, salute to
- Lyons, John
  - Refuge for Jews in Biro-Bidjan; C.409; see also..........231; C... 326

M

- M., M.
  - Let freedom ring; D... 630
  - Love and housing, in Moscow; S... 185
- Madeira, Louis C., III.
  - Coal, bootleg; C, with editorial comment ......566; see also EP... 394
- Magil, A. B.
  - Elks save America; S... 205
- Mahoney, Jeremiah T. See Olympic games
- Mail contracts. See Shipping
- Maltz, I.
  - Ex-lax, dangerous or not? C......510; see also... 65
- Man (anarchist journal), hounding of. H. Preece; C... 75
- Manchuria; bandit outbreaks; EP... 199
- Manlet, Joseph C.
  - Medicine under socialism; C......215; see also... 109
- Man's progress. Low; Ct... 36
- Marder, Louis
  - Treason or anarchy; C......565; see also E... 453
- Maria Chapdelaine. R. Giroux; MP... 447
- Marine, merchant. See Shipping
- Married women. See Women
- Marsh, J. L. R.
  - Mother lode strike; C... 75
- Marshall, Margaret
  - Future begins in Soviet Russia; S...... 266
- Marshall, Margaret, and M. McCarthy
  - Critics, literary; S......468, 542, 595, 653, 717; see also C......620; C.....621; C... 711
- Marvin, Reverend Ernest J.; letter to him, on W. R. Hearst, by H. Broun; S.... 651
- Masaryk, President, retirement; E... 730
  - Suggested for Nobel peace prize; EP... 1
- Maslow, Will, and E. M. White
  - New York's power yardstick; S... 430
- Massachusetts teachers' loyalty oath; EP.... 422
- Maternelle, la. M. Van Doren; MP... 548
- Mayer, Albert
  - Housing program, possibility; S....400; S... 432
- Mayer, Helene, consents to be member of German Olympics team; EP... 521
- May's department store, Brooklyn; strike; EP... 550
- McAdams, Clark; death. O. G. Villard; S.. 703
- McCarthy, Mary, and M. Marshall
  - Critics, literary; S......468, 542, 595, 653, 717; see also C..620; C..621..C 711
- McDonald, Duncan
  - Miners, progressive, case for; C....591; see also E... 397
- McIlvaine, C. A.
  - On Beals article on Panama; C.....270; also... 99
- McIntyre, Marvin Hunter. P. W. Ward; S... 347
- McWilliams, Carey
  - Anti-Japanese propaganda; reply to article in The Nation of June 26. G. P. West; C......130; reply, C... 244
  - Exit the Filipino; S... 265
  - Gallagher, Leo; S... 437
- McWilliams, Carey, and H. Klein
  - Terror in California; S... 97
- Meat strike, Hamtramck, Michigan; EP..... 171
- Medicine under socialism. J. Manlet; C ......215; see also... 109
- Medicines, patent. See Drugs
- Memel; dispute between Germany and Lithuania over German minority; EP.. 338
- Mendieta, Carlos. See Cuba
- Mendl, Lady, best-dressed woman; EP...... 662
- Menefee, Selden C.
  - Breaking of strike; S... 275
  - Tacoma lumber strike; S......76; see also C... 186
- Merchant marine. See Shipping
- Mexico
  - American interference, Catholic campaign for; EP... 450
  - Calles, P. E., behind the overthrow of. L. O. Prendergast; S... 67
  - Cardenas, President, triumph; EP...... 171
  - Fascism. L. O. Prendergast; S... 736
  - Foreign exploitation. M. S. Stewart; S. 323
  - Invasion, latest, by tourist trade from United States. E. Knowlton; S...... 707
  - Investments, foreign, and working class; EP... 522
  - National university threatened; EP..... 367
- Middle class
  - Crisis of:
    - I. Under capitalism. L. Corey; S 176
    - II. Under fascism. L. Corey; S ......207; see also C...... 297
    - III. Under socialism. L. Corey; S......238; see also C..... 297
- Middle west, anti-union activities. R. L. Kringer; S... 569
- Miles, Vincent, appointment to Social security board; EP... 367
- Militarism; Governor Lehman on "adequate national defense"; E... 314
- Military training; Connecticut state college rescinds ruling against opposition to training; EP... 551
- Milk
  - "Buyer's choice" a myth; EP... 522
  - For children of political prisoners, appeal for. A. Damon; C... 75
  - Racket. A. Chase and A. Goldsmith; S......501; see also C... 648
- Millay, Edna Saint Vincent, poems. H. S. Canby; C.......711; see also........ 595
- Miller, Guy A.
  - Replies to The Nation's notice of his opinion on play, Tobacco road; C......741; see also E... 582
- Mills, John
  - Le Roy, J. A., and E. A. Lauste; C......566; see also E... 498
- Milwaukee; labor ordinance, for collective bargaining; EP... 663
- Mini, Norman, another victim of anti-union frame-up. H. Solow; C... 467
- Ministers (religious). See Pacifism
- Minneapolis: A defeat for Green. C. Hudson; S... 744
- Minneapolis strike; one year later. C. Hudson; S... 510
- Miracles; E... 526
- Mississippi. See Negroes
- Mitchell, Beth
  - Alabama terror; C... 46
- Mitchell, Ewing Y., as muckraker of department of commerce; EP... 1
- Mitchell, H. L. and J. R. Butler
  - Southern share-cropper; S... 328
- Mitchell, James P.
  - Illinois miners work for unity; S....... 592
- Monkey business, anti-evolution trial ten years ago; E... 118
- Montjoy, John, Negro; new Scottsboro case; M. D. Brite and others; C... 215
- Moon over Mulberry street. J. W. Krutch; D... 364
- Mooney, Tom; California continues hostility; hearings; EP... 366
  - Hearings; appeal waiting to be heard; EP 494
- Moore, Virginia
  - Little ode; P... 51
- Morgan, Agnes
  - "Profitable poverty"; C... 382
- Morgan, J. P. and company. See World war
- Morgans defended by T. W. Lamont. O. G. Villard; S... 527
- Morgenthau, Henry, and his friends. P. W. Ward; S......182; see also C....... 383
- Mortgages; farm; Frazier-Lemke act. E. A. Krauthoff; C... 242
  - Mortgage scandals and the new deal. S. Grafton; S... 705
- Moscow; love and housing. M. M.; S...... 185
- Most of the game. J. W. Krutch; D........ 448
- Mother. J. W. Krutch; D... 659
- Mother lode strike. J. L. R. Marsh; C..... 75
- Moving pictures
  - Broadway prosperous; E... 702
  - Churchman, The, imperilled by verdict for Motion picture producers and distributors; EP... 198
  - Museum of modern art film library. W. Troy; S... 112
  - Newsreels, propaganda in; E... 369
    - See also Giroux, R.; Troy, W.; Van Doren, M.; for reviews of pictures
- Museum of modern art film library. W. Troy; S... 112
- Music
  - New York stadium concerts; EP........ 59
  - Records, recent. K. Burke; M... 692
  - State endowed. D. Dubinsky; C........ 244
  - State-endowed, under work-relief; EP.... 170
- Mussolini, Benito, and the Casa Italiana, Columbia university; E... 610
  - See also Italo-Ethiopian war; Italy
- Muste, A. J.
  - American federation of labor convention, preface to; S... 440
- Mutiny on the Bounty, the. M. Van Doren; MP... 658

N

- Nagata, Tetsuzan, murder of; EP... 226
- Narcotic farm, United States. O. G. Villard; S... 7
- Nash, Vernon
  - Japanese-American war myth; S....... 671
- Nation, The
  - Christmas letter prize awarded to S. J. Harris... 536
  - Labor welfare index......216, 302, 443, 571, 751
  - Lauste, E. A., aided through publication of story; E... 498
  - Troy, W., resigns as film critic; EP..... 339
- National committee for defense of political prisoners; success of group; EP...... 170
- National defense. See Militarism
- National education association; to make survey of American education; E........ 61
- National labor relations board. See Labor
- National university of Mexico. See Mexico
- National youth administration; EP... 30
- Naval conference, London. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Naval limitation. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Navy, United States, inefficient. O. G. Villard; S... 175
  - See also Freedom of speech and press
- Nebraska. See Academic freedom
- Neediest cases. See New York Times

- Negroes
  - Alabama cotton pickers protest to Washington against murders. T. Burke; S. 649
  - Chauvinism, black, article on, by B. Stolberg; letters of comment.... 16
  - College of the city of New York; discrimination against Negroes. J. Johnson; C 244
  - Domestic workers, oppression of. A. V. Jones; C 75
  - Harlem riots, report of investigating committee; EP 199
  - Louisiana, abuse. C. Beals and A. Plenn; S 503
  - Mississippi; torture of accused Negroes in Stewart murder case. R. H. Horton; S 674
  - Pennsylvania law against race discrimination; EP 198
  - Racial discrimination in southern schools and colleges; fight against; EP.... 255
  - Scottsboro case:
    - Negroes on juries; EP 607
    - Teamwork needed; EP 663
  - Scottsboro case, new. M. D. Brite and others; C 215
- Neuberger, Richard L.
  - Oregon anti-labor moves; S.... 162
  - Townsend plan exposed; S........505; see also EP 550
- Neutrality. D. Detzer; S 642
  - Policy, United States; E 425
  - Sanctions under neutrality; E.... 553
    - See also Italo-Ethiopian war
- New deal. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration; United States
- New Gulliver, the. M. Van Doren; MP.... 604
- New Jersey public service rates, victory in fight for reduction. McA. Coleman; S 133
- New Mexico; fascism in. K. Gay; S...... 537
- New Orleans. See Long, H. P.
- New Rochelle, New York; "red" scare; EP. 551
- New Theater on propaganda in movies; E... 369
- New York city
  - Anti-noise campaign; EP 423
  - District attorney Dodge advised to resign; EP 31
  - Police, clean-up needed; EP 227
  - Power plant; federal loan possible; EP.. 3
  - Power yardstick. W. Maslow and E. M. White; S 430
  - Tammany hall politics and the mortgage scandals. S. Grafton; S 705
  - Transit stocks and bonds. I. Feinstein; S 620
  - Unemployment relief. See Unemployment relief
- New York, New Haven and Hartford railroad, financing. I. Feinstein; S...... 534
- New York Post. See Newspapers
- New York stadium concerts; EP.... 59
- New York state federation of labor convention; E......258; see also C.... 382
- New York telephone company, labor union, new form; EP 30
- New York Times, attitude toward American newspaper guild. H. Broun; S...... 385
  - Hundred neediest cases; news "unfit to print." I. Feinstein; S.... 740
- Newspaper guild, American. See Newspapers
- Newspapers
  - American newspaper guild:
    - Affiliation with American federation of labor urged; EP 367
    - Amsterdam News strike. A. Chase; S........567; see also C....... 711
    - Battles with publishers; EP 523
    - Complaint brought by National labor relations board in case of M. Watson, discharged by Associated press; EP....699; see also EP... 495
    - Lorain, Ohio, Journal, lessons from. H. Broun; S 132
    - Lorain Journal, lockout. H. Broun; S 104
    - New York Post signs contract...... 192
    - New York Times, attitude of. H. Broun; S 385
    - No restrictions in membership. H. Broun; S 19
  - California; state to have liberal newspaper; EP 311
  - Chinese, corrupt. A. Smedley; S 8
  - Gannett newspaper profits to go to public after death of present owner; EP.. 423
  - German, under Hitler. H. L. Schiller; S 12
    - See also Freedom of the press
- Newsreels. See Moving pictures
- Nichol, W. U.
  - On The Nation's unbiased news; C...18; see also 76
- Nicholas the Second and Hitler. Burck; Ct 174
- Niebuhr, Reinhold
  - Pathos of liberalism; review of liberalism and social action, by J. Dewey; S.... 303
- Night of January 16, the. J. W. Krutch; D 392
- Nobel prize for peace; Masaryk and Von Ossietzky suggested; EP 1
- Noise; anti-noise campaign, New York city; EP 423
- Nomad, Max
  - On his review of "Leaders, dreamers, and rebels," by Fülöp-Miller; C..297; see also C 102
- Norton, Vernon C.
  - Rhode Island election; S 214

O

- O'Connor, Basil, fee from Associated gas and electric company; EP 169
- O'Connor, James Francis Thaddeus. P. W. Ward; S......182; see also C....... 383
- O'Connor, Representative John, and "death sentence" for holding companies; EP.. 169
- Ode to the Liberty league. S. Chase; S.... 613
- Oil. See Italo-Ethiopian war
- Oil for the lamps of China. W. Troy; MP. 56
- Old-age pensions; questionnaire sent to Congressmen; EP 725
  - Townsend plan, Oregon labor's views; E............258; C.... 382
  - Townsend plan exposed. R. L. Neuberger; S......505; EP.... 550
- Olympic games
  - Boycott. H. Broun; S 461
  - Boycott advocated; E 665
  - Boycott movement grows; E 201
  - Mahoney continues crusade against American participation; EP 493
  - Opposition to American participation grows despite Amateur athletic union vote; EP 698
  - Reason for withdrawal of American team; EP 521
  - Withdrawal of United States urged; E.. 426
- Omaha, Nebraska. See Academic freedom
- On stage. J. W. Krutch; D 575
- Opium, Japan and. M. Lester; C.... 298
- Oppenheimer, Franz, in America. O. Jaszi; C 511
- Oregon, anti-labor moves. R. L. Neuberger; S 162
- Oregon labor and the Townsend plan; E......258; C 382
- Ossietzky, Carl von; suggested for Nobel peace prize; EP 1
- Othello. J. W. Krutch; D.... 448
- Otto, Archduke. See Austria

P

- Pach, Walter
  - Eighteenth century art; A 751
  - Van Gogh, exhibition; A.... 751
- Pacifism
  - British peace ballot; EP 30
  - Clergymen oppose anti-war declaration; EP....59; see also C....187; C..... 244
  - College students' peace demonstration on Armistice day; EP 578
  - Kane, M. J., Armistice day address against pacifists of all shades; EP.....579; see also C 711
  - Peace patriots. W. Floyd; C.... 187
  - War in Ethiopia and European war, and pacifism. O. G. Villard; S.... 455
  - World peaceways, radio broadcasting; EP 367
- Page, Myra
  - Men in chains; S 561
- Painting, modern; E 33
- Palestine. See Jews
- Panama; revolt in. C. Beals; S.......99; see also C 270
  - Treaty, new, with United States; negotiations for; EP 255
- Paradise lost. J. W. Krutch; D.... 752
- Parnell. J. W. Krutch; D.... 630
- Parsons, Alice Beal
  - On literary criticism; C......621; see also 468
- Party, new, liberal; conference, Chicago, and platform; EP 57
- Patent medicines. See Drugs
- Patriotism; E......453; see also C.... 565
- Peace
  - By prayer; E 314
  - In the woods. Fritz; Ct.... 640
  - Kellogg pact, necessity for enforcing; E......524; see also C.... 710
    - See also Pacifism
- Peace patriots. W. Floyd; C.... 187
- Peace prize, Nobel. See Nobel prize for peace
- Peasants. R. Giroux; MP.... 391
- Peddlers, treatment in magistrate's court; EP 282
- Peek, George N., resignation; EP.... 662
- Pennsylvania anti-race discrimination law; EP 198
- Pennsylvania greyhound lines. See Labor—National labor relations board
- Penological congress. See Prisons and prisoners
- Pensions, old-age. See Old-age pensions
- Perkins, Secretary Frances, on capital and labor 78
- Petroleum. See Italo-Ethiopian war
- Petrosky, Mrs. Stella; may be deported as communist; E 341
  - Deportation proceedings stopped; EP.... 551
- Petrov and Ilf, Messrs., coming to United States; E 341
- Phenolphthalein, use of. I. Maltz and A. J. Cramp; C......510; see also.... 65
- Philadelphia; elections; Republican machine wins; EP 579
- Philippine islands. See Filipinos in the United States
- Phonograph records. See Music
- Pickering, Ruth
  - Ballet old and new; S.... 520
- Picketing; and treatment of pickets; EP.... 282
  - See also Labor unions
- Picture books for adults; E.... 426
- Pierce, Ross Edwards
  - On the human face; P.... 108
  - To the tall buildings of New York; P.. 79
- Pioneer youth, appeal for toys for children of miners. A. Sailer; C.... 712
- Pitkin, Walter B., article on "Profitable poverty." A. Morgan; C.... 382
- Pitts, Edwin C. (Alabama). See Baseball
- Pittsburgh, university of; academic cossacks. R. M. Stein; S....105; see also C.... 186
- Plays. See Theater, the
- Plenn, Abel, and C. Beals
  - Louisiana Negroes, abuse of; S.... 503
  - Louisiana skin game; S.... 738
- Poems
  - Cornetist, the. M. Van Doren.... 21
  - Note on E. A. Robinson. J. McA. Berryman 38
  - On the human face. R. E. Pierce...... 108
  - To the tall buildings of New York. R. E. Pierce 79
- Poetry; Little ode. V. Moore.... 51
- Police
  - Lawlessness by police advocated by Commissioner Valentine; EP 550
  - Methods; David gets the third degree. E. H. Lavine; S 644
  - New York city. See New York city
- Political prisoners. See Prisoners, political
- Porgy and Bess. J. W. Krutch; D.... 518
- Post, Langdon, on Astor housing project; EP......395; see also EP.... 339
- Post, New York. See Newspapers
- Post, Wiley; death; EP 225
- Postoffice department; anti-union policy persists; EP 579
- Poultry racket; in American federation of labor. I. Feinstein; S.... 288
  - New York city; EP 494
- "Poverty, profitable"; article by W. B. Pitkin. A. Morgan; C 382
- Power and power industry. See New York city; Public utilities
- Prayer, peace by; E.... 314
- Preece, Harold
  - Man (anarchist journal), hounding of; C 75
- Prendergast, L. O.
  - Fascism in Mexico; S.... 736
  - Mexican revolution; S 67
- Preparedness. See Militarism
- Presidential election of 1936; Hoover throws cap into ring; EP 606
  - Reciprocity treaty with Canada, effect of; EP 606
- Press. See Freedom of speech and press; Newspapers
- Pride and prejudice. J. W. Krutch; D...... 603
- Prison labor. See Labor, convict
- Prisons and prisoners
  - Chain gangs. M. Page; S.... 561
  - Penological congress, Berlin, for crueler punishment for prisoners; EP 282
  - Political, appeal for. R. Baron; C..... 712
  - Political, children of; appeal for milk. A. Damon; C 75
  - Political; persecution in California. R. Baron; C 355
- "Profitable poverty"; article by W. B. Pitkin. A. Morgan; C 382
- Progress of man. Low; Ct.... 36
- Propaganda in newsreels; E.... 369
- Public enemy No. 64B. The football broadcaster. Left wing; S 405
- Public finance. See Finance, public
- Public utilities
  - Aided by United States supreme court. G. and S. Slaff; S 373
  - Hopson, H. C., kingdom of; EP........ 225
  - Hutton, E. F., article on "ganging up" against opposition; EP 634
  - Lobby, investigation of; EP 85
  - New Jersey rates, victory in fight for reduction. McA. Coleman; S.... 133
  - O'Connor, Basil, fee from Associated gas and electric company; EP........ 169
    - See also Holding companies; New York city
- Public works; spending program, foolish, of Roosevelt administration; E.... 88

Pulitzer prizes; drama award; dissatisfaction with; EP 523
Pullman porters' fight. E. Berman; S...... 217
Puner, Samuel Paul
  Fargo strike; S......20; see also C.... 157

R

Race discrimination, Pennsylvania law against; EP 198
    See also Negroes
Racketeering in the American federation of labor. I. Feinstein; S....288; S..... 316
Radicals
  Bedford-Jones, Nancy, and her father; E 285
  California; tar-and-feather party against Santa Rosa radical; E 286
  Elks save America. A. B. Magil; S... 205
  Young, in college; E 285
Radio
  Advertising sponsorship. H. Broun; S.. 245
  Broadcasting, football. Left wing S.... 405
  Nostrum racket. R. L. Strout; S...65; see also C 510
  Stations censor labor. C. Reed; S...... 357
  Workers. H. Broun; S.... 190
Railroads; progress begins. O. G. Villard; S 203
Rainer, Luise, American debut. W. Troy; MP 112
Rattner, Dr. Irving N.; urges extirpation of communism from schools; EP 422
Rayburn, Representative, surrender on utilities bill; E.... 60
Reaction, tide against. H. Broun; S....... 219
Reading. See Books
Reciprocity. See Tariff, United States
Reconstruction finance corporation; loan to Dawes bank; EP 310
  Senator Taylor for federal aid to schools by corporation; EP.... 141
Records. See Music
Recovery, business. See Business depression
Red army days. M. Van Doren; MP...... 548
Red cross answers call; Helena, Montana, earthquake, inadequate relief. K. Howard; S 646
"Reds." See Communists
Reed, Clifton
  Radio stations censor labor; S.......... 357
Relief. See Unemployment relief
Remember the day. M. G.; D.... 420
Rendezvous. M. Van Doren; MP.......... 604
Republican party; campaign of 1936; EP.... 29
Resettlement case records; EP......579; see also C 742
Restoration of royalty. M. W. Fodor; S.... 462
Reviews, book. See Book reviews
Revolutionary policy publishing association. G. Simpson; C 45
Rhode Island election. V. C. Norton; S..... 214
  Warning to Roosevelt; E 202
Rich, J. C.
  Forward, defense of; C......186; see also EP 59
Rights, civil; battle for; E 116
  Laws restricting; EP 523
Riot on steamship Bremen; action of Magistrate Brodsky; EP......310; see also EP......141; C 244
Robinson, Edwin Arlington, note on. J. McA. Berryman; P 38
Robinson, Senator Joseph Taylor; for federal aid for schools by Reconstruction finance corporation; EP 141
Robinson, William J.
  Bremen incident; C 244
Rogers, Will; death; EP 225
Rogin, Lawrence
  Camden shipworkers' strike; S......... 188
Roman catholics. See Germany
Romero, Manuel, dismissal by Columbia university; C 243
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
  Administration:
    Hollow triumph. P. W. Ward; S.. 293
    New deal, end of; E 609
    New low for new deal; appointment of L. Hardy; E.... 709
    Record; E 313
    Strategy fails. O. G. Villard; S.... 731
    "Santa Claus." Fritz; Ct.......... 732
  And the war in Africa; EP 421
  Churchman; EP 339
  Constitution as issue in next campaign; EP 57
  Elections, after the. R. G. Swing; S.... 587
  European policy, as seen in Armistice day address; EP 577
  Foreign policy. P. W. Ward; S...... 71
  Journey, cross-continental; EP 365
  Man and his advisers. P. W. Ward; S. 347
  Politician; note to Russia and letter to R. Howard. H. Broun; S 327
  Public works spending program, foolish; E 88
  Record. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
  Re-election, chances for; EP 521
  Rhode Island election; warning to president; E 201
  Russia, note to, and letter to R. Howard. H. Broun; S 327
  "Success" in battle against unemployment, according to W. Lippmann; EP. 282
  Taxation, administration tax bill; E..... 173
  Taxation; attempt to force through inheritance and corporation taxes; EP... 29
  Taxation, program; EP......85; EP... 113
  Transcontinental trip; E 398
Roper, Secretary Daniel C.; investigation of Department of commerce; EP 1
Rorty, James
  Grand Coulee dam; letter in reply to letter by R. Insinger; C.... 101
  Fort Peck, American Siberia; S........ 300
Rosenfeld, Kurt
  German underground movement; S.... 507
Royalty, restorations. M. W. Fodor; S.... 462
Rural resettlement case records; EP.....579; see also C 742
Russell, George W. (Æ), death; E........ 117
Russia
  Abortions in disfavor. L. Fischer; S... 212
  Chamberlin, W. H., change of view, H. Broun; S 441
  Crops and industry, improvement; EP.. 2
  Economic conditions, improvement, and finances; E 61
  Family life; size of families increasing without pressure from above; EP.... 551
  Future begins. M. Marshall; S........ 266
  Jews. See Jews
  Living standard rises; EP 394
  Moscow, love and housing in. M. M.; S 185
  Olive branch from Moscow; E.......... 145
  Progress at home—enmity abroad. O. G. Villard; S 35
  Progress in 1935. L. Fischer; S....... 464
  Propaganda, new style; EP.... 699
  Revolution comes of age. L. Fischer; S 557
  Roosevelt note to, and letter to R. Howard; H. Broun; S 327
Russian-American relations
  Note of protest by United States; behind the note; E 284
  Protest of Washington against Third international conference in Moscow; EP. 253
  Roosevelt note. H. Broun; S.......... 327
  Tariff agreement, effect of; EP......... 86
  United States lags behind Europe; E.... 61
Russian-Japanese relations. See Japanese-Russian relations
Ryan, Frank R.
  On J. F. T. O'Connor; C......383; see also 182

S

Sacramento Bee, handling of criminal-syndicalism case. Letter by W. P. Jones, with editorial comment by The Nation..45; see also C.... 467
Sailer, Agnes
  Appeal for Christmas toys for miners' children; C 712
Saint Louis, Missouri; postoffice, anti-semitism and anti-unionism of Postmaster Jackson; EP 115
Salute to flag. See Flag, salute to
San Francisco; teachers barred from political activity; EP.... 551
Sanctions. See Italo-Ethiopian war
Santa Rosa, California. See California
Sas, Louis Furman
  Anti-semitism in Germany; eye-witness account; S 467
Schacht, Hjalmar. See Germany
Scheyer, David
  Fur workers; S 191
Schiller, Heinrich L.
  Journalism under Hitler; S............ 12
Schneider, Isidor
  Marxist critics; C....711; see also.... 653
Schools; decrease in expenditures; EP...... 283
  Federal aid for, sponsored by Senator Robinson; EP 141
    See also Education
Schultz, Dutch; killing of. E. H. Lavine; S. 584
Schuyler, George S.
  Black chauvinism, by B. Stolberg, comment on; C 16
Scottsboro case. See Negroes
Sealock, Doctor William E., suicide; EP ......143; see also C.... 354
Securities and exchange commission, change of chairman; EP 365
Security, social. See Social security
Sedition; Alabama law (Downs law), passed in Birmingham; EP 143
  Bill; E 117
Seggern, Boyd von
  Bedford-Jones, Nancy; C.... 383
Selkin, Celia
  On Ludwig Lewisohn; C.... 297
Senate. See Congress
Seymour, George Dudley
  Biographical material on N. Hale sought; C 467
Share-croppers. See Agriculture
Shaw, George Bernard
  Freedom and government; S.... 37
She. W. Troy; MP 168
Sherman, Nathaniel
  Connecticut forms a labor party; S...... 131
Shipping
  Interests succeed in ousting T. M. Woodward; EP 450
  Subsidies:
    And Italian trade. P. Ehlers; S.... 617
    Bland-Copeland bill, chances for; EP 30
    Bland-Copeland bill will not be passed; EP 142
    Merchant marine, kept. O. G. Villard; S.... 667
    Racket; revelations on mail rates; EP 451
    Representative Brewster's defection in opposition to bill; EP......... 58
    United fruit company mail contract cancelled; EP 698
Shipworkers, Camden, on strike. L. Rogin; S 188
  Appeal 247
Shirt sleeves, appearance is called disorderly conduct in New York; EP.......... 199
Shoemaker, Joseph A., murdered by Tampa mob; EP 726
Silver; price decline; EP 226
  Purchases, discontinuance by United States, and effect; E.... 729
    See also China
Simonds, Frank H.
  On imperialism and security; C....408; see also 340, 343
  Sanctions, and their consequences; C......710; see also E.... 524
Simpson, George
  Local 22, dressmakers' union; S....... 384
  Revolutionary policy publishing association; C 45
Sinclair, Upton
  Reply to Stolberg; C..535; see also.... 344
Slaff, George and Samuel
  Supreme court aids the utilities; S.... 373
Slight case of murder, a. J. W. Krutch; D.. 364
Smedley, Agnes
  Chinese press, corrupt; S.... 8
So red the rose. M. Van Doren; MP.... 724
Social security board; appointment of V. Miles; EP.... 367
Social credit; victory of W. Aberhart in Alberta; EP.... 254
Social security; under the New deal. A. Epstein; S.... 261
  Wagner-Lewis bill, shortcomings; EP.. 3
Socialism; medicine under. J. Manlet; C.215; see also 109
  Middle class under. L. Corey; S..238; see also C.... 297
Socialist party
  Meeting with communists, New York; EP 663
  Revolutionary element. G. Simpson; C.. 45
  Split over attitude toward communists; EP 698
  Stolberg, B., and the party. J. F. Sullivan and A. G. McDowell; letters.... 74
  United front needed. H. Broun; S.... 673
  What it wants. D. Allen; C.......... 101
Solow, Herbert
  Sacramento defense; C.... 467
Sonora products corporation, affairs of. W. Francis; S....149; see also EP..... 663
South, the; chain gangs. M. Page; S...... 561
    See also Agriculture
Soviet Russia. See Russia
Speech, freedom of. See Freedom of speech and press
Spending, government. S. Chase; S....... 613
Squaring the circle. J. W. Krutch; D.490; see also D..........518; C.......... 590
Stage censorship. See Censorship, stage
Stamp, Sir Josiah, impressions of America; EP 87
Stannard, Doctor Amy N., removal from federal parole board. R. G. Swing; S. 155
Steel, German, not for Triborough bridge; EP........605; see also C.......... 742
Steel industry, Tammany halls methods. I. Feinstein; S.... 710
Stein, Rose M.
  Pittsburgh university; academic cossacks; S..........105; see also C.......... 186
Steuer, Max D.; appointment, and the mortgage scandals. S. Grafton; S........ 705
Stewart, Maxwell S.
  Italy's economic situation; S.......... 457
  Mexico, foreign exploitation; S........ 323
  Mussolini's dream of empire; S........ 402
  Recovery, paradoxes of; S............ 529
Stewart, Raymond, murder, and torture of accused Negroes. R. W. Horton; S.. 674
Stolberg, Benjamin, and the Socialist party. J. F. Sullivan and A. G. McDowell; letters 74
  Article on Negro chauvinism, comment on; C.... 16

Article on Socialist party today criticised. G. Simpson; C.................. 45
Long, Huey; S......344; see also C.... 535
Workmen's circle, article on; comment; C 18
Strike-breakers. See Strikes
Strikes
"Conspiracy" charged in Brooklyn department store strike; EP............ 550
Dead in battles between haves and havenots; E........................... 89
Fargo, North Dakota. S. P. Puner; S............20; see also C......... 157
Strike-breaker number one. Book, "I break strikes! The technique of Pearl L. Bergoff," by E. Levinson. H. Wolf; S............................ 568
See also Amsterdam News; Automobiles; Coal miners, American; Consumers' research; Cotton; Cotton pickers; Lumber; May's department store; Minneapolis; Mother lode; Shipworkers; Terre Haute, Indiana; Works progress administration
Strout, Richard Lee
Radio nostrum racket; S..65; see also C. 510
Stuyvesant high school. See Academic freedom
Subsidies, shipping. See Shipping
Suez canal blocked! O. G. Villard; S.... 371
Closing, possible, and control; EP...... 281
Suicide rate, Budapest; EP................ 86
Sullivan, John F.
Stolberg, B., and the Socialist party; C. 74
Sulzberger, Arthur Hays, attitude toward American newspaper guild. H. Broun; S 385
Summer theaters. See Theater, the Superman, making of, views on. A. Carrel; E 370
Supreme court, United States
Aids the utilities. G. and S. Slaff; S.. 373
And democracy. L. B. Boudin; S.... 40
Fallacies about. M. R. Cohen; S...... 39
Value of judicial review. O. K. Fraenkel; S............................. 42
Swing, Raymond Gram
After the elections; S................. 587
Case for sanctions; S................. 641
Civilian conservation camps, take the army out; S...................... 459
Constitution, saving; S................ 435
"Education" as a racket; S............ 11
Holding companies' lobby; S.......... 155
Price of Hopkins victory; S.......... 375
Virgin islands, corruption; S.......... 155
Virgin islands, storm over; S.......... 95

T

TVA. See Tennessee valley authority
Tacoma, Washington. See Lumber
Taming of the shrew, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 448
Tammany hall. See New York city
Tampa, Florida, three mobbed by vigilantes; one dies; EP...................... 726
Tariff, discrimination; E.................. 342
Tariff, United States
Reciprocity agreement with Canada; EP ....578; E........... 608
Reciprocity negotiations with Canada; EP 311
Reciprocity pact with Colombia, and others; EP......................... 450
Reciprocity treaty with Canada; effect on coming presidential campaign; EP. 606
Tax exempt bonds. See Finance, public
Tax, income. See Income tax
Taxation. See Finance, public
Teachers
License refused to New York woman because of overweight; EP............ 115
Loyalty oath; EP...................... 422
Married, discrimination against; EP.... 115
"Teaching" and "advocating"; EP..... 635
See also Academic freedom; Unemployment relief—New York city
Teachers' union, crisis in. A. Lefkowitz and united committee to save the union; S.........410; see also C.......... 591
Telegraph, freedom of; C.................. 621
Tennessee Valley authority; act found constitutional by United States court of appeals; EP........................ 113
Terre Haute, Indiana, general strike; EP.. 142
Prevention planned by "law and order" group 247
Textile industry. See Cotton-textile industry
Thaelman, Ernst, fight for. J. Croll; C.... 130
Theater, the
Broadway prosperous; E.............. 702
Critics to award medal to best new play by American author; EP........... 523
Gangsters and verse, in Winterset; E.. 638
Summer theaters; E.................. 62
Modern, meaning of:
I. Condescension of the critics. J. W. Krutch; S.............. 269
II. The Shavian dilemma. J. W. Krutch; S.................. 291
III. The American tradition. J. W. Krutch; S.................. 320
IV. The new dispensation. J. W. Krutch; S.................. 351
See also Censorship, theater; G., M.; Krutch, J. W.; V. D., D.; G., M; M., M.
Three musketeers, the. M. Van Doren; MP 604
Third degree. See Police
Third party. See Party, new, liberal
Thomas, Norman
Indiana Hitlerism; S.................. 324
Thomas, Norman, at Madison square garden meeting. H. Broun; S............. 673
Tobacco road, play, attacked and defended; E..........582; see also C......... 741
Townsend plan. See Old-age pensions
Toys for children of miners, appeal for. A. Sailer; C.......................... 712
Trade, foreign; George N. Peek, resignation, and muddled views; EP............ 662
Training, military. See Military training
Transjordania. See Jews
Trappers. See Louisiana
Transit. See New York city
Treason or anarchy. L. Marder and R. N. Baldwin; C......565; see also E.... 453
Treasury department under Morgenthau. P. W. Ward; S....182; see also C.... 383
Triborough bridge, German steel barred; EP........605; see also C.......... 742
Trilling, L. R.
Seeks biographical material on C. D. Warner; C.......................... 742
Trotzky, Nathalie L.
Trotzky, S., arrest of; C.............. 45
Trotzky, Sergei, arrest. N. L. Trotzky; C.. 45
Troy, William
Becky Sharp; MP.................... 28
Escapade; MP........................ 112
Museum of modern art film library; S.. 112
Oil for the lamps of China; MP....... 56
Rainer, Luise, American debut; MP.... 112
She; MP............................ 168
Troy, William; resigns as film critic of The Nation; will teach at Bennington college; EP............................ 339
Tuan Sze-tsun, prayer for peace; E........ 314
Tugwell, R. G.
Resettlement case records; C........742; see also EP........................ 579
Twain, Mark, a century of. M. Van Doren; S 472
Tydings-McCormick bill. See Freedom of press and speech

U

USSR. See Russia
Unemployment
Aliens, Dies bill for deportation; EP. 85
Estimates of numbers; EP............ 726
Germany. See Germany.
"Success" of battle against, according to W. Lippmann; EP................ 282
Unemployment relief
Administration of work relief; conflict between Ickes and Hopkins; EP...... 337
Federal, suspension of; EP............ 661
Government program; E............... 4
Hopkins victory, price of. R. G. Swing; S 375
New York city:
Play-school teachers discharged; EP 254
Relief workers organize against wage cuts; EP...................... 171
Standards being reduced; E....... 581
Works progress administration action on refusal of "security wage"; EP 254
Recipients' alleged refusal to take jobs; E 144, 229
Spending program, foolish, of Roosevelt administration; E.................. 88
Supplementary relief, who gets? C. H. Grattan; S......................... 125
Willingness to work, and relief. H. Broun; S.......................... 161
Works progress administration. H. S. Johnson in charge in New York city; EP 31
Works progress administration laborers riot at Astor housing project, New York city; EP....339; see also EP.. 395
Work-relief fiasco; E.................. 453
Unfit to print. I. Feinstein; S.............. 740
Union of soviet socialist republics. See Russia
Unions, company and others. See Labor unions
United fruit company mail contract cancelled; EP 698
United gas improvement company, Tammany hall methods. I. Feinstein; S....... 710
United States
And the next war; E.................. 228
England and the United States. O. G. Villard; S......63; see also C...... 742
Government; importance of conferences between senate and house; EP...... 142
Government spending. S. Chase; S.... 613
Neutrality policy; E.................. 425
New deal; "social security" under. A. Epstein; S......................... 261
Story in pictures; E.................. 426
See also Finance, public
Utilities, public. See Public utilities
Universities. See Colleges

V

V. D., D.
Blind alley; D....................... 490
Valentine, Police commissioner, advocates lawlessness by police; EP.............. 550
Valéry, Paul, interview with. D. Dudley; S. 331
Van Doren, Carl
Langstroth, L., biography in Dictionary of American biography; C.103; see also E 6
Van Doren, Mark
Century of Mark Twain; S........... 472
Cornetist, the; P.................... 21
Crime and punishment; MP........... 658
Dernier milliardaire, le; MP.......... 548
Frisco kid; MP...................... 724
Maternelle, la; MP.................. 548
Midsummer night's dream, a; MP...... 491
Mutiny on the Bounty, the; MP....... 658
New Gulliver, the; MP............... 604
Red army days; MP.................. 548
Rendezvous; MP.................... 604
So red the rose; MP................. 724
Three musketeers; MP............... 604
Way down east; MP.................. 604
Van Gogh, exhibition. W. Pach; A........ 751
Van Sweringens, operations and come-back; EP............41; EP.............. 422
Vanity Fair; cartoon of emperor of Japan angers Japanese; EP................ 169
Vanity fair portfolio of modern French art; E 33
Vilar, Cesar. See Cuba
Villard, Oswald Garrison
Issues and men:
British election a referendum on League of Nations; S............ 639
Bryan, W. J., honor to; S.......... 583
England and the United States; S........63; see also C......... 742
Germany, government by gangsters; S 147
Home after vacation; S............ 119
"If this be treason," play; S....... 399
Institute of human relations conference; S....................... 315
Lamont, Thomas W., defends the Morgans; S..................... 527
Lansbury, George; S.............. 499
Lansing, R., self-revealed; S...... 427
McAdams, Clark, death; S........ 703
Merchant marine, kept; S.......... 667
Mirage of gold; Klondike; S...... 91
Morgan, house of, and neutrality in world war; S.................. 555
Morgans and the American entry into the world war; S.......... 612
Navy, United States, inefficient; S. 175
Railroads, progress beginning; S... 203
Roosevelt strategy fails; S......... 731
Russia aids the Jews;..231; see also C.........326; C............... 409
Russian progress at home—enmity abroad; S........................ 35
Sanctions against Mussolini; S.... 343
Senators Wagner, Nye, and others; S 259
Suez canal blocked! S............. 371
United States narcotic farm; S.... 7
War in Ethiopia; S................ 287
War, prevention; "If this be treason," play; S..................... 399
War, the, and pacifists; S......... 455
Virgin islands, of the United States; corruption. R. G. Swing; S........... 155
Storm over. R. G. Swing; S.......... 95
Viton, Albert
After Ethiopia—England? S........... 429
Vocational education. See Education

W

W., J.
Westchester county; academic freedom in; S............................. 107
Wagner act. See Labor
Wagner-Lewis bill. See Social security
Waiters, underpaid. E. M. Herrick; S..... 159
Waiting for Lefty, play, barred from Provincetown, Massachusetts; EP.......... 199
Walgreen company's treatment of employees. J. Brown; C......................... 215
"Walker, Thomas." See Green, R.
Wallace, George E., loses job for opposition to Long.............................. 192
Wang Ching-wei, attempted assassination; EP 549

War
  Civilization and barbarism; Ct........ 525
  Dying for civilization and democracy. Fritz; Ct........ 428
  Isolationists, and military sanctions; EP 605
  Mars, masks of. Fritz; Ct........ 500
  Next, and the United States; E...... 228
  Prevention; "If this be treason," play. O. G. Villard; S........ 399
  Sanctions or war? E........ 256
    See also Neutrality; Pacifism
War against crime, disease, poverty, corruption and imperialism suggested. Fritz; Ct........ 528
War, European. See World war
Ward, Paul W.
  Cummings, Attorney General; S........ 14
  Hull house on Pennsylvania avenue; S. 71
  Morgenthau, H., and his friends; S..182; see also C........ 383
  Power lobby; S........ 233
  Roosevelt keeps his vow; S........ 347
  Roosevelt's hollow triumph; S........ 293
Ware, Doctor Caroline F.; rejected by university of Wyoming because of marriage; EP........ 58
Warne, Colston E.
  Not dropped from university of Pittsburgh; C......186; see also........ 105
Warner, Charles Dudley; biographical material sought. L. R. Trilling; C..... 742
Warner, Ruby; dismissal from Valhalla, N. Y., school. J. W.; S........ 107
Warnick, J., deportation follows acquittal. E. Besig; C........ 620
Washington, District of Columbia; anti-red law proposed; EP........ 31
Watson, Morris. See Newspapers—American newspaper guild
Way down east. M. Van Doren; MP...... 604
Weep for the virgins. J. W. Krutch; D.... 722
Welfare index, labor. See Labor
West, George P.
  Japanese in California; C....130; see also C........ 244
West, middle. See Middle west
Westchester county; academic freedom in. J. W.; S........ 107
Whatever goes up. J. W. Krutch; D...... 694
Wheeler-Rayburn bill. See Public utilities
White, E. Michael, and W. Maslow
  New York's power yardstick; S........ 430
White, Walter
  National association for advancement of colored people and the Amsterdam News; C......711; see also........ 567
Widick, B. J.
  Green, W., two defeats for; S........ 412
Wilcox, Grafton S.
  Resettlement case records; C.......742; see also EP........ 579
William Tell. R. Giroux; MP........ 447
Winterset. J. W. Krutch; D..........420; see also E........ 638
Wisconsin; "people's front." H. Christian; S 714
Withers, William
  Menace of tax-exempt bonds; S........ 241
Wolf, Herman
  Strike-breaker number one; S........ 568
Woltman, Fred
  Utility companies, busy; S........ 154
Women; best-dressed; EP........ 662
  Married, barred from staff of university of Wyoming; EP........ 58
Wood, Alice, dismissal from Washington school in 1919; EP........ 31
Woodward, Thomas M., ousting from Shipping board bureau; EP........ 450
Work relief. See Unemployment relief
Works progress administration; strike; E.... 201
    See also Unemployment relief
Works, public. See Public works
World peaceways, radio broadcasting; EP.... 367
World war
  Bryan, W. J., and others, honor to, for course in war. O. G. Villard; S.... 583
  Lansing's war memoirs. O. G. Villard; S........ 427
  Morgan, house of, and "neutrality." O. G. Villard; S........ 555
  Morgans and American entry into war. O. G. Villard; S........ 612
  Morgans defended by T. W. Lamont. O. G. Villard; S........ 527
  War, the, and pacifism. O. G. Villard; S 455
Writers. See Authors
"Wuthering heights" praised. B. J. Fried; C 620
Wyoming, university of; rejects married women from its staff; EP........ 58

Y

Youth in depression; National youth administration; EP........ 30

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

Achievement of T. S. Eliot. F. O. Matthiessen; B........ 478
Adams, Franklin P.
  Diary of our own Samuel Pepys, the: 1911-1934; B........ 687
Adams, Grace; R........ 51
Aiken, Conrad
  King Coffin; B........ 628
Alexander II, biography. S. Graham; AN.. 112
Allen, James Lane, and the genteel tradition. G. C. Knight; B........ 220
America faces the barricades. J. L. Spivak; R........ 163
American messiahs. The unofficial observer; B........ 80
American philosophy, today and tomorrow. Edited by H. M. Kallen and S. Hook; B........ 749
American writers' congress. Edited by H. Hart: B........ 600
Amy Lowell. S. F. Damon; B........ 684
Anderson, Forrest
  Sea pieces and other poems; AN...... 750
Angoff, Charles; R........22, 136, 220
Anthology of world prose, an. Edited by C. Van Doren; B........ 516
Appel, Benjamin
  Four roads to death; AN........ 280
Art and industry. H. Read; B........ 222
Art of Renoir, the. A. C. Barnes and V. De Mazia; B........ 250
Arthur, George R.
  Life on the Negro frontier; B........ 53
Asiatics, the. F. Prokosch; B........ 572
Asylum. W. C. Seabrook; AN........ 196
At Madame Bonnard's. J. Vogel; B........ 658
Auden, W. H., and C. Isherwood
  Dog beneath the skin, the; B........ 626

B

Back to work: The story of the P. W. A. H. L. Ickes; B........ 80
Barbusse, Henri
  Stalin; B........ 656
Barnes, Albert C., and V. De Mazia
  Art of Renoir, the; B........ 250
Barnes, Harry Elmer (with collaboration of H. David)
  History of western civilization, the; B.. 359
Barnes, Harry Elmer; R........ 80
Barnes, Joseph; R........ 305
Barzun, Jacques; R........ 488
Basler, Roy P.
  Lincoln legend, the; AN........ 419
Bates, Ernest Sutherland; R........ 195
Becker, Carl; R........ 681
Beckhart, Benjamin Haggott; R........ 52
Benson, E. M.; R........ 222
Beres, David; R........ 164
Berryman, John McAlpin; R........ 630
Bessie, Alvah C.
  Dwell in the wilderness; B........ 278
Bichowsky, Doctor F. Russell
  Is the navy ready? O. G. Villard; S.. 175
Bingham, Alfred M.
  Insurgent America; B........ 625
Black reconstruction in America. W. E. B. Du Bois; B........ 108
Blackmur, R. P.
  Double agent, the; B........ 656
Blackmur, R. P.; R........478, 516
Blanshard, Paul; R........ 24
Booth, William, biography. St. John Ervine; B........ 81
Boss rule—portraits in city politics. J. T. Salter; B........ 24
Bourke-White, Margaret; R........ 135
Brenner, Anita; R........ 221
Bridges, Robert, letters of G. M. Hopkins to him; B........ 109
Briffault, Robert
  Europa: The days of ignorance; B..... 304
Brindze, Ruth
  How to spend money; B........ 23
Brinig, Myron
  Sun sets in the west, the; AN........ 489
Brothers three. J. M. Oskison; AN........ 750
Brougham, Lord. G. T. Garratt; B........ 488
Browder, Earl
  Communism in the United States; B.... 546
Brown, W. Norman; R........ 307
Bukharin, N. I., and others
  Marxism and modern thought; B...... 689
Bunin, Ivan
  Elaghin affair, the; AN........ 167
Burke, Kenneth; R........ 166
Burnham, James; R........ 416
Burtt, E. A.; R........ 485
Butterfield 8. J. O'Hara; B........ 545
Byron: Romantic paradox. W. J. Calvert; B 52

C

Cabell, Branch
  Smith. A sylvan interlude; B........ 630
Cabot, Hugh
  Doctor's bill, the; B...109; see also C.. 215
Cairns, Huntington
  Law and the social sciences; B........ 84
Caldwell, Erskine
  Some American people; B........ 518
Callaghan, Morley
  They shall inherit the earth; B........ 361
Calvert, William J.
  Byron: Romantic paradox; B........ 52
Cardozo, Benjamin N.: A liberal mind in action. J. P. Pollard; B........ 250
Carrel, Alexis
  Man, the unknown; E......370; B..... 748
Cat across the path. R. Feiner; AN....... 140
Cate, W. A.
  Lucius Q. Lamar: Secession and reunion; B........ 574
Cather, Willa
  Lucy Gayheart; B........ 193
Caulaincourt, General de, Duke of Vicenza
  With Napoleon in Russia; B........ 691
Cell 202—Sing Sing. L. E. Lawes; B..... 602
Cézanne, Paul. G. Mack; B........ 488
Chamberlin, William Henry
  Russian revolution, the, 1917-1921; B... 387
Chambers, R. W.
  Thomas More; B........ 249
Chances of morbid inheritance, the. Edited by C. P. Blacker; B........ 164
Chaos in Mexico. C. S. Macfarland; B.... 194
Chapin, F. Stuart; R........ 359
Chase, Stuart
  Government in business; B........ 478
Churchill, Winston
  Marlborough, his life and times. Volume III, 1702-1704. Volume IV, 1704-1705; B........ 83
Cicero. The fall of a republic. G. C. Richards; AN........ 418
Citizen and his government, the. A. E. Smith; B........ 80
Civilizations of the east, the: Volume III, China; Volume IV, Japan. R. Grousset; B........ 54
Codices Latini antiquores: A palaeographical guide to Latin manuscripts prior to the ninth century. Edited by E. A. Lowe; B........ 692
Codman, Florence; R........370, 721
Communism, three books on. J. F. Hecker; B........ 137
Communism in the United States. E. Browder; B........ 546
Condemned to live. J. Rabener; AN........ 55
Conrad, Jessie
  Joseph Conrad and his circle; B........ 444
Consumer seeks a way, the. C. Foreman and M. Ross; B........ 23
Controlling depressions. P. H. Douglas; B.. 21
Corey, Lewis
  Crisis of the middle class, the; B....... 625
Counterfeit. A. Kallet; B........ 23
Crisis of the middle class, the. L. Corey; B. 625
Cronyn, George
  Fortune and men's eyes; B........ 82
Crosby, Alexander; R...332; see also EP.... 395
Cruse, Amy
  Victorians and their reading, the; AN.. 750
Cullen, Countee
  Medea and some poems, the; B........ 336
Cunningham, William
  Green corn rebellion, the; B........ 417
Curtis, Merle
  Social ideas of American educators, the; B........ 195
Curtiss, Mina; B........ 628

D

Damon, S. Foster
  Amy Lowell; B........ 684
Darby, Hugh H.; R........ 573
David, Henry; collaborator with H. E. Barnes
  History of western civilization, the; B.. 359
Davies, W. H.
  Love poems; AN........ 280
  Poems of W. H. Davies; AN........ 280
Davis, H. L.
  Honey in the horn; B........ 248
Dean, Vera Micheles; R........ 746
Deep dark river. R. Rylee; B........ 111
De Mazia, Violette, and A. C. Barnes
  Art of Renoir, the; B........ 250
Den Doolard, A.
  Express to the east; B

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

- Derleth, August
  - Place of hawks; AN ... 167
- Dewey, John
  - Liberalism and social action; B ... 303
- Diary of our own Samuel Pepys, the: 1911-1934. F. P. A. (Franklin P. Adams); B ... 687
- Dickinson, Emily
  - Unpublished poems. Edited by M. D. Bianchi and A. L. Hampson; B ... 746
- Dictionary of modern American usage, a. H. W. Horwill; B ... 418
- Diplomacy of imperialism, the, 1890-1902. W. L. Langer; B ... 600
- Dixon, Richard Watson, letters; B ... 109
- Doctor's bill, the. H. Cabot; B....109; see also C ... 215
- Dog beneath the skin, the. W. H. Auden and C. Isherwood; B ... 626
- Don Fernando, or variations on some Spanish themes. W. S. Maugham; B ... 221
- Doob, Leonard W.
  - Propaganda, its psychology and technique; B ... 681
- Doolard, A. Den
  - Express to the east; B ... 572
- Dorfman, Joseph
  - Thorstein Veblen and his America; B ... 194
- Double agent, the. R. P. Blackmur; B ... 656
- Douglas, Paul H.
  - Controlling depressions; B ... 21
- Du Bois, W. E. Burghardt
  - Black reconstruction in America; B ... 108
- Du Pont dynasty, the. J. K. Winkler; B ... 389
- Durant, Will
  - Story of civilization, the. Part I: Our oriental heritage; B ... 307
- Duranty, Walter
  - I write [illegible] I please; B ... 626
- Dwell in the wilderness. A. C. Bessie; B ... 278
- Dwight Morrow. H. Nicolson; B ... 546

E

- Early letters of William and Dorothy Wordsworth (1787-1805); B ... 484
- Elaghin affair, the. I. Bunin; AN ... 167
- Eliot, T. S.
  - Murder in the cathedral; B ... 417
- Eliot, T. S., the achievement of. F. O. Matthiessen; B ... 478
- Ellis, Havelock
  - From Rousseau to Proust; B ... 683
- Encyclopedia of the social sciences. E. R. A. Seligman, editor-in-chief; Alvin Johnson, associate editor; B ... 362
- Erskine, John
  - Solomon, my son!; B ... 140
- Ervine, St. John
  - God's soldier; General William Booth; B ... 81
- Eugene O'Neill: A poet's quest. R. D. Skinner; B ... 415
- Euripides
  - Medea. C. Cullen; B ... 337
- Europa: The days of ignorance. R. Briffault; B ... 304
- European experiences. M. D. Luhan; B ... 628
- Express to the east. A. Den Doolard. Translated by D. C. De Jong; B ... 572
- Eyes on the world. M. Schuster; B ... 135

F

- F.P.A. (Franklin P. Adams)
  - Diary of our own Samuel Pepys, the: 1911-1934; B ... 687
- Farrell, James T.
  - Guillotine party; B ... 484
- Fearing, Kenneth
  - Poems. With an introduction by E. Dahlberg; B ... 138
- Feiner, Ruth
  - Cat across the path; AN ... 140
- Feliciana. S. Young; AN ... 224
- Fellow creatures. C. D. Stewart; E....6; see also C ... 103
- Festival at Meron. H. Sackler; B ... 630
- Finer, Herman
  - Mussolini's Italy; B ... 746
- First century of American literature, the. 1770-1870. F. L. Pattee; B ... 136
- Fischer, Louis; R ... 387
- Fisher, H. A. L.
  - History of Europe, a. Ancient and mediaeval. Volume I.; AN ... 280
- Fisher, Irving
  - 100% money; B ... 52
- Fletcher, John Gould
  - XXIV elegies; AN ... 391
- Flowering Judas and other stories. K. A. Porter; B ... 517
- Foreman, Clark, and M. Ross
  - Consumer seeks a way, the; B ... 23
- Forsythe, Robert
  - Redder than the rose; AN ... 279
- Fortune and men's eyes. G. Cronyn; B ... 82
- Forward—march! The photographic record of America in the world war and the post war social upheaval. F. J. Mackey and M. W. Jernegan; B ... 363
- Four independents. D. Sargent; B ... 165
- Four roads to death. B. Appel; AN ... 280
- Frazier, E. Franklin; R ... 53
- Freedom of the press. G. Seldes; B....332; see also EP ... 395
- From Rousseau to Proust. H. Ellis; B ... 683
- Fuel. W. Gibson; AN ... 252
- Fülöp-Miller, Rene
  - Leaders, dreamers and rebels; letter by author in reply to review by M. Nomad; C..102; letter by Nomad ... 297
- Furys, the. J. Hanley; B ... 135

G

- Galantiere, Lewis; R ... 487
- Garratt, G. T.
  - Lord Brougham; B ... 488
- Gauvreau, Emile
  - What so proudly we hailed; B ... 22
- Gay reformer, the: Profits before plenty under Franklin D. Roosevelt. M. A. Hallgren; B ... 721
- Genetics. H. S. Jennings; B ... 573
- Genzmer, George; R ... 418
- Gershoy, Leo; R ... 691
- Gibson, Wilfrid
  - Fuel; AN ... 252
- Gilbert and Sullivan. H. Pearson; B ... 474
- Glasgow, Ellen
  - Vein of iron; B ... 277
- Glassgold, C. Adolph; R ... 488
- God's soldier: General William Booth. St. John Ervine; B ... 81
- Goldberg, David
  - Sussman sees it through. A reappraisal of the Jewish position under the soviets; B........163; see also C ... 297
- Golden apples. M. K. Rawlings; AN ... 750
- Government in business. S. Chase; B ... 478
- Graham, Stephen
  - Tsar of freedom: The life and reign of Alexander II.; AN ... 112
- Green corn rebellion, the. W. Cunningham; B ... 417
- Grimké, Sarah, Theodore Dwight Weld, and Angelina Grimké Weld, the letters of, 1822-1844. Edited by Gilbert H. Barnes and Dwight L. Dumond; AN ... 196
- Grinding mill, the. Reminiscences of war and revolution in Russia (1913-1920). Prince A. Lobanov-Rostovsky; B ... 279
- Grousset, René
  - Civilizations of the east, the: Volume III, China; volume IV, Japan; B ... 54
- Gruen, William; R ... 193
- Guérard, Albert
  - Literature and society; B ... 475
- Guignebert, Charles
  - Jesus; B ... 747
- Guillotine party. J. T. Farrell; B ... 484

H

- Hacker, Louis M.; R ... 389, 625
- Hallgren, Mauritz A.
  - Gay reformer, the: Profits before plenty under Franklin D. Roosevelt; B ... 721
- Hanley, James
  - Furys, the; B ... 135
- Hargrave, John
  - Summer time ends; B ... 721
- Harris, Abram L.; R ... 21, 689
- Hecker, Julius F.
  - Moscow dialogues; B ... 137
  - Religion and communism; B ... 137
  - Russian sociology; B ... 137
- Hedwig, V. Randolph; AN ... 196
- Herberg, Will; R ... 574
- Heredity and disease. O. Mohr; B ... 164
- Heredity and disease, four books on; B ... 164
- Heritage. G. F. Hummel; AN ... 55
- Herskovits, Melville J.; R ... 308
- History of Europe, a: Ancient and mediaeval. Vol. I. H. A. L. Fisher; AN ... 280
- History of science, technology, and philosophy in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, a. A. Wolf; B ... 485
- History of western civilization, the. H. E. Barnes, with the collaboration of Henry David; B ... 359
- Hogben, Lancelot
  - Nature and nurture; B ... 164
- Honey in the horn. H. L. Davis; B ... 248
- Hook, Sidney; R ... 684
- Hopkins, Gerard Manley, letters; B ... 109
- Horse-shoe bottoms. T. Tippet; B ... 417
- Horwill, H. W.
  - Dictionary of modern American usage, a: B ... 418
- How to spend money. R. Brindze; B ... 23
- Hummel, George F.
  - Heritage; AN ... 55

I

- I break strikes! The technique of Pearl L. Bergoff. E. Levinson ... 568
- I was Hitler's prisoner. S. Lorant. Translated by J. Cleugh; B ... 335
- I write as I please. W. Duranty; B ... 626
- Ickes, Harold L.
  - Back to work: The story of the P.W.A.; B ... 80
- Influence of heredity on disease, the. L. S. Penrose; B ... 164
- Insurgent America. A. M. Bingham; B ... 625
- Intelligentsia of Great Britain, the. D. Mirsky; B ... 22[illegible]
- Invisible landscapes. E. L. Masters; B ... 445
- Is the navy ready? F. R. Bichowsky. O. G. Villard; S ... 175
- Isherwood, Christopher
  - Last of Mr. Norris, the; AN ... 112
- Isherwood, Christopher, and W. H. Auden
  - Dog beneath the skin, the; B ... 626
- It can't happen here. S. Lewis; B ... 516

J

- James, William, the thought and character of. R. B. Perry; B ... 684
- James Lane Allen and the genteel tradition. G. C. Knight; B ... 220
- Jeffers, Robinson
  - Solstice and other poems; B ... 480
- Jennings, H. S.
  - Genetics; B ... 573
- Jennings, H. S.; R ... 748
- Jensen, Carl Christian
  - Seventy times seven; B ... 630
- Jernegan, Marcus Wilson, and F. J. Mackey
  - Forward—march! The photographic record of America in the world war and the post war social upheaval; B ... 363
- Jesus. C. Guignebert; B ... 747
- Johnson, Charles S., and W. D. Weatherford
  - Race relations. Adjustment of whites and Negroes in the United States; B ... 53
- Johnson, Josephine
  - Winter orchard and other stories; B ... 220
- Jones, Gwynn
  - Richard Savage; B ... 359
- Joseph Conrad and his circle. J. Conrad; B 444

K

- Kallet, Arthur
  - Counterfeit; B ... 23
- Kang, Younghill; R ... 476
- Kantor, MacKinlay
  - Voice of Bugle Ann, the; AN ... 280
- Karl Marx. The story of his life. F. Mehring. Translated by E. Fitzgerald; B 719
- Kassil, Leo
  - Land of Shvambrania, the; AN ... 279
- Key, Francis Scott, biography. V. Weybright; AN ... 252
- King Coffin. C. Aiken; B ... 628
- King Jasper. E. A. Robinson; B ... 749
- "King Lehr" and the gilded age. E. D. Lehr; B ... 628
- King of the great clock tower, the. W. B. Yeats; AN ... 167
- Kitchin, George
  - Prisoner of the Ogpu; B ... 305
- Knight, Grant C.
  - James Lane Allen and the genteel tradition; B ... 220
- Koffka, Kurt
  - Principles of gestalt psychology; B ... 51
- Kohn, Hans; R ... 279
- Kronenberger, Louis; R ... 361, 480, 600, 720
- Krutch, Joseph Wood; R..359, 415, 474, 572, 682

L

- Labor relations boards. L. L. Lorwin and A. Wubnig; B ... 445
- Laidler, Harry
  - Socializing our democracy; AN ... 26
- Laidler, Harry; R ... 478
- Lamar, Lucius Q., biography. W. A. Cate; B ... 574
- Land of Shvambrania, the. L. Kassil; AN ... 279
- Land under England. J. O'Neill; B ... 248
- Langer, William L.
  - Diplomacy of imperialism, the. the, 1890-1902; B ... 600
- Langhof, Wolfgang
  - Rubber truncheon. L. Linke, translator; B ... 335
- Last of Mr. Norris, the. C. Isherwood; AN 112
- Law and the social sciences. H. Cairns; B ... 84
- Lawes, Lewis E.
  - Cell 202—Sing Sing; B ... 602
- Lawrence, T. E.
  - Seven pillars of wisdom. A triumph; B 545
- Leaders, dreamers and rebels. R. Fulop-Miller; letter by author on review by M. Nomad; C—102; letter by Nomad 297
- Lehr, Elizabeth Drexel
  - "King Lehr" and the gilded age; B ... 628
- Lehr, Harry S., biography. E. H. Lehr; B ... 628
- Leiserson, William M.; R ... 445
- Lendrum, Frederick C.; R ... 109 see also C ... 215
- Letters of Gerard Manley Hopkins to Robert Bridges, the, and the Correspondence of Gerard Manley Hopkins and Richard Watson Dixon. Edited by C. C. Abbott; B ... 109

Letters of Theodore Dwight Weld, Angelina Grimké Weld, and Sarah Grimké, the, 1822-1844. Edited by Gilbert H. Barnes and Dwight L. Dumond; AN.. 196
Levinson, Edward
  I break strikes! The technique of Pearl L. Bergoff........................ 568
Levy, Beryl Harold; R.................... 250
Lévy-Bruhl, Lucien
  Primitives and the supernatural; AN.. 391
Lewis, Sinclair
  It can't happen here; B............... 516
Lewisohn, Ludwig; R..................163
  see also C........................... 299
Liberalism and social action. J. Dewey; B 303
Life on the Negro frontier. G. R. Arthur; B 53
Lin Yutang
  My country and my people; B......... 476
Lincoln legend, the. R. P. Basler; AN..... 419
Lindsay, Vachell, biography. E. L. Masters; B 477
Literature and society. A. Guérard; B.... 475
Living with books. The art of book selection. H. E. Haines; B.............. 487
Livingston, Arthur; R..................... 516
Lobanov-Rostovsky, Prince A.
  Grinding mill, the. Reminiscences of war and revolution in Russia (1913-1920); B 279
Loederer, Richard A.
  Voodoo fire in Haiti. D. I. Vesey, translator; B........................... 308
Lorant, Stefan
  I was Hitler's prisoner; B............ 335
Lord Brougham. G. T. Garratt; B......... 488
Lore, Ludwig; R.............335, 482, 656, 719
Lorwin, Lewis L., and A. Wubnig
  Labor relations boards; B.............. 445
Love poems. W. H. Davies; AN........... 280
Lowell, Amy, biography. S. F. Damon; B 684
Lucius Q. Lamar. Secession and reunion. W. Armstead Cate; B.................. 574
Lucy Gayheart. W. Cather; B............ 193
Luhan, Mabel Dodge
  European experiences; B.............. 628
Lumpkin, Grace
  Sign for Cain, a; B................. 480
Lyon, Leverett S., and others
  National recovery administration, the; B 277

M

MacDonald, William; R..................... 83
Macfarland, Charles S.
  Chaos in Mexico; B.................. 194
Mack, Gerstle
  Paul Cézanne; B...................... 488
Mackey, Frank J., and M. W. Jernegan
  Forward—march! The photographic record of America in the world war and the post war social upheaval; B...... 363
Man of Aran. P. Mullen................... 56
Man, the unknown. A. Carrel; E..... 370; B 748
Marlborough, his life and times. Volume III, 1702-1704. Volume IV, 1704-1705. W. Churchill; B.................... 83
Marshall, Lenore G.
  Only the fear; AN.................... 196
Marx, Karl. The story of his life. F. Mehring. Translated by E. Fitzgerald; B 719
Marxism and modern thought. N. I. Bukharin and others; B................. 689
Mary queen of Scotland and the isles. S. Zweig. Translated by E. and C. Paul; B 306
Masters, Edgar Lee
  Invisible landscapes; B................ 445
  Vachel Lindsay; B.................... 477
Matthiessen, F. O.
  Achievement of T. S. Elliot, the; B... 478
Maugham, V. Somerset
  Don Fernando, or variations on some Spanish themes; B.................. 221
Mazia, Violette De, and A. C. Barnes
  Art of Renoir, the; B................. 250
McCarthy, Mary; R..........82, 220, 248, 278
McCoy, Horace
  They shoot horses, don't they? AN..... 279
Medea and some poems, the. C. Cullen; B 336
Mehring, Franz
  Karl Marx. The story of his life. E. Fitzgerald, translator; B............ 719
Mencken, H. L.; R........................ 444
Middle-class culture in Elizabethan England. L. B. Wright; B.................... 24
Millis, Walter; R......................... 363
Mirsky, Dmitri
  Intelligentsia of Great Britain, the; B 222
Mohr, Otto
  Heredity and disease; B............... 164
Moore, Merrill
  Six sides to a man; B............... 166
More, Paul Elmer, and American criticism. R. Shafer; AN....................... 224
More, Thomas, biography. R. Chambers; B. 249
Morrow, Donald
  Where Shakespeare stood. His part in the crucial struggles of his day; B... 627
Morrow, Dwight, biography. H. Nicolson; B 546
Moscow dialogues. J. F. Hecker; B....... 137
Mowrer, Edgar Ansel; R.................. 334
Mowrer, Paul Scott; R.................... 546
Mr. Aristotle. I. Silone; B............... 416
Mr. Justice Cardozo; A liberal mind in action. J. P. Pollard; B............. 250
Mullen, Pat
  Man of Aran.......................... 56
Murder in the cathedral. T. S. Eliot; B.... 417
Murray, Robert Hammond; R.............. 195
Mussolini's Italy. H. Finer; B........... 746
My country and my people. L. Yutang; B.. 476
Myers, L. H.
  Root and flower, the; B............... 361

N

National music. R. V. Williams; B........ 23
National recovery administration, the. L. S. Lyon, and others; B................. 277
Nature and nurture. L. Hogben; B....... 164
Nazi dictatorship, the; A study in social pathology and the politics of fascism. F. L. Schuman; B................. 334
Neilson, W. A.; R........................ 24
Neville, Helen; R...........140, 417, 446, 628
New America and the new world, the. H. G. Wells; B.......................... 80
Nicolson, Harold
  Dwight Morrow; B.................... 546
Niebuhr, Reinhold; R.............249, 303, 747
Nock, Albert Jay
  Our enemy, the state; B.............. 444
Nomad, Max; review of "Leaders, dreamers and rebels," by R. Fülöp-Miller; letter by author; C....................102;
Nuhn, Ferner; R......................... 518

O

Odum, Howard W.
  Regional approach to national social planning, the; AN..................... 419
O'Hara, John
  Butterfield 8; B...................... 545
On economic planning. Edited by M. L. Fledderus and M. van Kleeck; AN.. 252
100% money. I. Fisher; B................ 52
O'Neill, Eugene: A poet's quest. R. D. Skinner; B......................... 415
O'Neill, Joseph
  Land under England; B............... 248
Only the fear. L. G. Marshall; AN........ 196
Oskison, John M.
  Brothers three; AN.................. 750
Our enemy, the state. A. J. Nock; B..... 444

P

Parkes, H. B.; R....................194. 222
Parsons, Alice Beal; R................111, 221
Patmore, Derek
  Portrait of my family; B............. 657
Pattee, Fred Lewis
  First century of American literature, the. 1770-1870; B.................. 136
Paul Cézanne. G. Mack; B............... 488
Paul Elmer More and American criticism. R. Shafer; AN..................... 224
Pearson, Hesketh
  Gilbert and Sullivan; B............... 474
Penrose, L. S.
  Influence of heredity on disease; B.... 164
Perry, Ralph Barton
  Thought and character of William James, the; B.......................... 684
Place of hawks. A. Derleth; AN......... 167
Playthings of time. A. Zweig; AN......... 140
Plenn, Abel; R........................... 658
Poems, K. Fearing. With an introduction by E. Dahlberg; B................. 138
Poems: 1914-1934. H. Read; B........... 22
Pollard, Joseph P.
  Mr. Justice Cardozo; A liberal mind in Poems of W. H. Davies, the; AN.......... 280 action; B.......................... 250
Porter, Katherine Anne
  Flowering Judas and other stories; B.. 517
Portrait of my family. D. Patmore; B.... 657
Portraits and pamphlets. K. Radek; B.... 482
Primitives and the supernatural. L. Lévy-Bruhl; AN......................... 391
Principles of gestalt psychology. K. Koffka; B 51
Prisoner of the Ogpu. G. Kitchin; R...... 305
Pro patria, R. J. Sender; B.............. 390
Prokosch, Frederic
  Asiatics, the; B...................... 572
Proletarian literature in the United States. An anthology; B.................. 600
Propaganda, its psychology and technique. L. W. Doob; B....................... 681
Puritans and music in England and New England, the. P. A. Scholes; B..... 23

R

Rabener, Johann
  Condemned to live; AN............,. 55
Race relations. Adjustment of white and Negroes in the United States. W. D. Weatherford and C. S. Johnson; B.. 53
Radek, Karl
  Portraits and pamphlets; B............. 482
Rand, E. K.; R........................... 692
Randolph, Vance
  Hedwig; AN......................... 196
Rawlings, Marjorie Kinnan
  Golden apples; AN.................... 750
Read, Herbert
  Art and industry; B.................. 222
  Poems: 1914-1934; B.................. 22
Rebel war clerk's diary, a. Introduction and notes by H. Swiggott; AN.......... 55
Redder than the rose. R. Forsythe; AN.... 279
Redirecting education: Volume I, The United States. Edited by R. G. Tugwell and L. H. Keyserling; B............... 166
Regional approach to national social planning, the. H. W. Odum; AN........ 419
Regional reconstruction: A way out for the south. R. B. Vance; AN........... 419
Religion and communism. J. F. Hecker; B.. 137
Religion and science. B. Russell; B....... 682
Renoir, art of, the. A. C. Barnes and V. De Mazia; B....................... 250
Rice, Philip Blair; R.....22, 138, 445, 480, 626
Richard Savage. G. Jones; B............. 359
Richards, G. C.
  Cicero. The fall of a republic; AN.... 418
Robinson, Edwin Arlington
  King Jasper; B....................... 749
Romains, Jules
  World from below, the (Men of good will. Volume IV); B.............. 387
Root and the flower, the. L. H. Myers; B.. 361
Rorty, James; R.......................... 163
Ross, Michael, and C. Foreman
  Consumer seeks a way, the; B........ 23
Rourke, Constance; R..................... 23
Rowland, Benjamin, junior; R............. 54
Rubber truncheon. W. Langhof. Translated by L. Linke; B.................. 335
Russell, Bertrand
  Religion and science; B................ 682
Russia laughs. M. Zostchenko; AN........ 489
Russian revolution, the, 1917-1921. W. H. Chamberlin; B...................... 387
Russian sociology. J. F. Hecker; B........ 137
Rylee, Robert
  Deep dark river; B................... 111

S

Sackler, Harry
  Festival at Meron; B................. 630
Salter, J. A.
  Boss rule—Portraits in city politics; B.. 24
Samuel McIntire and the Sandersons. M. M. Swan; AN.......................... 26
Sargent, Daniel
  Four independents; B................. 165
Savage, Richard, biography. G. Jones; B... 359
Scheikévitch, Marie
  Time past; AN........................ 750
Scholes, Percy A.
  Puritans and music in England and New England, the; B.................. 23
Schrödinger, Erwin
  Science and the human temperament; B.. 193
Schuman, Frederick L.
  Nazi dictatorship, the: A study in social pathology and the politics of fascism; B 334
Schuman, Frederick L.; R................. 600
Schuster, M. Lincoln
  Eyes on the world; B................ 135
Science and the human temperament. E. Schrödinger; B..................... 193
Sea pieces and other poems. F. Anderson; AN 750
Seabrook, William C.
  Asylum; AN 196
Seagle, William; R....................... 84
Second hoeing. H. W. Sykes; AN........ 55
Seldes, George
  Freedom of the press; B...........332; see also EP....................... 395
Sender, Ramon J.
  Pro patria; B........................ 390
Seven pillars of wisdom. A triumph. T. E. Lawrence; B........................ 545
Seventy times seven. C. C. Jensen; B..... 630
Shafer, Robert
  Paul Elmer More and Amerwican criticism; AN 224
Shakespeare, three books on; B............ 627
Shakespeare's imagery and what it tells us. C. F. E. Spurgeon; B............... 627
Sign for Cain, a. G. Lumpkin; B......... 480
Silone, Ignazio
  Mr. Aristotle; B..................... 416
Six sides to a man. M. Moore; B......... 166

Skinner, Richard Dana
  Eugene O'Neill: A poet's quest; B..... 415
Smith, A. E.
  Citizen and his government, the; B.... 80
Smith: A sylvan interlude. B. Cabell; B... 630
Social ideas of American educators, the. M. Curti; B.......................... 195
Socializing our democracy. H. W. Laidler; AN 26
Solomon, my son! J. Erskine; B.......... 140
Solstice and other poems. R. Jeffers; B..... 480
Some American people. E. Caldwell; B.... 518
South. F. Wight; B....................... 446
Spangled banner. The story of Francis Scott Key. V. Weybright; AN....... 252
Spero, Sterling D.; R.................108, 546
Spivak, John L.
  America faces the barricades; B....... 163
Spurgeon, Caroline F. E.
  Shakespeare's imagery and what it tells us; B............................ 627
Stalin. H. Barbusse; B.................. 656
Stars look down, the. A. J. Cronin; B.... 389
Stearns, Harold E.
  Street I know, the; B................. 574
Stewart, Charles D.
  Fellow creatures; E..................6; see also C.......................... 103
Stewart, Maxwell S.; R...........277, 362, 416
Stillman, Clara Gruening; R............81, 306
Story of America in pictures. Arranged by A. C. Collins; E.................. 426
Story of civilization. Part I. Our oriental heritage. W. Durant; B........... 307
Street I know, the. H. E. Stearns; B..... 574
Summer time ends. J. Hargrave; B....... 721
Sun sets in the west, the. M. Brinig; AN.. 489
Sussman sees it through. A reappraisal of the Jewish position under the soviets. D. Goldberg; B.................163; see also C.......................... 297
Swan, Mabel M.
  Samuel McIntire and the Sandersons; AN 26
Swing, Raymond Gram; R.................. 444
Sykes, Hope Williams
  Second hoeing; AN.................... 55

T

They shall inherit the earth. M. Callaghan; B 361
They shoot horses, don't they? H. McCoy; AN 279
Thomas More. R. W. Chambers; B........ 249
Thorstein Veblen and his America. J. Dorfman; B............................ 194
Thought and character of William James, the. R. B. Perry; B.................... 684
Time past. M. Scheikévitch; AN.......... 750
Tippet, Tom
  Horse-shoe bottoms; B................. 417
Traven, B.
  Treasure of the Sierra Madre, the; B.. 79
Treasure of the Sierra Madre, the. B. Traven; B 79
Trial balances. Edited by A. Winslow; B.. 601
Trilling, Lionel; R.................52, 484, 545
Troy, William; R....56, 135, 193, 248, 304, 387, 475, 517, 572, 656, 683
Tsar of freedom: The life and reign of Alexander II. S. Graham; AN...... 112
Twenty-four elegies. J. G. Fletcher; AN... 391

U

Unofficial observer, the American messiahs; B................. 80
Unpublished poems of Emily Dickinson. Edited by M. D. Bianchi and A. L. Hampson; B........................ 746

V

Vachel Lindsay. E. L. Masters; B......... 477
Vance, Rupert B.
  Regional reconstruction: A way out for the south; AN...................... 419
Van Doren, Carl; R...................... 574
Van Doren, Dorothy; R..23, 277, 389, 484, 602
Van Doren, Mark; R....361, 417, 545, 627, 687, 746
Vanity fair portfolio of modern French art; E 33
Veblein, Thorstein, and his America. J. Dorfman; B........................ 194
Vein of iron. E. Glasgow; B............. 277
Victorians and their reading, the. A. Cruse; AN 750
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R.............. 626
Vivas, Eliseo; R......................... 250
Vogel, Joseph
  At Madame Bonnard's; B............... 658
Voice of Bugle Ann, the. M. Kantor; AN.. 280
Voodoo fire in Haiti. R. A. Loederer. Translated by D. I. Vesey; B....... 308

W

Wade, Mason; R......................... 165
Walton, Eda Lou; R....109, 166, 477, 601, 684, 749
War tomorrow—will we keep out? Edited by Ryllis Alexander Goslin; B....... 416
Ward, Paul W.; R........................ 721
We too are drifting. G. Wilhelm; B....... 221
We who are about to die. D. Lamson; B.. 602
Weatherford, Willis D., and C. S. Johnson
  Race relations. Adjustment of whites and Negroes in the United States; B..... 53
Welch, Livingston; R..................... 749
Weld, Theodore Dwight, Angelina Grimké Weld, and Sarah Grimké, the letters of, 1822-1844. Edited by Gilbert H. Barnes and Dwight L. Dumond; AN 196
Wells, H. G.
  New America and the new world, the; B 80
Weybright, Victor
  Spangled banner. The story of Francis Scott Key; AN.................... 252
What happens in Hamlet. J. D. Wilson; B 627
What so proudly we hailed. E. Gauvreau; B 22
Where Shakespeare stood. His part in the crucial struggles of his day. D. Morrow; B............................. 627
Wight, Frederick
  South; B............................. 446
Wilhelm, Gale
  We too are drifting; B................ 221
Williams, Ralph Vaughn
  National music; B.................... 23
Wilson, J. Dover
  What happens in Hamlet; B........... 627
Winkler, John K.
  Du Pont dynasty, the; B.............. 389
Winter orchard and other stories. J. Johnson; B............................ 220
With Napoleon in Russia. The memoirs of General de Caulaincourt, duke of Vicenza; B......................... 691
Wolf, A.
  History of science, technology, and philosophy in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, a; B................ 485
Woollcott reader, the. Compiled by A. Woollcott; B............................ 720
Wordsworth, William and Dorothy, the early letters of (1787-1805); B........... 484
World from below, the (Men of good will. Volume IV). J. Romains; B......... 387
Wright, Louis B.
  Middle-class culture in Elizabethan England; B 24
Wubnig, Arthur, and L. L. Lorwin
  Labor relations boards; B.............. 445

X

XXIV elegies. J. G. Fletcher; AN........ 391

Y

Yeats, William Butler
  King of the great clock tower, the; AN 167
Young, Stark
  Feliciana; AN........................ 224
Younghill, Kang; R....................... 476
Yutang, Lin
  My country and my people; B......... 476

Z

Zaturenska, Marya; R..................... 657
Zostchenko, Mikhail
  Russia laughs; AN.................... 489
Zweig, Arnold
  Playthings of time; B................. 140
Zweig, Stefan
  Mary queen of Scotland and the isles. E. and C. Paul, translators; B............ 306

55954

The Nation
FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 3, 1935 No. 3652

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 1
EDITORIALS:
  Wanted: A Philosophy of Taxation 4
  England Drops Europe 5
  A High Price for Labor Standards 5
  Coals to Newcastle 6
ISSUES AND MEN. A GREAT HUMANITARIAN EXPERIMENT. By Oswald Garrison Villard 7
THE CORRUPT PRESS IN CHINA. By Agnes Smedley 8
"EDUCATION" AS A RACKET. By Raymond Gram Swing . . . 11
PRIZE JOURNALISM UNDER HITLER. By Heinrich L. Schiller . 12
HACKING TO JUSTICE WITH CUMMINGS. By Paul W. Ward . 14
CORRESPONDENCE 16
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
  "We Cover the United Front." By Heywood Broun 19
  Gas Sunday. By Samuel Paul Puner 20
BOOKS AND FILMS:
  The Cornetist. By Mark Van Doren 21
  A Plan to Control Capitalism. By Abram L. Harris 21
  Straining to Feel. By Philip Blair Rice 22
  Cheap Stuff. By Charles Angoff 22
  Caveat Emptor. By Dorothy Van Doren 23
  Continuities in Music. By Constance Rourke 23
  The Science of the Possible. By Paul Blanshard 24
  A One-sided Picture. By W. A. Neilson 24
  Shorter Notices 26
  Films: A Penny-colored World. By William Troy 28
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 28

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING CHARLES ANGOFF
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of subscriber's address.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second-class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by The Nation, Inc.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulating Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

EWING Y. MITCHELL frittered out as an effective muckraker of the Department of Commerce, and the Senate Commerce Committee which heard his charges appeared to gloat over his ineptness in scoring points. Chairman Copeland and Secretary Roper in particular behaved as though their demonstration of Mr. Mitchell's ineptness was identical with proving the complete innocence of everyone in the department. They made a great deal of the fact that little in Mr. Mitchell's attack on the shipping ring which has plundered the Treasury for years is not already part of the official record. This is lamentably true. Senator Black has filled pages of thick reports exposing the subsidy scandals. Postmaster General Farley's report on the mail contracts is one of the best pieces of work to have come from a New Deal department. The facts are there, crying for notice, and when Mr. Mitchell recounted them, the only counter-attack was to remark that he was saying nothing new. Mr. Roper was able to score a tactical victory without having to explain how he came to sponsor the brazen Bland-Copeland subsidy bill, which defeats the subsidy policy of the President. But the public, we feel, was impressed by Mr. Mitchell's opinions of his former colleagues even if he could not substantiate charges of a criminal nature. Many a special interest is served in Washington without the coarse violation of the law. Congress, too, is more suspicious, and the passage of the Bland-Copeland bill without far-reaching amendments is less likely than it would have been without Mr. Mitchell's service. Our first interest is obtaining subsidy legislation which will protect the public. But we are anxious to see a house-cleaning in the bureaus which Mr. Mitchell condemned. If they are only as "innocent" as Secretary Roper and the shipping ring, a good shake-up is called for.

THE FRANTIC PROPAGANDA against the holding-company bill has been more effective in the House than it was in the Senate. Friends of the bill so predicted, knowing how heavy the barrage from organized home investors has been. Servants of special interests stand out more clearly in the comparative isolation of the Senate. The House committee in charge of the bill has deleted the death sentence on all holding companies which are unable to meet a standard of genuine usefulness, and it is said that a poll of the House shows a comfortable majority to sustain this deletion. As a fight nears, the White House itself shows signs of weakening. The President told a press conference that the North American was the type of company which should be spared ultimate extinction. This company, to be sure, stands head and shoulders above most of its contemporaries, but it does not meet the clear requirement of linking together a homogeneous service which would be weakened by its disappearance; nor is it a mere investment trust. It is discouraging to note the will to compromise which the President reveals when faced with stubborn opposition. This issue of the holding companies, we had been told, was the one on which he was determined to fight to the last ditch. Members of the House may feel that their home folks do not want to see the owners of holding-company shares lose any of those shares' fictitious value, but we are certain that if the President held them in Washington through a couple of torrid weeks, and explained the issue once more to the country, the investors' lobby would be routed.

A DISPATCH from Oslo, Norway, predicts that the Nobel Peace Prize for 1935 is to be divided between Masaryk, the eighty-five-year-old President of Czecho-Slovakia, and Carl von Ossietzky, former editor of the radical Weltbühne, who has been held in a German concentration camp under indescribable conditions since February, 1933. For the past year intellectuals in both Europe and America have carried on an active campaign for recognition of the German editor's militant fight against war and war preparedness. Ossietzky first entered public life after the World War as an avowed pacifist. As editor of the Weltbühne, he opened the pages of that weekly to a campaign against the cruelties of the anti-republican Fehme, the forerunner of the National Socialist movement. In 1931 he was arrested by the Brüning government for the alleged betrayal of military secrets in an article on Germany's war preparations, and was sentenced to eighteen months in prison.

On his release in December, 1932, he turned his attention to the Nazi movement. National Socialist leaders hated this scion of a noble Catholic family for his courageous anti-nationalism, and he was among the first to be arrested on the night of the Reichstag fire. Together with Mühsam, Neubauer, Hiller, Bredel, and other German intellectuals he was taken to the notorious concentration camp of Sonnenburg and from there to the marshes of Palenberg. The Labor Party of Norway is to be congratulated for its courageous defiance of its belligerent Nazi neighbor in singling out two outstanding anti-fascists of Europe for this admirable award.

THE LONG SILENCE regarding the movement of the Chinese Red Army has been broken by the report that the main body under Chu Teh and Mao Tse-tung has joined forces with the Szechuan Red Army at Tienchuan, seventy miles southwest of Chengtu. If this report is confirmed, it marks the completion of one of the most dramatic military maneuvers in history. Approximately nine months ago the main body of the Red Army evacuated Kiangsi, where the Communists had been in power for six years, and fought its way 1,000 miles overland—accompanied by a large portion of the civil population—to the rich western province of Szechuan. Knowing that once the Communists became intrenched in Szechuan it would be virtually impossible to dislodge them, Chiang Kai-shek took personal charge of the campaign to prevent them from reaching their goal. On several occasions it appeared as if he had blocked the way, but by means of a long southern detour through Yunnan the Soviet forces eluded the Nanking troops and arrived at their destination in reasonably good condition. The combined armies, said to be 200,000 strong, are now a far more serious threat to Chiang Kai-shek than they have been in previous years. Doubtless the urgency of the Communist "menace" explains Chiang's sudden capitulation to Japan at a time when the Nanking authorities were disposed to make at least a show of resistance.

BARRING the occurrence of unforeseen difficulties, Soviet Russia is expected to harvest the greatest crop in history this year. The problems of organization and discipline on the collective farms which proved so serious in 1931 and 1932 appear to have been completely solved. Weeks before the beginning of the annual spring sowing campaign the seed had been prepared and cleaned, tractor repairs had been completed, and a fuel supply laid in sufficient for the season's needs. Although cool weather kept the sown area lower than last year's until about May 1, the planting proceeded with such speed in the following days that the annual program was 84 per cent fulfilled by May 10 and surpassed early in June. With the advantage of early germination and aided by plentiful rainfall throughout the spring, there is every indication that the yield per acre will exceed that of the record 1933 harvest. At the basis of the success of the agricultural program lies the phenomenal development of the machine industry. Nearly 100,000 more tractors were available this year than in 1934, and also the acreage per tractor increased approximately 25 per cent. Production of combines in the first four months of 1935 was more than eight times as great as in the same period of the previous year. The steady improvement in agriculture and industry which has been especially marked in the past two years is now paralleled for the first time by a similar rise in the output of consumers' goods. Light industry expanded its production by 17 per cent for the first quarter of 1935, and the turnover of the state and cooperative stores rose by one-third. Food prices in the cities are approximately half what they were a year ago, and consumption has increased accordingly. Needless to say, none of these facts have appeared in the Hearst press.

DESPITE MAYOR LAGUARDIA'S order of some months ago recognizing the legality of mass picketing, the New York police force continues arbitrarily to break up such picketing whenever it occurs. On one day recently three groups of pickets were arrested in the mid-town area alone within a period of three hours. The police first descended upon four members of the Office Workers' Union who were picketing the American Mercury, arrested them, and were hustling them to jail when four other pickets appeared, joined later by a still larger group; in the end seventeen had been taken into custody—including at least one bystander. Others were arrested for picketing Bickford's restaurant and certain motion-picture theaters on Times Square, though in each case the number of pickets did not exceed four. In no instance were the pickets convicted on the spurious charges brought against them, but they were detained in jail from six to nine hours before they could even obtain release on bail. The moral is an obvious one. Labor has a constitutional right to picket, but if the practice becomes embarrassing to the employer the police will oblige by locking the pickets up until the slow wheels of justice can be brought into action to obtain their release. Thereupon picketing is resumed, the police again assert their supremacy over the courts by arresting the pickets for "disorderly conduct," until "justice" once more sets them free. This is the technique of American liberty.

ONE WAY OF USING the increasing empty tonnage of transatlantic liners would be to pass the bill introduced by Representative Dies, which would bring about the deportation of 6,000,000 aliens. In Washington last week, according to the press, pressure in support of the bill, which is put forward as a means of wiping out unemployment, was exerted by 155 organizations representing 5,000,000 people; Representative Dies has received 50,000 letters, and he says plans are afoot to gather 10,000,000 native-born and naturalized citizens into an organization, to be called "The Americans," which will be formed in each state on a non-sectarian, non-partisan basis to pass the bill. The bill would bar all pioneer immigrants who do not have relatives in this country, make mandatory the deportation of 3,500,000 aliens illegally in this country, and give to the 4,000,000 aliens legally here twelve months in which to become citizens. Finally all aliens would be required to obtain Labor Department permits to work, which would be issued only when employers showed that they could not find American citizens to do the job. The figures are impressive; the formula sounds neat. "If there were no aliens in this country," says Representative Dies with demagogic boldness, "we would not have an unemployment problem." The deportation spree would be wonderfully productive of the worst type of nationalism, race prejudice, and international ill-will, but the unemployment problem would still remain unsolved, a large number of consumers having vanished. Perhaps "The Americans" could then be used to track down some other unlucky minority in a new hysterical head-hunting expedition. We should like to know more about that mushroom growth of 155 organizations which popped up so suddenly to advocate this bill, and in whose cellar they grew.

IN DECLARING that affiliated local unions which admit Communists would not be recognized by the American Federation of Labor, William Green did not mean exactly what he said. There are few if any A. F. of L. unions without at least a few Communist members, and any effort to drive them out wholesale would split the federation wide open and presage its end as an important factor in American life. Whatever errors the Communists have made in tactics, it cannot be denied that they furnish a much-needed vigor in trade-union activities. Where they have been driven out, as in the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, they have taken the most active and courageous portion of the membership with them, leaving a vestigial union of no particular consequence. Mr. Green knows all this, and his statement was merely an attempt to prevent an amalgamation of the powerful Communist-controlled Fur Workers' Industrial Union with the International Fur Workers' Union, a relatively weak A. F. of L. unit. In supporting him, Matthew Woll, speaking for the federation, complained that the Communists "had returned to the old policy of boring from within" and declared that the A. F. of L. was determined to prevent the "united front." This is merely another way of saying he is afraid the Communists will instil sufficient militancy into the A. F. of L. to overthrow its present do-nothing leadership. Surely active cooperation among all factions of labor was never more essential than now, and any move to prevent unity must be set down as an aid to those employers who are fighting the establishment of a real labor movement.

SLIGHTLY MORE THAN A YEAR after President Roosevelt's notable speech on social security, the Senate passed the Wagner-Lewis bill, which purports to carry out his promises. The discrepancy between the two is painfully evident. The bill makes no provision for the millions now unemployed, and there is no guaranty that the state unemployment-insurance laws, when passed, will provide even a subsistence income for the jobless of the future. Agricultural laborers, employees of small business establishments, professional and white-collar workers, and domestic servants will have no protection whatsoever. Provision for the aged is also unsatisfactory. Aid is to be given at present only in those states which have pension laws, and in an amount not exceeding $30 per month for those over sixty-five years of age. Permanent insurance for the aged is to be financed by a levy on both employers and employees which rises to 6 per cent of the payroll by 1949. Since the tax for both unemployment and old-age protection is placed directly on business and the workers, it may be assumed that it will lead to decreased consumption and reduced standards of living, while an uneconomic and unnecessary surplus is being accumulated to meet future contingencies. The last-minute amendment by Senator Clark exempting establishments with private pension plans from the old-age insurance levies would, if upheld in conference, encourage employers to discharge their older employees before they reached a pensionable age. Many liberals, we know, welcome this measure merely because they consider it a step in the right direction. But in our opinion Congress has saddled the country with a cumbersome, ill-conceived program which, because it depends on forty-eight state legislatures, can be revised only with the greatest difficulty. Real security for the masses would be better served if this bill were vetoed to prepare the way for adequate legislation at the next session of Congress.

DR. NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER has just made another speech before the American Club of Paris. Fresh from the commencement exercises at Columbia University, where he countenanced the fascist Casa Italiana and had nothing whatever to say about the high-handed expulsion of a group of medical students and technicians for pacifist activities, he had the impudence to preach liberalism to his audience. He said, "All we need is to be liberal, open-minded, fair, sympathetic, and anxious to do harm to no man, good to all, to see to it that the child labor which we have abolished remains abolished." This is the same Dr. Butler speaking who has been a persistent opponent of the proposed child-labor amendment to the federal constitution. But such contradictions are not new in Dr. Butler's career. A reactionary in his own country and on his own campus, he champions liberalism the more strongly the farther removed he is from the United States.

WE RECORD with pleasure the decision of High Commissioner Kenesaw M. Landis that Edwin C. (Alabama) Pitts, former all-round athletic star of Sing Sing, may play professional baseball. It was an unprecedented decision, overruling the previous decision of W. G. Bramham, president of the National Association of Minor League Baseball Clubs. Pitts's victory will gladden the hearts of all intelligent penologists and bring hope to men still in prison. Our only wish is that Pitts will soon prove himself a star player, and that before long he will be in the big leagues.

MAYOR LAGUARDIA'S plan to request a $45,000,000 loan from the federal government for a municipal electric "yardstick" plant has lately been the occasion for heated argument at a public hearing, and he has promised to bring it once more before the Board of Estimate for a vote. The prospects for success look much better now than they did some weeks ago, thanks chiefly to the able pleas made by the Mayor himself and by Frank P. Walsh, chairman of the New York Power Authority. Former Supreme Court Justice Joseph M. Proskauer, counsel for the Consolidated system, presented the familiar arguments against the "yardstick" scheme—that public ownership has generally been a failure, that it would inject politics into the public-utility service, and so on. Mayor LaGuardia has ably disposed of these arguments in a pamphlet entitled "What My Power Plan Would Mean to New York Consumers," which may be obtained by applying to the Business Men's Committee at 580 Fifth Avenue. The Mayor shows, by citing comparative figures from public and private plants in Cleveland, Columbus, Los Angeles, and Seattle, that "the one effective way to force down the high rates of private electric companies is to build a yardstick in competition with the private plants."

PUBLIC LIB.

Wanted: A Philosophy of Taxation

THE President's special message on tax reform does not presage the creation of the social state through taxation, as The Nation has urged. It is not a specific program, and its chief merit is that it opens the most vital discussion the country can engage in. For that reason we welcome it. Now it lies with the progressives to widen and deepen the conception of taxation in Congress and the country, and to press for early action. The President lays down two principles—that the perpetuation of large incomes is not socially desirable, and that large corporations should be penalized by taxation because of their size. The first of these is incontestable. The second leads straight to one of the most profound philosophical debates in American life. Mr. Justice Brandeis is the chief antagonist of bigness and the source of the doctrine that decentralization is the only hope of building a good American civilization. His greatest moment, we imagine, must have come in the unanimity of the Schechter decision, which struck at the heart of the case for centralization. On the other side is the belief that centralization is inevitable and that the duty of the state is to guide and control the evolution to bigness for the public good. In this debate the President, it seems, has stood squarely on both sides. The Tennessee Valley project is a striking attempt to decentralize, and subsistence homesteads are in line with it. Yet he threw his weight behind the centralizing NRA without showing the slightest appreciation of how perilous it would become unless administered with great courage for the public welfare. Now that the NRA has been thrown out of court he yields to the Brandeis doctrine again in his attack on big corporations through special taxation.

The menace of bigness in finance and industry is the political and economic power that goes with it. But with the danger come indubitable benefits. Certainly some large corporations perform a genuine and valuable economic service which could not be performed by small companies. The modern automobile is only one instance. The consumer today gets for $500 a car which would have cost him $1,000 a few years ago. This is a benefit which ought to be preserved. The trouble with the automobile companies is not that they are big but that they are incredibly inhumane. They could make cheaper and better cars even if they met decent human standards in their factories. Social control of industry seems to us preferable to breaking up bigness into littleness. The latter may be the easier political solution, but it destroys certain values. The values can be preserved without political risks once we have a social state.

The President also proposes to tax inheritances and gifts, the revenue to apply to the retirement of the national debt. This will quiet the conservatives who clamor against the profligate spending of the New Deal. To their question who is going to pay, the President now replies, the multimillionaires. Heretofore the usual frightened answer has been that inflation is unescapable. But we are not satisfied with a tax system which goes no farther than earmarking the inheritance taxes in this way. In a sense it is a redistribution of wealth, since much of the debt to be retired has been incurred in paying relief. A generation or two of dying multimillionaires will have supplied the Hopkins doles and work-doles. But this is only a single operation of redistribution. In the truly social state wealth is continuously redistributed, since its accumulation is an uninterrupted social function which another uninterrupted social function must disburse for the general good. The President does show glimmerings of understanding the possibilities in taxation; he wants to use it to break up bigness, and he will make the rich pay for the relief of the poor during one depression. But he does not take hold of taxation as the best tool with which to rebuild society. He borrows a little from the wisdom of modern economics, and adds this little to the conglomeration of doctrines he already has acted upon. It now is for others to expand and expound the truth. Senator La Follette rose to the occasion with his proposal to increase the income-tax rate, reduce exemptions, and bring into the Treasury new revenue of a billion a year. This proposal, of course, should have been part of the security program which has just passed Congress. The social services are the proper medium for the distribution of wealth. Moreover, social taxation coupled with an adequate security program can alone assure the stability of consumer purchasing power necessary for the fullest use of our resources. The first aim of taxation is not to pay off debt but to make for a good life in the community. We see the English derivation of the President's proposal, for the English boast that their death duties are applied to extinguish the national debt. But they have comprehensive social taxation on a scale that this country has not dreamed of, and the retirement of debt through death duties is a small part of it.

Concurrently with the President's tax proposals comes the certainty that the work-relief program is to be turned into a hasty, superficial substitute for straight relief. Instead of the billions being used solely to finance long-term public works and rebuild the slums, they are to be handed out as quickly as possible on small schemes which use them chiefly for labor and very little for material—that is, on relief schemes which are disguised as work. The vast possibilities of spending the money wisely for the permanent enrichment of the country are on the whole being missed. This is probably the worst defeat of the New Deal, and its greatest discredit. It would have been far better to spend the money more slowly on great objects, paying cash relief in the meantime. But it is plain that the Administration is tired of planning and is gambling with the nation's money on recovery. If it can get the money out and maintain the present level of consumption, it counts on the force of credit inflation to do the rest. That is the measure of the opportunism at the White House. The new tax program fits in with it. It is issued at a time to produce a maximum of political advantage, is made to sound more radical than it is, and will reduce still farther the chance of a strong third party entering the next campaign. But intrinsically it is only a new philosophic color in Joseph's already much-patched coat.

England Drops Europe

NO event since the announcement of Germany's rearmament program is more ominous in its implications for European security than the new Anglo-German naval accord. Although it might seem at first sight that any arms-limitation agreement should be welcomed by a war-threatened continent, the pact is bound to have political repercussions which are far more significant than the question of mere naval restrictions. To begin with, it carries with it tacit sanction, as far as Britain is concerned, of the Reich's unilateral abrogation of the Treaty of Versailles. This may be defended as a realistic acceptance of a fait accompli, but in acting independently and against the will of other signatories of the Versailles treaty England has embarrassed its former allies. These powers have ample justification for feeling that the new German navy is being built against them rather than against Britain. As long as the Reich lives up to its promise to restrict its fleet to 35 per cent of the strength of the British navy, it cannot hope to challenge either England or the United States, but with a large proportion of modern ships it may well have greater strength than either France or Italy despite their slightly larger tonnage. The Soviet Union and the Baltic states, with little or no naval equipment, are perhaps even more seriously menaced by Germany's program.

A more disturbing feature of the Anglo-German agreement is the possibility that Britain has decided to play an independent role in Europe rather than join in a united front against the threat of Nazi aggression. In adopting this policy the new British Cabinet seems to have capitulated completely to Hitler. For six months Nazi policy has concentrated chiefly on the effort to split England away from the common front of the former Allied powers. The arrangements for Simon's visit to Berlin and Hitler's recent speech were primarily directed to that end. When first faced with the reality of German rearmament the British government appeared uncertain whether to join the other powers in an open alignment against Germany or to seek through mediation to bring Germany back into the collective system. Early efforts at conciliation having failed, the British representatives at Stresa joined with France and Italy in formulating measures to prevent unilateral treaty repudiation and to punish such action if it occurred. While still advocating the strengthening of the collective system, Britain appeared to recognize that extraordinary measures would have to be taken to hold Germany in check. Although it was not prepared to join in an Eastern Locarno or to adhere to the Franco-Soviet pact, it gave tacit support to these steps. For the past month, however, British policy has been swinging once more toward conciliation.

The naval agreement not only marks a repudiation of Allied solidarity against the Third Reich, but implies an abandonment of the principles of collective security in favor of the "splendid isolation" of Lord Beaverbrook. Having reached the conclusion that multilateral disarmament pacts are impossible under existing conditions, the new British government apparently feels that bilateral agreements offer the only means of avoiding a catastrophic armament race. It hopes that the German pact may be followed by similar agreements with France, Italy, and Soviet Russia, and that the same technique may possibly be adopted in subsequent negotiations with the United States and Japan. One wonders, however, whether the Baldwin government has thought through the implications of this revolutionary change in policy. The limitations of bilateral as contrasted with multilateral action are much the same in the naval field as in tariff negotiations. The issues discussed do not relate to two nations alone, but, as in the case of the new naval agreement, are frequently of greater concern to others. In bilateral negotiations a balance of power may be struck between two countries which is completely out of line with the best interests of the world as a whole. Bilateral pacts are in direct conflict with the centripetal forces which have been pulling nations toward some form of collective organization. They tend to place an exaggerated emphasis on a "strong" national policy, and thus exacerbate jingoistic passions. If pursued to their logical conclusion they would spell the end of all forms of cooperative international organization, such as the League of Nations. But of course it would be presumptuous to assume that the conclusion of one bilateral agreement implies a complete change in British foreign policy. The announcement that qualitative limitations "are dependent on the attitude adopted by other naval powers" indicates that doubt regarding the practicability of the new method already exists. These doubts should be greatly increased by Herr von Ribbentrop's most undiplomatic statement, in which he gloats over the fact that Germany has "broken the ice of the rigid political situation in Europe," and declares that "in the endeavor to preserve the culture of our Old World, Britain, France, Germany, and other European countries must stand together." To him, at least, there seems no doubt that the agreement marks the end of the united front and is a step toward a new union of European powers against Soviet Russia.

A High Price for Labor Standards

THE Guffey coal-control bill is an attempt to repeat in one industry what the old NRA tried to do for all: safeguard labor standards and collective bargaining at the cost of encouraging monopoly and of giving producers the power to fix prices. Coal being a "sick" industry, there is some justification for trying to heal it by extraordinary means, but this legislation is disquieting. It is a step not toward nationalization but away from it. It is the forced cartelization of a major industry, and it vests a great trade union with a semi-public status. This is "self-government" in industry with a minimum of public control, and it is neither justifiable as an emergency nor as a permanent pattern. In the end "self-government" by industry is economic fascism, and it can be saved from becoming so only if public control is both genuine and lively.

The intent of the bill is to "stabilize" the bituminous coal industry for a period of four years by means of price-fixing superimposed upon collective labor agreements (Title 1). Concurrently, the Secretary of the Interior will undertake to buy up $300,000,000 of coal-mining properties, to constitute a National Bituminous Coal Reserve permanently withdrawn from production (Title 2). With the withdrawal of these properties, it is supposed, supply will balance demand, the dead weight of excess producing capacity will be lifted, and the bituminous coal-mining industry will be free to enjoy prosperity. The heart of the bill is to be found in the marketing provisions which empower the twenty-two district boards of coal producers to fix minimum prices. These prices would be subject, it is true, to the approval of the National Bituminous Coal Commission, a governmental tribunal in the Department of the Interior, composed of five representatives of the public, two of the producers, and two of the trade unions. But the commission's power to review minimum prices is limited, in effect, to requiring that the district boards carry out their computations according to prescribed formulas. On paper, the commission is authorized to fix maximum prices to protect coal consumers. But this power is emasculated by a joker which declares that "no maximum price shall be established for any mine which shall not return cost plus a reasonable profit."

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

In addition to price-fixing, the bill articulates collective bargaining into the scheme of industrial self-government. Here lies the interest of the United Mine Workers, chief spokesman for the measure, who believe that the maintenance of union wage scales depends on the cartelization of employers. Should producers of more than two-thirds of the national tonnage in any year negotiate a collective agreement with a labor organization representing more than half of the employees, the wages and hours agreed upon become binding on all members of the code throughout the country. District agreements are negotiated on a similar basis. The section on district agreements seems to be aimed against the Progressive Miners of America and other "dual union" factions opposing the Lewis regime, for it specifies "representatives of the majority of the mine workers therein belonging to a recognized national association of mine workers."

The bituminous coal industry, here as in Great Britain, is suffering from a plethora of productive capacity. This is not to say, however, that it can regain its health by exempting members from the anti-trust laws (the bill does this specifically). It is not improbable that bituminous coal mining would languish still more grievously; for the boost in prices would increase the very forces—the shift to oil, natural gas, water power, and improved technology of fuel consumption—which constitute the industry's marketing problems. Further, the provision for establishing the National Bituminous Coal Reserve will throw out of work many thousands of soft-coal miners, who would have to be resettled and rehabilitated en masse. Perhaps the job can and should be done. But this should be foreseen and planned as an organic part of the legislation.

After the Schechter decision it is difficult to believe the bill is constitutional. The Supreme Court has already intimated that for the purpose of wage and hour standards it will not regard coal mining as "interstate commerce." Equally vulnerable is the bill's use of the taxation power, together with the power of granting drawbacks, to force employers into codes which pretend to be voluntary. We cannot believe it will weather the Supreme Court. But even if it should, we consider it dangerous without provisions for genuine public control, to which we regret to say both the President and Congress appear indifferent.

Coals to Newcastle

MANY of our readers must have seen in their daily paper a maddeningly brief dispatch about an American savant who has been traveling around the country teaching Indians to make arrows. For many days after reading the item we devoted our spare time to wondering just how the savant happened to know and just why the Indians did not, but we are glad to report our discovery that the questions are satisfactorily answered in a recent book by Charles D. Stewart.*

It seems that the Indians were a practical race and that they recognized the utility of iron from the moment that they received their first fragment of it from an early voyager. Bits of the precious metal found their way across the continent before the white men who had introduced it, and the use spread so rapidly that the invaders found it already familiar by the time they reached the remoter regions. Very quickly it supplanted the native stone weapons, and all knowledge of how they were made had disappeared before anyone thought to inquire into the subject. Today most Indians do not even know that stone arrows were ever used, and though they recognize one as a "thunder stone" they know it only as a symbol and not at all as a utility. Tardily, a Wisconsin naturalist-archaeologist named H. L. Skavlem took up the subject and solved the mystery.

It seems that you do it with a piece of bone—if you know how. Mr. Skavlem finds a toothbrush handle ideal, and with the aid of that implement he has made hundreds of flint arrow-heads in all styles by pressing the bone firmly against the flint until a little curved chip flies out just in the place where he wants it to. We confess that it doesn't sound easy. In fact, the explanation is almost as unsatisfactory as that said to have been given by the miraculous Australian sheep estimator who declared that there was nothing mysterious about the method by which he was able to tell the size of a herd at a glance. "You just count the legs and then divide by four." But in any event Mr. Skavlem has aroused the wonder of the Indians and says that he has only one difficulty. When complete realism is required in his imitations he has to be careful not to make the work too perfect.

Incidentally, those who find such subjects as this interesting will find a good deal more to interest them in Mr. Stewart's volume of essays. He began his career by exhibiting his ability to talk backwards in the dime museums of the eighteen-nineties. Now he devotes his time to investigating such curious questions as "How does a snake walk?" and to writing up the results for the Atlantic Monthly. He has, for example, a very fine essay on Chicago spiders in spite of the fact that, as he says, "I should confess that I do not know spiders anatomically or microscopically, but only personally." Then there is another about one Lorenzo Langstroth, who was born in Philadelphia in 1810 and who about 1850 made some discoveries concerning the psychology of the bee so important that they completely revolutionized the practice of bee-keeping, which had been shockingly inefficient since the time of Vergil. And yet there is no biographical sketch of Langstroth in any encyclopedia.

---

* "Fellow Creatures." By Charles D. Stewart. Little, Brown and Company. $2.75.

Issues and Men

A Great Humanitarian Experiment

"A COLONIZATION project as magnificent in scope as any which harnessed water power or reclaimed land, the narcotic farm is designed to house only addicts, cure them of their illness, and restore their confidence and self-sufficiency"—this is the description given of the first United States Narcotic Farm, which was opened recently at Lexington, Kentucky, by Surgeon General Hugh S. Cumming of the Federal Public Health Service, and is of a size to house no less than 1,400 drug victims. This is an enlightened undertaking indeed, and, like the new federal penitentiary at Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, is proof that slowly but surely the federal government, at least, is making progress in the handling of criminals. When one looks at the several states and notably the county jails one all but loses hope. In New York, for example, governor after governor goes to Albany and whether his name be Franklin Roosevelt or Herbert Lehman leaves the state prison system about as it was. We have not been able to induce the legislature to make of Sing Sing merely a receiving laboratory for the study and segregation of criminals until experts decide to what institution each shall be sent. There are still horrible conditions in many of our prisons caused by antiquated buildings, overcrowding, lack of adequate sanitation and recreation grounds. In Massachusetts they are still using the state prison which was erected in 1812! And then when the criminals are graduated from these institutions as professional crooks, even the first offenders, we go after them with increasing ruthlessness and declare that for a third or fourth offense they shall go to prison for life.

At Lexington the government took three years to build its new experiment at a cost of $4,000,000. The institution itself covers eleven acres of a 1,100-acre farm, and will employ 350 persons and cost about $750,000 a year; it is good news that a similar institution is also under way at Fort Worth, Texas. The patients to be sent there will comprise violators of federal law, offenders on probation, convicts who have finished their prison terms and are still addicts, and voluntary patients—the latter may be asked to pay for the cost of their subsistence and care. It is gratifying to read that "their names are to be kept confidential, their rights as citizens of the United States are in no way to be abridged, and their stay at the farm is never to be held against them as a charge in any court proceeding." The patients are to be taught trades and those who work in the plants and shops are to receive regular wages; it is hoped to make the farm an independent industrial center. Naturally it is thought that if economic security, at least to the extent of knowledge of a trade, can be given to the patients, that will be one of the best ways of aiding in the cure of the drug habit, which is coming more and more to be recognized as a purely medical matter. Everyone knows that the smuggling of drugs into the prisons of the country goes on continuously, with rare exceptions; many guards consider that the supplying of drugs is a legitimate source of revenue for them, and the devices resorted to by the smugglers seem to defy detection or control. If the drug addicts are wholly separated from other prisoners, it is obvious that they will be better taken care of and that they will not corrupt the many who are free from the habit on entering prison but who yield easily to the temptation to spend a good part of their incarceration under the influence of a narcotic.

Since the splendid project at Lexington was begun only three years ago, it may perhaps be charged to the credit side of the depression. Certainly public works of this kind are infinitely more worth while than the building of more cement roads, or post offices, or even grade crossings. If I were the head of the public-works building program, I should direct it chiefly along three lines: the rebuilding of the entire prison system, state and national, the building of new schools and university buildings, and the development of a huge housing program. Here is Langdon Post, head of the New York Housing Authority, telling Congress that one-third of all the people in the United States live in sub-standard houses. New York City, he declared, must take care in new housing of 510,516 families, or considerably over two million people. He is strongly for the Wagner housing bill, in which $800,000,000 is asked for in order that outright grants amounting to 30 per cent of the cost of land and materials may be given to local authorities. The government, he felt, should waive all interest payments "and simply require a payment each year from the Housing Authority to cover amortization over a period from forty to sixty years. This would approximate from 1½ to 1¾ per cent with this type of financing; rentals averaging slightly under six dollars a room would be obtained in the projects contemplated under the authority's program. Otherwise rents would rise." Of course, the government ought to lend its money without interest, for the best experts are confident that the urban problem of slum reconstruction cannot be solved on an adequate basis—that is, reach the very poor—unless the government is willing to put in its money on a non-interest-bearing basis. When one reads that in England the number of new homes built by private capital or by local authorities with Parliamentary aid has now gone up to two and one-half millions since the ending of the World War, it is certainly a disgrace that we have hardly made a start, particularly in view of the general belief that nothing could possibly do more to bring back prosperity than a big housing program.

Therefore it is all the more encouraging to read that at least in the field of penal reform the federal government is making progress, despite the difficult times. Building fine new institutions is, of course, only half the battle. The men at the head of those institutions must be wise, capable, humane, and imbued with a modern outlook upon crime and crime prevention.

Oswald Garrison Villard

The Corrupt Press in China

By AGNES SMEDLEY

WHEN referring to the capitalist press Lenin used to speak of the "reptile press." I have often resented this and have been tempted to write an article in defense of reptiles. At last, instead of doing this, I have decided to put down a few facts about the foreign and the Chinese press in China and leave it to others to decide if any reptile of any species deserves Lenin's comparison.

There is in China a most servile and corrupt press and a most servile and corrupt group of newspapermen; they can be bought by any secret service, government, business firm, or gang leader desirous of having something suppressed or something published. But there are, too, newspapers and newspapermen who have put up a courageous struggle for the right to publish facts. Very few of these are foreign; many more are Chinese. The truth of this statement is attested to by the frequent reports of the arrest, imprisonment, or death of Chinese newspapermen, and of the temporary or permanent suppression of Chinese newspapers which have tried to inform the Chinese people about internal or foreign affairs. During the one year of 1934 more than 110 publications in the Peiping-Tientsin area were either temporarily or permanently shut down. In that same year at least three newspapermen were murdered by the Blue Shirts in Tientsin.

To show the conditions under which newspapers and newspapermen work in China today, I offer the following two typical cases. In January, 1933, a Chinese newspaperman named Liu Yu-seng, editor of a supplement to the Shen Jih Pao of Chingkiang, a city six hours by rail from Shanghai, was secretly shot and killed in prison. The order for the execution was given by General Ku Chu-tung, governor of the province, who is one of the closest henchmen of General Chiang Kai-shek, dictator of the Nanking government. Chinese newspapermen investigated and learned that Liu Yu-seng had been killed because he had published a complete report about the opium traffic in Chingkiang, in which General Ku had a big and profitable share. When the press protested against the killing, General Ku said that Liu had been executed because he was a Communist. As proof, he said that Liu had been in prison for political activities in 1927, and that he had once tried to organize ricksha coolies into a union. This proved that he was a Communist deserving death! Yang Chien, general secretary of the China League for Civil Rights, conducted an investigation of this case through a certain official in Nanking with whom he was on friendly terms. This Kuomintang official wrote Yang that when Liu's body was exhumed and examined by his family in the presence of officials, it was found that one of his legs had been crushed by torture. Yang refused to give this letter to the press on the ground that if he did so he and its author would share the same fate as Liu. Six months later Yang was murdered by Blue Shirts in Shanghai.

Here is the second case. On November 13, 1934, Sze Liang-zai, millionaire owner and editor of the Shun Pao, a Shanghai daily, was murdered outside the city. I am informed that the foreign police of Shanghai knew that the murder was contemplated and warned the Blue Shirts that if they killed Sze in foreign-controlled territory, the police would expose the facts about Yang Chien's murder. So Sze was killed outside the foreign-controlled territory. Immediately after the murder Chinese officials began spreading rumors to cover the tracks of the murderers. For instance, Tang Leang-li, propagandist for Wang Ching-wei, high official of the Nanking government, told American newspapermen that Sze had been murdered by personal enemies. Others said he was killed in a quarrel over a concubine, and still others said he was murdered by business competitors. But every Chinese newspaperman, banker, and industrialist knew that he had been murdered by a band of Blue Shirts who had traveled in a high-powered automobile bearing a Nanking license plate.

For two years before this murder the Blue Shirts had tried to gain control of the Shun Pao, the largest and oldest Chinese daily. Following the Japanese invasion of Shanghai in 1932, Chiang Kai-shek had personally forced Sze Liang-zai to discharge his chief editorial writer, who was anti-Japanese and anti-Chiang. In January, 1934, the Shun Pao correspondent in Tientsin was murdered for reporting facts about the secret dealings between Nanking officials and the Japanese in the north. In 1934 the Central Kuomintang instructed General Wu Teh-chen, mayor of Shanghai and henchman of Chiang Kai-shek, to order the Shun Pao to publish no more articles by the famous left writer, Lo Hsün. The Blue Shirts asked Sze Liang-zai to allow them to furnish the material for one full page of his paper. When he refused, they offered to buy his paper for one million dollars. He refused this also.

Not one Chinese or foreign newspaper in Shanghai had the courage to publish the truth regarding this case. The Chinese knew the facts to the last detail, and it was not "lack of proof" that prevented the foreign press from publishing them. Had the foreign press desired proof, it could have secured it from the foreign police. Incidentally, lack of proof has never kept the Chinese or foreign press from publishing anything. Quite the contrary. For years the press in China has filled its columns and those of the world's newspapers with manufactured tales about the Chinese peasants and the revolutionary intellectuals. There was and is no proof of who murdered the American missionaries, Mr. and Mrs. Stam, last January, but this did not keep the foreign press from carrying on a vicious international campaign against the Red Army of China, and from saying that the Stams were murdered by a red detachment. In China the first reports of the murder of the missionaries showed that they were not killed by the reds. Only later did the British press in Shanghai get the idea of using this case against the Communists and as propaganda for foreign armed intervention.

But the highest point in press corruption ever reached in Shanghai, and the clearest possible exposure of the exact situation existing in the Chinese newspaper world, came on

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame Cal

April 30 of the present year when T. B. Chang, prominent newspaper owner and editor, was forced by the Nanking government to resign his position as managing editor of his three large Shanghai dailies and his news agency. Mr. Chang was owner and managing editor of the English-language daily the China Press, and the two Chinese dailies the China Times and the China Evening News, as well as of the Shun Shih Agency. The Nanking government placed this extensive property under the managing editorship of none other than Tu Yueh-san. It sounds unbelievable, but it is true. On the same day the Nanking government decorated this gang leader, conferring upon him the highest degree of the Order of the Brilliant Jade—the second decoration he has received this year. At the same time the two subordinate gang leaders, Wong Ching-yung and Chang Shao-lin, were also awarded this order.

If one wishes to know why things are or are not published in China, one must look deeper than the surface of things. In the middle of 1932, for instance, a number of official documents from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Nanking government fell into the hands of a Chinese acquaintance of mine. They explain much. All of them have to do with the foreign and Chinese press, news agencies, and newspapermen in China, and many are signed by the chief of the Bureau of Intelligence and Publicity of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Nanking government. All are marked "Private and Confidential." One of them, dated May 23, 1932, begins:

> Incompetence, mismanagement, and dishonest manipulation of funds placed monthly at the disposal of the Director of the Intelligence and Publicity Department of the Foreign Ministry for publicity purposes have reduced the functions of the department to doling out various sums of "subsidies" to newspaper reporters, news agencies, both foreign and Chinese, newspaper and magazine proprietors, managers, or editors. . . . The only method of publicity was that of subsidizing—bribing [sic]—news agencies and newspapers so that no news which might be considered unfavorable to the authorities would appear in print. To insure that no such information would leak out to the reading public, individual reporters were also given monthly "subsidies" . . . the demands of the newspapers and reporters are insatiable. There always exists the desire to be given larger sums. . . . The number of reporters and newspapers is constantly on the increase, so that there is no end to the demands.

One paragraph in this confidential report refers to the official British news agency, Reuters, and reads as follows:

> This written understanding with Reuters, which was signed on July 1, 1929, by the then assistant director of the department, provides for the payment of the monthly sum of $3,000. . . . The most objectionable feature—and the one which reveals the true purpose of the contract—is the provision to "treat all outgoing news dispatches fairly and justly and not omit to give the Chinese side of the case in any issue." If Reuters operates in China as an independent foreign commercial news agency, as it claims to be, and if Reuters is faithful to the profession of news gathering and news reporting, Reuters should not accept any cash payment from the Chinese government in consideration of a "fair" treatment of news going out from the country.

There is another contract between Reuters and the Central Publicity Department of the Central Kuomintang in Nanking by which Reuters receives $10,000 from that department. This contract is known to practically every foreign newspaperman in Shanghai. When it became known that these contracts had fallen into the hands of a new director of the Bureau of Intelligence and Publicity in Nanking early in 1932, quite a storm was raised around the Reuters office in Shanghai. So hot did things become for a time that T. V. Soong, Minister of Finance in the Nanking government, demanded that the director of the bureau surrender the contract to him and that under no conditions should it be published.

Why these contracts should have been kept secret from 1929, when they were made, down to 1932 is a question that others may answer. Certainly the United Press did not keep a business arrangement secret which it made with the bureau, according to which the official Nanking Kuo Min News Agency supplied news to the United Press and received the United Press service in return. The confidential reports state that this arrangement is "very advantageous for Nanking" because the United Press "cables abroad news given it by Kuo Min at United Press expense." In the light of these documents, one can more readily understand why, on New Year's Day, 1935, Chiang Kai-shek conferred the Order of the Brilliant Jade on Sir Frederick Jones, chairman of Reuters in London.

The Japanese are by no means niggardly in dealing with the press in China. An outstanding example of their methods is the Far Eastern Review, an American-owned and registered engineering monthly which is openly financed by the Japanese. The owner and editor is George Bronson Rea, who perambulates around Washington as "adviser" to the Japanese puppet state of Manchoukuo—at a fat salary. When Mr. Rea was away from China on his sacred mission of aiding Japanese imperialism, his position on the Review was taken for a time by another American, George Sokolsky. Mr. Sokolsky, however, seemed a bit more broad-minded than Mr. Rea, for he traveled back and forth between the Review office and the office of the Ministry of Finance of the Nanking government, with occasional side trips to the British consulate. The present editor of this Japanese propaganda magazine is also an American; when asked why he did dirty work for the Japanese, he replied: "I'm getting old. Old men can't be choosers." The Far Eastern Review, which defends the Japanese conquest of China, and whose editors have worked to this end, has operated for years without any kind of protest from American officials. But every American in China who attempts to publish news exposing the Japanese and the Kuomintang subjectors of the Chinese people is hounded by the local police.

Newspapermen of many nationalities are engaged in scraping in the shekels in the Far East. Until recently the editor of a Japanese imperialist daily in Dairen was an Irishman. During the Japanese invasion a correspondent for the Frankfurter Zeitung arrived in Shanghai to take my place, after the Nanking government, working through the German Foreign Office, had demanded my dismissal from that newspaper. I had refused to become an "adviser" to a department in Nanking—which meant keeping my mouth shut—and of course this proved definitely that I was a Communist. My successor, however, was not a Communist; so immediately upon arrival he dashed off to the Chinese mayor of greater Shanghai and asked for money to carry on in style. Someone blabbed, the news was cabled to Europe, and the impatient gentleman was recalled. Had he waited a week, the Chinese would perhaps have made him an "adviser" to some department in Nanking or the Japanese would have stalked into his room and plunked down a bag of yen.

The recent "international journalists' party" into the former Soviet regions of Kiangsi that have been overrun by Nanking troops is another case in point. This trip was demanded by the Japanese military headquarters in Shanghai. Of the six Japanese "journalists" on the trip, two were military spies. One foreigner, a Britisher, represented the North China Daily News. He was a military man and wrote no articles about his trip—at least he has not so far. The Japanese, ably seconded by Nanking officialdom, refused to allow Soviet Russian correspondents in China to go with the party, but they accepted a White Guard Russian who was not even a journalist. Of course, the German Nazis went, as did a few Americans. In Nanchang, when the local Associated Press correspondent, an American, tried to join the party, the Japanese objected and he was not permitted to go. Needless to say, the journalists came out as "authorities" on Soviet China, and expatiated on the glories of Chiang Kai-shek. They are now propagandists for all the intellectual and economic imbecilities of Chiang Kai-shek's "New Life" movement.

As to the Chinese press, twenty-two official Blue Shirt organs now exist in China, of which eight are in Shanghai. Apart from these organs of Chiang Kai-shek or some one of his henchmen, there are personal propaganda sheets maintained by Wang Ching-wei, who controls one Chinese daily in Shanghai and an English magazine, the People's Tribune, which is circulated in England and America. The editor of the People's Tribune, a henchman of Wang Ching-wei, draws $10,000 a month from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and $3,000 a month from the Ministry of Finance. He also "takes care of" English-language magazines in Shanghai and articles about China in the American and British press. Typical of the way he is able to force favorable reviews of his own books in China is the following incident:

Last winter the China Critic, a Chinese magazine in English that received $2,000 a month from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, broke its traces and reviewed General Yakhontoff's book, "The Chinese Soviets." The editor of the People's Tribune dashed to the telephone and called Nanking, whereupon the business manager of the Critic was ordered to Nanking. When he left that high fortress of the white terror he had signed an agreement to submit every article thereafter for censorship—which meant to the editor of the People's Tribune—and to review favorably every publication of that gentleman.

Censorship bureaus were established in all Chinese cities under Nanking control in July, 1934. Since then every manuscript and every advertisement must be submitted for censorship, and afterward two copies of each publication must be submitted for check-up. No blank spaces may be left to betray the hoof of the censors. On the censorship boards in all cities are representatives of every local politician and general.

The foreigners all know what is going on between Nanking and Japan, but the Chinese people may not know. Every reference to contemplated treaties or agreements between Chiang Kai-shek and the Japanese is eliminated from the Chinese press, and allowed to appear only after the agreements or treaties are in effect. This was true of the Tangku-truce agreement, and of the establishment of railway, telephone, mail, telegraph, and customs connections between China and Japan's puppet state of Manchoukuo. When the Japanese Minister to China and a high military officer conducted secret negotiations with Chiang Kai-shek and Wang Ching-wei in Nanking last February, not a word of the negotiations or of the true nature of the agreement was published in the Chinese press. Only after the negotiations were finished was the Chinese press allowed to publish a carefully manufactured statement issued by Chiang Kai-shek. In fact, I learn that but three people in China know what the agreement really was. They are Chiang Kai-shek, his wife, and a Chinese general, perhaps Yang Yung-tai. Yet, as recently revealed, the secret negotiations specifically arranged for Japanese financial and military "assistance" to Nanking in its wars on the Red Army and on communism, Japanese military and other "advisers" to take the place of the present German and other foreign advisers, Japanese investment—which means control—in Chinese industries, and a military alliance for war on the Soviet Union. The agreement really makes Kuomintang China a Japanese colony, with Chiang Kai-shek and his henchmen ruling as Japanese puppets, just as Henry Pu Yi rules in Manchuria.

I will give one personal incident as an example of the truthfulness of the news in the controlled Chinese press today. Three reports about me appeared in the Chinese and Japanese press in the course of last winter. These categorically stated that I had arrived in China, coming up from the Malay States, where I had been a "spy for India," and that I was a "notorious international spy" who did espionage work in London and Paris during the World War. I was said to have three different nationalities—American, German, Russian—and my job in China was said to be that of organizing an anti-imperialist and anti-war congress to wage war on Japan. I was also said to be working with Mrs. Sun Yat-sen, the Chinese Communist Party, and two Russian Bolsheviks from the Third International—whose names were given, though the addresses were unfortunately omitted. We all planned to use the Chinese Red Army and Szechuan Province as "our base of action." I was called very beautiful and intelligent and said to speak ten different languages. I was graduated from the University of Michigan, was born in Ohio, and the police of the "whole world" was watching me!

The only things in the report that were true were my name and the statements that I was in Shanghai and that the police were watching me! Everything else was manufactured in the diseased brains of Japanese and Chinese spies and newspapermen. The British police knew just when I landed in Shanghai from America, for a British detective with the name of F. A. Pitts was put on my trail. That I had never been in London, had never been in the Malay States, and that I was lying sick in a Shanghai hospital for months after my arrival instead of organizing secret congresses—all these facts were well-known to the men who manufactured these reports.

All of the above explains why I have become a defender of reptiles when I hear them compared to the capitalist press in China. It's utterly unfair to the reptiles.

"Education" as a Racket

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

Washington, June 24

WHAT is vocational education? And what kind of vocational education deserves federal funds? Under the Smith-Hughes Act, the Office of Education of the Department of the Interior is authorized to make contributions to educational projects of state governments which fit young people for a vocation. The intent of the act is beyond criticism. But in some cases it has been degraded in the South, most of all in Mississippi, into a racket for the benefit of garment and textile manufacturers. Thus, new companies bid for by Mississippi towns were offered first of all free factories, were guaranteed a five-year exemption from state and municipal taxation, and were told their workers would be trained for them at the expense of the state and the federal government. This has enabled a factory to obtain a staff of workers who have been "taught" at no cost to the company for from six to twelve weeks and then to employ them as learners, at the learner's reduced wage scale. And because a worker has learned a single operation at a machine and is qualified for a $9-a-week learner's job, this training is called education, with the suggestion that it meets the approval of the United States government. In none of these Mississippi schools about which I have information has there been any other "education." Strictly speaking there have been no "schools." The training place was the factory, or a building ultimately used as such, and the teachers were foremen or mechanics supplied by the textile companies.

Vocational education, according to a moderate standard, should teach workers to understand the whole process of which their operation is a part, and should supplement this with some education in citizenship. That would give the worker a sense of his own function in industry and in the community. Not so in Mississippi. Vocational "education" means nothing but training girls to perform a single operation at a machine at public expense, and it is offered as one of the inducements to factories to move there from other parts of the country.

So long as the NRA was in force the system was under partial control. A factory at Laurel, Mississippi, which marketed the output of its industrial "scholars"—working without pay—was ordered by the NRA to make a restitution of wages. The crushing blow sent this company into bankruptcy, and Laurel now must fish for a new one to take its place. Other factories were more circumspect. Some of them sold their products abroad, foreign dumping of these school-made products not counting as a violation of the textile code. But that was while the NRA was alive. Today the educational system can work still more usefully for the factories. No one can prevent the sale of production from the schools. Women can be taught by factory foremen—as they would be if there were no "education"—and kept without wages for from six to twelve weeks, and then put on a learner's scale for months.

This presents a frightening picture of man being conquered by the machine, and it is more frightening because the good folk of Mississippi are on the whole happy about it. They look upon industrialization as a boon. A community will buy stock in a textile plant so that it can build a factory; or it will make a bond issue; or it will solicit subscriptions. All the inhabitants, even those on relief, are asked to pledge so much a month toward the fund which will allure the factory to their town. They will do this in a fire of public spirit, on the assumption that it is going to take people off relief, and bring prosperity to the town. There may be a few, here and there, who do not see the justice in contributing to the profit of a rich manufacturing company. But in the main the campaign for factories has been undertaken enthusiastically without questions asked. The educational part of it, which is what primarily concerns the rest of the country, is assumed to be beyond challenge. Anyhow, what is vocational education? Is it more than jamming idle persons into jobs? If the companies use it for chiseling, or increasing their profits, that is beyond the experience of these ingenuous people. It does not occur to them that a factory normally has to train its learners at its own expense, that learners can produce for sale after a few days, and that six or twelve weeks of training is simply a donation to the factory owners. One town went so far as to build a factory and call it a school, thus using town funds which otherwise could not have been touched. After the factory staff was trained, the use of the "school" was given to the company free of cost for five years.

A still more ominous note in the story is the effort to remove the stigma from factory work and make it above social reproach. If a factory is lured to a town, hundreds of young women will enrol for "study," virtually every girl without a job. Many of them may be high-school graduates, dozens will have been to college, and there will be a few college graduates among them. In one factory the company employs a recreation supervisor who has organized her girls into Greek-letter sororities. That gives factory work an "air." Her machine operators have access to a reading course, and a meeting place where they can take lessons at a small fee in ballroom dancing and bridge. The whole town thus goes factory-minded; the factory is the center of community life. I am not suggesting there should be a social stigma on factory work or that industry should not become a social center of the community. The tragedy is in the inversion of a truly social picture. The factory here is not the servant of the community; the whole community has gone into service to the factory. But Mississippi does not see it that way. It finds nothing questionable in the fact that the Mississippi Power Company usually is the agent in soliciting companies to move to the state—though it does not give them free power—and that the chambers of commerce take the initiative in finding the free building and in soliciting the help of the state and federal educational authorities. It takes for granted that things have to be done in this way. Nor does it occur to people that if they tempt a factory, say, from the North, where labor unions are growing strong, and thus take hundreds of local young people off relief, an equal number will go on relief in the North. Hasn't the state passed a law to authorize them to bid for factories with the bribe of five years' tax exemption? It is part of the competitive way of doing things, the only way they know. Some of the training schools have been set up in this interstate competition, some to train workers for factories which have had to move out of prisons as a result of recent reform legislation. But in them all the theme is the same—"education" is thrown in as an inducement to a textile company to start a factory and is not even dreamed of as a serious community responsibility.

Now the question naturally arises how Mississippi has been able to give the impression that it can enlist federal funds for its educational racket, and to what extent it has done so truthfully. The question is asked first of all by organized labor, which has been bombarding Washington with protests against this practice and has also made protests to the state department of education. Labor, however, is not strong in Mississippi and the more effective answer was expected from Washington, where both the Interior Department and the Department of Labor have been given a full account of abuses. Certain results have been obtained, in that the federal Office of Education has exacted a promise from Mississippi that no federal funds shall be spent this year on these textile "schools." It remains to be seen whether the promise will be actually or only formally kept. A state might manage to charge textile-machine "education" to itself and spend correspondingly more federal money on approved projects.

The federal Office of Education has now formulated its policy as to the use of federal funds on state projects. I am told the policy is not new, but it has now been put down briefly for communication to all state educational departments. It comes under seven heads, and the use of federal funds is "believed to be justified" when:

> 1. The employer does not get production work done at a reduced cost.
>
> 2. The persons who serve as instructors devote definite periods of time to approved instruction with definite objectives under an organized plan and under public supervision and control; there must be a segregation of time for each person.
>
> 3. The training department or school is at all times open and accessible to supervisors and other authorized persons representing public vocational education.
>
> 4. The instructors meet all the qualifications set up in state plans.
>
> 5. Repetitive practice on learner status is not carried beyond the point necessary to reach the standard for the job or operation.
>
> 6. The state supervisor of trade and industrial education can show that he has visited, inspected, and supervised the work sufficiently to make sure that there is nothing irregular about it.
>
> 7. The number being trained is in keeping with the absorbing power of the service area.

It must be said, however, that this minimum standard of vocational education set by the federal government is not as high as many might wish. It does not require education in citizenship as part of vocational training, and it is satisfied on the whole if the training given is free from exploitation and enables the pupil to get a job. But I gladly draw a distinction between most of the vocational education provided by the government and such occasional abuses as the Mississippi racket. Vocational education is being given to about 1,400,000 persons without such abuses, and valuable service is being rendered on which no discredit should fall. The story of Mississippi, however, points to the danger of the South becoming industrialized on a level of complete servitude to the machine, and challenges both state and federal authorities to meet the problem with a constructive long-term policy more far-reaching than any now being pursued.

Prize Journalism Under Hitler

By HEINRICH L. SCHILLER

GERMANY'S heavy artillery in its journalistic assault on the Jews is represented by two weeklies, the Stürmer and the Judenkenner. About as large as the American tabloid, these two papers run to eight pages an issue and cost twenty pfennigs. Neither paper restricts itself to fighting the Jews but combats also the Catholics and the Free Masons. Nor is the battle against Judea confined to Germany. All countries are included, and in a recent issue of the Judenkenner the United States was given an entire page. Here is one of the "astounding facts" unearthed by the editors:

> We note . . . that in the United States . . . there is a Jewish state within the state, with its own organization, legislation, pronouncements, and administration, with its own state organs, authorities, officials, its own law, its own press, its own politics.

A more appreciative tone toward America is revealed in the following, printed when the Bremen and the Albert Ballin rescued the crew of a distressed Japanese freighter:

> If instead of Albert Ballin the name had been that of America's popular President, Abraham Lincoln, we would certainly have gained a milestone in the entire English-speaking world. . . . Not only that but Japan too . . . would have been on our side all along the line. . . . With the dropping of the boat's Jewish name we would be helping our German seamen and Germans abroad in a large way. . . . May the day not be far away when this Jewish name will disappear from German shipping. . . . Only thus can we convince the world of our pure honest will for peace.

The Stürmer is blessed with a larger circulation than the Judenkenner. Besides being available for twenty pfennigs, it may also be read free of charge in all the larger towns in a public Stürmer display case. Dedicated to "the Battle for Truth," the paper stresses every week in large roman type that "the Jews Are Our Misfortune." Its subject matter is varied, as witness the following titles of articles in recent issues: The Jew in the Pig Pen, The Jew as a Pimp, Back to the Ghetto!, The Girl Ravisher in Weimar, The Leech Lowenthal, New Zealand Wants

No Jews, Girl Raper Punished, The Jew Is Our Enemy.

Though the German press gave but scant consideration to the Hauptmann trial, the Stürmer was more generous. Its big scoop was a "Letter from America." Printed last March, it occupied almost a quarter of a page and came from the Protestant Union for Civic Welfare. "The verdict against Hauptmann," declares the letter, "is the product of the American Jews and the press which is controlled by them." Furthermore,

> The greatest wave of anti-Semitism is rolling over our country and no human power can stop it—at the most an act of God. And the Jews have brought this upon themselves. . . . If the great German nation stands by and watches how the American Jews crucify this youth, and only because of their violent hatred of Hitler and the New Germany, then a hundred million Christians in this country are lost.

The Stürmer watches everything. For example, if an Aryan should forget himself and buy from a Jew, the Stürmer is sure to see it:

> It is a shame when two hereditary peasants, Georg Heinrich Sassmannshausen and Heinrich Dreisbach, both from Birkenfeld, do business with the notorious Talmud Jew and Nazi-hater, Simon from Erndtebrück. That's how grateful these Jew vassals are to the Führer Adolf Hitler for being freed from Jewish bonds!

Here is another business item:

> It's all the same to the Jew what business he's in. All that matters is that he can snatch enough money. So it should be easy to understand that the Jew Hartog in Gangelt even does business in rosary beads and articles for communion. But the saddest part is played by those Catholics who forget themselves so much as to adorn their communicants with articles delivered by the heirs of the Christ-murderers.

The following paragraph was headlined, "Jew Triumph at the Altenburger Market":

> The Altenburger Market at Heftricht is centuries old. Five times a year our fellow-citizens gather there to do business. Where money is to be had, the Jew of course is out in front. So it's no miracle that the Altenburger market is overrun with Jews. Toward the end of last year the following incident occurred. Soon after the market's opening two youths displayed a sign, "The Jews Are Our Misfortune." And behold, the Jews began to howl and cry. They ran for the police and demanded the sign be removed. And what no upright Heftrichter would have imagined actually happened! Two police officials removed the sign while the Jews stood around laughing and snickering.
>
> We advise these two officials to join the service of the Jews. As sign removers in the pay of Judea they can earn immortal fame.

The next item was entitled, "Insolence of Jewish Advertising Soliciting." It was part of a half-page article:

> In this number [Number 13] of the Israelitische Gemeindeblatt there is another advertisement on page one. An advertisement representing the height of insolence! An advertisement we would not have thought possible if we had not seen it with our own eyes! The management of the Fachingen State (!) Bath advertises in a Jewish paper. . . . Here a state, and hence a National-Socialist, bath is misused in most incredible fashion! If the advertisement is examined under a magnifying glass, an eagle is seen in the firm's trade mark. And on the breast of this eagle we discover—a swastika! . . . How the Jews must have laughed, sneered, and mocked when they spied Adolf Hitler's sign in their paper!
>
> But the entire German people recognizes in this incident . . . an insolent scorning and vilifying of our symbol. We demand the immediate discharge of the responsible manager of the Fachingen State Bath. . . . Away with those men who are in the pay of Judea!

Another bath whose advertising was under the scrutiny of the Stürmer was the Mergentheim bath. In its prospectus for 1935 Mergentheim calls the attention of prospective guests to the fact that there are "Church services: Catholic and Evangelical churches; synagogues." Says the outraged Stürmer:

> This is an open invitation to Jews to take the cure at Mergentheim. In the beginning of the season no doubt some dozens of Jews will go to Mergentheim. But on this account hundreds of German guests will stay away. That will be the success of this Jew-friendly advertisement of a place which is limping sadly out of step with the times.

As might be expected, the Stürmer is much concerned with the lamentable fact that some Nazis have not yet scaled the heights of prosperity, while "even in the Third Reich there are still some Jews who live like kings." For example:

> What right has a Jew to an automobile when the German must walk or ride in the street car? If no gasoline were sold to Jews the situation would soon be different.

That the Stürmer is deemed excellent material for the Nazi schoolroom goes without saying. Indeed, in many schools the paper is displayed in the classroom. Now and then children's compositions are published in the paper itself. Here is the conclusion of one entitled, "The Jews Are Our Misfortune."

> We [in Germany] were at the brink of a grave. Then came Adolf Hitler. Now the Jews in other countries are baiting us. But we will not be led astray. We will follow our leader. We will buy nothing from Jews. Every pfennig we give them kills one of our comrades.

Being something of a family sheet, the Stürmer also conducts a Briefkasten, wherein it seeks to answer the queries of its harassed readers. These answers sometimes run to great length and in a way perhaps explain the paper's popularity. The following are just a few of the more enlightening answers:

> D. As we hear, the Seifert Company has connected with it, in a profit-sharing capacity, the full-blooded Jew Carsch. The Seifert Company is thus not Aryan.
>
> D. If your society's official organ, the German Barber, wants to be a journal true to the spirit of National Socialism, it must not accept Jewish advertising.
>
> S. If you saw this member of the party enter Jew Abraham's photo store at the back entrance after dark, then it is your duty to report him to the party officers.
>
> F. It is a disgrace that Jews are still allowed to visit bathing beaches. For the present all you can do is not to attend such places. Soon things will be different.
>
> J. It's a shame when a group of civil-service workers and business men of Jülich, even today, have to associate with Jews and bowl in their company.
>
> T. Whether the National Cash Register Company of Dayton, Ohio, is a Jewish enterprise we do not know.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Hacking to Justice with Cummings

By PAUL W. WARD

THE New Deal was rendered legally impotent when Roosevelt made Homer Stillé Cummings his Attorney General in March, 1933. Cummings is a hack politician who, lured into Democratic ranks by the windy oratory of William Jennings Bryan, served as a Connecticut member of the Democratic National Committee for twenty-five years, was mayor of Stamford for three terms, fought the good fight with Roper for McAdoo and against Smith in 1924, and from 1914 to 1924 luxuriated in the appointive office of State's Attorney for Fairfield County.

While holding the last-named post he carved a niche for himself in the annals of criminal jurisprudence by his admirable handling of the Israel case. Forsaking the traditional role of the prosecuting attorney, he proved through diligent and personal detective work the innocence of the defendant, Israel, against whom a prima facie case of murder had been developed, bulwarked by a confession from the accused. The laudations which that case evoked have caused him to search with as nearly equal diligence as failing health and heavier duties will allow for an opportunity to repeat the performance as Attorney General. So far the best he has been able to do—by undermining most of the evidence on which they were convicted of arson—is to win a new trial for two Washington law-school students, one of them the son of a Connecticut physician.

He has failed, however, to evince any comparable interest in the victims of racial or political prejudice. Lynchings, even when brought within federal jurisdiction by being complicated with interstate kidnapping, as in the Claude Neal case at Marianna, Florida, in October, 1934, leave him mute. The agents he has sent to investigate such crimes and similar, if less severe, crimes against radical agitators have seemed fired solely with ambitions to disprove federal jurisdiction. When the N. A. A. C. P. and similar Negro groups sought to add the lynching question to the agenda for the loudly ballyhooed National Crime Conference that Cummings staged at Washington in December, 1934, he rebuffed them. Cummings's liberalism, even within the confines of the criminal law, is limited to 100 per cent politically safe issues.

Partly for that reason, his crime conference was one of the most bizarre spectacles ever staged in Washington. It reached its peak when Fulton Oursler, editor of Liberty, delivered a sales talk for the Macfadden publications and old Bernarr himself, while pretending to be orating on the press and crime. It was a ghastly speech, full of the "treat 'em rough; shoot first and think afterwards" stuff so dear to the tough-cop and other types of moron mind. Cummings approved, although penologists in the audience, including officials of the United States Bureau of Prisons, shook their heads sadly over Oursler's atavistic urgings.

Making the proceedings doubly nauseous, Cummings lectured the conference on keeping politics out of the nation's law-enforcement machinery. He, who has been hacking to justice on gift horses from Farley ever since he assumed the Attorney Generalship, shamelessly belabored the subject, as did many of the political hacks who are his assistants, and the audience, made up almost entirely of law officers owing their jobs to nothing but political patronage, as shamelessly cheered them on.

But all this has little to do with the obstructionist role Cummings has played in the New Deal's larger activities. Although Cummings—who incessantly chews small bits of paper and looks as though he could take his collar off over his head if his nose would get out of the way—has posed from time to time as a foe of Wall Street, he has been involved in only one major assault against the vested interests. That was his appearance for the Baush Machine Tool Company against the Mellon-controlled Aluminum Company of America in a triple-damage suit against the latter for violation of the anti-trust laws. Cummings was aggressive as counsel in that case, but somehow he lost that aggressiveness when he entered the Department of Justice.

For more than two years he has had the Aluminum Company under investigation. It had been under investigation for several years before he took office. Shortly thereafter he received a white-washing report from Benham, the chief investigator and an Old Dealer. Cummings publicly scorned the report and valiantly demanded that it be rechecked, but, unaccountably, he turned the job over again to the men who had made the original investigation, which had consisted in large part of asking Aluminum Company officials if they really, honest Injun, were violating the anti-trust laws. Cummings still is waiting for a report to his liking, although months ago, on a retrial of the Baush suit, a Connecticut jury found the Aluminum Company guilty of violating the anti-trust laws to such an extent that it awarded the plaintiff in that civil action approximately $3,000,000 damages.

That, with the exception of one motion-picture case, there have been no substantial anti-trust-law cases instituted by the Department of Justice under Cummings may be explained away in general on the ground that, with those laws reduced to a nebulous state by the NRA, prosecutions of that sort were futile. Cummings himself held forth at a press conference in late 1933 on the futility of prosecuting under the anti-trust laws a steel corporation, for example, that could show the jury that the offense charged specifically had been approved by Roosevelt when he signed the industry's code. But the explanation does not hold in the case of the Aluminum Company, for the NRA washed its hands of it in a scorching report based on a survey of its own. That leaves Cummings's aides obliged to resort to another unofficial explanation—that the Attorney General is reluctant to proceed against the Aluminum Company of America lest he be accused of persecuting the Mellons.

This last explanation is plausible, if not acceptable, for Cummings got his fingers burned early in the New Deal through his amazing announcement that Andy Mellon would be indicted for income-tax dodging. Ever since, Andy has been hurling charges of persecution at the Administration.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame

The announcement was amazing only because it presumed to anticipate the decision of a grand jury—and, mark you, a Pittsburgh grand jury—before it had begun its inquisition. It became something more than amazing when, to Cummings's immense chagrin, the grand jury refused to indict Mellon. That hurt far more than the Supreme Court's NRA decision, although the latter was technically the most overwhelming defeat dealt any Attorney General in recent years.

In reality, the Supreme Court decision boosted Cummings's stock within the Administration because he privately and accurately had predicted what the court would do to the NRA, which he approved in broad principle. He had fought against a final court test for that reason, oblivious to the fact that the business of an Attorney General is not merely to pick winning cases and that the public interest demands prompt dissolution of all juridical mirages such as the NRA. That able if unimaginative lawyer, Stanley F. Reed, who became Solicitor General in March, 1935, joined Cummings in fighting against a final court test for the NRA, and between them they forced withdrawal of the government's appeal in the Belcher case. Reed offered to take personal responsibility for that withdrawal, which brought a storm of protests.

It was Roosevelt and Richberg who crumpled under that storm, not Cummings and Reed. When the Circuit Court of Appeals in New York shortly thereafter handed down its opinion in the Schechter case, sustaining the NRA as a constitutional measure but denying the federal government power to regulate wages and hours in an industry selling only in intrastate commerce, Richberg radioed Roosevelt. The President, then fishing off the Florida coast, in turn radioed the Justice Department, directing Cummings to press an immediate appeal to the Supreme Court in the Schechter case. Under the circumstances, Cummings was glad to make Richberg a special Assistant Attorney General and let him assist in presenting the case to the Supreme Court; that kept responsibility for the final outcome divided, and it was Richberg's legal repute, not Cummings's, that suffered at the White House when the decision was handed down.

The general character of Cummings's subordinates can be judged by the fact that, when a young lawyer with a glistening scholastic and trial record applied for a transfer to the Justice Department from the legal division of an agency that was being liquidated, the Assistant Attorney General who interviewed him bluntly replied: "Two Senators are worth any amount of efficiency in this department." He meant that political indorsements were all that counted. There is scarcely an informed person in Washington who would doubt the statement. Cummings has taken into his department men that Farley wouldn't have even in the Post Office Department. Cummings is a staunch party man and when the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, alias the Postmaster General, sends him a job-hunter, that hunter has found a job. His devotion to Smiling Jim has made him ridiculous in more ways than one; there was, for example, the time he rebuked Norman Thomas in a public meeting for referring to Farley as a "convenient symbol of something we don't need." But perhaps that wasn't devotion; it may have been conscience.

Thus Cummings has loaded up the Department of Justice with political hacks in a measure that equals, if it does not exceed, the accomplishments in this respect of any Old Deal Attorney General, and Roosevelt facilitated the process by issuing on June 10, 1933, an executive order authorizing the consolidation within the Justice Department of the legal divisions of all other federal agencies. It was supposed to be an economy order, but in most instances it has resulted only in larger pay rolls, duplication of facilities, and more red tape and inefficiency.

The fact that the Department of Justice is a bottleneck through which all the New Deal's legal juices must flow—only a very few agencies, such as the SEC, having anything approaching complete legal autonomy—makes Cummings and his Augean stable of political hacks a complete offset to the bevy of young crusaders that such holy ghosts of liberal jurisprudence as Felix Frankfurter recruited for the More Abundant Life battalions. Pausing only to point to the evanescent Donald Richberg as an example, I hasten to add that these recruits were, like Blackstone, somewhat overrated by that segment of the public mind that viewed them as true harbingers of a New Deal. But compared with most of those in the Justice Department who can and do check them at almost every turn—if only through natural departmental jealousy enhanced by envy of the higher salaries which lavish-handed administrators established in the emergency agencies—these militants are marvels.

Think of Tom Corcoran and Jerome Frank in the RFC, Ben Cohen and Nathan Margold in the PWA, Charles Wyzanski in the Labor Department, and Jim Landis, Robert Healy, Dave Saperstein, and John Burns in the SEC. Then consider, for example, the New Deal's first Solicitor General, J. Crawford Biggs, the North Carolina small-town lawyer who got the job because there were no other candidates in the field, all others having assumed that Frankfurter was to have the post. When Frankfurter declined, there was Biggs, replete with indorsements from Josephus Daniels, O. Max Gardner, a horde of judges, and a score of past presidents of the American Bar Association. Biggs became completely engrossed in teacup balancing and after two years was squeezed out of the Justice Department, with a post as RFC voting trustee on the Wheeling and Lake Erie for solace. He was supplanted as Solicitor General by Reed, a Kentuckian who has been through the Yale, Virginia, Columbia, and Sorbonne mills and who from December, 1919, to December, 1932, was general counsel to the Federal Farm Board. Thereafter he became general counsel to the RFC, from which post he switched to the Solicitor Generalship. He kept as Assistant Solicitor General the frigid Scot, the late Angus W. MacLean, whom Biggs had brought to Washington from North Carolina to do his work and leave him free for the heavy social duties that were his heart's delight.

MacLean was notable for having represented all the corporate interests there were to represent in his section of North Carolina; for having led as a member of that state's General Assembly a successful fight to lighten the tax load on tobacco land by establishing a state-wide consolidated school system; for having doubled income and corporation taxes while loading on a sales tax to make the consolidation possible; and for having demolished the business lobby that fought the tax bill by charging publicly that it was using "women and liquor." That charge put an end to vote-trading and resulted in the passage of the bill, forty-four legislators having been accompanied to the capital by their wives when they returned the week following publication of MacLean's charge.

The only Justice Department official who bears a reputation as a liberal—except Sanford Bates, director of the Bureau of Prisons, who had a hard time dodging the melodrama Cummings likes to see all criminal activities couched in—is Harold M. Stephens, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the anti-trust division. He is a scholar and has been a judge. A Nebraskan by birth and a graduate of Harvard, he practiced law at Salt Lake City from 1912 until he joined the New Deal. Handicapped by subordinates of the best Farley-Cummings strain and by being called upon for myriad performances outside his own field, Stephens has yet to justify his reputation.

The other assistant attorneys general fit into the general departmental picture. Francis J. Wideman, in charge of tax suits, is a Shriner from Florida who served briefly in the Jacksonville City Council and was a delegate to the 1932 Democratic National Convention. George C. Sweeney, in charge of civil suits other than tax cases, is a past exalted ruler of the Elks and a chair magnate of Gardner, Massachusetts; he was mayor of that little town when duty called him to the Justice Department. Harry W. Blair, who has charge of the public-lands division, is an obscure lawyer from Joplin, Missouri. Equally obscure is Joseph R. Jackson, who has charge of customs cases. Joseph B. Keenan, next to Stephens the ablest of the assistant attorneys general, has charge of criminal cases. He is a Rhode Islander who after being graduated from Brown and Harvard set himself up as a lawyer at Cleveland and handled an Ohio crime investigation.

That brings us back to Homer, the tall, stooping, affable boss of the lot. All this Mason, Elk, Old Fellow, and Eagle wanted for the hard work he expended in furthering Mr. Roosevelt's candidacy was appointment as Governor General of the Philippines. He got it and was on his way there when he stopped off in Washington for the 1933 inaugural. He got no farther. Tom Walsh, the valiant, whom Roosevelt initially named Attorney General, had died while en route to the inaugural. Cummings was pressed into service, an Attorney General being badly needed in the mad days that followed, as Roosevelt with the gestures of a necromancer closed, then opened the banks. By the time the air had cleared, Cummings was firmly in the Attorney General's seat and the Justice Department was well on its way to becoming the Circumlocution Office instead of a veritable New Deal front such as Walsh undoubtedly would have made it. In the financial crisis Cummings had obligingly produced whatever sort of opinion was needed from moment to moment, so Roosevelt kept him, regardless of the contrast between him and Walsh, the original choice.

Old Dealers who had trembled at the news of Walsh's advent hung out the "business as usual" sign. They knew that under Cummings the law would continue to be not only what Mr. Bumble said it was but what somebody else has described as a cobweb which catches small flies but which the bigger bugs break through.

[Mr. Ward's next article, Hull House on Pennsylvania Avenue, will appear in the issue of July 17.]

Correspondence

Letters on Stolberg

Black Chauvinism

To the Editors of The Nation:

A very timely article is Benjamin Stolberg's Black Chauvinism. The author is almost entirely on sound ground. It is unfortunate, therefore, that he felt the need of exaggeration to strengthen his thesis.

Of the Civil War he says, "The war was not fought by the Negro, and no revolution can be won vicariously." In other words, my friend Stolberg makes the usual error of assuming that the Aframerican's part in that conflict and the events leading up to it was entirely passive. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Negroes not only played an important part in the anti-slavery fight through writing books and pamphlets, lecturing, and getting slaves out of the South along the underground railroad (Frederick Douglass, Bishop Alexander Crummel, Sojourner, and Aunt Harriet Tubman, to name a few), but supported the cause financially. At one time the majority of the subscribers of the Liberator were colored people.

When one considers the fact that 178,975 Negro soldiers in 141 infantry regiments, seven cavalry regiments, twelve heavy artillery regiments, and one of light artillery fought to preserve the Union, it seems ridiculous to assert that the war was not fought by the Negro. The first colored regiments to be organized were the First South Carolina, May 9, 1862; the First Louisiana Native Guards, September 27, 1862; the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts, February 9, 1863; and the Second Carolina Volunteers, February 23, 1863. While 78,779 of the black volunteers were from the North, the remainder were former slaves. These troops fought in some of the bloodiest battles in the Civil War. Not only that but large numbers of black troops fought for the Confederacy. Of 28,000 Confederate troops on review in New Orleans in November 23, 1861, there was one regiment of 1,400 colored men. In February 1864, the Confederate Congress passed an act making all free Negroes between eighteen and fifty liable for military service.

My friend Stolberg falls into another white American error in assuming that some one or two people lead or can lead the Negro race in America. Inasmuch as this is not true of any group anywhere on earth, why should it be true of the Negroes? There are many philosophies, many schools of thought among colored people in America, perhaps as many as there are sections of the country. There are thousands of intelligent Negroes who agree with neither the Washington nor the DuBois school of thought. And it certainly is not true that the race now has no leadership because Dr. DuBois quit the N. A. A. C. P. There are hundreds of leaders in education, business, journalism, fraternalism, medicine, politics, labor, and social work.

While Stolberg is on the subject of chauvinism, perhaps he will explain satisfactorily his assertion that the colored man or woman who acquired at a great sacrifice a liberal education thereby became a "spoiled Negro." This comes dangerously close to agreeing with the Southern Bourbons who declare that to educate a Negro is to "spoil" him. And where does my friend Stolberg get the idea that "Dr. DuBois's militant intellectual Negro finally cut himself off from these masses by seeking preferential treatment in the white world"? Where are these Negroes? He surely cannot be referring to Charles H. Houston, the Harvard-educated lawyer who is heading the fight on Jim Crowism in the Southern tax-supported colleges, inequalities in teachers' salaries, and public-school fund allotments for the N. A. A. C. P., nor can he be referring to men like the City College graduate A. Philip Randolph, president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. He cannot mean Laurence C. Jones, who went into the wilderness of Mississippi from the University of Iowa and built up a great school for Negroes in a state where there are few. There are thousands of such Negroes of college education who have been and are laboring to lift the economic, social, and cultural status of the masses of Negroes.

Moreover, it is these educated Negroes who have borne the brunt of the fight to break down economic, social, political, and residential barriers. Dr. L. A. Nixon of El Paso, Texas, headed the fight on the Texas white primary. Dr. Sweet of Detroit opened the way for the dangerously crowded Negro population to expand. Walter White personally investigated twenty lynchings. There are thousands of others. Is fighting for citizenship and manhood rights cutting oneself off from the masses? Is it seeking preferential treatment to want to vote, live in a healthy locality, and get a Pullman berth from Washington to Mississippi? Is it seeking preferential treatment to go to the bat for Negro enfranchisement in the savage South?

It is equally an error to assume that all the Negroes flocked to Garvey or are flocking to Father Divine. Garvey never had more than 30,000 followers, as Cyril Briggs will attest. Millions of Negroes do not belong to any church, let alone believing in Divine. This is especially true of colored men, among whom the percentage of church members is less than among white men.

I agree whole-heartedly with my friend Stolberg when he says "there is no future for the American Negro in chauvinism, right or left," but he did not have to wander away from the strict truth in order to prove it.

New York, May 20 GEORGE S. SCHUYLER

Condescending Paternalism

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

When Benjamin Stolberg in his article, Black Chauvinism, discovers a "split in the psychology of the American Negro" and refers to the Negro as a "sociological caricature" he displays complete inability to grasp even the barest essentials of the question. One who professes to talk in scientific and even in (save the mark!) Marxian terms about social phenomena should at least have thought out the problem beyond a vagueness implicit in such psychological concepts when applied to social movements. The methodology of Mr. Stolberg bears a certain fundamental resemblance to that which produced the anti-Semitic tripe of national socialism. Did not The Nation, steeped in Abolitionist traditions, as much as sense the stench of condescending paternalism and insulting matter-of-fact chauvinism which pervades the whole article?

Only one entirely ignorant of the profound stirring among all strata of the Negro people, or an out-and-out political charlatan, could state that the Negroes are today leaderless, or that they "are falling for Father Divine." At no time since the Reconstruction period has there been such a vital clash of issues and discussion of political programs among Negroes as today. The fact that followers of Father Divine participated in the May Day parade side by side with Communists and tens of thousands of white workers is highly significant and important, and cannot be dismissed, as Mr. Stolberg attempts, with a knowing wave of the hand. It shows that even those masses most backward politically, and under the influence of the most primitive form of religionism, are today being set in motion toward a class-conscious position.

Nor can Mr. Stolberg explain away with smart all-inclusive phraseology the rapidly growing Communist influence among broad sections of the Negro people. Could there be anything more ridiculous than his main thesis—the hungry and bewildered and leaderless Negro masses are now finding escape in "racial chauvinism," and "the Communist Party, anxious for a 'mass base' in the black world which it lacks in the white, is catering to this very chauvinism"?

Chauvinism, this trained student of world affairs should know, is peculiar only to an oppressing people. White chauvinism and the practices of "white superiority" have been the principal factors leading to the rise of Negro nationalism, which it pleases our pseudo-Marxist to call "black chauvinism." But Mr. Stolberg only displays an abysmal ignorance of the source of the nationalist movement among Negroes, which is largely a reaction to oppression, an expression of the mass upsurge against this oppression. Petty-bourgeois Negro leaders (now including Dr. DuBois) and organizations are attempting to divert this upsurge into channels of separatism and segregation. It is precisely against such petty-bourgeois nationalism that the Communist Party fights, while at the same time directing its main efforts in a struggle against all aspects of white chauvinism, especially in the labor movement, where every chauvinist act provides grist for the mill of the segregationists.

The article is so evidently incompetent. Was it the anti-Communist conclusion which prompted The Nation to publish it?

New York, June 2 JAMES S. ALLEN

Testimony in Defense

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Inclosed is a copy of a letter which several of us of the faculty of Howard University have addressed to the editor of the Crisis. Since Benjamin Stolberg's article on Black Chauvinism, which is the subject of our controversy with the Crisis, appeared in The Nation originally, we should like our reaction to it to appear in your columns as well.

Washington, D. C., June 14 EMMETT E. DORSEY

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CRISIS:

We are deeply disturbed by your editorial comment on Benjamin Stolberg's article on Black Chauvinism in The Nation. We wish to protest the obvious distortion of the whole meaning of his position, which was a brilliant and sound analysis of the tragic predicament of the American Negro today. Your reference to Stolberg as a white Southern Bourbon could be easily dismissed as absurd were it not indicative of the very chauvinism he is attacking. Anyone who knows the history of Ben Stolberg—and everyone in the N. A. A. C. P. must know it—and who none the less interprets his outlook as the Crisis does is either stupid or vicious. And we are inclined to believe that in this instance the Crisis was both. It was stupid because it patently tore two sentences out of their context contrary to the letter of the passage between the two sentences and contrary to the spirit of the whole essay. And it was vicious because it expressed the growing racial sensitiveness in our Negro life, which is bound to work against the very desegregation which Mr. Stolberg so militantly demanded in the very article you attacked and for which the Crisis at one time stood without equivocation.

If Benjamin Stolberg's article in The Nation expresses white Southern Bourbonism, we demand that the editor of the Crisis print this letter so that the world may know that we, Negro teachers at Howard University, subscribe to the same kind of white Southern Bourbonism.

Washington, D. C., June 14

STERLING A. BROWN
RALPH J. BUNCHE
EMMETT E. DORSEY
E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

The Workmen's Circle

To the Editors of The Nation:

Mr. Benjamin Stolberg, who in his judgments on the Socialist Party assumes the pontifical air of an ecclesiastical father from whom there can be no secrets, evidently deems it important to take a jab at the Workmen's Circle, the great Jewish Fraternal Order having a membership of 70,000 in the United States and Canada. This is what Mr. Stolberg says: "Another powerful Socialist auxiliary is the Workmen's Circle, a Jewish workmen's benevolent society whose energies are also expended mostly in bitter denunciation of Stalin as being not one whit better than a fascist."

I was under the impression that the doings of an organization are known by its official acts, published statements, and the decisions of its governing bodies. I would like to ask Mr. Stolberg when and by which act did the Workmen's Circle as a body denounce the Soviet Union or slander its leaders? To say that the Workmen's Circle is "expanding its energies in bitter denunciation of Stalin" is the malicious statement of a man who is in fundamental ignorance of the purposes and activities of the Workmen's Circle. Far from spending its energies on trivial political squabbles, it is exerting them for the betterment of conditions of its membership and the laboring masses generally. It is attempting to raise their cultural and political level and to teach them their place in modern capitalist society. The Workmen's Circle is an inter-party organization where adherents of every wing of the labor and radical movements have the freedom to advocate their special brand of economic and political thought so long as their words or actions do not deliberately react to the harm of the organization.

I can hardly understand Mr. Stolberg's purpose in dragging the Workmen's Circle into the net of Socialist organizations for his caustic and oh-so-sophisticated attack. To me it seems very much like the act of pen-brigandage so masterfully characterized by the famous Alexander Herzen. Mr. Stolberg's spurious attack on the Workmen's Circle is merely words, hostile words, without base or foundation. It is to be hoped that the readers of The Nation will be able to see behind the malice.

New York, May 31 J. Baskin,
General Secretary Workmen's Circle

Vile Canards

To the Editors of The Nation:

For what purpose is The Nation being edited these days? In order to rub out what vestiges remain of any decent human movement to alleviate suffering and restore to mankind some measure of freedom? It would seem so after reading the vicious article on the Socialist Party by Benjamin Stolberg.

Mr. Stolberg's facts are false, his premises cock-eyed, and his writing magnificent. But magnificent writing is no excuse for printing so obviously biased an article as Stolberg's.

Those of us who have been loyal to The Nation since Mr. Villard took it over, years back, will find it hard to justify our support of a publication which gives circulation to such vile canards as Mr. Stolberg is guilty of in the article which you carried in your magazine.

Radburn, N. J., June 5 McAlister Coleman

» "The WHAT and the HOW and the WHY of SEX «

The HYGIENE of MARRIAGE

By DR. MILLARD S. EVERETT

"What am I missing?"

It is safe to say that no two people have identical sex habits. Further, we may assume that no two people get precisely the same degree of enjoyment out of their sex lives. There is more variation in sex practices than the average layman conceives possible. Physicians have found frequently that all that is necessary to convert an unhappily mated couple into one well adjusted and happy is to instruct them as to the variety that can exist within the marital relationship, in sex activity.

In this volume, more frank, more informative, and more detailed than any that has yet appeared on the American market for the general public, Dr. Everett discusses in dignified and scientific—yet perfectly understandable—language the problems and possibilities of the marital relationship. He has written a manual of sex that leaves untouched no major aspect of the sex life of those married or about to be, pointing the way to a happier, safer, more diversified, more wholesome enjoyment of sex.

PARTIAL LIST OF SUBJECTS TREATED

Sex Taboos • The Sex Organs • Abnormalities • The Physical Hygiene of Sex • Homosexuality • Pre-marital Sexual Adjustment • Pre-marital Chastity • Periods of Abstention • Monogamy • Satisfactory Physical Union • Marital Hygiene • The Beginning of Marriage • Orgasm in Men and Women • Frigidity in Women • Positions in Sex Relations • Importance of Orgasm in Women • The Frequency of Sexual Intercourse • Sex Relations After Middle Age • Qualifications for Parenthood • The Hygiene of Marriage • A List of Birth Control Clinics in the United States • Scientific versus Hearsay Methods of Contraception • Experimentation in New Methods of Contraception.

"There are other good books on sex, on birth control, on marriage. But the reader will look far to find a volume which excels this one in uniting practical information and general advice. . . . The author has wisely conspired with the publishers to keep the style clear and simple and the publishers with the author to keep the price down. . . . The intelligent person will find here . . . the what and the how and the why of sex."

—PROFESSOR T. V. SMITH,
University of Chicago.

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or to: N78

THE VANGUARD PRESS, 100 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C.

Please send me..........copies at $2.65 each ($2.50 plus 15c for postage and handling) of THE HYGIENE OF MARRIAGE by Dr. Millard S. Everett.

.....I enclose check or money order. .....Please send C.O.D.

Name ....

Address ....

City.............................. State............

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Labor and Industry

"We Cover the United Front"

By HEYWOOD BROUN

AT the moment of writing it is not possible to predict the precise form which the Wagner bill will take when it comes to the final vote, but there is every evidence of a Congressional desire to add more loopholes to a measure which was in the beginning more than a little drafty. Those who have hailed it as a Magna Charta of labor were decidedly premature. Indeed, I wonder whether labor should ever look to any piece of legislation as a rock on which to build a permanent or even a semi-permanent mansion. There are too many slips between the best of bills (and the Wagner measure is hardly that) and their performance.

Labor runs a double risk in the matter of relying on the aid of lawmakers. Some given bill may seem to offer everything which is desired. And, if we continue the fantasy, this may manage to slip through both houses and obtain a Presidential signature without having picked up crippling amendments along the way. Yet even at this point it is much too soon for bell ringing and dancing in the street. It is utterly impossible to predict the scope and effect of a law, no matter how precise its language, until it has been put into effect and withstood the heat and the cold, the rain and the hail for several years.

Practically no measure of any sort ever lives up to as much as 50 per cent of the hopes of its advocates. The roof is one of the weak points. On paper plans the shingling seems perfect but when the storm comes the hidden leaks develop. I cite 7-a which seemed distinctly promising and turned out to be practically useless as a guaranty of labor's right to organize without employer interference. Dissenters have always found a way to circumvent the most careful kind of legislation, and so poorly or loosely drawn bills may turn into sieves instead of barricades of protection.

Some radical labor sympathizers have been so much fed up with disappointing legislation that they are over-inclined to attack any effort made to improve conditions by law. Such an attitude seems to me an error. Labor ought to make its power felt in legislation but it should always move warily in Washington and keep its fingers crossed. There is too much disposition to say of this Senator, Representative, Cabinet member, or President, "So and so is a friend of labor." Such accolades of approval should be granted only for twenty-four-hour periods, or less, and subject to prompt withdrawal. Most politicians are tight-rope walkers, and the passenger who undertakes to perch upon the shoulders of any one of them is in a decidedly precarious position. He should always be ready to jump for his life at a moment's notice.

It may be trite to say that labor must always look to its own organizational power for its essential strength. Although this saying is familiar enough it cannot be repeated too often. And it seems to me that this is an excellent time for restatement. In my individual opinion important labor leaders are making a grave error in tactics at this very moment. They are hailing a highly dubious bill as a charter of liberties and at the same time announcing that they will have nothing to do with a united front.

In The Nation recently I ventured the opinion that if trade unions undertook to "purge" themselves of Communist or "Communistic" members they were very likely to find that employers would seize upon the opportunity to purge themselves of all unions, even the lily-white ones. That is just as true today. One or two labor experts have tried to tell me that William Green's warning to the International Fur Workers' Union was merely a local issue and that it did not truly mean that all unions should expel all Communists. Without passing here and now on the merits of the furriers' case I must say that the A. F. of L. leaders are dealing with devices which are dangerous to the labor movement in general. Employers have simply shown during the last few years that their first line of attack in any economic dispute is to raise the red scare. Surely this practice should be left to the employers and not used by labor leaders themselves. The labor leader who cries "red" today in dealing with a union situation may quite possibly and ironically find the same charge being hurled at himself by the employing groups tomorrow morning. If ever labor needed solidarity and a united front this is the very second.

In particular I may point out that the controversy has been brought up at a time when it may well cripple the rapid growth of white-collar organizations seeking affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. Take, for instance, the case of the Newspaper Guild. As an officer of that organization I have no right to state or even suggest an official policy except by the direction of the membership. But that direction has already been given. The constitution of the Guild says expressly that no political, racial, or sex test shall be made in regard to membership. The constitution of the Guild was adopted unanimously at the Cleveland convention.

Of course, no organization outside the A. F. of L. nor one merely moving in that direction has any right to attempt to dictate policy to such a large and experienced group, but I think it is only fair to point out that there seems to me no disposition on the part of the Guild to depart from its own policy of united front within its own ranks. Of course, there are Communists in the Guild and they have precisely the same rights as other members. The fact that they constitute, in all probability, a small minority does not affect the issue.

If the A. F. of L. can ask for the purging of Communists it can ask for the purging of Socialists or single taxers or anarchists or Townsendites or Republicans or any of the many curious sects which make up the political and economic map of America. I feel certain that there is not a single ism which is not represented in the Guild. We think that is our strength. After all we are newspapermen and we are proud to say, "We cover the united front."

Gas Sunday

By SAMUEL PAUL PUNER

NOT since the days of the first great American "red scare" in the years immediately following the war has organized labor in the Northwest been subjected to such waves of terrorism and vigilantism as have accompanied some of the recent strikes. After the Minneapolis drivers' strike a small group of young truck drivers organized their fellows in Fargo, North Dakota. The first strike of the newly formed Local 173, of the Chauffeurs, Drivers, Teamsters, and Helpers Union took place in November, 1934. It was in behalf of the local milk drivers. It lasted only one day; then the employers, who had hitherto refused even to discuss the demands, offered to arbitrate. At the end of two weeks, with the help of Governor Olson of North Dakota, the union won a complete victory.

The victory of the milk drivers soon brought the unorganized to union headquarters, and by December, 1934, the union was strong enough to attempt to tackle the employers in the coal, lumber, and ice industries of Fargo and its twin city, Moorhead. The demands were identical with those made and acceded to by the milk industry: (1) union recognition, (2) seniority rights, (3) a minimum wage of $20, (4) a forty-eight-hour week. The employers, balked by the newly formed Associated Industries, an association organized shortly before the milk strike to combat the rising wave of labor organization, refused even to discuss the demands. The workers then took the case to the Regional Labor Board in Minneapolis, but the employers failed to appear at the hearing. A strike was called on January 22, 1935.

The first few days of the strike were met by a stony silence on the part of the employers' association. Picketing continued peacefully and successfully throughout the city. But things were happening beneath the surface. From 200 to 250 deputies were quietly sworn in by State's Attorney Bergesen. (This was subsequently admitted by him when he was called as a witness for the defendants in the injunction proceeding.) Then a twenty-four-hour truce was requested for January 26, and granted by the strikers. A committee representing the Fargo Trades and Labor Assembly conferred with the employers but found them unwilling to yield a point. The strikers returned to the picket lines.

On Sunday, January 27, all was calm and peaceful on the Fargo front. At 3:30 p. m. the Union Hall was crowded with the strikers and their families who had come to hear an instructor of the educational division of the FERA, who was helping them form classes for the study of labor history. About 200 men, women, and children were present. Word came that a crew of men had been seen loading ice on the river. A committee of strikers was delegated to investigate and persuade the men to retire. They left the hall and drove over to the river. As they arrived, the police, already on the scene and reinforced by a band of special deputies, ordered them away. The men refused. Without further ado they were herded into trucks and taken to the police station. One of the pickets, a little more voluble in his objections than the rest, was clubbed by a policeman.

Immediately the police and special deputies were marshaled at headquarters and ordered to march on Union Hall. Armed with clubs and ax-handles, the forces of law and order went into action, having first carefully surrounded the premises and blocked all exits. A demand was made that William Cruden and Austin Swald, officers of the union, submit to arrest. The men countered with the demand that warrants be produced. There were, of course, no warrants, but the police stood their ground. An order went back to headquarters for tear gas, on the ground that the strikers were defying duly constituted police authority. Shortly thereafter, and without warning, the bombardment began through the windows. In a few moments, with eyes streaming from the effects of the gas, the strikers were driven from the hall. The women and children were segregated by the cops and sent home. All the men were arrested, including the FERA instructor. In all, ninety-five arrests were made on "Gas Sunday" and the men remanded to jail for lack of $500 bail each. The pickets seized at the river were charged with rioting, and the union members arrested in the drive on the hall were charged with conspiracy and resisting an officer.

After the preliminary hearing, charges were dismissed against all those driven from headquarters, but the sixteen strikers arrested at the river were held for trial for rioting. All the defendants were found guilty, three being sentenced to six months' imprisonment and thirteen to three months' each. This verdict is now being appealed.

Mass arrests failed to break the strike and, to the dismay of the employers, served to stir up sympathy to such a degree that the legislature passed a resolution of condemnation, charging, among other things, that "the police department of Fargo has deputized individuals of unconcerned standing in this controversy who have used brute force in preventing the strikers from peaceful picketing; and who have committed unlawful acts of violence for the purpose of discrediting the strikers and destroying favorable public opinion in their cause." As a consequence, the employers adopted more conventional tactics and applied for an injunction. The temporary restraining order was obtained without notice, and was so broad and sweeping that under its terms all strike activity, including peaceful picketing, was prohibited. After the hearing, however, the restraining order was modified, but a temporary injunction was issued sufficiently broad to hamper seriously the conduct of the strike, although the legislature had just enacted an anti-injunction law modeled on the federal Norris-La Guardia Act.

Despite this hardship the strike continued unabated with the strong support of organizations throughout the Northwest. Yet almost four months after the strike was declared, the International Union, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, branded it illegal and revoked the charter of Local 173. After this, the Fargo Trade and Labor Assembly expelled the local and found itself with but a third of its members left. The expulsion has resulted in the organization of the Independent Union of All Workers, 173, with a policy of industrial unionism. The strike continues under militant rank-and-file leadership.

The Cornetist

By MARK VAN DOREN

When the last freight, dusk-musical, had gone,
Groaning along the dark rails to St. Louis,
When the warm night, complete across the cornfields,
Said there was nothing now, no motion left,
No possible sound, we heard him—
Rocked on the silent porch and heard the low notes

Leave on their level errand like the last sound
Ever to be man-blown about the earth.
Like the last man this sentry of the switches
Blew, and the mournful notes, transcending cinders,
Floated above the corn leaves—
Floated above the silks, until arriving,

Arriving, they invaded our warm darkness,
Deep in the still veranda, and we laughed:
"Why, there he is, that pitiful lone devil;
There is the Frisco nightingale again,
There is our mocking-bird-man"—
Laughed, and said these things, and went to bed.

And slept; but there are nights now when I waken,
After these years, and all these miles away,
When I sit up and listen for the last sound
Man will have made alive; and doubt a little
Whether we should have laughed—
Whether we should have pitied that poor soul.

You were too sure of being there forever,
And I too soon was leaving to be wise.
Not that his horn had wisdom; but at night time
Man has a need of man, and he was there,
Always; the horn was there
Always—and joy, I think, was why we laughed.

And slept; for there is many an hour of dreariness,
Many an hour unloud with lips or brass,
When I lie still and listen for the last note
Ever some lung has blown; and am self-envious,
Thinking I once could laugh—
Thinking I once could pity that firm soul.

A Plan to Control Capitalism

Controlling Depressions. By Paul H. Douglas. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

THE author of the present volume feels that the monetary theories of Keynes and Hayek do not explain the generating causes of business cycles. He holds that the fundamental causes are rooted in industrial combinations and monopoly with their rigid prices and, to a lesser degree, in the rigid wage rates which some of the trade unions have maintained. Briefly stated, Douglas's theory is as follows: This is the era of monopoly capitalism, dominated by the holding company in transportation, communication, and power and by the vertical and horizontal combination in manufacturing industry. The primary aim of these monopolistic combines is to obtain a constant rate of profit. They succeed in doing this by keeping the price of their goods and services as nearly stable as possible. This strategy was most successful in the great upswing of 1922-29. During this period technical improvements and increasing investment of capital reduced unit costs, but the price level was kept stable, mainly, by price-control methods, such as "Pittsburgh plus" in the steel industry and the "open-price" competition of numerous trade associations. Wages, however, did not increase in proportion to the expanding productivity of labor and the declining costs of production. They lagged behind prices. Since the income of industrial and farm labor and that of the small salaried man did not increase relative to declining costs and expanding production, stable prices could be achieved only through the restriction of output. This was especially true in the heavy-goods industries, where monopoly is common. The inevitable results of output restriction and the lag of labor income under conditions of stable prices were inflated profits that stimulated speculation, a reduction of mass purchasing power and of the real income of the masses, the over-investment of capital, and then unemployment and the depression.

Although insufficient mass purchasing power is chief among the causes to which the author attributes the depression, it would be a mistake to classify him as an advocate of the so-called high-wages theory of prosperity. According to him, wages can expand only in proportion to labor's increasing productivity and to falling costs. The failure of organized labor to observe this relationship of wages, productivity, and prices frequently leads trade unions to jack up wages in specific trades to the disadvantage of the working class as a whole. Thus on the railroads and in the building trades the high wage-consciousness of the skilled unions resulted in a wage structure which was just as rigid as the prices that were enforced by the monopolistic practices of the employers in those industries. The cost of this benefit was borne by other workers, mainly the unskilled and unorganized, in the form of wage reductions or unemployment. The paramount concern of organized labor should therefore be the increase of the share of the social product which goes to the working class as a whole, and not high wages as such.

In Professor Douglas's estimation the rigidity of wages is not a serious problem because it has manifested itself in only a few industries. But to the extent that it is a problem for present or future concern he proposes that it be taken care of by the organization of labor upon an industrial instead of a craft basis and by the elimination of racial and other restrictions upon trade-union membership. The real problem in business-cycle control is "sticky" or inflexible prices, which employers with the connivance of A. F. of L. leaders have perpetuated in NRA codes. He proposes therefore a more determined enforcement of the anti-trust laws in small industry and abandonment of price fixing. He holds that any attempt to bring about competition in industries dominated by a few concerns is futile. The only remedy is to socialize monopolies. Thus Professor Douglas's plan for controlling depressions and therefore for controlling capitalism—since he thinks it can stand only one or two more depressions—has two objectives. The first objective is to bring about flexible prices and a stable price level. The second is to expand mass purchasing power in relation to the productivity of industry. The chief aspects of the plan are (1) the public ownership of the railroads and utilities, iron and steel, aluminum, electrical machinery, and heavy chemicals; (2) the creation of a central bank with the sole power to manufacture credit and with the power to stabilize prices and to provide employment during depressions; (3) the movement of wages in relation to the expansion and contraction of industry; (4) the levying of a federal tax upon corporate profits in excess of 6 per cent on capital actually invested; (5) the distribution of the proceeds of this tax in the form of a consumers' dividend or the expenditure of them upon social services; (6) the concentration of public works upon low-cost housing during depressions; (7) the building up of unemployment reserves during prosperity; and (8) the timing of government expenditures according to the ups and downs of business.

The author looks to a third party composed of farmers, wage-earners, low-salaried workers, and small business men to put his measures into operation. Past attempts to organize such a party have failed because of the divergent economic interests and outlooks of these groups. Nevertheless, Professor Douglas is forced to rely upon them, since his purchasing-power theory skirts the real problem that is at the base of the business cycle. This problem is not the rigidity of prices and monopoly but the conflict between labor income and profits. This conflict, which Marx saw in the conversion of variable capital (means of subsistence) into constant capital (machinery and materials of production), is of course intensified in the period of monopoly capitalism, but it is just as characteristic of the more primitive and individualistic stage. Accordingly, cycles must occur in both stages irrespective of flexible or inflexible prices. Thus, from this standpoint, the socialization of banking and industry and the control of economic life, generally, will not be realized until American labor is made conscious of the conflict of interest that underlies the business cycle and of the necessity to achieve political power.

ABRAM L. HARRIS

Straining to Feel

Poems: 1914-1934. By Herbert Read. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

WITH Mr. Read, who is one of England's foremost critics of art and literature, poetry is something of a side-line. Although he has been in close touch with poetic movements during the last two decades, he has followed rather than helped to lead them. Many of his poems give the impression of exercises in which he is trying to assimilate the inventions of more original writers. This collection shows, nevertheless, that combination of intelligence and sensitiveness which one expects to find in anything he publishes, and it contains a half-dozen poems of genuine distinction.

The early pieces in the imagist manner are not pointed enough to be among the best examples of that school. The war poems are interesting more for the incidents they relate, and for the author's comments upon them, than for the manner of their telling. Mr. Read has not an exceptional ear for music, and he is rarely able to establish a cadence or sustain a form. His real talent is for psychological and moral analysis, and it was not until he underwent the influence of Donne and Eliot that he acquired the technique which enabled him to make good use of this talent in the poems entitled The Analysis of Love, Beata l'Alma, Mutations of the Phoenix, and The Lament of Saint Denis.

Their general theme is the internal conflict of the intellectual who is straining to feel and straining to see. The solutions are the familiar ones of the nineteen-twenties: "sense and image" must be refashioned; "single perceptions," to which "communication is not essential," offer a haven of rest; and there is Lawrence's call of the blood, symbolized by the moon and the phoenix. The poet comes nearest to achieving a balance in these lines:

> Mind wins deciduously, > hibernating through many years.
> Impulse alone is immutable sap > and flowing continuance > extending life to leafy men.

The problem has been solved, however, only in theory: these poems are brittle, of the nerves, and fraught with a sense of isolation.

A recent poem of some length, The Nuncio, which was obviously influenced by W. H. Auden even to several of his mannerisms, shows that Mr. Read has again moved with the times. The old preoccupation is there, but it has taken a new form:

> Floodlights of emotion > must be thrown against the recessed terraces > the rectangular towers and bleak buttresses—
> the external form of our adventure.
> We must design with brighter color > borrowing harmonies from children at school > and especially on an outer wall > cast a warmth that will appeal > to those unable to measure steel.

This envisaging of the problem in its objective and social aspects promises the poet release from the tortures of introspection and progress toward clarity.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

Cheap Stuff

What So Proudly We Hailed. By Emile Gauvreau. The Macaulay Company. $3.50.

THIS book on Russia by Mr. Gauvreau, who is one of the staff philosophers on William Randolph Hearst's New York Daily Mirror, reminds me of Dr. Will Durant's "The Tragedy of Russia." True enough, they differ in their points of view: Dr. Durant didn't like Russia at all, and Mr. Gauvreau seems to like it. But both volumes have this in common: they are incompetent and cheap. Bad work is bad work whether it is on the right or on the left.

Just before the last Presidential election Mr. Gauvreau had a talk with Franklin D. Roosevelt, who confided to him his great interest in Russia. So Mr. Gauvreau took a brief and "memorable trip" to the land of the Soviets to see for himself. In Leningrad he saw some women repairing wires on telegraph poles, and this set him on a long and profound train of thought:

> An air of utter professionality, if I may coin a word, makes it almost impossible to distinguish the repairwoman on the job from the man at the other end of the loop of wire, pulling the slack taut. There are distinguishing measurements, of course, but the mind does not dwell on these long in Russia. The electricity of doing and of producing and of racing toward a goal makes other considerations seem somewhat silly. . . . At times some of the wiring may be weird indeed, and nothing but a woman's intuition may guide you to the mysterious button which turns night into day.

Mr. Gauvreau also saw women clean the streets of Moscow, and he observed their operations very closely. His considered opinion is that "they sweep the streets clean and do the job as though the gutters were their kitchen floors, leaving no corner neglected. Our male American street-cleaning employees are a little weak in the corners."

The Russian, of course, is "essentially tragic and melancholy," and when he "tells you to stop worrying, then is the time to sit up all night and expect the worst." Strangely enough, the Russian also "loves comedy." Then again, the Russian is really a very serious creature. He "wants to believe in the utter truth of that which is depicted for him on the stage." There is very little gaiety in him. Consider a Russian dancing. "If he is enjoying the dance, his face, which bears the mask of the stoic with its set lip and corrugated forehead all intent upon the mathematical calculations of toe and heel, whirl and glide, will never reveal it. He is working out a problem in this dance." One would naturally be inclined to think that a country inhabited by such strange people must be somewhat strange itself, and Mr. Gauvreau hastens to say that this is precisely the fact. Classical music when played in Russia, to cite one example, is not like classical music played in any other country. The Russian soil and atmosphere do something fine and special to it. "In the Russian interpretations . . . there is a distinction which is not to be found elsewhere, I think. There is a certain indefinable peace-breathing in the tempo of its dominance which sets it apart from anything like it in the whole world," whatever that may mean. Even locomotives, insists Mr. Gauvreau, are not just locomotives in Russia. He says that once, on a railroad trip, he "was lost in reverie as the locomotive, far ahead, panted and puffed with true Russian patience." The land of the Soviets apparently is too much for one mind to grasp, even when that mind is of the stature of Mr. Gauvreau's. On at least one occasion, he confesses, he had to repair "to the night club for a drink. That is the only thing to do when you are in Russia and thinking too much about Russia."

When Mr. Gauvreau came back to his office in the Daily Mirror he found a lot of accumulated work—stories about Sally Rand, Doris Duke, Gloria Vanderbilt, Waxie Gordon, Jessie B. Costello, John Dillinger, Eva Coo, Primo Carnera, Samuel Insull, Upton Sinclair, and "Dutch" Schultz. He recites their tales in typical tabloid manner, and then asks the reader whether he prefers the America of such raffish people to the Russia where women are so busy with worth-while work that men do not even notice their sex. "Is this our country, is this then America? . . . Who has done this thing to us? Shall all be lost because of these? Hardly. We are strong enough. We are big enough. The dream is unending." To drive home his comparison between the two countries Mr. Gauvreau prints two sets of pictures: one group of smiling Russian men, women, and children, and another of American murderers, Lesbians, and unemployed. All the pictures are so selected that they would delight the feature editor of the scummiest tabloid paper.

As Dr. Will Durant's "The Tragedy of Russia" was the cheapest book published so far in the United States against Russian communism, so Mr. Gauvreau's book is the cheapest one that has so far appeared in this country more or less in favor of it.

CHARLES ANGOFF

Caveat Emptor

The Consumer Seeks a Way. By Clark Foreman and Michael Ross. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.
How to Spend Money. By Ruth Brindze. The Vanguard Press. $2.
Counterfeit. By Arthur Kallet. The Vanguard Press. $1.50.

THESE three books, which take up the cause of that forgotten man the consumer, illustrate sharply how difficult any such championship must be. Mr. Foreman and Mr. Ross, after discussing the complicated nature of our economic society, come to the conclusion that only by consumer organization can the ultimate buyer of commodities hope for a fair deal; Miss Brindze describes in detail the quality and quantity standards which consumers must demand in order to assure themselves their money's worth; Mr. Kallet, with more passionate partisanship than any of the others, points out concretely, with the aid of impressive photographs, just how the consumer is hornswoggled by manufacturers, advertisers, and retailers in search of profits. In other words, if consumers would get together and, informing themselves about the kind of goods they want, demand that they be satisfied, what Mr. Kallet describes so feelingly would not take place. One would not say that this degree of intelligent self-consciousness on the part of millions of buyers is impossible to hope for. But at least it is far away. There is undoubtedly a small group of consumers who would be willing to study Miss Brindze's clear-cut standards, and who would make effective nuisances of themselves while making purchases, to the ultimate benefit of every other consumer.

There is no doubt that such consumer organization as we now have, as illustrated by publications like the Consumer's Defender and Consumers' Research, guide the marketing activities of an impressively sizable group of persons—say, a quarter of a million, counting each subscriber as representative of two or three others. But the inertia of a hundred and twenty million, the pressure exerted on them by highly colored advertisements, and the difficulty, even to those of more than average intelligence, of becoming informed about the multifarious tricks in all the retail trades constitute a problem of enormous proportions. Probably the most effective way of tackling it would be to press for the establishment, by government departments, of definite consumer standards, as those standards now exist to a large extent for industry. Mr. Foreman and Mr. Ross might have emphasized this point more clearly, instead of discussing "consumer organization" quite so largely or so generally. Meanwhile those persons who are willing to study Miss Brindze's book, who thereby learn what they ought to be getting when they buy wool or silk or leather or what not, and who insist they be informed of the proportion of honesty and counterfeit in whatever goods they purchase—providing the salesman himself knows the answer—will be assured of more satisfactory goods. For hers is a practical and sensible book, and if it occasionally seems complicated, she is not to blame. The process of mixing shoddy with honest goods has become a fine and excessively devious art. Miss Brindze will help the consumer to master it, to his own advantage.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Continuities in Music

The Puritans and Music in England and New England. By Percy A. Scholes. The Oxford University Press. $7.50.
National Music. By Ralph Vaughn Williams. The Oxford University Press. $1.75.

THE celebrated Dr. Burney, whose highly useful "History of Music" is soon to be published in this country, seems to have been among the first to develop the theory that the Puritans hated and suppressed music. Dr. Scholes has thoroughly demolished this idea in a lively and extensive work. He shows that Cromwell, Bunyan, Browne, and many other typical Puritans enjoyed and cultivated the art of music, that the Puritans danced, that opera in England actually began under the Puritans, that musical instruments were fairly common among the Puritans of New England, and that dancing was not unknown among them, apart from the gyrations at Merry Mount. With great care Dr. Scholes portrays the Puritan antipathy to church worship by means of organs and trained choirs, and separates this from the general question of the Puritan enjoyment of music. He also proves that this antipathy was by no means peculiar to the period of the Commonwealth but was part of a conviction that went as far back as Ethelred.

In other words, the Puritans appear in a new guise under the persuasive pen of Dr. Scholes, and English music is shown not to have suffered a destructive break in the seventeenth century.

Dr. Vaughn Williams finds the real break in the English musical tradition at another point and from another cause, that of the rise to power of an uncultured landed gentry in the early eighteenth century, who considered the practice of art unworthy of a gentleman and turned it over to the "foreigner." At the same time the foreign court of St. James brought its own music to England. Dr. Vaughn Williams touches upon certain parallels to these incidents in our history and indeed touches upon the course of American music elsewhere, but the main value of his charming little book for American criticism would seem to lie rather in the implications of what he says about the history of English music or, in general, about "national music." He is strictly a nationalist in music, who believes that national folk music provides the inevitable base for music expression, that here is the "raw material" for national song.

Not all that Dr. Vaughn Williams has to say is new. The essential things have been said by Herder and Böhme. Yet they are wisely said here, in fresh connections, as in the statement that "what we call the classical idiom is the Teutonic idiom and it is absolutely as narrowly national as that of Grieg or Moussorgsky." In declaring that "style is ultimately national" Dr. Vaughn Williams unites this with the idea that originality, particularly as to subject matter, is a notion of rather recent growth—coming in of course on the tide of romanticism; and he protests against contemporary emphasis on "personality." Not least of the contributions of this book is its manner. It would be pleasant if our own gaps and difficulties in creating a national music could be treated, not in terms of a wailing excoriation—as about the Puritans—but with the quiet, sensitive approach of this distinguished critic and composer. CONSTANCE ROURKE

The Science of the Possible

Boss Rule—Portraits in City Politics. By J. T. Salter. McGraw-Hill Book Company. $2.50.

MOST books on political science include very little discussion of the back-slapping, job-getting, bribe-paying process which goes to make up politics in American cities. Professor Salter represents a hopeful new tendency toward realism in this field. He temporarily left his chair at the University of Wisconsin and lived for fifteen months with the political underlings of the Vare machine in Philadelphia, swapping his promise to name no names for a collection of salty and amusing biographical tales of nine ward leaders, which comprise most of this book. What the author found in Philadelphia is typical of a dozen other large American cities. The material of the study is strictly local, but the moral is national.

Salter found in his study of the Vare machine that about 85 per cent of the local committeemen in the most strongly organized Philadelphia wards were on the public payroll, a percentage which is strikingly paralleled in New York when Tammany is riding high. Fitness for the political job is unimportant; geniality, plus ability to deliver the vote, plus the absence of first-page scandal are the requisites for payroll placement. It is the same, of course, in New York in those areas still under machine control, where a $6,250 Commissioner of Records is unable to read his own name, and where secretaries to justices of the City Court come straight from stevedore jobs by way of district captaincies. Political success, Professor Salter points out, revolves around "these simplest fellow-creature wants: jobs; food; justice—tempered with mercy or favoritism—and taxes; since the power to tax involves the power to destroy." Compared to this appeal the high purposes of efficient government and honest administration seem nebulous indeed. The ward leader never talks idealism except at public functions when he is on exhibition. He holds the constant loyalty of his followers precisely because he assumes that they always want special favors in return for their votes. He is not interested in ultimate social or political goals; to him "politics is a science of the possible."

Professor Salter gives many illustrations of the "fixing" methods of a ward leader. A friendly truck driver, for example, ran down an iceman and then appealed to the leader for a "fix." The evidence was doctored and the case dismissed by a pliant coroner for a total expenditure, aside from the funeral expenses, of only $60. This is how the $60 was distributed:

Detective Craig	$10.00
Tinke and Company (2 motor cycle policemen) . .	20.00
Tim C., a deputy coroner-investigator, told the coroner the death was accidental, etc.	15.00
Ditto later	5.00
Ditto later, another	5.00
Irish sergeant at Forty-third and Tuppen Streets. (He was nice to us—gave us the records. Told us whom we could fix, etc.)	5.00

In spite of the apparent impregnability of the Vare machine, Professor Salter, during the very period of his study, saw the collapse of that machine. He saw Roosevelt and the New Deal displace the grocery baskets of the district leaders with organized home and work relief; he saw the Republican patriots deserting the sinking ship in district after district to support the newly formed Democratic machine that had jobs and pull to offer. The one thing that could most surely smash an American political machine, he concluded, was catastrophe, and especially economic catastrophe.

He might have added that the processes of machine rule in American cities dovetail very neatly into the practices of industrial individualism, and when the industrial machine breaks down, the political machine is likely to collapse with it. The little business man wants little political favors and in normal times the ward leader is able to deliver those favors in return for contributions to campaign chests and industrial jobs for his henchmen. When the taxpayer has no money for anything, and the capitalist no jobs for anybody, and the city treasury runs dry, then the ward politician cannot deliver any substantial favor in return for a vote. Then we have a reform wave, and both the official leaders at City Hall and the unofficial leaders of the political government find themselves among the unemployed. PAUL BLANSHARD

A One-sided Picture

Middle-class Culture in Elizabethan England. By Louis B. Wright. The University of North Carolina Press. $5.

THE word "Culture" in the title of this volume is in some degree misleading. The author's aim, as defined in his preface, is "to describe the intellectual background and interests of the literate common people, the rank and file who composed the great middle class." One would have expected the word "aesthetic" to have appeared in this definition if it were to cover what is ordinarily included in culture, but that word and what it usually implies are all but ignored in this voluminous and richly documented treatise. Apart from a single paragraph in the opening chapter, we learn nothing about the music, painting, architecture, or furniture of the period, although interest in none of these was confined to the aristocracy and gentry. Music especially, as Mr. Wright is aware, was cultivated more widely in Elizabethan England than it has ever

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

☐ RESORTS ☐

"The Camp with that Wonderful Spirit"

CAMP MILFORD

KENT CONN.

MICKEY MICHAELS,
Manager

A modern adult camp in the heart of the Berkshire Hills. Every outdoor activity. Congenial fellow guests.

JULY 4th WEEK END
4 Full Days $18.50

Daily Rate $5
Rate July & Aug. $27.50

Special R.R. rates N. Y., N. H. & H. Write for illustrated Booklet "N" and rates. N. Y. office: 1440 Broadway. Phone PEnnsylvania 6-7842.

HAMBURGER'S EVERGREEN
Farmingdale, New Jersey Telephone 113
In delightful rural setting
Scientifically combined Vegetarian meals
Well equipped Solariums, Showers, Bathing
All conveniences Amusements
Attractive rates 1¼ hrs. from New York

CAMP UNITY, Wingdale, N. Y.

Ideal for progressive workers, socially-minded professionals. On Lake Ellis, in Berkshire foothills. All land, water sports. Theatricals, lectures, concerts, dances, etc. Finest food. Cars leave daily. For folder, write:

Room 201, 50 E. 13th St., New York City
ALgonquin 4-4611.

HILLMAN HOUSE—Pearl River, N. Y. Pleasant retreat in beautiful Rockland County. One hour from City. Swimming. American-Jewish cuisine. Rates reasonable. Phone 959. N. Y. Office EVergreen 8-9543

RAY FARMS, LIBERTY, N. Y.

180 acres of land surrounded by most beautiful scenery. Our cozy cottages provide privacy and comfort. Tennis. Swimming. Russian American cooking. Tel. Liberty 1087-R.

CHILDREN ☐ SUMMER

PIONEER YOUTH CAMP
for boys and girls, in the Catskills
OPENS ON JULY THIRD
A few places still available in groups from 6 to 16 years.
Non-profit-making rates
Inquire at:
PIONEER YOUTH OF AMERICA, Inc.
[illegible] Bank St., New York City WA. 9-4627

EXCELLENT vacation for boys. Doctor's family can take 3 boys Brewster estate, N. Y. Best care. $21. Write J. Hollos, M.D., 1018 E. 163rd St., New York City.

☐ EDUCATIONAL ☐

NEW CITY SCHOOL OF PAINTING
Primrose Farm, New City, N. Y.
Rockland County
RICHARD LAHEY, Instructor
Classes starting July 1st
For further information, please write, or phone New City 156

PERSONAL

THE IMBECILITY OF HUMANKIND is amusing. But where can you find intelligent friends? Send 3¢ stamp. CONTACTS, Box 91, Station D, New York City.

☐ RESORTS ☐

● Spend July 4th week-end at

CAMP SAIDEL on beautiful Trout Lake

Write to
S. SAIDEL,
Lake George

4 Full Days $16.00

COOKS FALLS LODGE
Cooks Falls, N. Y. Tel. Roscoe 2 F 13

4th of July weekend
Wed. thru Sun. $15

All sports including beautiful new swimming pool

Stop at the Best Spend the Least

RIVERSIDE INN
Seymour, Conn.

On Lake Housatonic, 70 miles from New York. Beautiful surroundings. Tennis, boating, bathing, fishing, dancing. Excellent meals. New management.

4th of July—Wed. to Sun. inclusive—$14.00
Derby 639-2—N. Y. phone—LUdlow 7-5551

Bushkill, Pa. Tel Bushkill 9011

BUSHKILL VIEW CAMP

in the Pocono range. Hotel and camp life combined. Delightful country, pleasant atmosphere.

High elevation. Yiddishe meals.

Delaware Lackawanna R.R. Booklet

VINEYARD LODGE, Ulster Park, N. Y.
"garden spot of Ulster County"

Modern hotel amidst beautiful 200 acre fruit and grape farm. Solarium, horses on premises, swimming, tennis, social activities, congeniality, American Jewish cuisine. Reasonable rates.

Joseph Rosenthal Kingston 157 J [illegible]

Make "HILLCREST LODGE" your "COUNTRY HOME." Golf, tennis, handball, on the premises; swimming nearby. 25 minutes by train, 50 by car. Millington 364, Plainfield, N. J.

UNUSUAL! Picturesque, secluded Lower Berkshires. 1½ hrs. Delicious food. Sports. Comradeship. Weekend; $3 daily. Ask descriptive road map. CAMP ARTEMIS, Brewster, N. Y. BRewster 555 F5

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, in the Adirondacks. One mile from Warrensburg. Private beach on Echo Lake. Tennis, handball, swimming, boating and canoeing. Cabins if desired. Guests met at Lake George. $19.00 and $21.00. R. J. Venton.

Vacation in Woodstock | for hotel particulars, Box
Famous Art Colony | 500, Woodstock, N. Y.
Unusually moderate rates during June.

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE
Pleasant Valley, N. Y. Dutchess Co.
An ideal place for rest. Beautiful surroundings. Wholesome food. Modern conveniences. Tennis, bathing, fishing, rowing. Jewish.
Rate $17 weekly.

SYMPHONIC MUSIC

MUSIC LOVERS—100,000 of the finest records in the world on sale, 50c-75c per record (values $1.50 and $2). The symphonies, Chamber Music, Operas, etc., of BACH, BEETHOVEN, BRAHMS, MOZART, WAGNER, etc. Mail orders. Catalogue. THE GRAMOPHONE SHOP, INC., 18 E. 48th St., New York.

Let the classified columns of The Nation serve as your messenger to the 37,000 subscribers who read these columns each week.

Rate: 62 cents [illegible] line of [illegible] words
Minimum 3 lines

THE NATION

☐ INSURANCE ☐

If you need the hospital, will it be

CASH or CHARITY

★ $1-a-month* PROTECTION PAYS HOSPITAL BILLS . . . .

Unique plan provides: ■ Semi-private hospital room ● Nurse ■ X-rays ● Medications, Dressing, etc.

At critical times, avoid heavy unforeseen expense. Let First Mutual Health repay your hospital expense. Unusual plan costs you $1-A-MONTH, takes dangerous burden off your shoulders. Only requirements: You must be below 60 years of age and in good present health. Write for full details and application form. No groups necessary.

FIRST MUTUAL HEALTH INSURANCE CO.
DEPT. 137
WILMINGTON, DELAWARE

☐ SUMMER HOMES ☐

FOR SALE OR RENT

SUMMER SOLUTION—for parents and children
STONYBROOK, WESTPORT, CONN.

Charming bungalows, open fireplaces, tennis, swimming, supervised camp activities for children. Reasonable rentals, easy commuting from New York. N. Y. Office, 1457 Broadway, Room 619. Tel. Wis 7-4149.

WELL improved house and 5 acres, 45 miles out Bronx Parkway. Schwartz, 60 Broad Street. HAnover 2-8194.

☐ SUMMER RENTALS ☐

FOR RENT—August only, 8-room home, professional people, one block ocean, Far Rockaway, to refined family. Box 637, % The Nation.

RUSTIC cottage in natural setting at Jersey seashore; 500 ft. from water front. Easy commuting. Seven rooms, all conveniences. Rent season $200. Tel. GLenmore 5-2389 or MIdwood 8-9922.

APARTMENT TO SHARE

PROFESSIONAL man will share beautiful five room apartment, Long Beach, with two or three cultured gentlemen. $75 per person for season. Phone COlumbus 5-1500.

SUBURBAN HOME TO RENT

NEW 6-room brick house, magnificent outlook on crest of Dunwoodie Heights; 5 minutes drive to N. Y. C. line, by new Saw Mill River Parkway. Very large rooms, two bath-rooms, double garage, built-in Frigidaire, automatic oil heat, screens, awnings, etc. Only $80 per month to desirable family. MELVIN, 265 Lee Ave., Yonkers. Tel. Yonkers 2448-R.

Classified and Resort advertisers:—

The issue of The Nation appearing after this one, will have to go to press a day earlier on account of the holiday—July 4th.

If you want to insert an ad in that issue, please have it reach us Friday.

THE NATION
20 Vesey St. COrtlandt 7-3330

been since; the painted cloths to which he makes passing allusion were a conspicuous feature of middle-class interior decoration, the domestic architecture of the time still influences our own, and our collectors today cherish the chairs and cupboards of the middle-class households of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. There is much still to be learned about all of these, and the absence of a discussion of them leaves the picture of the state of Elizabethan culture somewhat bleak and one-sided.

What he does deal with, fully and with lavish illustration from contemporary documents, is the mind and aspirations of the burgess as revealed by printed books. In his discussion of The Background he tells how the middle class was constituted; how proud the citizen was of his city, his country, and his position in the commonwealth; how he valued learning—mainly as a means of getting on; and what was his favorite reading. In The Whole Duty of the Citizen, he describes the extraordinary appetite for didactic literature, supporting by abundant evidence the thesis of writers like Weber and Tawney as to the relation between Puritanism and the rise of capitalism. The last part, on The Citizen's Literate Recreations, is concerned with the lighter reading of the populace—most of it of slight literary value, the controversy over women, popular works on travel and science, and finally the drama.

It is evident that such a distribution of evidence, with the omissions noted, does somewhat less than justice to the quality of life lived by the class from which the first settlers of our own country came, and leaves some worthy curiosities unsatisfied. Had these other elements in their culture been included, and the excessively full treatment of the utilitarian interests been cut down to make room for them, the book would have been both fairer and more interesting. As it is, it is a valuable source book, furnished with a good bibliography and index, for which students of the period will be grateful.

W. A. NEILSON

Shorter Notices

Socializing Our Democracy. By Harry W. Laidler. Harper and Brothers. $3.

The case for socialism has never been more sanely and logically stated in terms of the modern world than in this most recent of Dr. Laidler's books. Apart from its analysis of the weaknesses of capitalism, which could be paralleled in the writings of many other present-day economists, the book is especially valuable for the clear distinctions made between socialism and the reformist measures of the New Deal and for its specific outlines of the new society which Socialists would create in this country. Although on the whole the volume is remarkably objective and admirably documented, it betrays a certain partisanship in dealing with the role of European social democracy in recent years. Being convinced that there is at least a good chance that the transition to socialism can be made peacefully in the United States, Dr. Laidler appears to be only mildly concerned over the menace of fascism and builds his case on the assumption of a continuation of our democratic institutions. Obviously the long-range value of his book will depend on the validity of that assumption.

Samuel McIntire and the Sandersons. By Mabel M. Swan. The Essex Institute. $1.50.

This compactly filled little book contains many kinds of information concerning the crafts in New England at the turn of the eighteenth century. The furniture business was booming in Salem and Roxbury, and consignments of mahogany secretaries, card-tables, bureaus, and chairs were being sent to Charleston, the West Indies, Rio Janeiro, and even Calcutta. Miss Swan speaks of the furniture workers of Salem

☐ CONFERENCE ☐

TAMIMENT SUMMER CONFERENCE
ON LABOR, INDUSTRY AND GOVERNMENT

Six Sessions, June 27 to June 30

Labor's course in the present crisis will be discussed by

Catherine Bauer
David Dubinsky
Dr. Abraham Epstein
John T. Flynn
John P. Frey
Francis J. Gorman
Sidney Hillman
Algernon Lee
Dr. Harry W. Laidler
Edward F. McGrady
George Meany
Senator Gerald P. Nye
Louis H. Pink
Dr. I. M. Rubinow
Charles Solomon
Mark Starr
B. Charney Vladeck
Louis Waldman
Chester M. Wright
Max Zaritsky

Institute rate: $3.00 per day. Registration fee: $1.50.

Camp Tamiment, 7 E. 15th St., ALgonquin 4-3094.

☐ RESORTS ☐

Forest and Stream Club
An Ideal Adult Camp
IN THE GREEN MOUNTAINS,
WILMINGTON, VT.
Four and one-half hours from Grand Central
Sporty 9 hole golf course right on premises.
Complete social and athletic activities.
FOURTH OF JULY WEEK-END (4 days) $20
SEASON RATES [illegible] PER WEEK AND UP
14th year of highly satisfactory service
55 W. 42nd STREET, N. Y. C. LAckawanna 4-9247

Original Schildkraut's
FUN
REST
HEALTH RECREATION

The Gateway to a Pleasant Vacation
THE NEW LAKEVUE LODGE
LIVINGSTON MANOR, N. Y.
Tel. 179F 2
Classical and dance music by professional entertainers. 185 acre playground, including magnificent lake for bathing and boating.
Vegetarian cuisine.
City phone: Schildkraut's Vegetarian Rest., 4 W. 28 St., BO 4-8091.

LOW COST 4th OF JULY WEEK-END WITH GOLF
at Delightful Mountain Hotel only 90 Miles from New York
1. One person 4 days including golf—$17.50 to $20.50
2. Two persons 4 days including golf—$33.00 to $38.00
Lower rates are for running water; higher, for private bath.
Tournaments in tennis and golf; many attractions. Very well-kept 9-hole golf course. Comfortable rooms. Delicious meals.
WRITE at once TO
Cragsmoor Inn, Cragsmoor, Ulster Co., N. Y.

Other resorts on pages 25 and 27

☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐

JULY 4th WEEK-END PROGRAM

Four days and five nights of gorgeous sport and rib-tickling entertainment.
Tennis, Handball, Baseball, Horses, Swimming. Concert, Campfire, Movies, Operetta, Farce
HIT OF 1935: INDIVIDUAL SOLARIUM CABANAS

Write for 2 day and 4 day reservations

Lower daily and weekly rates during June

BLUE MOUNTAIN LODGE

Phone Peek. 1403
Peekskill N. Y.

A NEW UNITY HOUSE RISES FROM THE OLD!

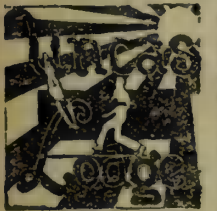
$27.00 week
Reduction for Union Members

NEW modern buildings, new roads, improved athletic facilities. Once again the leading personalities of musical, literary and theatrical world will entertain you. Added attractions: The Group Theatre presents "Awake and Sing"; The Theatre Union; The Chicago Opera Company and others. Write for booklet.

UNITY HOUSE
Forest Park, Pennsylvania
N.Y. Office: 3 W. 16th St. ■ CHelsea 3-2146

July 4th week-end, 4 days, $18. Program: Group Theatre, Chicago Opera Co., Concert and Revue.

UNCAS LODGE
UNCASVILLE, CONN.
9th SUCCESSFUL SEASON



"Send for Booklet"

A charming, unpretentious, modern adult camp and 165-acre old New England farm. An ideal retreat for lovers of rustic beauty.

- Private Twin Lakes.
- 3 Clay Tennis Courts.
- Saddle Horses and Golf nearby.
- Unexcelled Cuisine.
- Socials, Theatricals, Camaraderie.

JULY RATE $22.50 per week
July 4th Weekend—$4. per day
Camp Phone: Norwich 1858 Ring 5
New York Phone: NEvins 8-2384—Evenings

DELIGHTFULLY DIFFERENT

RED OAKS Atlantic Highlands New Jersey

150-acre estate, beautiful country. Tennis, handball, nearby golf, riding. Log fires. Just over the hour from New York by train or auto. Penn. R.R. or C. R. of N. J. to Red Bank. Sandy Hook Boats to Atlantic Highlands pier.
Telephone: Atlantic Highlands 264
Management: Mascha and Hyman Strunsky

ZINDOREST PARK

Monroe, N. Y., Phone 7755
Formerly a millionaire's country estate of 150 acres, most beautifully landscaped and located. Tennis, handball, swimming, rowing and dancing. Very fine saddle horses, expert instruction.
Open All Year.

TIMBERLAND
A Modern Camp for Adults
■
Booklet on Request
33 W. 42nd St.
PEnn. 6-7663

The Rare Charm Of An Intimate Congenial Group
July Rate $29.50
Superior Cuisine
De Luxe Accommodations
Fare $5.00 by Packards

TIMBERLAND In The Adirondacks
Pottersville, N. Y., Warren County
Esther R. Kessler — Israel H. Kessler

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
A Camp for Adults in the
ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG N. Y.

Booklet "N" on Request

City Phone
VAnderbilt 3-9874

10th Anniversary TREAT!
July 4th Week End
Wednesday Supper Thru Sunday Dinner. $18
With Transportation and Meals. $28

All land and water sports including Golf
RATES FROM $28 Weekly

In the Heart of the ADIRONDACKS...
Most Beautiful Summer Resort
■
9 Hole Golf Course on Premises
9 Clay Tennis Courts
8 Hand Ball Courts
½ mile Sandy Beach

SCAROON MANOR ON SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.

MOON HILL Lodge
ON SCHROON LAKE
IN THE HEART OF THE ADIRONDACKS
JULY 4th WEEK END
FOUR FULL DAYS $23.75
ENJOY Golf, Tennis, Riding, Swimming, Etc. Complete Social Staff. Famous Cuisine. (Dietary Laws.)
Write for Booklet "N."
Sarah Solomon, Man. Dir.
Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y.
N. Y.: 11 W. 42d St.
PE. 6-7949

CAMP AWAISQUAM
ABRAM RESNICK
Director
Gloucester, Mass.

Charming
UNPRETENTIOUS on picturesque bay at Gloucester—fine spirit, whole-hearted direction. All land and sea sports. Send for booklet.

GREEN MANSIONS
Keynote to a pleasant vacation at a most modern and complete adult camp.
- INTIMATE
- COLORFUL
- ALIVE

private golf course
Special July 4th Week End
Booklet on request

N. Y. Office
157 W. 57th St.
CO 5-6346

Lena Barish-Sam Garlen
Directors

GREEN MANSIONS
WARRENSBURG N·Y·

"The Gateway to Your Perfect Vacation"

LAKE CHODIKEE COUNTRY CLUB Highland, N. Y.
(The Beauty Spot Within 2 Hours of N. Y.)
400 Acres of Summer Wonderland
Rustic Lodge and Bungalows
All Modern Conveniences

Excellent Cuisine by Famous Caterer

NIGHTS OF GAIETY:
Broadway Acts, Dramas, Revues, Talkies, Campfires, Bridge, Concerts, Around the Samovar, Amateur Nights, Bohemian Nights.
DAYS OF FUN:
Tennis, Bowling, Fishing, Golfing, Baseball, Basketball, Handball, Boating, Saddle Horses, Swimming, Hiking, Gymnasium, etc.

July 4th Week End
Four days....................$20
Special 10 Day Offer
June 28th to July 7th....................$40
Write for Illustrated Booklet
N. Y. O., Chanin Bldg. CAledonia 5-1421
"Key Up At Chodikee"

ENJOY...
A MARVELOUS VACATION
At This Low Introductory Rate

Every outdoor activity. Golf, Tennis, Handball, Swimming, Canoeing on Sylvan Lake. Orchestra. Delicious meals. Golf Free.

RATE JULY AND AUGUST $25 PER WEEK (European Plan —No Meals $12)

JULY 4th WEEK END
$4.50 PER DAY

CAMP BEEKMAN
Adult Camp of distinction
HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.
Phone Hopewell Junction 176F2
GEORGE J. ZINOVOY—JOSEPH PHILLIPS
MYRON R. GOLDIN, Directors
New York Office, 158 W. 23rd St.
Phone WAtkins 9-2630

See other Resorts on pages 25 and 26

as being joined in a cooperative enterprise, but the modern manufacturer had appeared. The Sandersons parceled out the work of carving, reeding, making legs of chairs and tables, and bureau fronts, and they were, moreover, wholesalers on a fairly large scale, buying up the finished work of other makers. Even in his heyday as a carpenter-architect Samuel McIntire found time to carve separate friezes of roses on banisters or chair-backs for the Sandersons. It must be recorded that these adventures in the methods of modern business came to an unhappy end. They had floated too large a scheme and found themselves in a thicket of lawsuits. They failed, as a contemporary said, "thrusting themselves from mechanic employments into the mercantile affairs and venturing largely upon credit." They were not Salem men. They had come there to make money.

Films

A Penny-colored World

ALTHOUGH "Becky Sharp" (Radio City Music Hall) is not the first full-length picture to be produced entirely in color, it is pretty certain to mark the beginning of a new stage in the evolution of the motion-picture medium. Like the version of Somerset Maugham's "The Letter" in which the late Jeanne Eagels demonstrated for the first time that the feminine voice could be recorded on the screen without inflicting temporary injury to the ear drum, it does not so much usher in a technical innovation as bring that innovation to a point of development where it must be accepted as a permanent modification of the medium as we have known it. In the first place, the particular color process which Robert Edmond Jones uses is much the most successful that has so far been employed in the attempt to supply to the film one more of the qualities which still separate it from life. While it is not completely successful in achieving that end, as must be pointed out in a moment, it at least does not prevent the spectator from responding to other appeals in the picture. As Miss Eagels in "The Letter" and Ronald Colman in "Bulldog Drummond" helped the advance of the talking picture enormously by the excellence of their playing in those two early ventures in the field, Miriam Hopkins will undoubtedly habituate the American public to color through the distraction of her superb impersonation of Thackeray's least admirable heroine. The greatest compliment that can be paid Miss Hopkins is to say that in all those scenes in which she appears we are made to forget that we are assisting at what may prove to be an event of great significance in the history of the cinema. She is able to make us ignore the sometimes too gaudy raiments, the sometimes too vivid flesh tints, with which technicolor enhances her person. In a word, the clearest triumph in "Becky Sharp" is that of Miss Hopkins; the film would probably be as popular with the general public if produced in the now old-fashioned black and white. And it should be mentioned that this triumph is effected in spite of a synoptic and badly proportioned narrative, which scants the really dramatic sections of the Thackeray original, the affair with Lord Steyne, while dragging out Becky's later career at Bath to an intolerable length.

Mr. Jones's color process will nevertheless be the subject of most earnest debate on the part of those interested in the future development of the films. Discussion will no doubt narrow itself down to the question whether color does add perceptibly to the total effectiveness of the film as a form of entertainment or art. As far as this reviewer is concerned, the answer must be that until color is used with a somewhat better sense of its functional value than is shown in this picture it is more likely to be a handicap than an aid to any further refinement of the medium. At present it is all too plainly being exploited for its own sake: it is not sufficiently fused with the formal design to have any value as a means of intensifying the total dramatic pattern of the scene or shot. Some of the more notable effects of this divorce between line and color are an overcrowded canvas, an elimination of the visual center, and a disintegration of the movement or rhythm. Color tends to "fill up" the screen frame; it adds quantitatively to what the eye must absorb at any given moment. The danger of trying to make the eye take in too many colors, as in the Waterloo sequence, is that it ends by taking in none at all. Closely related is the objection that the colors are not harmonized around a single formal center (which should in turn be related to the dramatic essence of the scene), with the result that the attention is provided with no principle of selection. The worst consequences of this are evident in those scenes in which a too garish background obscures and sometimes even blots out the countenances of the players. But what will undoubtedly be the most serious difficulty to overcome is that of managing a continuous and harmonious pictorial rhythm. The problem of montage in the color film is one of carrying over from shot to shot not only a meaningful correspondence of design but an equally appropriate correspondence of color. It is hardly possible, for example, that the violent "contrast-montage" so effectively used by the Russians and others in the black and white film can be successfully translated into color terms without considerable subtlety and restraint. In brief, the task of the screen director, arduous enough in the past, is tremendously increased by this newest expansion of the medium. What is now required of him is nothing less than a sense of the complex interrelationships of line and color comparable to that of a master painter. Because such a possession is rare in itself, and the chance of its coexisting along with the numerous other qualifications of the good director even rarer, we can hardly expect that the integration of color will be accomplished all at once. The real importance of "Becky Sharp" is that it reveals through its defects the extent and nature of the problems that must be solved before color can become as integral an element of the medium as sound has become in the best pictures of the last few years.

WILLIAM TROY

Contributors to This Issue

AGNES SMEDLEY is the author of "Chinese Destinies" and "China's Red Army Marches." Her story of her own life, "Daughter of Earth," has recently been reprinted.

HEINRICH L. SCHILLER was born in Hamburg and has taught linguistics at Leipzig and Berlin. He is now living in London.

PAUL W. WARD is a Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun.

SAMUEL PAUL PUNER, a labor attorney practicing in New York, is office counsel to the American Civil Liberties Union.

ABRAM L. HARRIS, professor of economics at Howard University, will publish shortly a new book, "Black Capitalism." He is also preparing a study of Marx and Veblen.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE contributes reviews and critical articles to various literary periodicals.

CONSTANCE ROURKE is the author of "American Humor: A Study of the National Character" and "Davy Crockett."

PAUL BLANSHARD is Commissioner of Accounts of New York City.

W. A. NEILSON is the president of Smith College.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.
SEP

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 10, 1935 No. 3653

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 29
EDITORIALS:
  Can Labor Enforce the Wagner Bill? 32
  The Tax Fiasco 33
  Modern Painting 33
  The Abyssinian Gamble 34
ISSUES AND MEN. RUSSIAN PROGRESS AT HOME—ENMITY ABROAD. By Oswald Garrison Villard 35
CARTOON: PROGRESS OF MAN, 1935 A. D. By LOW 36
FREEDOM AND GOVERNMENT. By George Bernard Shaw . . . 37
NOTE ON E. A. ROBINSON. By John McAlpin Berryman 38
WHAT TO DO WITH THE SUPREME COURT?
  Fallacies About the Court. By Morris R. Cohen 39
  The Supreme Court and Democracy. By Louis B. Boudin . . . 40
  The Value of Judicial Review. By Osmond K. Fraenkel 42
THE TYRANNY OF THE BANK OF FRANCE. By Robert Dell . 43
CORRESPONDENCE 45
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
  After Its Fashion. By Heywood Broun 47
  The Nation Index of Labor Welfare 48
  The Need for Federal Labor Laws. By Elinore Morehouse Herrick 49
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 50
BOOKS AND FILMS:
  Little Ode. By Virginia Moore 51
  The Psychology of Koffka. By Grace Adams 51
  Irving Fisher's Plan. By Benjamin Haggott Beckhart 52
  History of Heroism. By Lionel Trilling 52
  Good Will, Bad Science. By E. Franklin Frazier 53
  The Art of the East. By Benjamin Rowland, Jr. 54
  Shorter Notices 55
  Films: Behind the Screen. By William Troy 56

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING CHARLES ANGOFF
Associate Editors
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
Contributing Editor

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents ■ year additional. FOREIGN: $1 ■ year additional. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of subscriber's address.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second-class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by The Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

THE LIABILITY of the name of Herbert Hoover rests less heavily on the Republican Party now that he has sent an envoy to Washington to explain to party leaders that he will retire voluntarily from candidacy in the late summer. He did this, according to the Times, to head off the polite insult of a public letter asking him frankly to announce his intentions. The only reason, he explained, that he did not retire now was to give direction to Republican criticism of the Administration, and to do this with due authority. He promised to support the Republican candidate in the next campaign, and predicted that the prospects of victory would increase every day and would be "immeasurably advanced" if economic conditions and employment were not improved more than now appears probable. Thus the Republicans, rid of the leader whose name is most closely identified with the depression in the public mind, hope to win next year because the depression has not been conquered by his successor. This would be less illogical if they were grooming a candidate who promised to be more capable and consistent in meeting the emergency than Mr. Roosevelt. But of the Republican hopefuls so far mentioned—Vandenberg, Dickinson, McNary, Mills, and Knox—none has the stature even of Mr. Hoover. The President, it would seem, can count on a second term unless he fulfils the Republican dream-wish and defeats himself.

THE COUNTRY must look far backward to find a lobby to equal for audacity and strength the one which stormed the House to defeat the holding-company bill. It numbered between five and six hundred, and workers on the battlefield at the capital were supported by effective cohorts in Congressional districts. On the opening day of the debate members received as many as 5,000 telegrams each, and the cost of telegrams sent that day was estimated at nearly a million dollars. Representative Rayburn of Texas, author of the House bill, stated that there had been more misrepresentation and propaganda against this bill than against any other in the history of the House. He pointed to officials of Texas utility companies sitting in the gallery—where the lobby occupied the choice seats—and called them office boys for the controlling interests in New York. No lie has been too obvious to be used against the bill, and a fabulous sum has been spent in newspaper advertising and circularization in every state. Two years ago the bankers and the utility promoters suffered a setback, and it appeared that Congress was to be free of their control. Now Winthrop W. Aldrich, president of the Chase National Bank, is able to telephone members of the subcommittee of the Senate while it confers on the banking bill and ask to have a section of it taken out. The utility interests can descend on Congress with the most brazen campaign on record. Congress would do well to fulfil the promise of Representative Marcantonio, hold a searching inquiry into the lobby, and send some of its members to prison.

WE ARE NOT SO DISTURBED as our contemporaries about whether the President actually issued the orders to his Congress leaders to jam through the proposed inheritance and corporation taxes as an addendum to the nuisance taxes. The evidence makes it obvious that Congress leaders thought he did, but he stirred up a tempest when he told the White House correspondents this was not true. As they had not heard him issue the orders they could not challenge his veracity. But what is more important than veracity is that the program was changed after a swift and surprisingly unanimous public condemnation of the speed with which it was being rushed through. Whatever one believes about these taxes, no one can argue that they should not be carefully studied. And the importance of veracity should not weigh in permitting that study, no matter what may have been decided to the contrary. So we are relieved that more time was given for the debate. But we also are disturbed by the poor judgment at the White House. The President apparently was told that he had Huey Long on the run because of the failure of his filibuster, and that the tax proposal would finish him off. Thereupon the haste was held necessary to prove the President's sincerity. When Louis Howe was at his desk such blunders were rare. In this instance, the blunder produced an immediate protest which was immediately heeded. This is the operation of democracy with no other machinery than the publication of news and editorials. In this respect Washington is the most sensitive capital in the world.

ABOUT FIFTY MEMBERS can be counted on in the House of Representatives to oppose any measure damaging to the public interest. Another fifty can be recruited by careful explanation of the issues at stake. But the Bland-Copeland ship subsidy bill rallied an opposition of 186, and was passed by only eight votes. The bill was scheduled for a three-hour debate, but the opposition managed to introduce enough amendments to prolong the discussion to fourteen hours. Only a few amendments were adopted, one to guarantee minimum wages to American sailors, and one to insure the adequate manning of American ships. But none of the amendments carved out of the bill the possibilities of continuous plunder by the shipping interests. As passed, it frustrates the President in his intention that future subsidies should be open and limited, and it represents a clear case of subversive conduct by Secretary Roper, who gave it his official blessing. It is impossible at this writing to forecast the future of the bill in the Senate. Twice Senator Copeland has been defeated in an attempt to bring it up for debate, and it may turn out that the bill has been killed by the close vote in the House. This will not save the Treasury from paying out the public money on a profligate scale to the shipping lines, as the mail contracts are still in force. These the President has power until October to cancel, but he hesitates to invite the litigation which would follow. Congress would do well to pass a resolution closing the courts to all companies which can be shown to have won their mail contracts by collusion or rigged bidding.

PASSAGE of the Wagner labor-disputes bill has prompted certain of the larger corporations to make frantic efforts to transform their "employee-representation plans" into "independent" labor unions. Various tactics are being used, though we suspect that in each instance the purpose is the same. Taking advantage of the few days' grace provided while the differences between the Senate and House bills were ironed out in conference, the New York Telephone Company approached the officers of one of its old company unions with the magnanimous offer to donate $500 to cover the expenses of establishing a new organization—free from company influence. The suggestion was accompanied by a saccharine statement pointing to the achievements of the employee-representation plan and expressing the desire of the company to conserve these gains even though the form of organization would have to be changed. We anticipate a real fight if the new labor board should attempt to force corporations of this type to conform to the spirit as well as the letter of the law, but unless it does, the new act may easily degenerate into another Section 7-a.

THE PECULIAR INSANITY which afflicts the Administration when dealing with the precious metals has never been more clearly manifest than in the preparation of a subterranean vault at Fort Knox, Kentucky, to protect our huge gold stock against foreign invasion. Just what enemy is likely to occupy New York and Philadelphia, and what arrangements that power would make for the removal of some tens of thousands of tons of gold and silver is not disclosed. Nor is it stated why the gold is to be transferred while some ten to twelve million persons are left at the mercy of the enemy. Instead, we are to take comfort in the fact that foreign airplanes will find the flight across the Appalachians a "treacherous" one, and that there is a mechanized cavalry detachment of 1,300 men on duty at Fort Knox to fight off the invader. However, the economic implications of the step are more disturbing than the military. For nearly twenty years the United States has systematically stripped gold from debtor nations. And though it has obtained more than two-fifths of the world's supply, it has consistently refused to alter its policies so as to permit a needed redistribution. Gold, apparently, is no longer to be treated as a medium of exchange, valuable chiefly for the goods and services which it can command, but is to be buried in the earth in some central location and defended by the army as a symbol of our national wealth. We have only one suggestion to make: that one day each year the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, guarded by a regiment of marines, betake themselves to Fort Knox and conduct a ceremonial counting of the gold, the proceeding to be broadcast over a nation-wide hook-up.

FIFTY MILLIONS are to be spent by the newly founded National Youth Administration, set up by the President under the direction of Miss Josephine Roche and Aubrey Williams. Thus the government enters the field with an appeal to youth before the demagogues have come around to it, and we can only wish it every success. The money is to be used for four purposes: to find employment for young people, to train or retrain them, to create work projects suitable for them, and to continue a certain number of students in colleges and universities. One of the work-relief projects will be a national census of the status of all young people between sixteen and twenty-five. This strikes us as the most important of all the plans, since it will provide the information, now wholly lacking, of what is happening to young people in the depression. When that picture is complete, it will be for the government to discover what can be done to solve a tragic problem. At that stage much more than fifty million dollars will have to be spent. The plight of young people is perhaps the most dangerous aspect of the present crisis, and the indifference to it of most older people has been ominous. If democracy is to be saved, it will be by the rising generation, whose parents have not made it any too secure. Yet the only hope held out to the young has been that somehow old times would come back and give them something to live for. If democracy does not enlist youth, fascism can and will.

A REMARKABLE VICTORY for a courageous peace policy has been won in the British Peace Ballot, now concluded after a six months' campaign. Though it was an unofficial referendum, 40 per cent of the electorate took part in it, and gave such a clear expression of conviction that it will be hard for the government to disregard it. The votes cast numbered 11,627,765, only 300,000 short of the number given the National Government in 1931. On the question of Britain's remaining a member of the League of Nations, 11,000,000 answered in the affirmative and only 350,000 were opposed, despite the rabid propaganda of the Beaverbrook press for isolationism on the American pattern. Ten and a half million favored all-round reduction of armaments; a like number voted against the manufacture and sale of munitions for private profit. The vote on the application of sanctions against the aggressor was closer. The great majority favored economic sanctions, and while two million could not make up their minds about military sanctions, the vote was 6,784,368 for them and 2,351,981 against. Nearly half the voters of Great Britain now have squarely faced a series of the major questions before the British government and have given their answers. As an educational device, valuable for politicians and public alike, we commend the experiment to the American peace organizations.

THE BEST ADVICE we can offer District Attorney William C. Dodge of New York County is to resign. He has done nothing about the guaranteed-mortgage racket, the vice and gambling racket, the poultry racket, or the Welfare Island scandal. The evidence in each case is massive, official, and of long standing. Mr. Dodge's indifference to the Welfare Island situation is especially inexcusable. The July, 1933, grand jury found "conditions of apparently grave mismanagement . . . covering lack of proper supervision of prisoners, traffic in contraband, unreasonable and uncalled-for fraternizing among prisoners, inadequate prison rules for discipline, haphazard and irregularly timed inspections of cells for weapons, etc." The grand jury asked for "a very thorough and painstaking investigation," but according to Foreman Robert Appleton, "nothing was ever really done." Governor Lehman's "suggestion" to Mr. Dodge that he appoint the able Thomas E. Dewey as a special investigator to look into the vice and gambling racket was polite and long overdue. The available facts call for more. They call for the resignation of a man whose official life, to put it mildly, has been characterized by stubborn indifference to the public welfare.

HUGH JOHNSON has consented to give a series of performances in New York City under the auspices of the Works Progress Administration. It is a charity engagement for which the veteran of many roles will receive nothing but $25 a day for expenses. He will remain until October 1 and he will be required to spend $5,000,000 a week—and a total of $220,000,000—which is New York City's quota of the federal work-relief program. In making the appointment the Administration followed a policy inaugurated early in its career of turning projects over to people who have strong doubts that they will work. General Johnson's daily column in the New York World-Telegram, which appeared on the streets at about the same time as its author, discredited the whole work-relief program in typical Johnsonian periods as "$4,000,000,000 worth of boondoggling" so devised as to prevent any useful and permanent projects from being undertaken. As for his other qualifications, he told "the boys" from the newspapers that frankly he didn't know a thing about his new job; and even after a conference with Mayor LaGuardia the General repeated that he really didn't know anything about the job and that it would be ten days or two weeks before he got his bearings. Evidently his New York run, like his NRA engagement, will be a series of spontaneous combustions. On the day after his arrival the Blue Eagle Guy was initiated into the Circus Saints and Sinners at a session whose hilarity and disorder reminded him, he said, of nothing so much as the New Deal in June, 1933. We should be accused of solemnity, no doubt, if we suggested that there must be experts in the New York City relief set-up who already know a thing or two about the job and could handle it more efficiently than the noisy and innocent Mr. Johnson. But we are hereby the first to admit that for hilarity and disorder he cannot be surpassed—and comic relief perhaps is better than none.

THE NATIONAL GUARD has been called out in Tacoma, Washington, with the usual results in tear-gas attacks and "strike riots" in which, by some strange chance, only strikers get seriously hurt. And what is the National Guard doing? It is protecting the "right to work" of a few strike-breakers against the unkind opposition of 40,000 lumber workers, most of whom have undoubtedly spent their best years in the industry, who have been on strike for almost two months for decent working conditions. The lumber walk-out is being run by the rank-and-file of the Sawmill and Timber Workers' Union. At a conference in June 400 rank-and-file delegates repudiated the reactionary A. F. of L. leadership of their vice-president, Abe Muir, and put an end to the policy of separate agreements by which Muir and his select strike committee had "settled" mill after mill for 50 cents an hour, the forty-hour week, and no recognition. Most of the "settled" mills have struck again and the strikers are making their original demands for 75 cents an hour, the thirty-hour week, and, above all, union recognition. The longshoremen have already announced that no ships will be loaded as long as the guardsmen remain in the city, and there is talk of a general strike. It is highly possible that Tacoma may be the scene this summer, as San Francisco was last, of a long-drawn-out and violent struggle.

WASHINGTON is to have its own anti-red laws. By a rider to the District of Columbia appropriations bill, none of the money appropriated may be used to pay the salary of any teacher "teaching or advocating communism." The rider was introduced by Representative Cannon, Democrat, of Missouri at the close of a day's session, was passed without notice or debate, and has been signed by the President. The act does not distinguish between the advocacy of communism in the schools and the exercise of a teacher's ordinary political rights outside school hours. It provides no hearing for the teacher accused of "teaching or advocating communism." It does not define communism. And it gives no definition of teaching. Will it be "teaching communism" to answer a child's question about the Russian government? It was for just this, in 1919, that Alice Wood, a Washington high-school teacher, was suspended without pay. The school board which suspended Miss Wood (the president of the board was the president of the Capital Traction Company) was reversed by the District Supreme Court, which held suspension without a hearing to be illegal. But the court gave no opinion on the right of the student to ask, and of the teacher to answer, a question about a contemporary government. Later the board issued a rule forbidding mention in current-events classes of "bolshevism and similar heresies." To the list of "similar heresies," the League of Nations was presently added.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Can Labor Enforce the Wagner Bill?

AFTER a year and a half of sharp struggle labor at last has its Wagner law, which, if hardly the Magna Charta it has been advertised to be, does open wide the door to collective bargaining. It is first of all a defensive measure, designed to create a balance of "equality of bargaining power" in industry, and though it provides for enforcement, the real responsibility for making it effective rests, as it should rest, with labor itself. Enforcement will provoke major battles in basic industries—steel, automobiles, rubber—where the law promises to refuel the self-organizing movement which was fired by Section 7-a. Labor in these industries is not yet mature enough to use the new opportunities, and the American Federation of Labor is so paralyzed by craft-union traditions that it cannot now offer real leadership. So the first question after the passage of the Wagner law must be how much use can be made of it.

This is a question of great national importance. Only if it is satisfactorily answered can there be a labor movement in this country, let alone the labor party recommended by Louis Waldman at the Tamiment Economic and Social Institute. "It is up to the American Federation of Labor," he said, "to take the lead in this party. Indications are rapidly accumulating that before very long the A. F. of L. will be compelled to take the initiative to this end." But a deep river has to be crossed before there is a labor movement or a party growing out of it. Industrial unionism has to be established, and the A. F. of L. has either to change its whole mind and nature or renounce the work altogether, leaving it to those better fitted to carry it through. There are indications that the A. F. of L., instead of taking the lead in forming a labor party, may even rescind its San Francisco resolution for industrial unions in basic industries. At present, obstructing its own resolution, the A. F. of L. is blocking industrial-union organization in basic industries, at the cost of any organization at all. John L. Lewis, of the industrially organized miners, pressed for industrial unions in six major industries, but in the A. F. of L. council got one vote beside his own. The A. F. of L. has no single-minded program, with organizers and money to back it, for such purposes. It represents a futile, frightened, selfish right wing as against a weak left-wing rank-and-file movement. And rank-and-file leaders are so inexperienced, and so worn down by fighting their own officials as well as the powerful forces of great industrial management, that they have met heavy defeats.

Labor will enter the battle area of the basic industries to find company unions firmly established. The employers have recognized the approaching danger, and with the help of the President have successfully played for time to intrench themselves. Arthur Young, vice-president of United States Steel, in the revealing letter published by The Nation, called company unions "fences pretty securely set up." It will be no easy matter to tear these "fences" down. It cannot be done at all unless labor can organize, and it cannot organize unless it is led and financed. So that is the first great problem to be solved.

The second is the question of constitutionality. Obviously this fight in the basic industries will be further postponed by an early start on the tedious road of appeal to the Supreme Court. It is no secret that the proponents of the law, despite brave citations of the Texas and New Orleans, the Bedford Stone Cutters, and the Coronado cases, are afraid of the court. If they lose, the decision may come early next summer, in time for the issue, along with other adverse rulings on New Deal legislation, to create a demand in the next campaign for amendment of the Constitution. If that is to be the future, the passage of the Wagner law will be only the beginning of a still longer fight, and two years or more may pass before it begins to be genuinely effective. This is disheartening, but it is not unreasonable. The law, by legalizing collective bargaining, makes possible an ultimate shift in economic power from employers to workers. This is a fundamental change, and if effected it will be the most important that has been made in a democratic direction since the rise of the great corporations to their dominating position. Naturally it will be fought by them by every known device of obstruction and beguilement. They know what is at stake, and while they have been beaten in Congress they have only retreated, and are far too powerful to surrender after a minor setback. So we are not too sanguine merely because the Wagner bill has finally been enacted. It is a preliminary victory only. It cannot become a final success until two great transformations have been effected. One is the reconstruction of the American Federation of Labor (or its resignation from leadership); the other is the winning of the legal right for the nation as such to decide its economic destiny.

It is taken for granted that Francis Biddle will be chairman of the new board, carrying over with him the personnel of the National Labor Relations Board. He has been vigorous and courageous, and has fought successfully for the board's independent status, even against the A. F. of L. and Secretary Perkins. His first difficulty will be in maintaining the board's prestige while the greater issues of its future and scope are fought out in American life. The board will be flooded by disputes, not many of them suitable as cases to go to the courts to become the basis of labor law. Unless he can obtain settlement of the majority of legally "doubtful" cases, his board will gain the reputation of impotence and inefficiency. This situation makes it imperative that the board have a strong secretary, which it has not had since Dr. Leiserson left. Regional boards and labor unions alike have an interest in seeing this work in the hands of someone with special talents and experience. The cry throughout the campaign for this law was that the board which administers it should be staffed by courageous men, and that it should be utterly independent. In all respects the campaign has succeeded. In so far as such a law needs teeth this one has them; the appointment of Chairman Biddle and his associates of the NLRB will satisfy the public that the board is competent; and it has its independent status. For this success great credit is due to Senator Wagner, who has contributed his share to what may become one of the historic laws of the country.

PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlington

The Tax Fiasco

IN its "share-the-wealth" tax program the Administration has followed what has become an established pattern. First the President makes a pronouncement setting forth the fundamental principles behind a needed reform in terms so sweeping and courageous that he fires the imagination of the country. This creates a demand for immediate action. Then concrete proposals are brought forth which fall far short of the bold concepts contained in the pronouncement. Thereupon public interest subsides, and the final action is little more than a travesty of the principles originally set forth. When the President spoke of driving the "money changers out of the temple" in his inaugural address, the American people were prepared either for outright nationalization of the banks or for drastic reform of the entire banking structure. But neither the Banking Act of 1933 nor the bill before Congress, as now modified, fundamentally challenges the power of the money changers. The NRA was blazoned forth as a means of raising the purchasing power of the working class. Once more the whole country was electrified, but, as one will note by reference to The Nation Index of Labor Welfare published elsewhere in this issue, its effect in that direction was negligible. There was perhaps an even greater gulf between the President's inspiring words on social security and the Administration's bill just passed by Congress.

So it is with social taxation. No action could be more consistent with the philosophy of the New Deal as it is understood by the great majority of people than a redistribution of wealth through a socially conceived tax program. From time to time the President has held out promises that this would ultimately be done, though it was difficult to see why he should allow more than two years to elapse before initiating the most-needed reform of the day. His message of June 19 appeared to open the way for specific action. When he declared that "the transmission from generation to generation of vast fortunes . . . is not consistent with the ideals and sentiments of the American people," it was assumed that he understood the implication of his words and was prepared to sponsor far-reaching legislation. Probably that large section of the public which reads only headlines still believes that the President's program will place a large share of the cost of government on the shoulders of the wealthy.

But as outlined by Senator Harrison the new tax proposals will yield only $340,000,000 out of a total government revenue of over $4,000,000,000. Since $1,100,000,000 is received in income taxes and from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 in estate duties, it is clear that the bulk of our tax revenue will be raised by levies on consumption—paid by the masses. The most conspicuous omission in the new program is the failure to increase the tax on well-to-do and wealthy groups with annual incomes of from $5,000 to $1,000,000. It is only through a much higher levy on these groups that the fundamental defect in our economic structure—the tendency for savings to outrun investments—can be rectified. Incomes of from $15,000 to $20,000 are more than adequate to meet the physical and cultural requirements of an American family. Recent studies show that families with incomes of $20,000 and over save, in the aggregate, more than half their incomes. Despite the Administration's "share-the-wealth" plan, individuals with an annual income of $25,000 will pay a total tax of less than $3,000, while those with $100,000 will continue to have a tidy sum of $68,000 to meet personal expenses.

This is not social taxation. It is estimated that if the British tax rate had been applied in this country in 1928, the federal government could have obtained $5,750,000,000, five times as much as was collected. An income of $10,000 pays two and a half times as large a tax in England as in this country, while one of $15,000 contributes three times as much. Even if the new taxes are adopted, a $2,000,000 income will pay $70,000 less than in Britain.

The British also go much farther in taxing inheritances. An English estate of $500,000 is assessed $100,000, and the recipients of the legacy are subject to an additional tax. At present the same estate in this country would pay about $60,000 with no further levy on recipients. The new Roosevelt tax on this estate would be an additional $6,000 if it passed entirely to one individual—hardly enough to prevent economic power from being transmitted from one generation to the next. Only the very largest estates would be drastically scaled down, and they still would remain far larger than is socially desirable. It would appear that the Administration is seeking to exploit the full political advantages of a program of social taxation without alienating the wealthy. Our hope is that progressives in Congress will take advantage of the two months reluctantly conceded for consideration of the program to force through taxation which fulfils the President's inspiring promises.

Modern Painting

IT is a curious fact that as modern literature became somber modern painting became gay. Or if it be objected that "gay" is not exactly the right word—as in the case of Cézanne, for example, it certainly is not—then at least it became very conspicuously "happy" in the special technical sense that it achieved an amazing adequacy and completeness of expression probably unparalleled at the time in any other form of art. Perhaps the fact is most striking to those laymen who are habitually more aware of the tone of modern literature, but it strikes one with full force in glancing at a new and handsome "Portfolio of Modern French Art."*

This collection, which begins far back with David and comes down almost to the present, reveals a steady progress, at least up to Cézanne and Van Gogh, not only in boldness and mastery of execution but in joyousness as well. The stately if somewhat conventional sereneness of David gives way to the intensity of Manet; that in turn to the happy sensuousness of Renoir and, the whole reaching a climax, to the intoxicated ecstasy of Cézanne and Van Gogh. Perhaps there is a suggestion of mere legerdemain in Matisse, of frivolity in Pascin, of imitativeness in Derain. Perhaps there are indications in their work that the movement is almost finished. But whether it is or is not, there is an indescribable air of permanence about the pictures. Styles may change; their aims and mood may come to seem definitely part of a past which has ceased to be active. But it is almost as hard to imagine them no longer interesting as it is to imagine the same thing of—if one insists upon leaving out the very greatest—the work of Botticelli or Mantegna. Moreover, in both cases the air of permanence seems to come from the same thing—from the fact that what their creators had to say is so definitely and completely stated. It is not merely because they were original and bold and ingenious, but because both their particular vision of what certain fragments of the world could be made to look like and their delight in this vision seem so adequately communicated once and for all.

---

*"The Vanity Fair Portfolio of Modern French Art." Condé Nast Publications. $12.

To most students the literature of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries does not seem to have this same air of permanence. Its creators broke ground possibly quite as new as that so successfully cultivated by the painters. They were also equally bold, equally sincere, and, in addition, they were quite possibly faced with more difficult problems. But few if any of their works seem as completely achieved, as near to complete mastery. They are uncertain, troubled, and dubious. They did not know so well as their writing predecessors or their painting contemporaries what they believed, what task they wanted to accomplish, or even what they believed to be good and true and beautiful. And for all these reasons it may be well doubted if they will last as the painters will. They are not classic in the sense that they accomplished a task so well that one cannot imagine that particular task better done.

Perhaps this is only another way of saying that they were not, like the painters, "happy" in either of two senses. They were not happy artists in the technical sense of being artists who found completely felicitous means of giving expression to the weight of their emotions. Neither were they, for the most part, men capable of taking any persistent or consistent delight in the world presented to their intellect and their senses. Man did not delight them nor woman neither. They were discontented, protesting, rebellious. They doubted if the game was worth the candle. And they did not even put dislike or hate in perfect or enduring form.

As men, Cézanne and Van Gogh and Gauguin were not contented either. Utrillo went mad and Pascin committed suicide under peculiarly messy circumstances. But if they were tortured men it is not their torture which finds direct expression in their work; it is the triumphant vision into which the torture had goaded them. And looking at the joyous statements in their work one is tempted to say of them what Beethoven said of himself. They crushed the grape for the joy of men and it is joy one gets in contemplating their pictures. Most important of all, perhaps, is the fact that the best of them loved their visible world. Their torture was not the torture which comes from hating but, like that of Van Gogh, the result of an agony lest they should find themselves unable to set down some adequate representation of their almost unbearable delight in what they saw. Has any really great modern writer been able sincerely to exclaim, "O brave new world," or to feel that "it was joy in that time to be alive"? But the world of the painters was a brave new world—brighter, more intense, and more exhilarating than that which anyone else had had the wit to glimpse since the Renaissance.

The Abyssinian Gamble

CAPTAIN ANTHONY EDEN was made minister in the new British government "for League of Nations affairs." One of his first acts in that capacity was to visit Mussolini to discuss Abyssinia, a member of the League. According to the Herald Tribune, he "is said to have worked along the line of a territorial grant, economic concessions, and the right to trade routes and a railway line for Italy in the African empire." Another report is that Britain offered concessions to Italy for Mussolini's acceptance of Anglo-German naval agreement, while France offered them to induce Mussolini to oppose that agreement. A Rome dispatch of the United Press begins: "Authoritative sources intimated today that European powers had agreed to partition among them, in the name of civilization, the Ethiopian empire." Authoritatively, too, it is stated that Mussolini can accept nothing less than a protectorate over Abyssinia. Another cable suggests that Eden's first preoccupation is to find some way for Italy to remain a member of the League when at war with Abyssinia, and that the method will be to declare Abyssinia in default of its obligations to abolish slavery. As a footnote to these cables comes one from The Hague, where a mixed commission is studying Italian and Abyssinian arguments as to the incidents which precipitated the "crisis."

These cables complete a distressing picture. Only the weakest machinery of conciliation is at work, while the League is being circumvented by the very persons charged with making it effective, and the theft of empire is proceeding in the traditional manner. Mussolini is following the successful pattern of Japan in Manchoukuo. He is more raucous about it, but that satisfies the formula. The more a nation can stake its prestige, the more it wins the right to be left alone by other nations. Either Italy will be at war with Abyssinia by October, or Emperor Haile Selassi must yield what Italy might win in a war.

It now becomes a matter of great concern to keep the record clear, to see that any charge used as a pretext for action against Abyssinia is proved to the hilt. If the slavery charge is chosen, it will be difficult to establish. Abyssinia is under a pledge to "endeavor to secure complete suppression of slavery in all its forms and of slave trade by land and sea." In fulfilling this pledge the Emperor has issued important decrees, making substantial progress toward its abolition. His latest report to the League showed the liberation in a year of 3,647 slaves and sentences in 293 cases for violation of laws against slavery. It would be mockery for Italy to "civilize" Abyssinia in this respect, as slavery in a form admitted by Italy itself to be economic servitude flourishes in Libya. Its abolition in this part of Africa is not to be effected by a mere emancipation proclamation.

Private information from Italy tells of increasing economic pressure and the fear that a capital levy disguised as a forced loan is inevitable. Mussolini was advised by most business leaders against the Abyssinia adventure and refused to listen. Now the prospect of an African war is arousing little enthusiasm. The public does not like it and the soldiers like it still less. It occurs to us that Mussolini likes it least of all.

Issues and Men

Russian Progress at Home—Enmity Abroad

THE news from Russia continues astoundingly favorable. After having averted its face again and again, nature seems now to have determined to do all it possibly can to aid the Soviets in achieving success. A bumper harvest is expected for this year. On June 1 there had been sown to grain no less than 220,000,000 acres out of a possible 224,000,000. "Qualified foreign observers," the New York Times reports from Moscow, agree with the Soviet authorities that nearly the whole possible crop has now been planted, and very well planted—"better than ever before"—with the aid of 99,000 new tractors, while 21,000 new combines are waiting to help in the harvesting. Moreover, heavy and frequent rains occurred all through April and May, and there is moisture enough in the ground in all parts of the Soviet Union to carry the crop through even if there should be a severe drought from now on. The planting of cotton, sugar beets, and garden truck has also been very well done, but it is admitted that there is still some resistance to collective farming and a good deal of sabotage. There is every prospect that the total crop will be much larger than that of last year, which was four million metric tons ahead of 1933. "The Soviet socialization of agriculture, which has caused such bitter struggles in the past," concludes the dispatch in the Times, "is now practically accomplished."

Equally remarkable is the gold production. In two years it is expected to surpass that of the Transvaal in South Africa, according to the Director of the Soviet Gold Mining Trust now in the United States to buy more mining machinery. He declared that the Soviets are producing 15,000 kilograms of gold monthly against 11,000 kilograms a month last year. The Soviet iron and steel industry, incredible as it seems, has already equaled or passed the German, and if the same rapid growth continues and our steel and iron industry continues slack, it may be only a few years before the Soviets will claim that they have achieved the largest iron and steel production in the world. These are staggering accomplishments. However one may feel about the Soviet system and however high seems the price that has been paid in human lives for this forced industrialization of Russia in the less than twenty years since the revolution, it remains a stupendous record. Looked at simply as an engineering and industrial feat, it stands without parallel. The great creative forces of the nation, which were locked up under the Czar, are released. Prometheus is unbound.

In other fields also the progress of the Soviets is startling, notably in scientific research. Their zeal in this field was illustrated the other day by their refusal to allow a great Russian scientist to continue to teach and work at Cambridge University. He was ordered home to teach there. In medicine, in meteorology, in the social sciences, in social reform, the progress is extraordinary. And in diplomatic relations the Bolsheviks have scored one success after another—the renewal of diplomatic relations with the United States, the recent treaties with Rumania, Poland, and Czecho-Slovakia, the alliance with France, and their entrance into the League of Nations. These are achievements indeed, even if much of the credit must go to Adolf Hitler.

Yet it is a curious fact that the greater the industrial and economic success of the Soviets, the greater will be their danger from the outside world. The more rapidly, for example, they strengthen their munitions industry and improve their army, the greater the temptation to the Japanese to strike at them from Manchuria before it becomes no longer possible to do so with any hope of victory. The greater their success in establishing the communist state, the more readily will conservatives and reactionaries in Europe listen to talk of a holy war to do away with the "menace to home, family, and church"—and private property. For the masters of privilege everywhere are quite aware that if Russia builds a state in which there is a greater diffusion of wealth and comfort and a greater security of living for the masses than elsewhere, the workers of other countries will insist on receiving the same kind of treatment, on having the same form of government. Hitler particularly understands this; he and others, like our own Hearst, know that what they say about starvation and misery in Russia is either not founded on fact or is grossly exaggerated. Hitler himself is debarred from attacking Russia at its most vulnerable points—the dictatorship, the suppression of individual liberty, free press, and free speech, and the wholesale, brutal execution and exiling of those who oppose the government—because he is vulnerable at precisely the same points himself. It is necessary therefore for him to fill the air with attacks upon communism, although his original twenty-six-plank platform was almost as communistic as that of the Bolsheviks.

How largely the element of private property enters in is deducible from the difference in the attitude of conservative church groups toward Germany and toward Russia. Hitler is deliberately seeking to destroy the Protestant and Catholic churches and is setting up a new pagan church in which the old Germanic gods are to be worshiped. Yet the press of Europe and the United States has in no degree raged against the godless German government as it has against the godless Bolsheviks. The answer is that Hitler still stands for private property and that his denunciations of Moscow delight the clubmen on Fifth Avenue and Pall Mall.

Hence, the greater the success of the Soviets in building up a powerful industrial state and actually beating capitalism at its own game, the greater will be the rage against them abroad, the desire to see them collapse, and the willingness to aid Hitler and the Japanese to attack Russia on two fronts. The threat of this, of course, drives the Soviets in turn to increase the speed of their industrialization and militarization program. A vicious circle indeed!

Oswald Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW

HOG: "They kill me to eat, but you, poor sap — they kill you just for your own good ...."
HOMO SAPIENS
TO DAY'S WIRELESS PROGRAMME
HITLER
MUSSOLINI
DANCE MUSIC
Nationalism Swill
LOW

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press

PROGRESS OF MAN. 1935 A.D.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Freedom and Government

By GEORGE BERNARD SHAW

[The following speech by Mr. Shaw was made in London and transmitted over the nation-wide network of the Columbia Broadcasting System on June 18, between 5 and 5:30 p.m. He spoke in the weekly series on "Freedom" arranged by the British Broadcasting Corporation and short-waved to the United States. The New York Times and Herald Tribune did not think it worth while to give his speech any space the following day. We are herewith printing the speech with the kind permission of Mr. Shaw and the Columbia Broadcasting System.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: I have no time to talk to you of any nonsense about freedom tonight. Let's come to business. How can you tell a free person—a person who can do what he likes when he likes and where he likes, or do nothing at all as he chooses? Well, there is no such person, and there never can be any such person. Whether we like it or not, we must wash and dress and undress, we must spend a couple of hours eating and drinking, we must spend nearly as much in getting about from place to place—for half the day we are slaves to necessities which we cannot shirk. As we must eat, we must first provide food; as we must sleep, we must have beds and bedding; as we must walk through the streets, we must have clothes to cover our nakedness.

Now food and houses and clothes can be produced by human labor, but when they are produced they can be stolen. If you like honey you can let the bees produce it, and then steal it from them. If you are too lazy to get about from place to place on your own legs you can make a slave of a horse. And what you do to a horse or a bee, you can also do to a man or a woman or a child. You can get the upper hand of them by force, or trickery of any sort, or even by teaching them that it is their religious duty to sacrifice their freedom to yours. So beware! If you allow any person or class of persons to get the upper hand of you, they will shift all that can be shifted on to your shoulders, and you will find yourself working from eight to fourteen hours a day, when, if you had only yourself and your family to work for, you could do it quite comfortably in half the time or less. The object of all honest government should be to prevent your being imposed on in this way. But the object of most actual governments, I regret to say, is exactly the opposite: they enforce your slavery and call it freedom.

The natural slavery of man's nature forces you to eat and drink; and makes eating and drinking so pleasant that when we can afford it, we eat and drink too much. We must sleep or go mad—and then sleep is so pleasant that we have difficulty getting up in the morning. And families seem so pleasant that we get married and go on building societies. Thus, instead of resenting our natural wants as slavery, we take the greatest pleasure in their satisfaction, and we sing sentimental songs in praise of them.

The slavery of man to man is the very opposite of this; it is hatred of the body and of the spirit. Our poets do not praise it; they proclaim that no man is good enough to be another man's master. A student of the great Jewish prophets, a gentleman by the name of Marx, spent his life in proving that there is no extremity of selfish cruelty at which the slavery of man to man will stop, if it is not stopped by law. You can see for yourself that it produces a state of continual civil war, called a class war, between the slaves and their masters, organized into trade unions on the one side and employers' federations on the other.

St. Thomas Law, who has just been canonized, says we shall never have a peaceful and stable society until this struggle is ended by the abolition of slavery altogether; and the completion would enable man to do his share of the world's work with his own hands and brains.

Naturally, the master in parliaments, in schools, and in newspapers makes the most desperate efforts to prevent us from realizing our slavery. From our earliest years we are taught that our country is the land of the free. And was not freedom's influence before us when we defeated the Spanish Armada, when we cut off King Charles's head, when we won the Battle of Waterloo, and when, only the other day, we quite unintentionally changed the German, Austrian, Russian, and Ottoman empires into republics?

When we grow old enough to vote, we are told that we have the wage boards, free education, and the New Deal and the dole; and what more could any reasonable man ask for? We learn that the rich are taxed a quarter, a third or even a half of their total incomes. But the poor are never reminded that they have to pay that much of their wages as rent, in addition to having to work twice as long as they would need to if they were free.

Whenever famous writers protest against this imposture—say, Voltaire and Rousseau and Tom Paine in the eighteenth century, Karl Marx in the nineteenth, or Lenin and Trotzky in the twentieth—you are taught that they are atheists, libertines, murderers, and scoundrels. And it is made a criminal offense to buy or sell their books. If they make the slightest sign of a revolution, England immediately makes war on them and lends money to the other powers to join her in forcing the revolutionists to restore the slave altar. When this was successful at Waterloo, the victory was advertised as another triumph of British freedom. And the British wage slave, instead of going into mourning like Lord Byron, believed it all and cheered enthusiastically.

When the revolution wins, as it did in Russia in 1922, the fighting stops. But the abuse, the calumnies, the lies continue until the revolutionized state grows into a first-rate power. Then our diplomatists, after having for years denounced the revolution leaders as the most abominable tyrants, have to do a right turn and invite them to dinner.

Now though this class of humbug is made to delude the slave class only, it ends in deluding the master class much more completely. A gentleman, whose mind has been formed at a preparatory school for the sons of gentlemen, followed by a public school and a university course, is much more utterly taken in by the falsified history and dishonest political economy and the snobbery taught in these places, because the gentlemen's education teaches him that he is a very fine fellow, superior to the common run of men, whose duty it is to wash his clothes and carry his parcels. This entirely agrees with his view of himself. He honestly believes that the system which has placed him in such an agreeable situation and done such justice to his merits is the best of all possible systems and that he should shed his blood, and yours, to the last drop in its defense.

But the great mass of workers—underpaid, treated as inferiors, cast on the dole—cannot feel so sure about it as the gentleman. The facts are too harshly at hand. In hard times, such as we are now passing through, their disgust and despair sometimes lead them to kick over the traces, upset everything, and we have to be rescued from gangsterism by some poor young genius who has the fancy for being an emperor and has the courage and brains and tendency to jump at a chance. But the slaves who would give three cheers for the emperor might just as well have made a cross on a British or American ballot paper, as far as their food is concerned. Now so far I have mentioned nothing pertaining to historical facts, for that would lead me into controversy; and controversy would not be fair when you cannot answer me back. I am never controversial over the wireless.

Always remember that though nobody likes to be called a slave, it does not follow that slavery is a bad thing. Great men like Aristotle have felt that the power of government would be impossible unless the persons the people have to obey are beautifully dressed and decorated, speaking with a special accent, traveling in first-class carriages or in the most expensive cars, riding on the best-bred horses, never cleaning their own boots or doing anything for themselves that can possibly be done by ringing a bell and ordering some common person to do it. This leads, of course, to the fact that they must be rich, without any other obligation than to produce an impression of almost godlike superiority on the minds of the common people. In short, it is contended that you must make men ignorant and idolatrous before they can become obedient followers and law-abiding citizens.

When women were enfranchised and given the right to sit in Parliament, the first purpose was to defeat all the women candidates who stood for the freedom of the workers and had given devoted and distinguished service. They elected only one woman, a titled lady of great wealth and exceptionally fascinating personality. Now this, it is said, is human nature; and you cannot change human nature. On the other hand, it is maintained that human nature is the easiest thing in the world to change if you catch it young enough, and that the idolatry of the slave class for the mass class is entirely an artificial product of education and of a propaganda that plays upon our infants long before they ever leave their cradles. An opposite mentality can, it is argued, be produced by a contrary education and propaganda. You can turn the point in line for yourself. . . .

A practical question, if possible at all, is how the income of the whole country can best be distributed from day to day. If the answer is to cultivate an agriculture using mechanical plows and chemical fertilizers, and industrially insuring electrified factories full of machinery, the product may be so great that an equal distribution of it would provide enough to give the unskilled laborers as much as the managers and the men with the scientific set-up.

Do not forget, when you hear that the trends of modern machinery enable one girl to produce as much as a thousand men could produce in the reign of Good Queen Anne, that this marvelous increase in huge things makes noodles and steel pins and matches—nor that very young children may eat noodles eagerly, but the diet is not enough for them.

If you live in a civilized country your freedom is restricted, and you are forced by laws to do this and not to do that, and to pay rents and taxes. If you do not obey these laws the courts will imprison you and, if you go too far, kill you. If the laws are reasonable, you have no reason to complain, because they increase your freedom by protecting you against assault, highway robbery, and disorder generally. But as society is constituted at present there are other far more serious contentions. Your employer dictates the cut, color, and condition of your clothes, as well as your hours of work; he can turn you into the street at any moment to join the melancholy band of lost spirits called "the unemployed." In short, his power over you is far greater than that of any political group could be. Your only defense is to strike, which is only another form of starving on his doorstep until he does you justice. But as the police will not allow you to starve on your employer's doorstep, you must starve on your own if you have one. The extreme form of the strike—a general strike of all workers at the same moment—is also the extreme form of human folly, because if completely carried out it would extinguish all men, and the workers would be the first to perish. A general strike is trade unionism gone mad. Sane trade unionism would never sanction more than one big strike at a time, with all the other trades working overtime to support it.

If you have to work twelve hours a day, you have no freedom at all. If you work eight hours a day, you have four hours a day to do what you like with, subject to the laws of the land, and given enough money to buy an interesting book or pay for a seat at the pictures. But even here nature interferes, for if your eight hours' work has been of a hard, physical type and when you get home you want to spend your four hours in reading a book to improve your mind, you may find yourself fast asleep in a half minute and your brain remains in its present benighted condition.

We must change our politics before we get what we want; and meantime we must stop gassing about freedom, because the people in England do not know what freedom is—never having had it. They will always call freedom by its old English name of "leisure," and keep pounding for more leisure and more money to enjoy it in return for one's share of work. If you had your choice, would you work for eight hours a day and retire on a full pension at forty-five; or would you rather work four hours a day and continue to work until you were seventy years old? Now, don't send the answers to me, please! Talk it over with your wife.

Note on E. A. Robinson

By JOHN McALPIN BERRYMAN

He was forever walking
A little north
To watch the bare words stalking
Stiffly forth,
Frozen as they went
And flawless of heart within without comment.

What to Do with the Supreme Court?

Fallacies About the Court

By MORRIS R. COHEN

THAT the people of the United States favor the NRA was made obvious by the unprecedented Congressional majority accorded to the Administration in the election of 1934. What, then, prevents Congress from passing a bill enlarging the Supreme Court with ten additional judges who, on a rehearing, are sure to vote for the constitutionality of the original act?

There is a general impression that this would be dishonest. Why so? Because, according to the traditional assumption, judges have nothing to do with making the law, their decisions following with logical necessity from "the solemn will of the people expressed in the Constitution," and if the results are bad, we should go through the laborious ordeal of changing the Constitution rather than the composition of the court. This view has so often been repeated that it is generally accepted as axiomatic. Nevertheless, it rests on a number of rather obvious fallacies.

1. That the judges merely find the meaning of the Constitution and in no way make or mold it has long been characterized among scientific jurists as a childish fiction. No one can seriously maintain that all of our constitutional law as to what constitutes interstate commerce, the police power of the states, or due process of law follows logically from the wording of the Constitution and has not been affected by the social, economic, and political opinions of different judges. The law took a different direction under Taney than under Marshall. Indeed, how could the people in 1789—or the small proportion of them who had the right to vote then—have foreseen all the modern inventions and made definite provisions for them? It is certainly not through anything written in the Constitution that the power to regulate interstate commerce includes the power to prohibit the sending of liquor into certain states but not the power to regulate insurance. A thousand similar distinctions may be mentioned which, whether justified or not by their practical consequences, are certainly judge-made and might have been different if other judges had ruled.

Specifically the NRA is declared unconstitutional because it delegates legislative power to the President. But the fact is that all effective legislation for the future must inevitably delegate some subsidiary lawmaking to the executive authority. Justices Stone and Cardozo recognized this and claimed that in this case there was too much delegation. But the line between proper and improper delegation is not laid down in the Constitution itself. Where to draw it is a question of political wisdom. Why should the courts rather than Congress determine it? The usual answer is that the Constitution declares itself to be the supreme law of the land, and its interpretation must therefore be left to the courts. This, however, cannot be consistently maintained. The Constitution provides that every state shall be guaranteed a republican form of government. What does that mean? In the Oregon case, when the issue was raised as to whether the referendum was compatible with a republican form of government, the Supreme Court declared it a political question and not for the courts to decide. There are in fact many express provisions of the Constitution which the courts cannot or dare not enforce. Thus for more than ten years Congress refused to obey the Constitution and to apportion representation according to the latest census. Would our courts have dared to declare the acts of the counter-constitutional congresses between 1922 and 1932 unconstitutional? Certainly not, though if they did so, they would be on logically firmer ground than in deciding that Congress could not pass a minimum-wage law for the District of Columbia.

The truth, then, is that constitutional law is just what judges make it. A leading conservative newspaper put it aptly when it said that the United States Supreme Court is a continuous constitutional convention. This it is in fact. But we do not generally recognize it, else we should demand that the work of this constitutional convention be ratified by the people before it goes into effect, or at any rate that the delegates be more responsive to, and in closer touch with, popular needs.

2. We are frequently told that the Constitution represents the eternal principles of justice, or at least those principles of liberty and right which are characteristic of Anglo-~~Saxon~~ civilization. The first of these claims is obviously question-begging; specific decisions which strike people as unjust can certainly not be defended that way. The second claim is even more readily disposed of by the fact that our English cousins have never given their courts power to set aside legislation on grounds of unconstitutionality.

3. Quite fallacious also is the rhetorical argument that without this power vested in the courts we should be at the mercy of legislative majorities. This argument ignores the historic fact that in few, if any, actual cases have the majority of our people felt themselves saved from Congressional oppression by judicial intervention. On the contrary, Congress being more responsive to popular demand, our people as a whole have felt more resentment at being at the mercy of small judicial majorities than at being at the mercy of very large legislative majorities. Besides, the mischief of Congressional wrongs can be readily remedied at the next election, while the mischief of wrong judicial decisions in the name of the Constitution requires the laborious consent of two-thirds of each house of Congress and three-quarters of the state legislatures.

If we need watchers to protect us from bad legislation, why not watchers against bad judicial decisions? The fact is that the people of England, France, Switzerland, or the Scandinavian countries feel as free as we do, and their rights are as amply protected, without their courts having the power to set aside legislation as unconstitutional.

4. It is quite fallacious to argue that our system assures a maximum security of legal rights and thus encourages business enterprise. The actuality is rather the other way. In no other civilized country would people endure a legal system in which such a question as that of the legality of certain codes could remain undetermined for two years. In no other country also is there such a complete separation between power and responsibility as in ours, where those who have the final word on all questions of law are in no way answerable to the popular will or to any other earthly authority.

5. It is generally urged that the judicial veto over legislation has been in force since the case of Marbury vs. Madison in 1803 and it is too late to change it. This argument is historically untenable. What that famous case did decide was that the court would not issue a mandamus to compel a Democratic Secretary of State to deliver certain commissions to some Federalists, even though an act of Congress authorized it to do so. The actual decision was a quite satisfactory victory for the Democratic Administration and not something over which the country got excited. In his written opinion Marshall did, in the fashion of his day, indulge in speculations about constitutions written for all time and superior to acts of Congress; but most of it was mere dictum. It is obviously one thing for a court to refuse to follow a coordinate department of the government to constrain the Executive, and quite another to say to the people at large that they are under no obligation to obey a general law enacted by Congress. Marshall argued that judges swear to obey the Constitution and must therefore live up to their oath. But Members of Congress and the Executive likewise swear to obey the Constitution and must therefore also follow what they regard as the meaning of the Constitution. From the chaos which would follow a consistent adherence to the theory of three independent departments of the government we have been saved by the process of practical accommodation and the extra-legal party system.

The first case in which the Supreme Court exercised the right to set aside a law of general importance was the Dred Scott case, and the decision and the dicta in that case were repealed by force of arms. It is only in recent times that declaring acts of Congress unconstitutional may be said to have become a practice.

6. The subordination of Congress to the courts has often been defended on the ground that under this system we have greatly prospered. This is a rather naive example of the fallacy of post hoc ergo propter hoc. Our prosperity, if it is a fact, may be due to our unrivaled natural resources, to the practical skill of our people, and the like. And it may well be argued that our present depression is in part due to such judicial vetoes as those of the Lochner case, the Adair case, the child-labor cases, the minimum-wage cases, and others, which by depressing the economic power of the laboring classes have depressed our home markets.

7. When we realize that the important questions which come before our highest court involve political, economic, and technical issues, then if we lay aside pious rhetoric we must admit that far from being the strongest, the judiciary is the weakest part of our governmental system—for it has the least opportunity of getting adequate information. No one who wants to inform himself thoroughly on any question will be satisfied to do so on the basis of listening for a few hours to two lawyers who have submitted argumentative briefs.

8. Space does not permit discussion of the relation of our federal courts to state legislation. But if the virtue of a federal system be the opportunity for different experiments in different states, that virtue has been effectively minimized by the way in which the Supreme Court has turned the Fourteenth Amendment—intended by the people as a protection for the Negroes—into a prohibition of experiments in the field of social legislation.

The Supreme Court and Democracy

By LOUIS B. BOUDIN

> The Constitution contains, of course, no provision which, in terms, deals in any way with the subject. [Mr. Justice Brandeis, in his dissenting opinion in Washington vs. Dawson and Company, 264 U. S. 219, decided February 25, 1924.]

IN attempting to find our bearings in the chaos and confusion created by the recent Supreme Court decisions, it is important, above all, that we understand clearly what it is all about. Unfortunately, most of the discussion follows channels least calculated to lead us to any solution of the fundamental problem. We are avoiding the real issues involved. Most of us—and this is particularly true of so-called "liberals"—are "constitutionally," that is, psychologically, unable to undertake a "revision," even a mental one, of the entire order of things given. As a result, we attempt to cover our basic confusion and utter impotence by futile and largely meaningless talk about a "liberal interpretation" of the Constitution or the necessity for its amendment.

This talk is beside the point. It proceeds upon the assumption that there is something in the Constitution which the judges have "interpreted illiberally," and that the difficulty is to be overcome by getting either some different provisions into the Constitution for the judges to "interpret" or a different set of judges, more "liberal" than the present ones, who will interpret the present provisions in a more liberal way. This is nonsense based on ignorance. Our main difficulty does not lie in the fact that the judges of the Supreme Court are not liberal enough, and it cannot be remedied by an amendment to the Constitution.

In the closing pages of my "Government by Judiciary" I ventured to dissent from the general chorus of approbation with which the then jubilant liberals had greeted the "new majority" of the Supreme Court, which was apparently steering the ship of state along a "new course." For this discordant note I was roundly abused by the liberals. Events have proved that I was the better prophet. But the word prophet puts it on the wrong foot. I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet. What I like is to get down to fundamentals in these matters. And one of the fundamentals of this situation is that it has nothing to do with the liberalism, so-called, of the judges of the Supreme Court. I do not believe in a "liberal" Supreme Court. The decision on the NIRA proves that I am right in that position. I must confess to deriving a certain malicious pleasure from contemplating the plight of the liberals in discussing that decision, in view of the unanimity of the judges. No more can "reactionary" judges be blamed. Justices Brandeis,

PUBLIC LIBRARY

Stone, and Cardozo, surely, are not reactionaries, at least not in the sense in which liberals use that term. No wonder our liberals don't know what has happened to them.

Given our present "Constitution," the word used in the Pickwickian sense in which it is used by the judges, the decision was eminently proper—proper even for a liberal judge to make, or at least to join in. (I make the qualification because of a theory I have as to why Justices Cardozo and Stone joined in the decision, which I cannot go into here.) If the Supreme Court is to have the power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional, it could not have used it to better purpose than in killing the NIRA as it was "interpreted" by the Roosevelt Administration during the latter part of its existence. Apart from some special interests in and outside the Roosevelt Administration, I do not know of anyone who ought to shed a tear for the abolition of this vicious piece of governmental machinery. I say "machinery" not "legislation." It was not a beautiful piece of legislation, to start with. The best that could be said for it was that it was so vague and equivocal that with proper handling it could perhaps have been made to serve some useful purpose. As actually handled, particularly during the latter part of its existence, it was a source of oppression to the "little man" generally and of no use to the working class as a special interest. This undoubtedly helped bring about both the decision and the unanimity of the judges in rendering it. Another help was the manner in which the case was handled before the Supreme Court. I have read the government's brief, and I give it as my considered opinion that if a set of lawyers ever deserved the licking they got, those who represented the government in this all-important case richly deserved it.

Unfortunately, the decision was not limited to this case, and the thing condemned was not the NRA but the NIRA. And to do this, the Supreme Court had to find something in the Constitution on which to base the condemnation. Under the system of conventional make-believe which is our constitutional law judges cannot say that they declare a law invalid because they do not like it, either as written or as applied in practice. They must say that the Constitution forbids it. In small matters that is of no particular moment, for it does not stop them from upholding a similar law—similar, that is, in a constitutional sense—when they or their successors like it better. The technical term involved in the operation is known as "distinguishing" the one case from the other, and the process of separating what they like from what they don't like, as "pricking out a line of demarcation" between the good and the bad. But when it comes to fundamentals that becomes impossible. Of necessity, they must dig deep and build high. The result is that when they condemn the bad they make impossible the good.

The very nature of the democratic process is such that it does not admit of outside correctives. "The cure for the ills of democracy is more democracy," and this is more than an old-fashioned copy-book maxim. There is only one way to make bad laws impossible, and that is to make all new legislation impossible. And even that is not a sure preventive, for old laws may be put to new, and very bad, uses. And if new remedial laws are made impossible, we are much worse off than we would be under the worst regime of hasty, ill-considered and ill-digested, or even downright vicious legislation. That is exactly what has been happening to us under our system of government by judiciary.

That is why we are squirming under the new decisions of our real governors. It is not as if we had not been suffering under bad laws, for we have. Nor is it as if good new laws were permitted us. The recent decisions of the Supreme Court have not only put an end to Mr. Roosevelt's New Deal; they have made any New Deal impossible. That is the reason for the talk about amending the Constitution. And it brings us to the real point in the discussion.

The talk about amending the Constitution is on a par with the talk about liberal judges. It assumes that there is something in the present Constitution which says that the NIRA is unconstitutional. But this assumption is due to ignorance about the workings of our constitutional system—an ignorance fostered by one of the most gigantic propaganda machines the world has ever seen (it embraces not only every school and college textbook on history and government but every political party, including the Socialist Party). The truth is that there is nothing in the Constitution as it stands which forbids such legislation as the present NIRA. I say this in the face of the unanimous decision of the United States Supreme Court, and notwithstanding a warm admiration for some of its judges. For it must be remembered that "the Constitution" is a term of "art," as we lawyers say, which, translated into ordinary English, means "the Supreme Court."

The quotation at the head of this article is from the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis in a case in which the Supreme Court declared an act of Congress unconstitutional. Officially, and to the layman, it meant that the Constitution said that the particular thing should not be done. In reality, there was nothing about it in the Constitution. And to Mr. Justice Brandeis, speaking to lawyers, it was a matter of course that there should not be. Mr. Justice Brandeis was speaking of a particular case in which he disagreed with the majority of the court. But the same is true of the entire business of unconstitutionality. "Of course, there is nothing in the Constitution about all this," applies to all cases in which laws are declared unconstitutional, to cases in which Mr. Justice Brandeis joins the majority as well as to the other kind. It is true of the decision on the NIRA, in spite of the unanimity of the judges. What is more, I believe that Judge Brandeis, for one, would not seriously dispute it. When Mr. Justice Brandeis joins in declaring a law of Congress unconstitutional, he says in effect: Assuming the power of the Supreme Court to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional, and bearing in mind the uses to which this power has been put in the past by this court, I am of opinion that this law deserves to be annulled by putting it into the unconstitutional class.

Where does all this lead? For one thing, it leads to the irresistible conclusion that it is not only practically impossible to amend the Constitution, but almost useless. It is also very dangerous. For not only can amendments be interpreted away; they can also be made, by interpretation, a source of new and undreamed-of ills. In both respects the Fourteenth Amendment is a warning and an example.

There is only one way really to amend the Constitution and that is by depriving the Supreme Court of the power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional. But this power, too, is "of course not in the Constitution." A formal amendment is therefore entirely unnecessary if we really mean business. And I venture to predict that this formal method of amendment will not be resorted to when the people of the United States get ready to make real democracy possible. I also venture to predict that although this will not be its immediate effect, it will ultimately prove to have been the "silver lining" of the present cloud.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

The Value of Judicial Review

By OSMOND K. FRAENKEL

THE Schechter decision dramatizes an issue which has been pressing into prominence in American affairs. Whenever a particular social reform is urged upon a state legislature, the argument is advanced that enactment of such reform will drive industry from that state into others less solicitous for the workers' welfare. The progress of many reforms—especially the abolition of child labor—has been delayed by just such considerations; hence the need for federal action in the major fields of social betterment.

Through the years of the depression it has become increasingly evident not only that national economic planning is essential, but also that it cannot be accomplished except by federal action. During these years the country has willingly yielded wide powers to Washington. Probably it is unfortunate that the Administration did not propose the necessary constitutional changes at the height of its popularity, because there is serious danger that improvement in business will find the people unwilling to consider any far-reaching changes in the distribution of power in our federal system. Yet this is an issue which must sooner or later be met. Perhaps it will be solved by a reorganization of the states, perhaps by the vesting of greater powers in the central government. Fundamental constitutional change, by whatever method, is essential.

Whether or not change of this nature should include a limitation of the power of the courts to pass on constitutional issues has become a much-discussed question. The recent ruling that the Railway Pension Law violated the due-process clause, coupled with Chief Justice Hughes's statement on the possible bearing of that clause on some of the code provisions, shows the danger which exists. The current conception of due process has caused more havoc than has any other constitutional doctrine. It has doomed workmen's compensation, minimum wages, regulation of the hours of labor, regulation of various kinds of businesses, the establishment of railroad pensions, and a great variety of taxes. It is time the original meaning of the phrase, a purely procedural one, be restored. Without this change in the Constitution no real progress along the road of social reform is possible. Until it has been made, the Constitution will remain a bulwark of the capitalists' order; not until that time will it be possible to plan toward any degree of socialism. And were it once accomplished, it would probably be unnecessary to reform the court itself, for in spite of much argument to the contrary the Supreme Court has valuable constitutional functions to perform.

When the court upholds the rights of a minority, as in the Scottsboro case, or protects against arbitrary official action, as in the recent Humphrey case, it is performing those functions for which it was really intended and for which it is best qualified. The American people are by tradition distrustful of authority. They set up their tribunals to be independent in the hope that they would stand as champions of liberty against oppression. Too often the courts have failed, mistaking the privilege of the few for the liberty of the many. But today more than ever it is essential that we preserve and intensify the independence of the judiciary.

The suggestion that the Supreme Court be denied the right to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional covers both too much and too little ground. Its scope is too limited, because adopting it would do nothing to curb interference with desirable state laws by a decision, often over strong dissent, that the laws violated due process. It is too extensive, because there are many respects in which Congress should properly be subject to supervision. Today the court may still be relied upon, at least in peace times, to protect freedom of speech and other rights guaranteed by the first amendments. There are even provisions in the body of the Constitution itself—such as the right of each state to representation in the Senate—which, if infringed by act of Congress, the court should uphold. The mere fact that the judiciary in other countries exerts no such power constitutes no valid argument against the existence of this power under our peculiar conditions. And there have been times in the history of other countries when the existence of an independent court might well have been useful, if only as a deterrent.

Revision of the powers of the Supreme Court is unlikely to strip it of the right to uphold the particular form of government laid down in the Constitution; although, of course, that form may itself be the subject of amendment. And it was with the form of our government that the wider aspects of the Schechter case dealt. The decision that the NIRA delegated excessive powers to the President would probably never have been rendered during the latter part of the last century while the democratic tradition was in the ascendant. Even during the cumulative increase in administrative strength which characterized the post-war period, the Supreme Court never overthrew any act of Congress on the ground of excessive delegation. Yet the decision in the Schechter case should have been anticipated by the Administration after the recent "hot oil" case. While it is true that that case was complicated by the ambiguity of the administrative orders, the principle laid down in it applied with equal force to the codes.

There is nothing in this phase of the Schechter decision which cannot be cured by Congress; all the court requires is that Congress lay down a standard by which administrative action may be measured. And with the experience gained in the preparation and administration of the codes this should now be possible. Very likely such formulation could not have been made at the time the idea originated. If Congress decides to preserve some of the features of the NRA, it is to be hoped the Administration will leave off hiding its head in the sand in order to postpone decisions of constitutional questions of importance. A course of this kind may once have been justified on the cynical theory that by the time the original NRA might be declared unconstitutional its economic purposes would have been well accomplished. Such an attitude is no longer desirable. Especially in connection with such legislation as the Wagner-Connery labor-disputes act it is essential, after any obvious constitutional defects have been removed, to secure a prompt adjudication in a wisely chosen case. There is a possibility that this law may be held constitutional on the theory that action taken to prevent a strike in a local factory necessarily affects interstate commerce when its products are widely distributed among the states. If this power is to be denied Congress, the necessity for amendment will be manifest.

It would seem, therefore, that two courses lie open to the Administration. It must educate the public to the need for far-reaching constitutional changes—changes in the distribution of federal power and changes involving the redefinition of due process. In the preparation of its laws it must use greater skill than heretofore, better judgment in the selection of its test cases, and it must press, above all, for prompt determination. Until the court has passed on the bulk of the New Deal legislation it will be impossible to define to what extent the Constitution must be changed.

The Tyranny of the Bank of France

By ROBERT DELL

Geneva, June 14

THE recent financial and political crisis in France has ended in the capitulation of Parliament to the financial and industrial interests that engineered the crisis, but the victory of those interests is less complete than on similar occasions in the past, and there are encouraging symptoms of an awakening to the necessity of getting rid of their domination. The sinister part played by the Bank of France, in particular, has been so evident that the revolt against the tyranny of the bank is rapidly spreading, and in normal circumstances one of the issues at the general election next year will be whether the Bank of France is to be the master or the servant of the state. It is not only in France that the question of the relations between the central bank and the state is an urgent question of practical politics. The political influence of the Bank of England is just as great and just as pernicious as that of the Bank of France, although that fact is not yet so generally realized in England as it is in France. Democratic government, as Anatole France said long ago in "L'Ile des Pingouins," has come to mean in practice government by the financial interests, and unless democracy can control the banks, the banks will destroy democracy, for the financial interests have discovered that a fascist regime suits them even better.

The financial crisis was artificial. It was, as has been said, engineered by the banks and certain industrial interests, represented by the Comité des Forges, which are in close contact with high finance. For example, M. de Wendel, the potentate of the Comité des Forges, is on the governing board of the Bank of France. He has the controlling interest in the Journal des Débats, and the industrial interests that he represents share with the coal interests the control of the Temps. The Comité des Forges and its satellites have other less open influences in the press. The Comité des Forges is undoubtedly behind the anti-parliamentary movement, and it inclines to an alliance or close understanding with Nazi Germany. So do the leaders of the chief anti-parliamentary organization, the Croix de Feu. This is natural and there are several reasons for it, notably hostility to communism and to Soviet Russia and the belief, no doubt justified, that an understanding with Germany would facilitate a fascist victory in France. Moreover, an alliance with Germany would be to the advantage of the French iron and steel interests, which have already profited greatly by German rearmament, for it would make it necessary for both countries to be heavily armed. The alliance would be aimed primarily against Soviet Russia, but ultimately against England, at least to some extent. One of the aims of the alliance, in the minds of its French—and no doubt also its German—advocates would be to eliminate English influence on the European continent and put an end to the balance-of-power policy, which has enabled England to dominate the Continent hitherto. This was one of Caillaux's aims when he tried to arrive at an understanding with Germany in 1911, and it was for that reason above all that he incurred the bitter hostility of the British government and the Foreign Office, which succeeded in driving him from office. Clemenceau was the principal agent in the operation. It was not the first time that British diplomacy had turned his chauvinism to account.

Colonel de la Rocque and the other leaders of the Croix de Feu are not, however, in favor of an immediate alliance with Germany, and no doubt their opinion is shared by the Comité des Forges. Their view is that the alliance will be possible only when they—that is, the French fascists—have come into power and have increased French armaments to such an extent that Germany will not have been able to catch up with France. France, it is thought, will then be in a position to make its own terms and to become the predominant partner in the alliance. This crazy illusion is a measure of their intelligence. Meanwhile, they insist on the danger of German rearmament and the necessity of strengthening French defenses. And, unfortunately, it is impossible to deny that necessity. In particular, it has become necessary completely to reequip the French air force, which, although formidable on paper, is as everybody knows far behind the German or the English air force in fact, for its material is old and out of date. Some people in France still advocate a limitation of armaments as a remedy, but their number is rapidly diminishing, for limitation would be a dupery without international control. How is it possible to exercise effective control in a country where, as we have now learned, the terrorist regime is so efficient that it has been possible secretly to create a huge air force—so secretly that foreign governments have been deceived? The only system of control that would have the least chance of being effective in Germany would be that of a permanent control commission on the spot with all the powers possessed by the allied military commission of control set up by the Treaty of Versailles, including that of entering any factory without notice. The German government would never accept such a system. Nor could it be asked to, unless the other governments were also willing to accept it. How many would be? Few of those who talk glibly about disarmament or limitation of armaments seem ever to have given a moment's thought to the conditions necessary to make it a reality.

The increased military expenditure into which France has been forced is one of the chief difficulties in the way of balancing the budget, and the budget deficit was the origin of the recent crisis. When Flandin formed his Cabinet, he made the mistake of accepting Germain-Martin, nominee of the Bank of France, as his Finance Minister. Germain-Martin insisted on the policy of the Bank of France and the financial interests generally—a policy of ruthless deflation. The budget was to be balanced solely by enormous cuts in expenditure, that is to say, mainly by reductions in the salaries of civil servants and the wages of government employees, in war pensions, and in social expenditures, notably the social-insurance system. Such reductions are indefensible, for the salaries of civil servants and the war pensions in France are already miserably low, but no other reductions on a large scale are possible. About two-thirds of the national expenditure, which amounts in round figures to forty-five billion francs, are absorbed by the cost of the army, navy, and air force and the service of the national debt. The former cannot be reduced in present circumstances and the latter is of course intangible. It is not even possible to suspend the sinking fund without an amendment of the constitution, for Poincaré made it the object of a constitutional law which assigned to it the revenue of the state tobacco monopoly. An amendment of the constitution involves convening the National Assembly at Versailles, which is a large order. In these circumstances Flandin proposed a policy which cannot be better described than in the following quotation from an able article by the Paris correspondent of the London Times, published in that paper on June 11:

> M. Flandin hoped to balance the budget not by drastic cuts but by the creation of economic conditions that would produce an increase of revenue or, at any rate, put a stop to its shrinking. The budget problem would not be acute until the autumn, when the next year's estimates must be produced. In the meantime the Government hoped to make their cheap-money policy effective, to remove at least some tariff barriers by negotiation, to reform industrial production, and, eventually, to make the reductions in direct taxation which have been so fruitful a feature of British policy. If M. Flandin had been able to apply his plans, they might have improved matters enough to wipe out a substantial part of the estimated deficit by the end of the financial year.

This constructive policy was bitterly opposed by the financial interests and the industrial interests represented by the Comité des Forges. Germain-Martin voiced their opposition in the Cabinet. The Bank of France refused to hear of credit facilities and blackmailed the government by refusing to discount Treasury bills. Flandin yielded and asked the Chamber for special powers to apply a policy of deflation. Germain-Martin resigned in the middle of the debate, and the Chamber quite rightly refused the free hand asked for by the government. Bouisson would probably have been given the special powers had not the Chamber been estranged by the attitude of Caillaux, the Finance Minister, and by the unwise speech made by Bouisson himself. Piétri formed a Cabinet that would have had a majority in the Chamber, but he was forced out by the Bank of France, because his policy was not sufficiently deflationist and he had not the courage to withstand the pressure of the bank.

The Bank of France will be disappointed with Laval if, as is reported, he is likely to abstain from salary cuts and is thinking of a suspension of the sinking fund, among other measures. That would make a saving of about 3,500,000,000 francs for the year, but the estimated budget deficit is about 6,500,000,000 francs, and it is difficult to see how the balance of it can be made up. The deficit of 4,500,000,000 francs on the railways is to be covered by a loan. The Treasury has to meet during the year payments falling due to the amount of 9,585,000,000 francs and will have a difficulty in meeting them unless the Bank of France is forced to discount Treasury bills. On the whole it seems likely that the devaluation of the French franc will become inevitable before the end of this year. Devaluation is inevitable in Switzerland and cannot be much longer delayed, for Switzerland is being ruined by the economic and monetary policy of the federal government. Devaluation of the Swiss franc would no doubt hasten devaluation in France.

By granting the Laval Cabinet the powers that had been refused to its predecessors the Chamber, as I have already said, capitulated to the financial interests. It was also no doubt intimidated by the fear of another anti-parliamentary agitation, which was being worked up by the newspapers controlled by those interests. Had the parties of the left been able to agree on a policy, it would have been a different matter, but in the circumstances the defeat of the Laval Cabinet would have led to parliamentary chaos. The logical solution would have been a dissolution of the Chamber and appointment of a provisional Cabinet with special powers until the general election, which in the case of a dissolution must be held within two months, but the consent of the Radical Party could not be obtained. The center and the right, which were talking so much about a dissolution some little time ago, are by no means eager for one now, for they fear, with reason, that a general election would result in a victory for the left.

One thing at any rate has been demonstrated—namely, the weakness of the fascist movement in France. The complete calm in Paris and throughout the country during the ministerial crisis showed how artificial the rising in Paris in February, 1934, was. The "leagues" could not have had a better opportunity of taking the action that they have so often threatened, but the Croix de Feu, instead of demonstrating in Paris, held a "test rally" at Cambrai. The bluff of the fascist organizations has been called and the Chamber is unlikely to be frightened by them in the future. Thus, although the Chamber yielded in the end, its resistance to the Flandin and Bouisson Cabinets has by no means been useless. That resistance has also called public attention to the dangerous power of what Herriot once called the "wall of gold"—the Bank of France and the financial interests generally. The lesson will not be lost, and, as I have said, this question will no doubt be one of the chief issues at the next general election, if it takes place in normal conditions. But the international situation is so threatening that nobody can foretell what it will be a year, or even a few months, hence.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Cal.

Correspondence

Sergei Trotzky

To the Editors of The Nation:

Our youngest son, Sergei, who chose to stay in Moscow when we were forced into exile, was arrested at the very beginning of this year. If at first one could hope that the arrest was accidental, that in a day or two he would be freed, it is clear now that the jailers have far more serious designs.

Sergei was born in 1908. In families whose elder members are absorbed by politics the younger ones are often repelled thereby. Such was also our case. Sergei never occupied himself with political questions; he was not even a member of the Communist Youth (Komsomol). In the university he concentrated on mathematics and mechanics. As an engineer he received a professorship in one of the higher technical schools. With two other colleagues he published recently a special work entitled "Light Gas Generators of Automobile-Tractor Type." The book was published by the Scientific Automobile-Tractor Institute and was warmly received by the most outstanding specialists in the field.

Sergei decided to remain in Moscow so as not to be torn away from his work, which from then on absorbed his whole being. The material conditions of his existence were very difficult but did not differ in this respect from the living conditions of the overwhelming majority of the unprivileged Soviet youth. In the six years of our present emigration Sergei continued his intense scientific and pedagogic work without any interference on the part of the authorities—until after the Kirov assassination, when he was arrested and our correspondence ceased.

I would be happy to think that under the influence of events my son became involved recently in opposition activity, because then Sergei could bear up much better under the blow that has been dealt him. But such a supposition must be considered absolutely out of the question. Sergei grew up in the Kremlin; Stalin's son was a frequent visitor in the boys' room; the GPU and the university authorities kept a redoubled watch over him first as a student, secondly as a young professor. He was arrested not for any sort of opposition activity but exclusively as the son of Trotzky.

It would be very simple to verify the facts stated in this letter. It would be sufficient, for instance, to establish an international committee consisting of authoritative and sincere individuals, of course well-established friends of the U. S. S. R. Such a committee would have to examine into all repressions in connection with the Kirov assassination; among other things it would throw the necessary light also on the case of our son Sergei. When the social revolutionaries, the organizers of attempts on the lives of Lenin and Trotzky, were being tried in 1922, the Central Committee under the leadership of Lenin and Trotzky afforded Vandervelde, Kurt Rosenfeld, and other adversaries of the Soviet government the right to participate in the trial as defenders of the accused terrorists. This was done precisely in order to dispel in the mind of the international proletariat any doubts as to the fairness of the trial. Could not Romain Rolland, André Gide, Bernard Shaw, and other friends of the Soviet Union assume the initiative to establish such a committee in agreement with the Soviet government? This would be the best method of checking on the accusations and the suspicions widely spread in the working masses. The Soviet bureaucracy cannot place itself above the public opinion of the international working class. As regards the interests of the workers' state, a serious verification of its actions could only serve to its advantage.

France, June 1 Nathalie L. Trotzky

The Bee Objects

To the Editors of The Nation:

In the issue of The Nation for May 22 appeared an editorial referring to the criminal-syndicalism case which stated that it was a reporter for the Sacramento Bee "who, during the Sacramento trial, slipped a note to Albert Goldman, Non-partisan Labor Defense attorney, apologizing in advance for the fact that the Bee would distort the report of his speech to the jury."

That statement is a rank falsehood. In the first place, the Bee did not publish any extended report of Goldman's speech to the jury. As you can see from the inclosed clippings from the Sacramento Bee of Tuesday, March 26, 1935, the Bee published but a four-paragraph summary of Goldman's address to the jury. We even blackfaced his attack on capitalism. It was a fair summary of what Goldman said, and the attorney himself made no complaint about it, indicating that the reporter who covered the trial had given a correct summary of his remarks.

Undoubtedly your statement that a Bee reporter slipped a note to Goldman advising him that his report of the speech would be distorted had reference to a story published in the Western Worker of March 7, 1935—a marked copy of which is inclosed—telling how Gilbert H. Parker, a former Sacramento newspaperman and publicity man for the Associated Farmers of California made certain statements to a reporter for the Western Worker relative to the trial being a frame-up.

In view of the very evident fact that the information on which you based your editorial attacking the Sacramento Bee was false, I think we are entitled to a correction in the columns of your magazine.

Sacramento, May 25 Walter P. Jones,
General Editorial Director,
McClatchy Newspapers

[The Nation editorial to which Mr. Jones refers was not based on any story published in the Western Worker (a paper, by the way, which is even less friendly to Mr. Goldman, a Socialist, than is the Sacramento Bee). In reply to Mr. Jones, we reiterate simply that it was a Bee reporter, not Gilbert Parker of the Associated Farmers, who slipped the apologetic note to Mr. Goldman regarding the probable treatment by the Bee of his closing address to the jury, and that this note was read by two other persons not directly connected with the case. Perhaps the reporter's apologetic tone was inspired by the Bee's handling of the criminal-syndicalism case during the previous four months. The story he turned in on this occasion—or at least the four paragraphs which the Bee devoted to the subject—was hardly up to the Bee's own passionate standard in reporting the trial. However, a copy-desk man repaired its weakness with the headline: "Defense Counsel of Reds Assails U. S. Government."—Editors The Nation.]

The R. P. P. A.

To the Editors of The Nation:

Benjamin Stolberg's article, The Socialist Party Today, which appeared in your issue of June 5, is marked by omissions so grievous that his entire interpretation of recent happenings in the Socialist Party is rendered null and void. Mr. Stolberg fails to mention the third and most alive group in the party, the Revolutionary Policy Committee, whose official title is now the Revolutionary Policy Publishing Association because it risked expulsion by calling itself a committee without sanction. The R. P. P. A. was formed at the Detroit convention in 1934 and issued an "Appeal to the Membership of the Socialist Party," calling upon our comrades to assume a Marxist position and take upon themselves the duties of revolutionary socialism. No one making an analysis of the present situation in our party can do justice to the topic without careful analysis of the R. P. P. A.'s position. And if Mr. Stolberg has never seen the "Appeal"—a fact which in itself would render him unfit to discuss the entire subject—he could easily have ascertained the position of the R. P. P. A. from the two issues of the Revolutionary Socialist Review which have appeared.

No just appraisal is made by Mr. Stolberg of the March meeting of the National Executive Committee; no mention is made of the expulsion of all the revolutionary Socialists in the Buffalo local, and of Jim Oneal's remarkable speech there, wherein the Communist Manifesto was discarded by the right wing because, as Comrade Oneal so gallantly put it, it belongs to the "romantic era of socialism." Apparently Comrade Oneal has not enough romance in his soul to be a Marxist.

The statement that the "militants" are youngsters flirting with communism is utter nonsense; even Norman Thomas knows better than that. They are neither young, nor Communists, nor are they militant either. The revolutionary Socialists in the party have been trying to get the militants to tell them what they are militant about, and the only answer seems to be "confusion."

Nor are the militants causing the right wing any trouble. The revolutionary Socialists are, and they are not "militants." They are the most vehement critics of the militants. On most issues it is very difficult for me personally to distinguish a militant from a right-winger, and by 1936 I predict that those militants who are not with the R. P. P. A. will be with the right wing. Confusion must go forward or backward, and it is much easier to slide than to labor. The real obstacle in the path of the left-wing Democrats masking as Marxists has come from the incompatibility of their reformist position and the Marxist position of the R. P. P. A. All sorts of reports are circulated by the right wing to the effect that the members of the R. P. P. A. are in the pay of Moscow or members of the Communist Party or Lovestonites. It has reached such a point that one cannot be a Marxist in the Socialist Party any more without the right wing crying "Moscow."

The revolutionary Socialists have unmercifully criticized the present leadership of the party for its reformist, class-collaborationist policies, and its undemocratic methods. Instead of taking a sophisticated stand outside the party, however, they are striving to bring it around to sound Marxist principles and back to the glory that is the heritage of 'Gene Debs.

Mr. Stolberg's snootiness alone is objectionable in this period of crisis in our party, when a turn to the left is still possible. It is downright malevolent when it is joined with ignorance of the present factional struggle.

New York, June 2 GEORGE SIMPSON

Alabama Terror

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In Alabama a new reign of terror is being conducted against union labor by police and extra-legal forces in the hire of heavy industry. In the share-cropping region south of Birmingham the cotton choppers are on strike for a dollar-a-day wages. They have been receiving thirty-five cents a day, top price. Twenty-one workers and share-croppers have been arrested, held in jail briefly, then turned out of jail at the point of a gun and handed over to landlord vigilantes to be beaten, burned, and dumped. Two of the victims were white men arrested while addressing a group of share-croppers in a private home. The rest were Negroes, who suffered the additional punishment of eviction from their homes. One of the Negro workers, W. J. Foster, sent from Birmingham to investigate the terror in the share-cropping area, has not been heard of since he was turned over to the vigilantes four weeks ago. There is every reason to believe he was murdered.

In the industrial city of Birmingham police and private detective agencies in the hire of heavy industry cooperate in an attempt to break up labor unions. Homes of workers are raided constantly. Wholesale arrests are made without warrants, and the victims are given ten months on the chain gang for "possessing literature advocating government overthrow." In addition, kidnappings and beatings are carried on by thugs cooperating with the police. Robert Wood, district secretary of the International Labor Defense, was kidnapped from a downtown street by four thugs, carried out into the country, brutally beaten, and threatened with death. He was told he was "too damned interested in local industry." A week later Blaine Owen, a member of the Communist Party, was treated in a like manner. Owen was pointed out to the thugs, who followed in another car, by a police car which flashed its light on him.

We ask all readers to send protests to Governor Bibb Graves, Montgomery, to Mayor Burns, Selma, Alabama, and to Commissioner W. O. Downs, Birmingham.

Birmingham, Ala., June 16 BETH MITCHELL

Jane Addams Memorial Fund

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The death of Jane Addams places a responsibility upon those who have appreciated her work in various fields to see that it is continued and increased. Especially is this true in the case of Hull House, which among her many interests was closest to her heart. The value of Hull House in American life as a pioneer among social settlements and an example of the way in which association among members of different groups and races can be made serviceable to all is unquestioned. To thousands of individuals of the neighborhood, through the schools of music, painting, ceramics, drama, and dancing, as well as classes in more formal education, through social clubs, the gymnasium, the summer outings, Hull House has been a source of immediate relief from depressing conditions, and of encouragement and aid in fulfilling aspirations for the future. To thousands of residents for longer or shorter periods, Miss Addams's home has been an initiation into sympathetic and helpful relations with the less privileged. Moreover, Hull House has been a social laboratory where experiments of benefit to the whole country have been conducted. Hull House was a pioneer in juvenile research, from which came the Juvenile Court, in the establishment of playgrounds, in the protection of aliens.

To continue the house in its spirit of present usefulness and future progress, the trustees, upon the advice of many friends, have established the Jane Addams Memorial Fund. During her life Miss Addams obtained from friends or gave from her own resources about $30,000 a year, one-third of the annual budget of the house. It is hoped that a sum can be raised the income of which will replace Miss Addams's financial contribution to the work she founded and loved. The Jane Addams Memorial Fund offers an opportunity to all who loved her to show their appreciation of what she meant to her city, her country, and the world. Subscriptions may be sent to Louise De Koven Bowen, Treasurer, 800 South Halsted Street, Chicago.

New York, June 25 ROBERT MORSS LOVETT

Labor and Industry

After Its Fashion

By HEYWOOD BROUN

SOONER or later this article will get around to "the freedom of the press" and endeavor to point out that this ideal is very much less than a cure-all for the cause of labor. But first of all I should like to have you share with me a few extracts from the Binghamton Sun of June 21. The Sun, whose code is "fairness, decency, accuracy," had room for little but local news because of one event. The chronicle of the epoch-making event began on the first page as follows:

> Never in better form or more convincing in his sincere appeal to the intelligence and the hearts of his fellow-workers, George F. Johnson responded yesterday to their request to visit each unit of the giant industrial democracy he has created. Beginning a long-delayed "loyalty tour" of the industry in company with his brother, C. Fred Johnson and the younger executives, President George W. Johnson and General Manager Charles F. Johnson, he delivered a series of eleven heart-to-heart talks at the plants in Binghamton and Johnson City.

To a casual reader this seemed a little like too much Johnson. It seemed extraordinary that one family should be so firmly intrenched in all the executive posts of a "giant industrial democracy." But on reading a little farther into the four or five pages devoted to the wise and witty sayings of good old "George F." I found that it was not an industrial democracy at all but the Endicott-Johnson Shoe Company. I was still curious to learn just what it was which moved George F. to make so many speeches and pour forth sincerity without stint. I found that his chief concern was with malcontents and "reds." In fact, he "flayed" them. Accordingly I remained in a little doubt as to the accuracy of the Binghamton Sun in stating that George F. made his heart-to-heart appeals solely because of the invitation of his "fellow-workers." I think it only fair to surmise that part of the idea was his very own. Mr. Johnson, as I gathered from reading a large part of his eleven speeches, is not exactly prodigal of ideas. He believes in loyalty and he said so a good many times in the course of his addresses. I had hoped to find some little help from a big four-column box on page 11 of the Binghamton Sun; I refer to "Straight from the Shoulder—Pointed Paragraphs Picked from George F.'s Series of Talks to His Fellow-Workers Yesterday."

The first quotation from the master which my eye encountered was: "There are people—too many, I am afraid —who don't like this American form of government. God knows where they came from or why they are here. I ask them, 'Why don't you go back where you came from?' "

"You would, you intellectual giant," I said to myself, and proceeded to dig deeper into the speeches which a squire of industry makes to the tenants on a tour of the estate.

"It is not important how much you earn today or next week," said good old George F. "It is how much you earn this year that is altogether important." Pie has been brought down from the sky and placed just around the corner.

It seemed to me that C. Fred Johnson spilled the beans a little. When called upon for a speech he made "one of his characteristic brief statements." To be sure C. Fred is an old-timer and has to be humored. But I still insist that the note he introduced was unfortunate. "I go when and where I please," declared C. Fred, "and come back when I'm good and ready. I hope you're as lucky."

Still perhaps a little touch of levity was needed. Even George F. unbent on occasion. The Binghamton Sun tells us, "There was humor, too. To one pretty girl Mr. Johnson gave the following piece of advice: 'If you'll be good, you'll be happy, but you'll miss a lot of fun.' "

"And the crowd roared," adds the Sun. I'll just bet it did. Mr. Johnson's joke (no offense, George F.) is ancient and feeble, but when the boss goes gay none but an alien and un-American agitator would refuse him his audience reaction. It was at the Scout Factory, as I remember, that the chief speaker hit upon one of his snappy ideas. "If you workers like our American ideals of government and our Industrial Democracy don't let these people come over here and tell you how much better it is somewhere else. Ask them, 'What in hell are you here for?' It's a fair question."

But no one should get the idea that George F. did not have any remedy to meet the needs of his fellow-workers. Much of his talk was wholly constructive. I particularly liked his, "If anybody knows how to say 'Hello' to the boys, I should be the one."

Still even that might elicit a question which would not be altogether unfair. Suppose somebody asked, "So what?"

By now, I hope, some little light has been thrown on the manner in which labor news is often handled in the smaller cities. When a plant is the town itself, there is little chance of getting dispassionate or detached news treatment. And certainly the relief does not lie merely in insisting on the maintenance of a free press. I am, of course, asking for a precise and literal use of the phrase. The famous constitutional guaranty contained in the First Amendment does not by any means promise each American citizen the right to get the news without bias or suppression. It merely says that a publisher shall not be impeded by direct or indirect censorship which is not of his own choosing. The man who suppresses facts in his paper or distorts them for his own interest performs an anti-social service. But I think it is stretching words beyond their natural meaning to argue that he is violating the freedom of the press. Mr. Hearst is all that Mr. Hearst is, and yet under the usual and reasonable definition of "free press" he has a right to continue in that benighted state. At least any attempt to alter it by statute would be in violation of the First Amendment.

In other words, the frequent statement that a free press is the certain bulwark of our liberties is not wholly true. One Hearst is bad enough, but suppose there were a hundred. Each might proceed according to his rights to publish what he pleased and suppress the rest. That would not make for liberty for the rest of us. As a matter of fact the situation under which we live is not a thousand miles away from that nightmare condition. Surely no one is naive enough to believe that any vast amount of newspaper enterprise is devoted to the attempt to give labor news accurate coverage even in crisis? And so perhaps the greatest joke is the eyebrow-lifting of the publisher who regards some small leaflet or publication with disdain and says, "Why this isn't news—it's propaganda." To put it bluntly, if labor wants to get a press which is fair to labor it will first have to organize its own newspapers. Our present press is free to do as it pleases, and it pleases to be always on the side which carries the heaviest butter.

The Nation Index of Labor Welfare

A FURTHER slight decline in working-class living standards is indicated by the preliminary figures of The Nation Index of Labor Welfare for May, the last month in which NRA codes were legally in effect. Owing to a continuation of the mild business recession which started in March, employment and payrolls fell off noticeably in both manufacturing and non-manufacturing industries. The average weekly wage for all industrial workers, including those employed in the retail and wholesale trades, transportation, and mining, as well as in factories, declined from a peak of $21.66 in March to $21.47 for May, a drop of 0.9 per cent. The last month's decline was offset by a slight decrease in the cost of living—the first for many months—leaving real wages unchanged from the revised April figures at 99 per cent of the 1932 average. The rise in unemployment, however, more than counterbalanced the reduction in relief rolls, causing a 0.2 per cent net decline in the Index of Labor Welfare.

Compared with May, 1934, the picture is somewhat more unfavorable. Although weekly wages have risen approximately 3 per cent during the year, the cost of living has gone up 5 per cent. Unemployment has increased by over 500,000, and the number on relief rolls by nearly 2,000,000, leaving The Nation Index 3.2 per cent below the level of twelve months ago. The preliminary indices for May as compared with the revised figures for the previous month and for May of a year ago are as follows:

(1932=100)

	May 1935	April 1935	May 1934
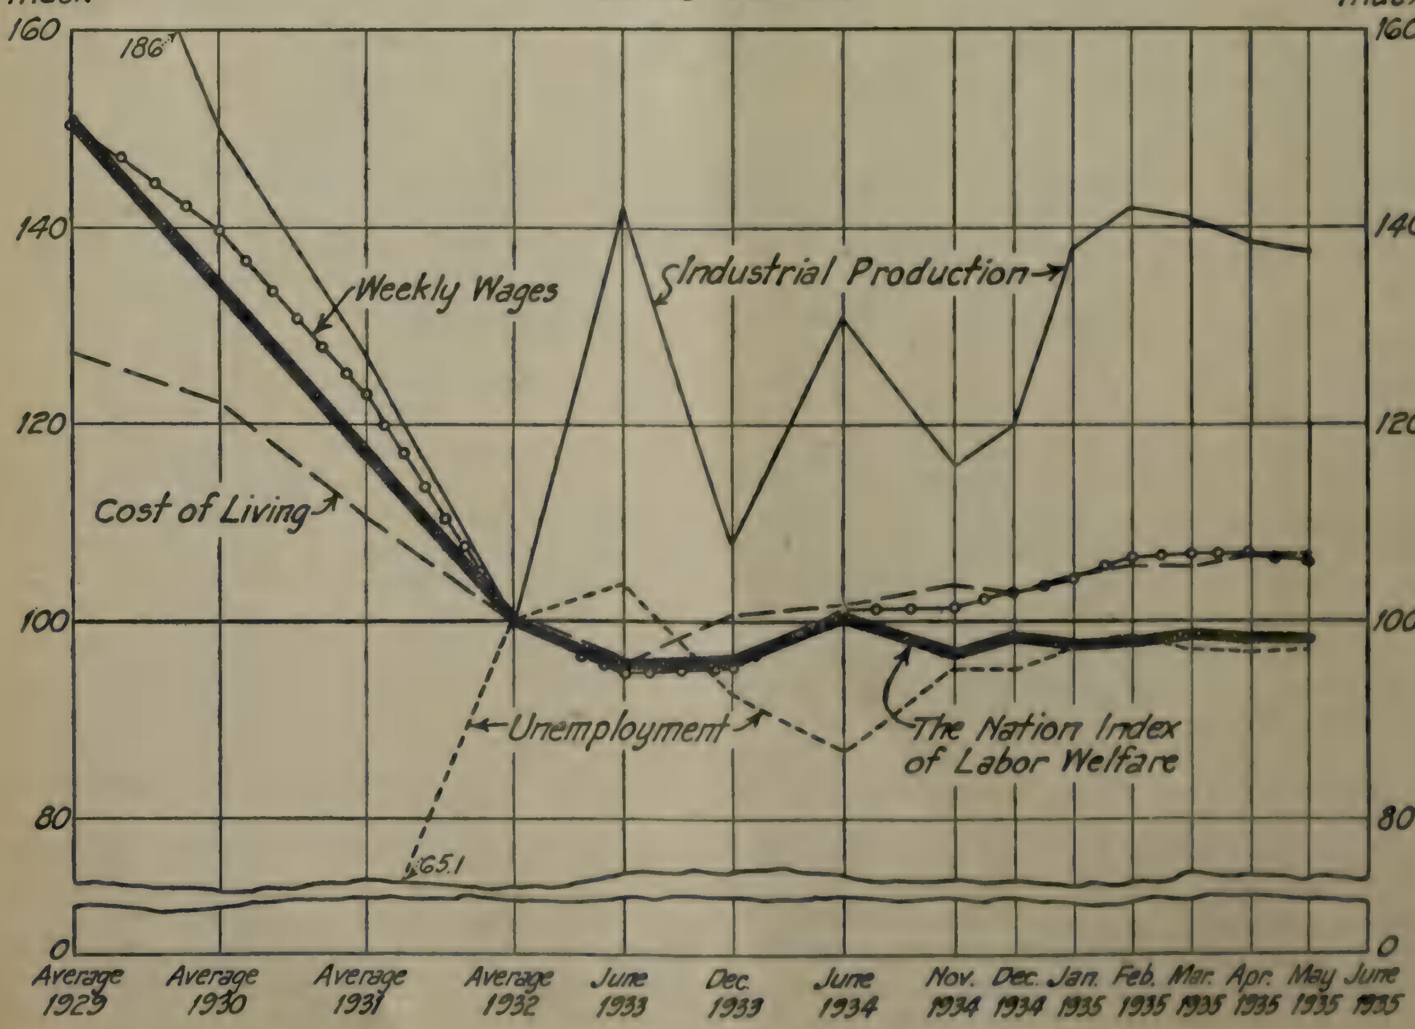
Industrial Production	138*	139†	139
Average Weekly Wages	105*	106†	102
Cost of Living	106	107	101
Real Wages	99*	99†	101
Index of Labor Welfare	97.8*	98†	101

* Preliminary. † Revised.

THE CHART OF LABOR WELFARE
(Average 1932=100)



The Need for Federal Labor Laws

By ELINORE MOREHOUSE HERRICK

THE abrupt termination of the NRA by the Supreme Court will soon test the soundness of industry's insistent claim, "Let us alone! Cut out the codes! Industry can and will govern itself." When the NRA was established in 1933, industry had shown very clearly its incapacity for self-government. Wages had been disastrously reduced and the markets for goods thereby destroyed. It is pertinent now to look back over the record of the first years of the depression to see what progress has been made in raising wages and in spreading and stabilizing employment.

That many people had to depend upon charity to make up the difference between depression wages and what it costs to keep alive was shown in a study entitled "Cut-Rate Wages," published by the Consumers' League of New York in February, 1933. This study, made from analyses of case records of a hundred social agencies in New York, revealed that in 1932 in the richest city in the world women were being paid 12½ cents for making a dress, while the "finisher" of that dress was receiving from 3 cents to 15½ cents. One woman received 21 cents for putting linings in seventy-two pairs of slippers at the rate of one slipper every forty-five seconds. Wages of $4 a week for unlimited hours recurred frequently in this survey. The result in social costs is told in the reports of these agencies—sanitarium care recommended for two months, room rent subsidized, children placed in boarding homes at taxpayers' expense. Report after report showed despondency, undernourishment, and inadequate clothing as typical of these victims of a selfish and ruthless industrial system. Charity took the place of an adequate living wage.

The NRA raised bottom wages all over the country. In strike after strike handled by the Regional Labor Board of New York, wage-earners testified, "I was getting $6 before the NRA—now I am getting $12," or whatever the minimum in the governing code prescribed. It is true, of course, that some chiseling employers continued to pay lower wages than the code minimum. It is also true that in many cases the wages of the more skilled workers were reduced to make up for the increases in minimum wages. Despite all this, the NRA effected a general improvement in the wage level, particularly for the least skilled.

The codes too often fixed unconscionably low standards and were so loosely framed that it was easy to evade both wage and hour requirements. But countless industries that had never before tried to maintain uniformity of labor standards did make such an effort through the code structure. Whether the beneficial results of coded cooperation within the ranks of industry can be preserved remains to be seen. But perhaps an examination of past experiences will prove enlightening.

There were many attempts to work out cooperative agreements prior to the adoption of the NRA. Two such attempts, with which I am personally familiar, were made in New York State. For approximately five years the Consumers' League maintained a White List of candy manufacturers, a central point of which was a minimum wage of $14 for a full week's work. This experiment broke down in 1932 because there was no way to keep in line employers who would not agree to the White List standards. Wage-cutting competitors could not be controlled even by the boycott effect of the league's White List. The league finally relinquished this method in fairness to the employers who were still making a real effort to meet the modest requirements of a $14 minimum wage and a forty-eight-hour work week. In other words, consumer pressure could not be mobilized in sufficient volume to support the more enlightened employers. People persisted in buying lower-priced candy even though it was made by sweatshop labor.

In 1932 a new cannery code was adopted in New York State after its terms had been worked out jointly by the State Department of Labor and the canners themselves during a series of conferences and surveys conducted over a three-year period. The code, after approval by the Industrial Board, became, in effect, a new law to govern practice in the canning industry. Since the new regulations had received the official indorsement of the Canners' Association, it seemed reasonable to assume that the industry was ready genuinely to modify its methods in accordance with the requirements of its own code, although the state had for twenty years found it virtually impossible to enforce the various labor laws existing on the statute books for canneries.

I made a twelve weeks' survey at the height of the canning season in 1932, visiting fifty-four representative plants, approximately one-third of the total number operating that season. I found only four employers who had made a real effort to comply with the code; three others had made some effort. With these few exceptions, the industry as a whole had practically ignored the agreement. Even in a summer of bountifully available local labor on account of unemployment, hardly any effort was made to recruit labor to reduce the hours of work to even the legal maximum. Wages ranged from 8 cents to 22 cents an hour for women and from 10 cents to 27½ cents for men. One canner frankly admitted having forced his help in 1931 to work illegal overtime until midnight and later during the weeks of the tomato season, and he boasted, "We will do it again under similar circumstances." His plant was located in a township where the public-welfare organization informed us that 3,000 people, approximately one-third of the population, were receiving relief. In one of the smaller cities a plant hired less than one-fifth of the usual number employed the previous year. With trained workers unemployed and eager to work, this plant found it "easier and cheaper to use overtime than to recruit more workers." The majority of the independent canners explained their low wages by saying that they had to meet the competition of a large concern operating many plants in which there were uniform rates of 12½ cents for women and 17½ cents for men.

I dwell at length on the canning industry because of its anti-social practices and its long-time stubborn resistance to the introduction of humanitarian standards by compulsion or otherwise. It was an effort to improve labor conditions in New York canneries which gained for Al Smith, then an assemblyman, his first favorable publicity. As long ago as 1915, in urging a law forbidding Sunday work in canneries, Al won his point by saying, "When I learned the Commandments, they said, 'Remember thou keep holy the Sabbath day.' There was nothing about 'except in canneries.'" Notwithstanding all that has been done in the past twenty years to humanize working conditions by legislative enactment and by "voluntary cooperation," the canning industry remains near the bottom of the list with respect to wages and the length of the work week.

It is this industry which furnishes also the best illustration of the failure of the courts to enforce labor standards. Some years ago a canner pleaded guilty to violation of the child labor law, but the local justice found him "not guilty."

For a period of several years the Consumers' League studied the records of the Magistrates Courts in New York City. We found a high percentage of suspended sentences given even for repeated violations of state labor laws. When, however, committees from various organizations visited the courts and made known their presence and their interest to the judge, we found that fines replaced the suspended sentences. As soon as the vigilance was relaxed, the suspended sentences returned.

Lack of pressure from the public for proper working standards is seen in a more important and widespread phase. Surveys conducted by various state departments of labor between 1929 and 1932 revealed numberless instances where chambers of commerce offered inducements of free rent, cheap labor, free water, and similar subsidies to employers if they would remove to their towns. Too frequently these firms would move on again after a short time leaving nothing behind them in the community. Often such firms moved out in the night without paying their employees at all. Have chambers of commerce realized their pre-NRA folly? No.

Since January, 1935, I have seen advertisements and published statements of local chambers of commerce offering the same old inducements to attract "new business." These offers come from all over the country—New England, Alabama, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. The majority of the "run-away" employer cases handled by the Regional Labor Board have been concerned with removals from New York to New Jersey, where the labor laws are less stringent and labor less well organized. In every case the employer has cited as his reason for moving the desire to get cheap labor and cheap rent.

What is the result to the community which offers asylum to these "runaway" employers? Relief rolls tell the story. While it is argued that it should make no difference that people in one community are put on relief as long as people in the new community are taken off relief, there is a real distinction. So long as the federal government is contributing to relief, we can ill afford to have self-supporting workers in one community put on relief so that other persons may be employed in remote communities, too often at a wage so low as to require some public subsidy. The costs of relief are borne ultimately by every citizen in the country. It is therefore an essentially "penny wise but pound foolish" policy for chambers of commerce to invite manufacturers into the community simply because the presence of a large group of unemployed has created a low wage level.

Suppose we leave the problem of industrial standards to the several states? What happens then? We know that interest in and machinery for enforcement differs greatly from state to state and area to area. During five years in the South, where I was production manager for a large textile mill, I never once saw a state factory inspector, although there was a Department of Labor and there were laws governing working conditions. In New York State, on the other hand, where the Department of Labor is highly organized and has been developed over a period of years, such a situation would never occur. At least once a year every industrial establishment in the state is inspected. In New Jersey a minimum-wage law was enacted in 1933. Yet because no appropriation for it has been passed, the state has not yet put the law in operation. These inequalities exist everywhere throughout the country. Wisconsin has long-established wage and hour regulations, while Illinois still has a seventy-hour work week on the statute books.

For the time being we seem to be stalemated as far as federal regulation of these matters goes, despite the widespread realization that state action is inadequate. The forces of public opinion may help in certain situations, but cannot be relied upon to effect the consistent reforms needed. We cannot reasonably expect voluntary adherence to improved labor standards when even compliance with the labor provisions of the NRA codes could not be enforced.

The most successful policing of NRA codes was carried on by organized labor. Labor organizations fought the decent employers' battle by forcing the undercutters to observe code provisions, or by forcing such employers out of business. No matter what governmental controls are established, organization of workers will remain the most effective means of securing decent standards.

Contributors to This Issue

Morris R. Cohen, professor of philosophy at the College of the City of New York, is author of "Law and the Social Order."

Louis B. Boudin, well-known lawyer and member of the United States Supreme Court bar, is the author of "Government by Judiciary," "Is Economic Planning Constitutional?" and other essays and articles.

Osmond K. Fraenkel was retained by the I. L. D., with Walter H. Pollak, to prepare the briefs and argue the appeal of the Scottsboro case in the Supreme Court. He edited "The Curse of Bigness," a collection of miscellaneous papers by Justice Brandeis.

Robert Dell is the Geneva correspondent of the Manchester Guardian.

Elinore Morehouse Herrick is New York Regional Director for the National Labor Relations Board.

Grace Adams is the author of "Psychology: Science or Superstition" and "Your Child Is Normal."

Benjamin Haggott Beckhart is associate professor of banking at Columbia University.

Lionel Trilling is a member of the English Department at Columbia.

E. Franklin Frazier is professor of sociology at Howard University and author of "The Negro Family in Chicago."

Benjamin Rowland, Jr., is a member of the Oriental Department of the Fogg Museum in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Books and Films

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Little Ode

By VIRGINIA MOORE

Therefore praise the candlestick
On whose sturdy tallow wick
Burns the brave dispeller of Fear, the enemy of love;
Burns the finder, at small cost,
Of the misplaced and the lost;
Burns the soother of those fate
Sent to bed at half-past eight;
Burns a third sagacious eye
For the young man ignorant why;
For the woman, bound by ring,
In her wrapper, listening;
Burns the witness, when they wed;
Burns the bondsman of the dead;
Burns the cheerful, long-ignored
Understudy of the Lord
Who in cycles of dense night
Said to all, "Let there be light";
Burns the golden, constant guard
Of the howling, evil-starred,
Cold and hungry, pampered not,
Scared ones that the darkness got.
It has burned a hundred years.
(Goodness always perseveres.)
Polish hard the cup and base
Till they print an admiring face.

The Psychology of Koffka

Principles of Gestalt Psychology. By Kurt Koffka. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $6.

IN the province of scientific psychology the relationship between German professors and American students has been strong and peculiar. Fifty years ago when bright young Americans, enthusiastic over the biological theories of Darwin and Huxley, wanted to apply those same concrete, mechanistic methods to the more elusive processes of the human mind, they went to Leipzig and learned from Wilhelm Wundt how to analyze their perceptions into myriads of discrete sensations. Today when so many other bright young Americans have become disheartened over the barren austerity of the sense-psychology advocated by Wundt and Mach and Avenarius, they have looked to Kurt Koffka, a German expatriate now living in America, to teach them a newer and more idealistic conception of the human mind.

It is well for those young philosophers, as it is for the rest of us, that during the seven years in which he has been a professor at Smith College Koffka has learned English so well that he can now express himself fluently in it. Recently it has seemed that the whole Gestalt theory was in danger of being permanently befogged by that strange technical terminology that in America always clings to any discussion of sense perceptions.

To the students of Wundt, and to all their academic progeny, it was of supreme importance to maintain forever and against all comers, whether they called themselves gestaltists, behaviorists, or psychoanalysts, that the one fundamental fact of all mental life was the sensation—and that all other phases of human living, no matter how intricately intellectual or how disconcertingly emotional they might seem to be, could some day, by careful and serious introspection, be reduced to such meaningless psychic elements as colors and tastes and sounds and smells. And when these Wundtians read of the simple experiment by which Wertheimer had proved that even such expert psychologists as Koffka and Koehler could not analyze the elementary perception of a black line falling against a white background into its component sensory elements, they knew at once that the very fundamentals of their hard-fought-for science were being threatened.

For most of the rest of us, who think of college seminars and university laboratories, along with junior proms and fraternity initiations, as pleasant but rather vague items of our youth, it is difficult to realize how important this experiment of Wertheimer's and the interpretation which he and Koffka and Koehler chose to put upon it could be. And the Wundtians, who happened to be the only Americans competent to translate the original German presentations of the theory, did not help us much in our understanding. Even to the simple word Gestalt, for which there was no exact English equivalent, they assigned such technical synonyms as "form" and "configuration."

In his new book Koffka uses "gestalt" as a simple English word, without either the italics or the capital G, as though anyone should know its meaning. But when, without defining it precisely, he begins to elucidate its meaning he uses such large and grandiose words as integration, organization, value, meaning, force, and stress—words which today are spoken more easily by philosophers and theoretical physicists than by most empirical psychologists. Thus we realize, as many of us had suspected before, that in his exposition of the gestalt theory Koffka is intent upon blasting not only the concept of discrete sensations and the technique of modern psychology but the assumptions of that static physical science upon which Wundt and Mach and Avenarius so consciously and so conscientiously modeled their infant discipline. He is crying out, almost screaming, if such a cultured voice as his can scream, against all those nineteenth-century empiricists whose only creed was, "Find facts, facts, facts, and again facts; when you are sure of your facts build theories. But your facts are more important"; and who by virtue of this persistent fact-finding reduced all human knowledge, and along with it most of human life, to an aggregate of "unintelligible, irrational, meaningless events." Boldly Koffka maintains that there are no facts that can be completely dissociated from the theories that prompted their discovery. Humbly he asks: "Must we pay for science by a disintegration of our life? Must we deny on week days what we profess on Sundays?"

These are strange questions to come from one who contends so staunchly that he is above everything else a scientist; and Koffka knows it. And because he knows it, and because he knows just as well all the limitations that science puts upon her devotees, he disarms us of any fair means of criticizing him. He forces us to agree with him that "the truth of the gestalt principle will have to be tested by the course that science takes in the future."

Yet since it was necessary to introduce the names of Wundt and Mach and Avenarius in the beginning of this review, to show Koffka against his proper background, it is just as essential to bring them into its ending—and to point out that for all his courageous attack upon them Koffka seems to fail in the same way that they did. His theory and the logical beauty with which he works it out cannot fail to impress anyone who has the patience and the pertinacity to read with all his attentive intelligence the more than six hundred words of its exposition. And yet, despite all its logic, its beauty, and its cloistered "realism," it does not, any better than those older theories which it strives so valiantly to annihilate, explain that befuddled, harassed, illogical, and not always beautiful phenomenon that we know as mortal man.

Grace Adams

Irving Fisher's Plan

100% Money. By Irving Fisher. The Adelphi Company. $2.50.

ONE must commend the moderation of the publisher's claim for Irving Fisher's most recent work. The jacket blurb states that the 100 per cent plan is designed "to eliminate runs on commercial banks; largely to cure or prevent depressions; and to wipe out much of the national debt."

Though not new, the so-called 100 per cent reserve idea has found many adherents since the depression. As the academic reviver of this scheme, Professor Soddy of Oxford University should perhaps be given credit. But one must not forget the earlier contribution of William Jennings Bryan, who became convinced that national banks should be compelled to raise their reserve requirements from the then existing 15-25 per cent to 100 per cent. Otherwise, he stated, they made a quadruple profit as contrasted with the meager double profit they were alleged to derive from their note-issue privilege.

The premise underlying Professor Fisher's proposal is that cyclical fluctuations mirror the dance of the dollar. In its price gyrations the dollar keeps step with the twistings and contortions of bank loans and investments and hence of bank deposits. With the present 10 per cent reserve plan banks multiply their loans and investments when reserves are increased. Thus deposits or "money" are created and inflation is induced, a process which goes on as merrily as a wedding bell until some event reverses it, when loans and investments are reduced and purchasing power is "extracted" from the community.

Stabilize the dance: prices will not change, business cycles will be largely eliminated, and capitalism saved. Years ago Professor Fisher was convinced that the compensated gold dollar would stabilize prices. At present this constitutes but one leg of his stabilization triangle. The other two are the 100 per cent reserve plan and the scrip-stamp idea of Silvio Gesell.

To preserve capitalism one need only discard the 10 per cent and adopt the 100 per cent reserve. Instead of holding on the average a 10 per cent reserve with the Federal Reserve banks against deposit liabilities, banks would, after the institution of the plan, have to hold a 100 per cent reserve against all checking accounts with a currency commission. Commercial banks would thus become warehouses for demand deposits, thereby reverting to the technique followed in its early years by the Bank of Amsterdam. In Professor Fisher's opinion banks could no longer create purchasing power of their own volition. Only the Currency Commission could do this, and Professor Fisher suggests that its policy be such as to stabilize a cost-of-living index. In a growing economy the stabilization of prices would require the continuous injection of additional doses of purchasing power. This the Currency Commission would do through purchases of the public debt. Hence the public debt would be reduced, taxes might finally be abolished, and eventually a social dividend might be declared.

Interested always in monetary problems, Professor Fisher thinks of commercial banks as little mints, busily engaged in the creation and in the extraction of purchasing power. Little emphasis is laid on the economic functions of credit or of commercial banking. To him the quality of bank assets is of minor significance. Book credit is not considered. All-important is the liability side of the bank statement, bank deposits, which he relates as a causative factor to price fluctuations.

Stable prices are to Professor Fisher a criterion of a healthy underlying economic situation. The years from 1922 to 1929, when wholesale prices were relatively stable, represented in his opinion such a period. He gives credit for the stability of prices then to the policies of the late Governor Strong of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. Had Strong lived, the depression, according to Professor Fisher, would have been prevented "almost altogether." Not having a genius of the stature of Governor Strong to guide our banking system, we must fall back upon mechanistic controls such as the 100 per cent reserve plan.

In his analysis of cyclical fluctuations Professor Fisher gives little attention to the particular uses made of increases in the volume of credit, to the growing rigidity of our economic system, to governmental intervention in the control of prices and in the prevention of liquidation, to the varying rates of growth among industries, to price disparities, to the tendencies toward autarchies and trade barriers, or to a host of other factors. In disturbing the equilibrium between savings and investments and in causing lending rates of interest to deviate from the "natural" rate of interest, credit inflation, as Professor Fisher carefully points out, is certainly one factor, and an important one, in cyclical fluctuations. However, it is not the only factor, and the remedy which Professor Fisher suggests would not effect a cure. More likely it would lead to what one might call a zero per cent reserve plan, under which bank deposits would be covered solely by the public debt. This would be in accord with the doctrine frequently ascribed to John Law, one of the first to suggest the elimination of the public debt through banking manipulation.

Benjamin Haggott Beckhart

History of Heroism

Byron: Romantic Paradox. By William J. Calvert. University of North Carolina Press. $2.50.

THE reader "who stops at his dramatic preludings," said Matthew Arnold of Byron, "does not know him." But most readers stop just there: Byron is Childe Harold and the Childe is a callow, self-pitying ranter. It is, no doubt, this mistaken notion that has made Byron's works the least bought of the popular Cambridge editions of the poets. Few, though these few have been of the best, have seen beneath the crudeness and the frequent vulgarity to the fineness, the intelligence, the craggy seriousness, the modern relevance. Of late, however, the feeling has happily begun to spread that Byron is not for adolescents but for the most adult, that his life is not a fatuous spectacle of misadventures but an instructive history of heroism. To this juster ascendant view Mr. Calvert's study adds materially.

Mr. Calvert calls Byron the most complex of the three great later romantics. By this he means, I take it, not that Byron was more subtle or fine-drawn than Shelley and Keats, but that he was in constant conflict within himself; that where Shelley and Keats suffered most from the resistance of the world to their natures, Byron suffered most from the contradictions of a paradoxical temperament. Within him a pagan sensuality coexisted with a Calvinist morality, and if, as Mr. Calvert suggests, his Presbyterian heritage had not caused him to attach so much guilty importance to his sensuality, a society no less sensual would simply have taken it for granted. In him Voltairean rationalism existed together with a deep love of the past and its faiths. A lack of social ease went with his arrogance; with his lonely pride went dependence on public good-will. The list of paradoxes could be extended; one is never sure on which of two opposite and irreconcilable sides his temperament lay, for it lay on both.

The crux of this paradoxical nature Mr. Calvert finds in the great romantic's defense of Pope and neo-classicism. This has often been interpreted as mere perversity. But actually it was a manifestation of something very important in Byron. As everyone says, the eighteenth century was preeminently characterized by its search for common sense, and the phrase is usually taken to mean something contradistinguishable from the poetic and the aspiring, and, by inference, as something low and even cynical. But the search for common sense had its own aspiration: the "common" is the "general" sense as opposed to the sense of the mere individual. The dominant literary theory of the eighteenth century, it is often said, was dictatorial, but it was a "dictatorship" based on a "democratic" ideal. Common sense implied a reference not so much to an abstract truth or even to fact as to the agreement of all qualified men. By extension it implied that this agreement could be reached by a curtailment and subordination of the mere individual's observation and feeling. And Byron, bearing the heavy burden of self, was looking for points of reference beyond individuality. He found it in Pope's school as, later, he found it in the Greek dramatic form.

Byron, the very type of rampant individualism, had the paradoxical but perhaps inevitable drive toward the social whole, and it was by the conflict of these two parts of his nature that he advanced to maturity. The Greek adventure was the last of many attempts to involve himself in the more decent aspects of the social world. The "dramatic preludings" have obscured the fact that when, even as early as "Childe Harold," Byron bore through Europe "the pageant of his bleeding heart," he was trying to understand that heart in the light of Europe and its history. The type of his solitary, savage heroes has reference not to the personal will but to the social will in its European corruption.

It is with this aspect of Byron—perhaps the basic one—that one could wish Mr. Calvert's excellent book had dealt in greater detail. For the understanding of Byron rests, I would submit, upon the realization that he was among those great Europeans of his time—Goethe, Stendhal, Heine—whose distinction lies in their study of European society and what it did to man.

LIONEL TRILLING

Good Will, Bad Science

Race Relations. Adjustment of Whites and Negroes in the United States. By Willis D. Weatherford and Charles S. Johnson. D. C. Heath and Company. $3.20.

Life on the Negro Frontier. By George R. Arthur. Association Press. $2.

MOST of the literature on the Negro in America derives its value chiefly from the fact that it reflects the attitudes and opinions of whites and Negroes concerning various phases of race relations at different stages of accommodation between the two races. Even so-called scientific studies of the race problem are not free from the bias of the various "schools" of opinion on race relations. Of late there has grown up a "school" which prides itself upon its objectivity in the study of race problems. The objectivity of this "school" consists mainly in its claim that it "lets the facts speak for themselves." But upon examination of such studies it generally turns out, first, that the "facts" which are supposed to speak for themselves are nothing more than meaningless arrays of statistics and historical data which—lest one be guilty of bias—have not been analyzed in terms of significant social or economic relationships; and, second, that these so-called factual data are presented in "an atmosphere of optimism and good-will." Although the first of these books is a recent addition to a supposedly scientific series of textbooks on sociology, it is mainly a reflection of the philosophy of race adjustment of the two authors, who conform strictly to the above-mentioned requirements of "objective" studies of Negro problems. Even an enthusiastic Southern reviewer in the Nashville (Tennessee) Banner admits as much when, after praising the "dispassionate" attitudes of the authors, he states that the "most valuable contribution" of this book is "the atmosphere of determined good-will which is evident on every page."

The book by Weatherford and Johnson is supposed to be a unique achievement in "interracial cooperation" because a white and a Negro scholar "cooperated" in an intellectual task. But there is a certain irony in such a claim, for when one reads the book one finds that each of these two "leaders in the attempt to work out a basis for intelligent and mutually tolerant" race relations has written his chapters as if he had no knowledge of what the other had written but aimed only at saying nothing that would offend the feelings of the other. Consequently, the book is entirely lacking in organization, is full of repetitions, and constantly shifts its point of view. Without adding anything to existing knowledge concerning the race problem, the authors have, on the whole, strung together in anecdotal fashion bits of historical and anthropological information and marshaled statistical data in order to "analyze and discuss factually and candidly the various aspects of the problem of race relations." But all of this had to be done according to the canons of "orthodox" research. As a result we have the Negro author using much labored learning to express the most obvious trivialities, while the white collaborator speaks sentimentally about the Negro and treads softly where fundamental issues are concerned. For example, Weatherford tells us that amalgamation cannot solve the race problem because we do not know enough about the effects of race-crossing! Perhaps when the thousands of mulattoes who have solved their problem by passing into the white race read this, they will return immediately to their colored brethren to await the outcome of research. Moreover, there are certain conspicuous omissions in the book which are undoubtedly due to the "orthodox" character of this work. Imagine, for example, discussing the economic problems of the Negro without referring to Spero and Harris's fundamental study, "The Black Worker," except in a footnote reference to a single sentence, while the reader is referred to the Negro Year Book "for full discussion of the present union situation."

It may be necessary to present for consumption in the South "facts" concerning race relations in "an atmosphere of determined good-will," but books of this type have no place among scientific studies. Such a book as Bond's brilliant and thorough study, "The Education of the Negro in the American Social Order," may not be palatable to the South, but it represents the true meaning of objectivity in social research. Moreover, if we are going to have intellectual cooperation between whites and Negroes, let it be dictated by the scientific attitude which marked the work of Spero and Harris and not in "an atmosphere of determined good-will," such as characterizes this book.

"Life on the Negro Frontier" purports to give an account of the development and the present status of the Negro Young Men's Christian Associations in various parts of the country. However, all of the worth-while information in this book could have been presented in a short, inexpensive pamphlet which would have reached a wider audience. The grandiose title is misleading, since there is little worth-while information concerning the problems of the Negro in the Northern city. The presentation of the setting in which the Negro Y. M. C. A.'s grew up is a sentimental tribute to Julius Rosenwald's part in the work and an exaggerated appraisal of the effectiveness of these organizations in ameliorating the condition of the Negroes. The author's story, which is based upon information picked up from various unacknowledged sources, is not only presented in an uncritical fashion, but contradicts in one instance at least the census figures which accompany the story. (See, for example, the ratio of males to females, page 12.) A realistic account of the development of the Y. M. C. A. among Negroes which will present the compromises, the interracial diplomacy, and the rationalizations that have been necessary to make Jim Crow arrangements square with Christian principles still needs to be written.

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

The Art of the East

The Civilizations of the East: Volume III, China; Volume IV, Japan. By René Grousset. Alfred A. Knopf. $5 each.

THE last two volumes of M. Grousset's work, "The Civilizations of the East," present to us in remarkably condensed form the whole pageant of culture in China and Japan. In this review it will be possible only to mention some of the high lights of these books that complete this French scholar's story of art in the Orient.

After a summary of Chinese culture in the prehistoric period, M. Grousset takes up the bronze ritual vessels of the Chou period, the mighty caldrons that were used in the great annual sacrifice to heaven and that formed the very palladia of empire. These bronzes embody alike the grandness and the austere simplicity for which the Chou period has invariably stood in the Chinese imagination—a period of mighty rulers, of the great classical scholars, the age which, to the Chinese scholar, has been what the Hellenic past has been for Western civilization. And frequently there is a suggestion in these massive, rugged shapes of the more sinister side of early Chinese religion, the sacrifice to the powers of darkness, the shadows of the sacred groves, and the practices they witnessed.

For too long, under the influence of the exotic fripperies and tours de force in ivory that came back in the holds of the first clipper ships to make the China run, the art of the Chinese was regarded as something grotesque, suitable only for the curiosity cabinet. We do not have to be professional aesthetes or even archaeologists to see in the forms of the very earliest periods the real and true expression of the art of China; we need only be lovers of order.

The memory of the kingdom of Han survives even today in the legends of the peoples of the Pacific basin, and not without reason, for the power of the dynasty from which the succeeding period takes its name extended from the shores of the China Sea to the very gates of India; its magnificent silks and ornaments in jade delighted the primitive chieftains of Japan and nearly bankrupted the lords of Rome. This era saw the formation, perhaps partly under the stimulus of the barbaric art of the Scythians, of a really typical Chinese art, an art characterized by the resilient strength of the curving, sweeping movement of line, the life quality of the animal forms, and, as always, a dependence on designs heavily charged with symbolical meaning.

In the chapter on the beginnings of Buddhist art in China, M. Grousset takes us to the treeless, wind-torn valley at Yun Kang, where today the peasants store their scanty harvest in the very laps of the giant gods enshrined there by the Tartars in the fifth century. Certainly nothing could speak more eloquently than this of the decline of Buddhism in China. The religion of Gautama was never able to capture the Chinese, a people so very aware of the social securities, with the lure of an unearthly paradise. Buddhist sculpture and painting, too, are like tiny ripples in the main current of Chinese art.

In the volume on India the author recounts how, at the very time that pagan cults were dying in the twilight of the classic world, the old gods found new life in the service of Buddhism in the Graeco-Buddhist art of northern India, which once had been the easternmost province of Alexander's world empire and the domain of his Eurasian-Greek successors. Through the Buddhist kingdoms of Turkestan this last remnant of the art of Hellas provided models for the first Buddhist images of China. In China the mingling of classic and Oriental elements united to form one of the most grandly hieratic art forms in all the world, in spirit similar to the majestic sculptures of medieval France. In his fourth volume M. Grousset suggests that, when Buddhism penetrated to Japan, there was a sort of revitalization of these decadent Graeco-Buddhist forms, a rebirth of something approximating the truly classic ideal. In the ancient sanctuaries at Nara we are often struck by the mysterious, almost sinister aspect of the earliest idols, dark and rigid forms in the temple shadows that seem to embody the common people's awe of the unearthly, highly metaphysical divinities that came to replace the simple, healthy nature spirits of the Shinto pantheon. Only later, with the complete acceptance of Buddhism, do we find a candid, friendly spirit in the gods—the expression of simplicity and clarity—everything that is the opposite of darkness and obscurity, that in every period has been reflected in the arts as an essential character of the Japanese spirit. It is perhaps to the awakening of this quality, rather than to any redistilled classicism, that we are to attribute the radiantly beautiful divinities of early Buddhism in Japan.

One criticism I would make of the volume on China is that it includes so many paintings in Western collections, often of dubious origin and labeled indiscriminately "Sung Period" or earlier. If we are to form a foundation for our judgment of the Sung landscape we must turn to the great originals in the collections of Japan and the countless masterpieces formerly in the Forbidden City.

Chinese collectors have always been cognizant of a fact mentioned by M. Grousset, that "a fine Ming painting . . . will always be of more value for an exact understanding of Chinese art than all the pseudo-T'ang and pseudo-Sung works that crowd our collections." The connoisseurs and literary men of the Ming period were quick to recognize the merit of the work of their contemporaries and even preferred it to the scarce and often questionable productions of earlier periods. M. Grousset's chapter on Ming is slight indeed, but this is not surprising, since probably no Westerner is capable of producing a satisfactory work on this subject without steeping himself in the vast material, most of it hidden in the godowns of collectors in China.

Although M. Grousset states that his book is intended as no more than an introduction, I could wish that he had divided his material a little more evenly and perhaps with a better sense of proportion. In the volume on Japan, it is to the later art, particularly to the Ukiyo-ye, that has been so long familiar to Westerners, that he devotes most space and most illustrations. It is to be regretted that in the chapters dealing with the earlier formative period of Japanese art the author contents himself with a rapid survey, and, for illustrations, with references to innumerable and to the average reader inaccessible publications. Such masters as Korin and Okyo are barely mentioned; even the great Sesshu fares none too well in this unbalanced volume.

The last chapters of the fourth volume are devoted to the banners, the "lama pictures" of the Peking junk dealers, that hang in the stinking temples of Tibet and China. Although occasionally charmed by this last offshoot of Indian culture, we are aesthetically as well as physically revolted by the array of monstrous forms, writhing in the consummation of their lusts, amid festoons of skulls and bleeding flesh, that are the illustrations of a religion as far from early Buddhism as is voodoo from the faith of Galilee.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY CAL.

Throughout these last two volumes as in the first of the series we have recorded for us the sensitive reactions of a cultured Western gentleman to the finest examples of Oriental art. Never for a moment are we presented with an Eastern point of view, and, in a way, this makes for a certain unity and spares us those orgies of nationalistic writing indulged in by such critics as Mr. Coomaraswamy. There is a unity achieved, too, in the volume on China by the author's tracing through the centuries the evolution of the Chinese aesthetic ideal that links the great bronzes of Chou with the misty quiet of the Sung landscapes.

In the English edition the thinness of the author's fabric shows through more than in the original, where a veritable armory of knife-sharp definitions, greater and more precise than the English vocabulary of art terms, cloaks the meagerness of fact and enchants us with its brilliance and clarity. M. Grousset is at his best when describing the historical and social background of the art of China and Japan, the grandeur of the court of T'ang, the abstract metaphysical beauty of Zen Buddhism in Japan. In spite of the occasional faults of commission and omission that seem almost inevitable in a vast project of this type, these books are probably better than anything else that has been written for anyone beginning the study of Oriental art; and even for those who have gone farther in this study, M. Grousset, in addition to valuable bibliography, supplies what is all too often the missing piece in the archaeological picture puzzle, the aesthetic value of beautiful objects irrespective of time and place of creation.

BENJAMIN ROWLAND, JR.

Shorter Notices

Heritage. By George F. Hummel. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

It is hard to say at first glance just why this is not a successful novel—in any but a possible commercial sense. Mr. Hummel has chosen for his theme the ambitious one of a German family striking roots in mid-nineteenth-century America and developing into the second generation. His treatment of all this is painstaking and obviously sincere; he has a sense of locale, a sense of human nature, a sense of drama, and a sense of reality. Yet somehow all these excellent qualities add up to zero, and if we compare Mr. Hummel's family saga with such a book as "Buddenbrooks," or even one of lesser merit, it will be easy to understand why. Mr. Hummel lacks the creative vision so necessary to a work of this kind; lacking that, it is as though he lacked everything else. His characters, for all their plausibility, have a decidedly manufactured look, the situations into which he projects them are theatrical rather than dramatic, and his book as a whole is without that combination of mystery and reality, that power to transcend life while remaining consistently faithful to it, which gives to such books their chief raison d'être; as a work of art it has no value simply because it confers no value on life. Before we are halfway through it we begin to ask ourselves why it was written at all; before we have finished we begin to wonder if Mr. Hummel himself knows the answer: and when so ambitious an attempt poses questions like this, its failure is proportionately striking. Mr. Hummel is a diligent workman; his tools are good and he knows how to use them. Something more than all this, however, is required in order to build a house, and a great deal more than all this is required in order to build a mansion. He has undertaken a job which is plainly beyond him.

Second Hoeing. By Hope Williams Sykes. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

This tale of the Colorado beet fields is a decent realistic novel which, like the beets its heroine hoed, has turned to sugar. The story has to do with the daughter of an immigrant German-Russian farmer, Hannah Schreissmiller, whose loyalty to the hard life of land and family drudgery constrains her to reject a fine marriage with the well-to-do, romantic young American that she loves. In its account of the day-to-day labors of the farmhouse, the cleaning, the cooking, the sewing, the planting and plowing and hoeing, the novel has a fine, factual truth. The characters of the foreign-born father and mother, the minister, the whole litter of fractious, disorganized children, are neatly caught. The heavy Germanic speech patterns of the old people, the vulgar, hybrid Americanisms of the young, ring harshly true. Yet when the author leaves the sphere of naturalism for that of sentiment, her novel sickens. The romance of Hannah and Jim Boswell is so factitious as to debase the book, for all its good, homely observation, to the level of a smooth-paper magazine love story. As evasive and untrue as this jerky, unmotivated love affair is the author's disregard of the social implications of her agricultural story. The few references to dropping prices are quite unrelated to the body of the novel and do nothing to affect the general optimistic tone of the trumped-up happy ending.

Condemned to Live. By Johann Rabener. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

The only remarkable thing about this vast first novel by a young German is that it should come to America generously indorsed by Thomas Mann and Jacob Wassermann. As it appears in translation, it seems a herculean but misguided exertion on the part of a young man with a good deal of zeal and no talent whatever. Its conception is grand and spacious, its characters of titanic proportions, but its execution is ant-like, piddling. It tells of a young man, Fedor Feuerhahn, demon-haunted, the son of a fearful marriage, the incestuous lover of a debauched mother, whom he must stab in her bath before he can rest in a suicide's grave. The skeleton of the story has tragic power. Watching Fedor tortured by pursuing furies, it is possible for a moment to think of Orestes. But the amazing literal-mindedness of the author, his clumsy, uninspired style, his undiscriminating passion for detail make the comparison—and the novel—laughable. It must be added that Herr Rabener's work is not aided by what must be one of the least readable translations of all time. The literal-mindedness of the original author is only surpassed by that of his translator, Geoffrey Dunlop, who attempts to make an English phonetic transcription of a Jewish-German accent, and whose renditions of German slang are as close in letter as they are far in spirit from what must have been the original.

A Rebel War Clerk's Diary. With Brief Introduction and Notes by Howard Swiggott. Old Hickory Bookshop. Two Volumes. $7.50.

There is no more valuable picture of life during the Confederacy than "A Rebel War Clerk's Diary." John Beauchamp Jones, who had been an author and journalist before the war, was a clerk in the Confederate War Department. In his diary he made an entry for every day of the Civil War, during all of which he never left Richmond. The book is not a literary document, and it suffers from the fact that much of the comment in it was based on gossip, the usual war-time rumors, and unreliable newspaper comment. At the same time there is much in it of very great value in its reflection of the life of Richmond and its officials, and the spirit of those years. The editor declares that despite the varying values of Jones's opinions "the accuracy of the diary is amazing." Its very defects bear upon the temper of the times and help portray Richmond as it was. Often the comments are bombastic and in the light of history ridiculous, but at other times the war clerk showed amazing insight and good judgment. Here is his brief comment upon the capture of Slidell and Mason:

> November 18th.—Today the Secretary told me, in reply to my question, that he had authentic information of the seizure of Messrs. Slidell and Mason, our commissioners to Europe, by Captain Wilkes, of the U. S. Navy, and while aboard the steamer Trent, a British vessel, at sea. I said I was glad of it. He asked why, in surprise. I remarked that it would bring the Eagle cowering to the feet of the Lion. He smiled, and said it was, perhaps the best thing that could have happened.

The last entry in the diary is of April 19, 1865, after which the writer left for the Eastern shore of Maryland. He survived the war but a short time, dying less than ten months after the surrender of Appomattox, yet his diary has given him an immortality with all who study the Civil War.

☐ BOOKS ☐

RUSSIA: A New History
(Third Edition—Revised)

By Prof. Ivar Spector, University of Washington
Author of "A Living Russian Grammar," etc.

Used as text in High Schools, Colleges and Universities

Traces the history of Russia from 700 B.C. to 1935

Price $2.00

Address: Metropolitan Press, Graphic Arts Building, Portland, Oregon.

"BRICKBATS AND ORCHIDS"

An outstanding new book now being made up giving both [illegible] for and against modern dated sound money without stamps. Articles to be by Editors, Economists and others. Variable expiration date and amount of exchange fee [illegible] banks for [illegible] dated currency, originated by me, allows scientific regulation and control of velocity of exchange, unemployment, business volumes, etc.; check money and deposits not altered. H. G. Wells in "The New America New World," says if money works to stall economic life it must be altered, but he offers [illegible] plan. "Inexplicit" men please note. Shall appreciate articles from those attending Institute of Public Affairs, University of Virginia, 6-30 to 7-13, 1935. Need additional articles on both sides. Bibliography and further details [illegible] request if needed. Yours for streamlined private capitalism, sound money, taxes from increased business volume and MONEY IN MOTION. See ad in "COLUMN REVIEW," July issue. Read "The Natural Economic Order."
J. B. N. CARDOZA, 44 B. Morton Street, New York, N. Y.

☐ RESORTS ☐

Forest and Stream Club
An Ideal Adult Camp
IN THE GREEN MOUNTAINS,
WILMINGTON, VT.
Four and one-half hours from Grand Central
Sporty 9 hole golf course right on premises.
Complete social and athletic activities.
FOURTH OF JULY WEEK-END (4 days) $20
SEASON RATES $30 PER WEEK AND UP
14th year of highly satisfactory service
55 W. 42nd STREET, N. Y. C. LAckawanna 4-9247

See pages ii and iii for other Summer Resorts

Films

Behind the Screen

MR. PAT MULLEN, who was the assistant producer of Robert Flaherty's "Man of Aran," has just written a book by the same title (Dutton, $3) which includes, among other things, some hints as to why that admirable picture depended so little for its interest on its being a representation of life as it is actually lived in the Aran Islands. Not long after his arrival in the Islands, it would appear, Mr. Flaherty learned that one of the most formidable monsters of the deep, the basking shark, had recently returned in great numbers to the west coast of Ireland. Whatever may have been the distinguished photographer's intention to record the prehistoric charm of Aran, its incredibly primitive economics, its naive and unspoiled population, it vanished before the prospect of brandishing a tripod in the teeth of the mighty fish. It mattered little that Aran men had not engaged in shark-hunting for almost a century. Mr. Flaherty was able to resurrect a few nonagenarians whose fathers had faintly recalled how the shark had been dealt with in the old days. A shipment of harpoons was imported from another part of the world, and with the assistance of a certain Scotch captain the Aran curragh men were instructed in their use. The result, as everyone knows, was one of the most beautiful and exciting films of recent years. That its theme bears no real correspondence to the actual conditions and preoccupations of the Aran Islanders at present has not been a source of great disturbance to many people.

Mr. Mullen, despite the occasional guilefulness of an Islander who has been temporarily exposed to the sophistication of Back Bay Boston, manages to get into his book much of just that quality of his native island which Mr. Flaherty saw fit to eliminate from the film. It is present throughout not only in the style but in the incidents which are used to bring out the temperamental idiosyncrasies of friends and relatives. There is the story of how Mr. Mullen's father secretly removed a whole sand dune from a neighboring property in order to make a little patch of soil for his own family. There are descriptions of wakes, marriages, and other social occasions which give us an impression of the cultural construction of Aran society. As a supplement to Mr. Flaherty's picture and as an intimate revelation of how so-called ethnographical films are put together nowadays, the book should be of special interest to everyone interested in the current screen.

Although the name of the Standard Oil Company is nowhere mentioned among the titles, "Oil for the Lamps of China" is really a tribute in celluloid form to the unflagging idealism of that organization in spreading the fruits of European civilization among the benighted peoples of the Orient. The most noteworthy of these fruits, it appears, is a special kind of oil lamp designed by the hero to make the Chinese burn more oil. The hero is a new kind of torch-bearer for the films —one who willingly sacrifices his wife, his child, and his best friend for the sake of the "Company." Through every sort of hardship and disillusionment he manages to keep his faith and is in the end rewarded by a handsome promotion. In the foreword we are told that oil is of course to be taken merely as a symbol of Light. Unfortunately, the word oil has accumulated certain other symbolical associations in recent American slang. It is more than likely that it is in the sense of an ill-smelling lubricant rather than a source of illumination that the word will be used to describe the particular effect of this picture. It is chiefly notable, and is mentioned in this place, as offering the most nauseating example of big-business propaganda that has appeared this season. WILLIAM TROY

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 17, 1935 No. 3654

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 57
EDITORIALS:
Big Business Wins in Congress 60
Vanishing Opportunity 61
Our Noble Educators 61
Summer Theaters 62
ISSUES AND MEN. ENGLAND AND THE UNITED STATES. By Oswald Garrison Villard 63
CARTOON: THE RED CARPET. By LOW 64
THE RADIO NOSTRUM RACKET. By Richard Lee Strout . . . 65
BEHIND THE OVERTHROW OF CALLES. By L. O. Prendergast 67
THE NEW BRITISH CABINET. By Harold J. Laski 70
HULL HOUSE ON PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE. By Paul W. Ward 71
CORRESPONDENCE 74
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
Tacoma: Timber and Tear Gas. By Selden C. Menefee 76
Redder than the Roosevelts. By Heywood Broun 77
Another Language 78
BOOKS:
To the Tall Buildings—New York. By Ross Edwards Pierce . . . 79
Radix Malorum. By William Troy 79
Whither America? By Harry Elmer Barnes 80
General William Booth. By Clara Gruening Stillman 81
An Old Battle. By Mary McCarthy 82
Marlborough as Soldier. By William MacDonald 83
Law as Sociology. By William Seagle 84
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 84

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING CHARLES ANGOFF

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of subscriber's address.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second-class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by The Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter S. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

IN URGING CONGRESS to pass the Guffey coal bill so that the Supreme Court can rule on it, the President keeps open the door for the constitutional issue in the next campaign. "A decision of the Supreme Court," he writes, "would be helpful as indicating, with increasing clarity, the constitutional limits within which this government must operate." This suggests that the President expects an adverse decision, and would welcome it. The parade of New Deal legislation before the court will be headed by the processing-tax provisions of the AAA, and an adverse decision will make a constitutional issue unescapable. For the farmers, whatever else they may think of the New Deal, like the tax which raises the level of their incomes. If the court throws out only the Guffey bill and the Wagner labor law, the President may not feel that he has enough public support for a constitutional campaign. If the securities act should be added, the cause would be measurably strengthened. It would be still stronger if old-age pensions were struck down. But if the AAA too is destroyed, the President can count on support from everyone not fanatically committed to an unchanged Constitution and the status quo. Certainly the Republicans, if they intend to campaign as defenders of the Constitution, would find themselves in an awkward position, since they cannot hope for success next year without substantial support from the farmers. It is doubtful, however, that the Supreme Court will make matters so easy for the President and so fatal for itself.

SHORTLY BEFORE INDEPENDENCE DAY the Senate, evidently inspired by the British sedition act, unobtrusively passed a bill which so clearly violates the constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech and press that it ought to make the hair of all nine Supreme Court judges stand on end. The purpose of the bill, which was introduced by Senator Tydings at the instance of the War and Navy departments, is "to make better provision for the government of the military and naval forces of the United States by the suppression of attempts to incite the members thereof to disobedience"; to that end it prescribes a fine of $1,000 or two years' imprisonment for whoever advises or whoever publishes or distributes any publication which advises, counsels, urges, or solicits any member of the military or naval forces of the United States to disobey the laws or regulations governing such military or naval forces. It also provides that raids for the material described may be conducted under search warrants authorized by the war espionage act. The Senator from Maryland said that the bill was directed against pamphlets circulated among soldiers and sailors encouraging disobedience to officers and saying that "they are all brothers"; Senator Bennett Clark, in one of the few comments which accompanied its unanimous passage, said he thought it should be applied to CCC camps, and complained that he had actually seen a CCC camp paper in which Soviet institutions were praised; at which Senator King avowed that the officer responsible "ought to be court-martialed." Soldiers and sailors are sworn to uphold the laws and Constitution, but we do not recall any phrase in any oath proclaiming the infallibility of second lieutenants; and since joining the army does not carry with it loss of citizenship, it would seem that the armed forces have a right to read anything they please, even to such inflammatory remarks as that Soviet institutions are praiseworthy and that privates and officers are all brothers. After all, we are not engaged in a war. Or are we? Opponents of the bill point out that strikers and their sympathizers could be punished for protesting against the use of the National Guard in a strike area; and the section allowing raids on search warrants authorized by the war espionage act opens the way to a rousing red-baiting campaign. If the newspapers of the country were not so busy defending themselves from the American Newspaper Guild, we might expect them to put on a stirring battle for the freedom of the press, which is here clearly at issue.

WHETHER OR NOT the hour will strike for forming a third party in the fall, it has come for the beginning of a national campaign to educate the public to the idea of production for use rather than for profit. But many questions leap to the mind in studying the third-party conference in Chicago which enunciated the principle. The platform of fourteen planks commends itself as broad enough to bring together many leftist groups, though we doubt if it needed to include the soldiers' bonus. The question arises whether a third party can be launched nationally before it has begun local work and achieved a good deal of local success. Obviously it is simpler to make the beginning in a Presidential year and to focus attention on an appealing Presidential candidate. The best showing yet made for a left-wing third party was La Follette's campaign in 1924. It left behind few local organizations and proved to be a single effort of no permanent benefit. If a third party is formed in the fall, it would be well advised to concentrate on building the foundations first, and to plan no national campaign before 1940. This is an invitation for hard and probably thankless work. Yet without such an investment there can be no third party. Some time must elapse before organized labor can have demonstrated its ability to unionize on industrial lines, and until it does and is able to collaborate effectively, no third party will have the character or numbers to count in a national election. Ultimately, we believe, there will come a new division in American politics between those who favor production for use and those who seek to retain finance capitalism. We see the Chicago conference as an early milestone in this long development.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

THE STRANGE CASE of Congressman Brewster is the talk of liberals in Washington. We discuss in our leading editorial his part in the holding-company crisis. But this was not his only inexplicable defection. As Republican on the committee considering the ship-subsidy bill he had taken a leading part in exposing the shipping interests and the dishonesty of the bill. Then when a minority report was prepared by Representative Wearin of Iowa, he at first declined to sign it, and insisted on minor changes. The fight on the bill could only be made on the floor by offering amendments, debate being limited to five minutes for each amendment. About ninety had been prepared and Mr. Brewster was expected to introduce thirty of them, dealing particularly with the legal aspects of the bill. The first day of debate, however, found Mr. Brewster trying a private law case in his home state of Maine. He returned the next day and, on the assumption that he was still loyal to his opposition to the bill, it was decided that he should propose the motion to recommit it. This motion must be made in writing; Mr. Brewster duly signed it, and he and other leaders received instructions as to the precise time when it had to be introduced—just before the roll call. The amendments finally gave out, and the time came to move to recommit. But Brewster sat motionless in his seat. Only after the roll call had begun did he rise to present his motion, and was ruled out of order. The vote to recommit probably would have carried, and thus the bill might never have passed the House.

IT IS MUSSOLINI, not Hitler, who is bringing the European crisis to a head; at least he is leading his fellow-dictator for first honors in demonstrating that fascism means war. Fighting in Abyssinia is scheduled to begin in late September, when the rainy season ends. Great Britain, making a desperate effort to use the League to curb Italy, finds France unwilling to collaborate. This makes it impracticable for Britain to close the Suez Canal to Mussolini's transports, or to threaten to do so unless it wishes to embark on a permanent anti-Italian policy. France's reluctance to restrain Italy undoubtedly arises out of an understanding reached during the Austrian crisis, now strengthened as a result of the Anglo-German naval agreement. The British policy as regards Abyssinia has produced one display of courage, the offer of the British port of Zeila and a corridor leading to it, the first proposal to give up territory in the cause of peace yet made by a great power. France, in declining to join Britain in using the League against Italy, can claim to be realistic, since Italy would withdraw and thus bring the final collapse of collective effort. Yet France's own security rests on collective action, and a still more discredited League weakens France. The morality of Europe was stricken with the ascendancy of Nazi Germany, but some semblance of it was left while Germany remained outside the League. Britain did not purify the air by the naval agreement with Hitler. And Mussolini's open defiance of his League obligations is destroying the little discipline that remains in Europe.

THE RECENT INCIDENTS along the Manchoukuo-Siberian border, together with renewed Japanese activity in Inner Mongolia, indicate that the danger of a Soviet-Japanese conflict is not wholly removed. While Japan's latest sortie into North China has been explained on various grounds, there are reasons for believing that preparation for a possible war against the Soviet Union has been the determining factor. As long as North China remained under Nanking, there was always a danger—no matter how subservient Chiang might be—that bands of Chinese patriots might harass the Japanese lines of communication. The violent attack which General Isogai recently launched against the underground Kuomintang organizations in North China suggests that anti-Japanese agitation has never been fully stamped out. Particularly disturbing is the extension of Japanese influence in Inner Mongolia. Having already established military airdromes in several cities of Eastern Chahar, Japan is now demanding that it be allowed to construct an air base at Kalgan, the southern terminus of the caravan route which runs through Outer Mongolia to the Siberian border. Under the guise of extending the demilitarized area set up by the Tangku truce, Japanese troops have taken over control of several thousand square miles of territory and have forced the Chinese authorities to grant free passage to their agents, who are seeking to enlist the support of the Mongolian priests and landlords in a holy war against communism. Each step which Japan takes toward the North or West makes war more difficult to avert.

THE UNIVERSITY OF WYOMING last February invited Dr. Caroline F. Ware, formerly associate professor of history at Vassar College, to teach three courses in the current summer session, in the catalogue of which she was in time duly listed. On June 11 Dr. Ware received a wire from the dean of the summer session informing her that it had been discovered that she was married, and since the university had a rule forbidding the employment of married women in any capacity, she would not be permitted to give her courses as agreed. Dr. Ware promptly replied that she intended to press for the fulfilment of her contract, and on receiving a subsequent letter from President A. G. Crane explaining that the rule had been adopted as a consequence of the depression, she wrote that the University of Wyoming was supposed to be an educational institution, not a work-relief organization. Wyoming was the first State to adopt women's suffrage, refusing indeed to enter the union until its constitution, permitting women to vote, was accepted. Even if this were not the case, it is difficult to understand how a state university in good standing would be so shortsighted as to institute a policy of discrimination against women for the sole reason that they were married. We hope that Dr. Ware will make it as hot for the university as she possibly can. Its trustees and its president already look silly; perhaps if they can be made to feel uncomfortable enough they will rescind the prohibition against married women and pass a rule refusing to employ any professor who does not wear side whiskers instead. Logically, we believe they would be on firmer ground.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

ONE WOULD THINK that there would be nothing easier in the world than for a minister of the Christian or Jewish religion to be opposed to international butchery, but apparently casuistry is still a mighty weapon among men of the cloth. A few months ago 200 rabbis and Protestant ministers of New York drew up a "declaration of purpose," the last sentence of which read: "In the spirit of true patriotism and with deep personal conviction I . . . renounce war and never will I support another." The Social Service Committee of the Methodist Episcopal Conference of New York, at the last annual session of the local church, presented a similar declaration. Immediately the more respectable of the clergy raised a cry of outrage at this "straight pacifism." The Reverend J. Campbell White, of the West Forty-fourth Street United Presbyterian Church, announced that "self-defense is absolutely necessary under present conditions. . . . Ruthless injustice and cruelty must be curbed by force until cured by Christ." Only the other day the Central Conference of American Rabbis, meeting in Chicago, battled over the issue of war, and once again caution won a victory over courage and decency. The conference was confronted with a resolution calling upon its members to "refuse to support any war in which this country or any other country may engage, on the ground that war is a denial of all for which religion stands." The resolution was overwhelmingly defeated. Rabbi James G. Heller of Cincinnati opposed it on the ground that war was not "a denial of all for which religion stands," Rabbi Joseph L. Barron of Milwaukee "held it the duty of religion to support war to repel an enemy," and Rabbi Morris M. Feuerlicht of Indianapolis thought that the resolution ought to be "put in the wastebasket."

ABRAHAM CAHAN, editor of the Jewish Daily Forward, which claims the largest circulation of any foreign-language paper in the world, has just celebrated his seventy-fifth birthday, and has received numerous expressions of congratulation on his forty years as an editor. Outside his excellent novel, "The Rise of David Levinsky," published a quarter of a century ago, we fail to see anything in his career that raises it above the average. He has been praised as a great editor, but those who have praised him have seldom been able to read Yiddish and thus were incompetent to pass judgment upon his journalistic work. A close reading of his paper for many years convinces us that the Jewish Daily Forward is far from being a great newspaper. It is full of the features that make the Hearst papers the rags they are. Almost every issue contains fiction serials which if translated into English would grace the New York Daily Mirror. There is also a letter department that is a compound of the writings of Beatrice Fairfax and Bugs Baer. Its editorials are distinguished by their irrelevance and plausible ignorance, and its news columns are either too skimpy or poorly written or both. Its general attitude on Russia has been one of prejudiced antagonism. Such is the paper that Mr. Cahan has edited for nearly forty years. He himself has learned little with the years. He thinks that "republican Germany . . . was in excellent shape under the Social Democrats," and that President Roosevelt's "New Deal was excellent as far as it went. . . . A progressive spirit is noticeable all over the country."

RECENTLY we heard José Iturbi conduct Beethoven's Eroica symphony at the New York Stadium concerts. It was an indifferent performance, but we enjoyed ourselves because in imagination we transformed the ragged sounds coming from the stage into the magnificent tones of the same symphony when conducted by Toscanini or Bruno Walter. Good music well played is such a rarity in New York in the summertime that we are grateful even for poor performances because they remind us of really able ones. Unfortunately, we shall soon be denied even this simple pleasure: the Stadium concerts this year have gone in more heavily than ever before for operas and ballets. Not that there is anything disgraceful about operas and ballets, but somehow we cannot get rid of the feeling that they are inferior music and had best be kept indoors. Perhaps the reason for this feeling is to be found in our super-intellectuality or perhaps we are influenced simply by plain musical conservatism. At any rate, we have infinitely more pleasure in listening to "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" than to "Aida," and to Beethoven's Seventh symphony than to "Adventures of Harlequin." Time was, and not so long ago, when the musical fare at the Stadium was almost wholly classical, and the attendance was apparently quite satisfactory. If it has fallen off in the past two or three years, the reason may have been the continuously inferior conducting and not the nature of the music played. Willem van Hoogstraten, who has been the chief conductor during the past ten years, is not a Kapellmeister of the highest competence.

OUR ADMIRATION for Aldermanic President Bernard S. Deutsch mounts day by day. His persistent espousal of the cause of the medical students and technicians who were dismissed from Columbia University for pacifist activities without a hearing is so extraordinary for a municipal office-holder that we are almost willing to forgive him all the nonsense he has spouted in the past. As a member of the Board of Estimate he recently voted against granting Columbia a franchise for a conduit to carry cables across West 116th Street. Through the affirmative votes of all the other members of the board, including Mayor LaGuardia, he was defeated. But it will be impossible to defeat him on the Sinking Fund Commission, which considers all pleas for tax exemption and where the approval of them must be by unanimous vote. Columbia applies annually for the cancelation of various municipal charges, including a tax exemption on about $20,000,000 worth of property. Mr. Deutsch can thus give President Butler many serious headaches, and we hope he carries out his threat to do so.

Big Business Wins in Congress

IT will be difficult for protagonists of our existing "democracy" to explain away the action of the House on the holding-company bill and of the Glass subcommittee on the banking bill. Not by any stretch of the truth can they pretend that the people, of, by, and for whom the country is to be governed, determined the fate of either bill. The House voted against the death sentence for holding companies to favor a privileged minority of investors. The Glass subcommittee refused genuine government control of the volume of deposit money, restored to deposit bankers the business of issuing securities, and authorized the revival of interlocking directorates. Senator Glass, heavily belaureled this year by honorary doctorates from Eastern universities, rendered a signal service to bankers as a special class. The ultimate form of the banking bill may yet be changed through the resistance of the House, where public control of the volume of money is a popular cause. The death sentence in the holding-company bill could be saved through the influence of the Senate, where the utilities lobby is not so effective. This looks as though democracy has friends enough in both houses to save itself. But obversely developed, the picture is not so satisfactory. High finance chooses its fighting ground to suit its ends. The bankers use the technique of conspiracy, which flourishes most effectively in a Senate subcommittee which, if not corrupt, believes passionately in the virtue of private banking and in the sin of financial democracy. The eloquence of the utilities must be more direct; they tell a Congressman that they will finance his reelection or assure his defeat. This argument is most potent in the House, where every member must stand for reelection next year. So the utilities concentrate on the House.

There will be no public inquiry into the machinations of Dr. Glass, for it could only demonstrate that he is an alert, astute Old World gentleman, with a worship of bankers as religious as any Communist's faith in the proletariat. But an inquiry into the utilities lobby is unavoidable. Representative Rankin predicts it "will uncover a saturnalia of corruption that will rock this capital and shock the American people from coast to coast. These lobbyists went to an extent of racketeering never before known in the history of this government." While it is doubtful that an inquiry will reveal anything sensationally different from the traditional utility methods of controlling legislation and legislators, an investigation is essential, and should be intrusted to a Senate committee amply supplied with funds and with the full rights of subpoena. Certainly a House inquiry by the Rules Committee could accomplish little. Its chairman, Congressman O'Connor, a servant of Tammany, voted for the utilities, and only three members of the committee would be interested in exposing the lobby. Even so it is doubtful whether the inquiry will be able to throw light on the unexpected help given the utilities by two of their leading foes. One is Chairman Rayburn of the Interstate Commerce Committee. To quote Representative Rankin: "His capitulation was the most heart-sickening and pathetic spectacle I have ever witnessed since I have been a member of Congress." The other is Congressman Brewster of Maine, who became the hero of the utilities by voting against the death sentence and by airing an attack on Thomas Corcoran, one of the President's personal aides in the utility fight. Brewster had given his word that he was "100 per cent" for the Administration bill. He had been received into the confidential meeting of those leading the campaign for it. He was in charge of legal work for the Passamaquoddy project, which the Maine utilities still hope to undermine. He absented himself from Washington in the heat of the fight and returned just in time to vote against the death sentence. Corcoran, whom he had informed of his change of heart, told him he would have to be dropped from his legal assignment on the Passamaquoddy project. Thereupon Brewster took the perilous course of justifying his change of heart by accusing Corcoran of threatening to withdraw the Passamaquoddy project, an accusation which Corcoran staunchly denies. Servants of the utilities in the House quickly seized on the Brewster charge as canceling the activities of the utility lobby. Inquiry probably cannot make clear the motivations of Brewster and Rayburn. Brewster may have done no more than many others—curried favor with conservatives in his own district, fearful of voting according to his personal convictions. The evil genius in this drama is not the lobby but the quiet and persistent control of local politics by the utilities. Any investigation must proceed carefully and exhaustively if it is to put together a presentation of a prevailing situation stirring enough to arouse the public.

This inquiry will be one of four which will be in progress after the adjournment of Congress. The Munitions Committee will be rummaging among Morgan's papers to learn to what extent our Number One Banker drew us into the World War. Another committee will be investigating the connection between bankers and the railroads; another, the American Telegraph and Telephone Company. Thus a new branch of government is coming into existence, the Senate investigation. We already have government by direct financial interests; now and again there is government by telegraph and radio (as during the World Court fight); and here is the antidote to both, government by education. The first banking investigation sent the bankers into hiding for two years, from which they have only been rescued by the respectable Dr. Glass. These four inquiries should give the country another prodding reminder of what it means to be ruled by big business. They should make it difficult for the President to maintain his cheerful demeanor of compromise with things as they are and force him to campaign next year purely as a reformer. Once Congress has adjourned he probably will begin to awaken public opinion, which once was his only support, but which he has done so much to chloroform. Admittedly, the President as the crusading reformer would be infinitely more attractive than as the economist or as the builder of the social state. We believe he can reestablish his hold over the country in this role. But it will be a strange commentary on his doctrine of compromise if, after striving for a full term to wheedle big business with concessions, he must run for reelection as its outspoken disciplinarian.

Vanishing Opportunity

THE shortsightedness of the Administration in abruptly terminating the Soviet-American debt negotiations last winter has been strikingly illustrated by the credit arrangements which the Soviet government has recently obtained in Europe. First came the 200,000,000-mark credit agreement with a German banking consortium headed by the Deutsche Bank und Disconto-Gesellschaft, signed on April 10. This was followed late in May by a general trade accord with Czecho-Slovakia, which provided for what is in effect a five-year, 6 per cent, government-guaranteed loan of 250,000,000 crowns.

Although the Czecho-Slovakian credit is not so large as those previously arranged in Germany and elsewhere, its terms are highly advantageous. Previously the credits extended to Soviet foreign-trade organizations were what is known as "commercial" credits, extended by individual firms and in some instances partially guaranteed by the government. While from the Soviet point of view these marked a significant advance over the era of no credits, they involved excessive charges and considerable overpayment owing to the high cost of discounting the unguaranteed portion of the advances. Recently the Soviet authorities have come to the conclusion that this form of credit has outlived its usefulness. The Czecho-Slovakian loan is to be covered by Soviet government bonds rather than by bills of exchange, thus giving the Russian trading organizations the advantages of cash discounts. Certain credits available in Great Britain have been refused because of their relatively high cost. Where satisfactory terms could not be arranged the Soviets have paid in cash, such purchases being confined to immediate needs.

Back of this shift in policy lies the improvement in Soviet internal economic conditions—commented on in a recent issue of The Nation—and a resultant change in its basic requirements. Only a few years ago the Soviet Union was compelled to buy practically all of its machinery and a large share of its raw materials abroad. Today it has reached a point in industrial development where, if necessary, it can meet all its needs out of domestic production. Relieved from the pressure of immediate necessity, it has enjoyed a large favorable balance of trade in the past two years and has been able to reduce its foreign indebtedness to less than one-quarter of the 1931 amount. This fact, coupled with its rapidly increasing gold production and its perfect record in meeting obligations, has greatly strengthened the Soviet credit position.

The United States has habitually lagged several years behind Europe in recognizing the significance of changes in Soviet trade policy. When, about six years ago, one European country after another was establishing systems of government-guaranteed credits to aid their manufacturers in accepting orders from the U. S. S. R., this country not only failed to make such provisions but imposed severe restrictions on the importation of Russian goods. The result was that despite a predilection for American equipment and technique the Soviet government was compelled to divert a considerable part of the business which might have been placed in this country to our more farsighted European competitors; and American exports to Russia, which had averaged more than $100,000,000 annually for several years, dwindled to about 10 per cent of that figure. Recognition of the Soviet Union by the Roosevelt Administration brought a slight improvement in trade, but owing to the lack of credit facilities the gain has been slight as compared with the possibilities. If the present trend is maintained, Soviet purchases in the United States during 1935 will be about $30,000,000, or approximately twice as great as in 1934. With adequate credit this could be increased about tenfold.

Attorney General Cummings's interpretation of the Johnson act prevents the extension of loans or credits to the Soviet Union by banks or industrial concerns. If American manufacturers are to obtain any substantial share of the expanding Soviet purchases, some provision will have to be made for government credits, such as was intended by the establishment of the ill-fated Export-Import Bank. Now that the international credit blockade of the U. S. S. R. has been broken, it is almost certain that the scramble for Soviet trade will be intensified. Already there are reports that Germany has offered a new loan of a billion marks—sufficient to cover the present volume of Soviet purchases in the United States for more than a dozen years. While this particular offer has been rejected on political grounds, it should serve as a warning to the Administration that further delay may shut the United States out of the one expanding foreign market.

Our Noble Educators

THE National Education Association, in solemn conclave assembled, opened its annual session by proposing a program described by school leaders as the "most statesman-like steps ever taken by a teachers' organization." It would be unkind to point out the faintness of this praise. Let us pass on quickly to the program itself, which provides for the creation of a commission of seventeen on a five-year plan to make a survey of American education and recommend far-reaching proposals for its improvement. The first, and presumably the most important, task assigned to the committee is "to plan for continued adaptation of education to social needs." This, of course, is admirable; it might mean that our national educators were beginning to be faintly cognizant of the unreality of much of our educational program, falling as it does between the two stools of the old system of classical training and such vague attempts as we have made to introduce modifications in line with our industrial and social development; it might even mean that leaders among our teachers were aware of the rifts in our democratic lute and were preparing to adapt our school system to the cultural inconsistencies of a society in which millions have not enough to eat, in a country rich beyond parallel in the resources of production, and a small group owns or controls the main portion of our national wealth.

The subsequent proceedings of the Denver convention, which began badly enough with a tabling of the resolution on academic freedom, did indeed indicate a certain amount of enlightenment. After a lively discussion the academic-freedom resolution was forced through by the insurgents of the rank and file. On paper it was all that could be asked. It provides for a committee of five, three of whom are to be classroom teachers, whose duties are to publicize and combat any proposed legislation against freedom of teaching, to investigate cases of discharge in violation of the principle of academic freedom, to assist teachers deprived of their positions for this reason, and to "cooperate with other representative organizations actively engaged in maintaining the principles of academic freedom." Dr. Abraham Lefkowitz, representing the joint teachers' organizations of New York City, leader of the liberal forces in the convention, declared that the "progressive elements in the association have obtained more of their demands than ever before in the history of the association." But that Dr. Lefkowitz himself was not without doubts of the practical operation of the resolution was evidenced by his further comment that "it now remains to be seen if executives and committees will carry out the spirit and intent of the resolutions." Nor do these doubts seem too far fetched in the light of another resolution proposed from the floor by J. G. Allen of Scotland, Pennsylvania, which was embraced perhaps with feelings of relief by the convention as a whole. This expressed the association's belief in the "fundamental principles of American democracy" as the "best so far devised by the mind of man to govern free people," and pledged its intention "so to teach the youth of the land."

It would appear that the two resolutions contain certain contradictory elements. In practice, that is, if a teacher wished to describe to his students the workings of the Soviet government, he would be obliged to add that of course it was inferior to our own democracy. Otherwise he could not avail himself of the privilege of championship by his fellow-members of the N. E. A. in the event of his discharge for mentioning so unfortunate a subject in the classroom. If, on less dangerous ground, he wished to discuss the English system of legislation by parliamentary committee, he would have to point out the superiority of our own Congress, which operates somewhat differently. In other words, either the resolution on academic freedom or the resolution pledging teachers to avow the incomparable blessings of our form of government is so much waste paper.

A courageous attempt, also led by Dr. Lefkowitz, to modify the complete control by five trustees of the N. E. A.'s permanent fund, amounting to more than $800,000, was twice defeated. Dr. Lefkowitz's proposal was that expenditures from the fund might be made if voted by a two-thirds' vote of the assembly in two successive years. This seems to be a modest-enough amendment, and the administration of large sums by a group of five men to contain elements rather less than democratic. The majority of the N. E. A. was satisfied with it, however.

A number of complaints were heard, notably one expressed by Professor George D. Strayer of Columbia University, about the recent appropriation of $50,000,000 for the government youth program, which was made to the FERA instead of to the N. E. A. With all due respect to Professor Strayer, we suspect that the sum, insufficient as it may be for the needs of millions of young Americans whose future seems somewhat less than assured, was suitably allocated. So far the N. E. A. has given little promise that it would spend any number of millions of dollars wisely for the guidance and protection of American youth. Until it appears that the resolution on academic freedom really means what it says, one is justified in suspecting the basic intentions of the N. E. A.

Summer Theaters

MUCH has been said for and against the "summer theater," a relatively new institution whose growth during the last few years has scattered professional and semi-professional acting companies over the countryside, especially in New England, where summer residents are thickest. Opinions differ concerning its value as a laboratory for testing plays designed for Broadway, but one of the best things about the summer theater is just the fact that the summer play does not have to meet the fierce competition of the regular season. Broadway conditions put an absurdly high premium upon secondary virtues—upon slickness of writing and production, upon mechanical efficiency, and upon superficial contemporaneity. Audiences on vacation are much more favorably disposed toward plays whose virtues are not of the conventionally smart kind.

It is doubtful, for instance, if anyone would have risked "opening cold" on Broadway with a revival of Wycherley's "The Country Wife," which was performed last week with fine effect in Lawrence Langner's Country Playhouse at Westport. Perhaps it will get to the metropolis ultimately, as its predecessor "The School for Husbands" did, but the country theater provides ideal conditions for experimenting with the sort of revival which ought to be more frequent on Broadway than it is. The play in question is, of course, one of the finest of the late seventeenth century, and its author shares almost equally with Congreve credit for creating a tradition of sophisticated comedy still alive today. But never since the age in which it was written has there been another which ought to appreciate it as much as this one. Nor is it merely that we are used to speech almost as plain as that which delighted the gallants of the Restoration. Our "sophistication" is nearer to theirs than to that of any other period, and we can enter more fully into their spirit.

Incidentally, the particular production was a delightful one, and the cast—which included Tom Powers and Frances Fuller as well as Ruth Gordon, the star—was excellent. Miss Gordon, indeed, was an inspired choice, and she acted the role of the fausse ingénue with a sense of its values and a sense of style which might make one think she had been trained in a tradition of artificial acting that no one has really been adequately trained in today. It would be an excellent thing for both actors and audiences if both had more frequent opportunity to discover, not only how alive some of the old plays are, but to what extent they made possible effects which we have forgotten to seek.

"The Country Wife" held the stage well into the eighteenth century but only in a very drastically revised form. It is amusing to note that it can now again be played almost as it was written. The student familiar with the text would have discerned a certain simplification of the subplot and the omission of a few memorable lines. But he may also take whatever satisfaction he may care to take from the observation that most of the deleted lines were apparently removed less because they were risqué than because they were brutal. In most respects we are not more squeamish than the audiences of the seventeenth century but we are hardly prepared to regard certain subjects—notably that of venereal disease—quite as jocosely as they did.

Burlingame Public Library Burlingame, Cal.

Issues and Men

England and the United States

When the recent change in the British Cabinet took place, the cables told us that the new Prime Minister, Stanley Baldwin, is distinctly pro-American, and that Sir Samuel Hoare may also be relied upon to conduct the foreign policy of Great Britain with the United States always in the forefront of the picture. This is gratifying of course—and cynics should not try to belittle it by saying that about the first thing Mr. Baldwin did was to set forth once more why Great Britain could not pay its financial obligation to the United States. It is obviously of the utmost importance in this particular crisis of the world's history, with Japan behaving worse than ever in China and Hitler keeping all Europe on tenterhooks, that the governments of the United States and Great Britain should see eye to eye as much of the time as possible and informally cooperate whenever conditions permit.

Just what does eye to eye mean? Well, certainly not an alliance of any kind. Some months ago the Marquis of Lothian came to this country to talk up a genuine alliance between the two countries, a plan which he subsequently published in full in the London Times. It was that the United States fleet should take over the safeguarding of Great Britain's interests in China, while Great Britain with its fleet and army should take over the safeguarding of America's interests in Europe. The idea was preposterous, so childish as to make it amazing that it could be seriously put forth. It showed that the Marquis had not the faintest understanding of political conditions in the United States. For one thing, if such an alliance were seriously suggested, the pro-German and Irish groups alone would make the welkin resound to their anger. Never has there been a time since the Venezuelan episode of 1895 when such a proposal would have aroused greater indignation in political circles in Washington. What interests has the United States in Europe today that call for supervision by the British government and the British army and navy? And who could possibly think that any American would be willing to see our government make the cause of British merchants in China, of the exploiters of China, its own? The proposal was hardly a sane one.

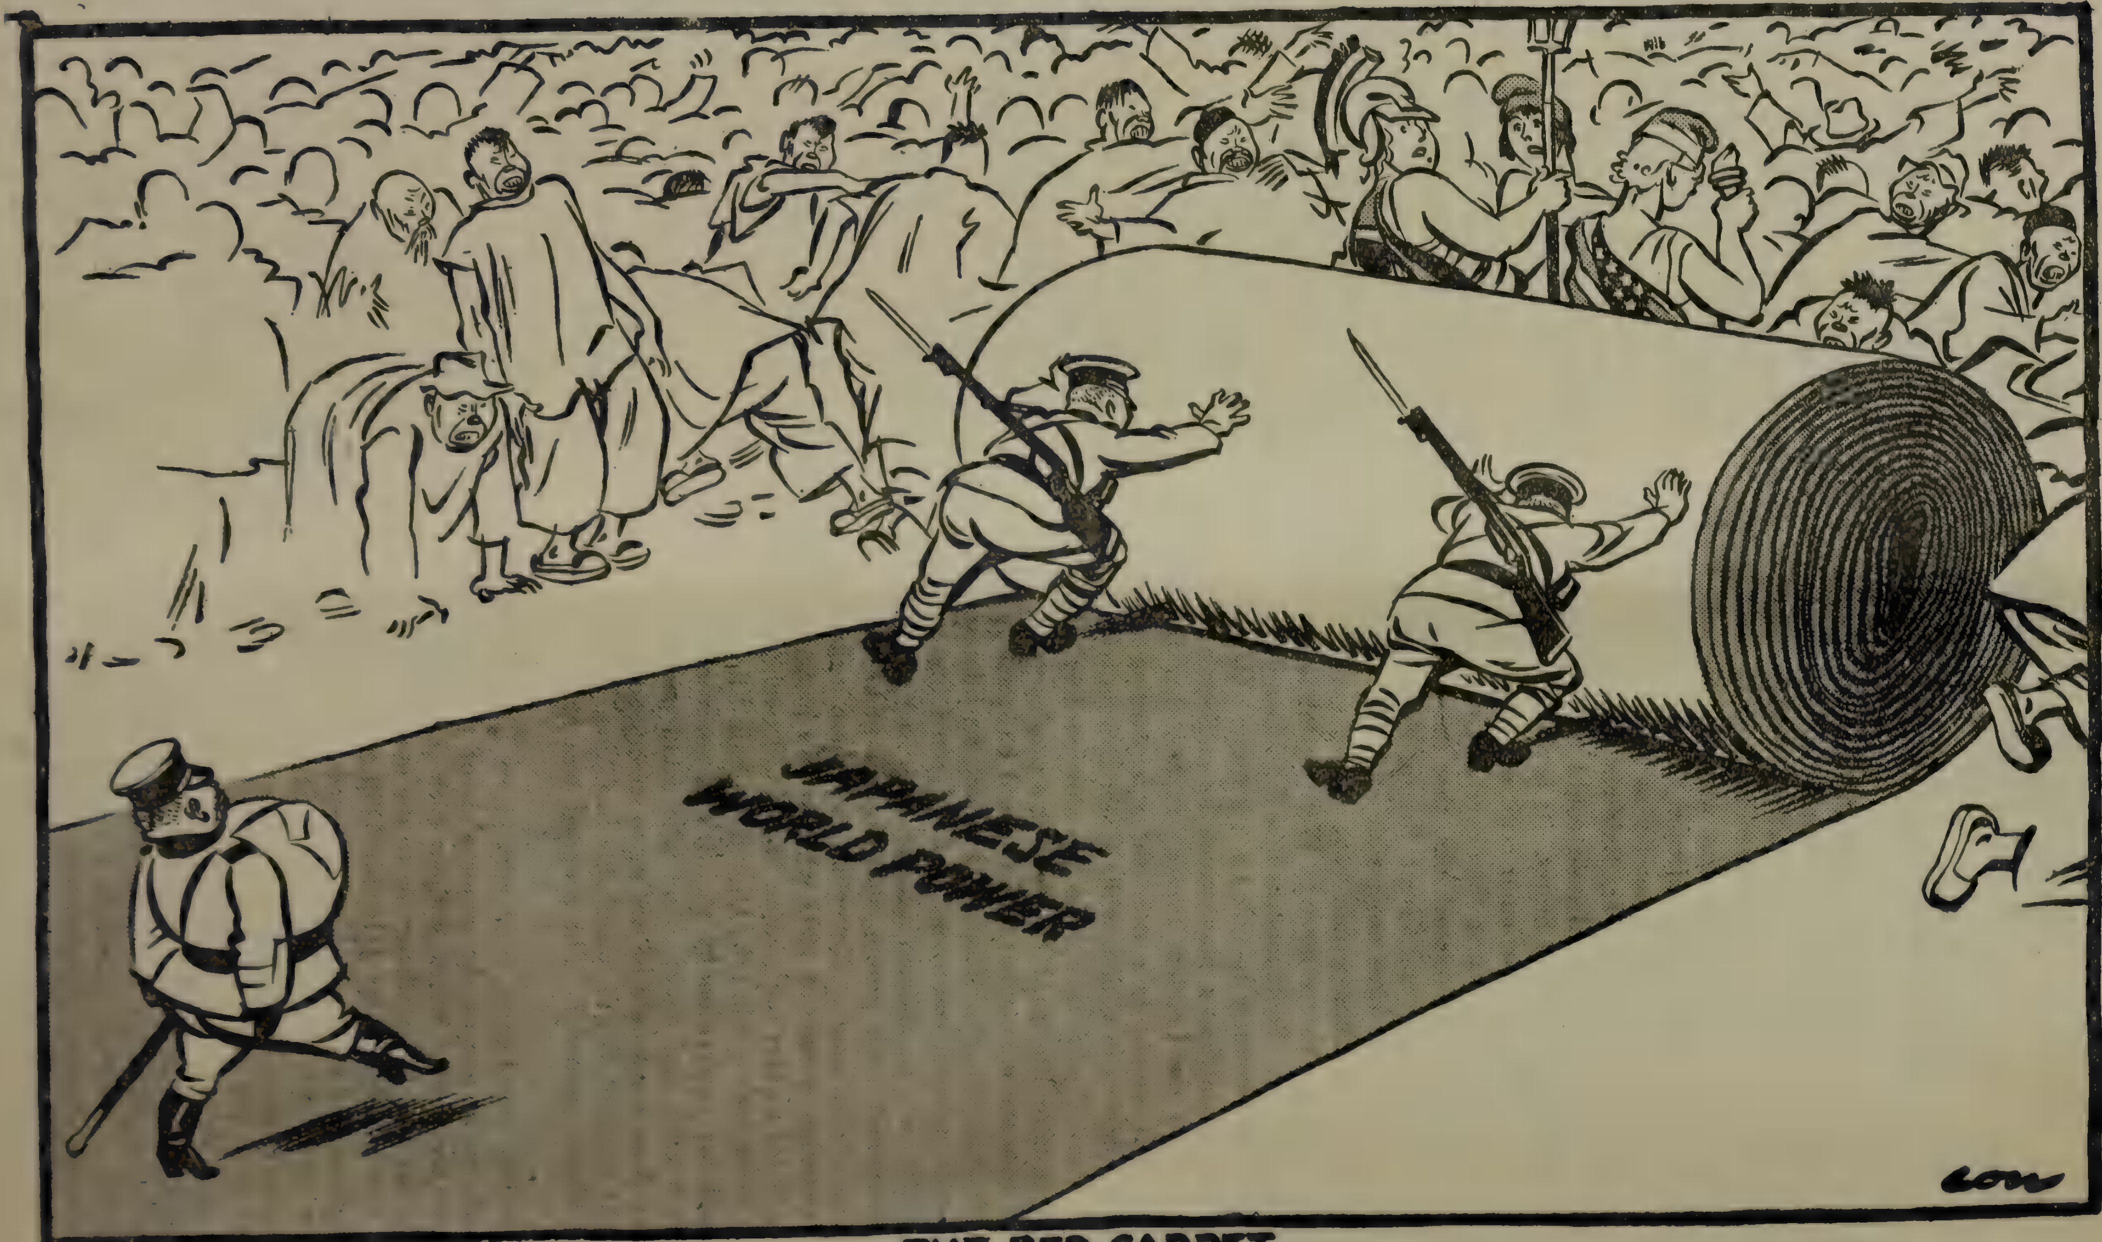
None the less, moral cooperation with Great Britain at all times ought to be one of the major aims of the State Department of the United States, without such cooperation binding us in any way to an alliance or to the use of force. Writing in Foreign Affairs for July, Sir Willmott Lewis, the able correspondent of the London Times in Washington, says that the relationship of the United States and the British commonwealth is "incomparably the most fruitful for good or evil" in all the pattern of international affairs, and proves it by pointing out how great a change would be effected in the entire international situation if there were marked antagonism between the United States and the United Kingdom—similar, let us say, to the relationship between Germany and France. He dwells on the fact that the "primary interest" of the English-speaking world is peace. He correctly points out that the difference between British and American policy is a constitutional one, that under the British constitution executive and legislative powers are one, whereas in the United States the powers of government are diffused. "Thus," he writes, "it is that American foreign policy so often resembles Penelope's web, for what is woven by the President may be unwoven by the Senate, to the confusion of such suitors as, for instance, Secretary Hay with his treaties, President Taft with his proposal for arbitration, and President Wilson with his Covenant of the League of Nations." This has been, and is, a reason that foreign countries are puzzled whether to accept a declaration by the American Executive as binding in the absence of action by the Senate. Sir Willmott makes the interesting suggestion that the hesitancy of the great powers to adopt the non-recognition doctrine of Secretary Stimson in the case of Manchoukuo was due to the fear that the Senate would not back up Mr. Stimson and President Hoover.

Even in Great Britain, however, there have been marked changes in foreign policy, though the historical continuity has been preserved for a long while. But if a really radical government should come into power, there might be a new departure in British foreign policy. Sir Willmott's final conclusion is that Walter Lippmann's demand for clearer definition of British and American policy "at the point of greatest susceptibility as a basis for closer action between the two countries" does not cover the situation. It is "too gradual." What he would have is "the development on this side of the Atlantic of a positive concern with the causes of war everywhere." With this surely everyone can agree. But that does not mean that if such a positive concern were developed here it would result either in a de facto alliance with Great Britain or in joint action with Great Britain in every case. What we need is sympathetic understanding with Great Britain and, as I have already said, moral cooperation at all possible points. If Japan again takes another slice of China, there might well be a joint protest by both the great Anglo-Saxon countries and a publicly announced counseling together on the measures to be taken to focus public opinion upon an obvious aggressor who is bound to find one excuse after the other to dismember China and dominate Asia.

This focusing of an aroused and outraged public opinion so as to bring it to bear effectively on events in Europe or in Asia is the great problem before all enlightened statesmen. It is the one genuine hope of escape from another bath of blood for the whole world. It does seem as if we should be able to work out a consistent American foreign policy along this line, one which would be adhered to both by Congress and by successive administrations of whatever party.

Oswald Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW



JAPANESE
WORLD POWER
LOW

THE RED CARPET.

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press

The Radio Nostrum Racket

By RICHARD LEE STROUT

A STARTLING exposure of the kind of drugs that go into patent medicines now being advertised all over the country by the radio was given before the Federal Communications Commission by Dr. Arthur J. Cramp, representing the American Medical Association, at the recent National Conference on Education and Broadcasting. Dealing by name with such nostrums as Peruna, Willard's Tablets, Ex-Lax, Alka-Seltzer, and Crazy Crystals, this extraordinary story of drugged proprietary medicines received, naturally enough perhaps, practically no newspaper attention. But the announcement by the Columbia Broadcasting Corporation that it was going to clear its own channels of objectionable advertising of this type, coupled with the drastic action of the Communications Commission in summoning twenty-one radio stations to show cause why their licenses should not be canceled after they had carried the notorious Marmola program, indicates that public pressure for an extensive radio house-cleaning is making headway at last.

Even the action of the Communications Commission, which affected many of the outstanding stations of the country, failed to attract widespread newspaper notice. In the past the commission has occasionally cited individual stations for broadcasting quack remedies, but this is the first time that it has taken to task what appears to be the entire roster of stations carrying a specific objectionable program. Furthermore, in previous cases the commission has usually dropped proceedings after the specific program was discontinued; in this case, however, although citations against sixteen of the original twenty-one stations were dropped after their discontinuance of the Marmola program and promise of good behavior, the remaining five stations, including Station KNX of Los Angeles, with a 50,000-watt clear-channel, must appear at a meeting of censure on next October 3, when hearings will he held.

The twenty-one stations originally cited for broadcasting the Marmola program extended from coast to coast. The program, the report indicates, was sent out twice a day for fifteen-minute periods for approximately two months. Broadcasters now frankly admit they knew nothing of the product whose alleged virtues their stations extolled; but instead of taking this ignorance as damning evidence of lack of social responsibility, the Communications Commission accepted the plea as reason for letting sixteen of the twenty-one stations off.

Marmola is a preparation represented as able to reduce fat; it contains a powerful drug. Back in 1929 the Federal Trade Commission barred the company from distributing its product unless it was accompanied by a statement that it was dangerous to health except when taken under the supervision of a physician. In a test case the Supreme Court held, however, that the commission had exceeded its authority, since interstate commerce was not proved, although the court agreed that the evidence showed the preparation was unsafe for general distribution except under medical advice. The Post Office then summoned the company in a fraud order, and the Marmola producers agreed to quit business and cease mail distribution. As a matter of fact the company merely reorganized and changed its name, and as the Raladam Company proceeded to distribute the same old Marmola through drugstores instead of by mail, and to use in large part the great agency of the radio instead of newspaper advertising.

The Communications Commission has life-and-death control over broadcasting stations through its power to extend or cancel customary six-month licenses, but political factors have hitherto made it extremely timid in using this authority. Now, however, under the bolder leadership of Anning S. Prall, the new chairman, it seems bent on cracking the whip over some of the big stations. The testimony given to the commission by Dr. Cramp as the official representative of the American Medical Association—he offered transcripts of specific patent-medicine programs made from phonographic records taken off the air—shows the crying need of action to stop the most dangerous exploitation of the public attempted in years. Dr. Cramp, appearing with Dr. W. W. Bauer of the A. M. A., made his statement in public hearings on May 15. His testimony showed beyond all doubt that the radio-equipped home is being furnished misleading and fraudulent advertisements of nostrums that are deleterious to health, habit-forming, or downright poisonous. Analyses of the ingredients of the nostrums listed were, in most cases, made by experts of the American Medical Association. Dr. Cramp's testimony, then, is the authoritative comment of the spokesman of America's premier medical organization on the products which make use of the publicly owned radio channels with federal acquiescence.

Introducing his statements with the remarks, "I have tried as nearly as possible to take a fair cross-section of patent-medicine advertising as it goes on the air today," he continued as follows, according to the transcript of evidence of the Federal Communications Commission:

ALKA-SELTZER

> Alka-Seltzer is advertised so as to play up the idea that it is an "anti-acid." . . . The essential drug in Alka-Seltzer is aspirin, or, as known in the medical profession, acetyl salicylic acid. . . . When you dissolve two tablets of Alka-Seltzer in a glass of water, as is suggested in the trade package, you get, according to the analysis of the chemists of the American Medical Association, nearly nine grains of aspirin and nearly one grain of salicylic acid, together with the citric acid and baking soda that produce the effervescence. A person who follows the directions and takes sixteen tablets a day would obviously consume over seventy grains of aspirin and over six grains of salicylic acid in that period. . . . Nowhere, however, is any hint given of the amount of aspirin present, and it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the vast majority of people who take Alka-Seltzer are still quite ignorant of the fact that they are taking aspirin. While the public generally believes that aspirin is harmless, the medical profession has long known its potentialities for producing alarming symptoms . . . while there have been reported in medical literature several causes of death from the use of aspirin.

CRAZY CRYSTALS

Crazy Crystals are said to be "just the minerals taken from the natural water." The water in question is Crazy Water, a preparation that in the past has been the subject of action by Federal Food and Drug officials in at least sixteen cases. A large number of these cases were brought because the water contained filthy, decomposed, and putrid substances. Some of the cases were brought because Crazy Water was sold under the claim that it was curative . . . claims that were declared in court to be false and fraudulent. From the various published reports of the Crazy Water concern itself, it is admitted that the chief ingredient is sodium sulphate, commonly known as Glauber's salt, or the "horse salts" of the veterinarian. . . . Salts or saline cathartics are among the most abused medicaments used by the public. They should be classed among habit-forming drugs, for there is no question that they are responsible for a large proportion of cases of cathartic habit. . . .

PERUNA

Peruna is a patent medicine that has been on the market for many years. It has always been highly alcoholic, the amount of alcohol varying from 27 per cent to the present 18 per cent. The drugs that are alleged to be in it, in addition to alcohol, have varied at different times. Thirty years ago the Office of Indian Affairs forbade the sale of Peruna to the Indians because they got drunk on it. About the same time the Bureau of Internal Revenue notified Hartman, who then put the stuff out, that he would have to put some drugs in Peruna or take out a liquor license. He added senna. This cut down the sale to such an extent that Hartman attempted to recoup his losses by putting the old Peruna back on the market under another name—Ka-tar-no—to be sold under liquor-license restrictions. At that time Peruna contained 20 per cent of alcohol. When national prohibition went on the statute books the Peruna concern cut down its alcohol content from 20 to 12 per cent for the domestic Peruna, although export Peruna still contained 20 per cent. About 1927 Peruna increased the alcohol from 12 to 18 per cent, the amount that it still has. Alcohol is a narcotic drug, and sold indiscriminately to the public in the guise of a "patent medicine," it carries with it very definite dangers. The Peruna broadcast, it will be noted, recommends that "a tablespoonful or two" be taken about half an hour before each meal and before going to bed. Two tablespoonfuls is an ounce, or about half a wineglassful. As Peruna contains twice the amount of alcohol to be found in champagne, the amount of alcohol the purchaser may get is by no means negligible.

WILLARD'S TABLETS

The Willard Tablets advertising theme is that the preparation is a home treatment for poor digestion, heartburn, acid dyspepsia, and stomach ulcers. . . . The tablets themselves were reported in the Journal of the American Medical Association to be just another one of the anti-acid preparations, containing, essentially, baking powder, bismuth subnitrate, and magnesium oxide, a combination that is put up in non-proprietary form by most of the pharmaceutical houses and sold, not, of course, for stomach ulcer, but for symptomatic treatment of hyperacidity.

I might interpolate at this time that there has been a terrific number of these stomach-ulcer and hyperacidity patent medicines on the market during the depression. The reason is not far to see. The depression has brought about a condition of worry in the minds of hundreds of thousands and millions, and that worry has reflected itself by upset digestive conditions, particularly with hyperacidity. These people have been led to believe by advertising over the radio and otherwise that they are suffering from stomach ulcer. . . .

EX-LAX

Ex-Lax is broadcast as "the delicious chocolate laxative that will not form a habit." The purgative drug in Ex-Lax is phenolphthalein, which, like all chemical purgatives, may form a habit. There have been numerous cases reported in medical literature of serious results following the use of phenolphthalein. . . . Yet this preparation Ex-Lax is put up in the enticing form of a candy and sold to all who wish to buy. In 1932 a case was reported in the Journal of the American Medical Association of a ten-year-old boy who ate the contents of a box of Ex-Lax in mistake for candy and died. The medical profession has gone on record as being opposed to the indiscriminate sale of powerful drugs put up in the form of candy or chewing gum. . . . Dr. F. J. Cullen of the Federal Food and Drug Administration issued a warning in 1933 against the dangers to the public health in the widespread exploitation of phenolphthalein put up in the form of confections.

Commenting on the analysis, Dr. Cramp emphasized that the preparations singled out were "by no means the most objectionable" but were taken as a fair cross-section. Dr. Cramp is a practical man and did not enter into philosophical discussions of why publicly owned ether channels should be turned over to private interests for exploitation. His plea was based on concrete grounds—possibly the medical profession's jealousy of its prerogatives played a part. Radio advertising of patent medicines, he declared, is more objectionable than newspaper advertising on four counts:

> Many newspapers as a matter of enlightened self-interest have developed certain standards of decency and censorship that keep out of their pages the advertisements of many products of this character. Further, the public has through several generations developed a defense mechanism against the printed word and is much less likely to be carried away by false or fraudulent claims made in cold type than it is when similar claims are made verbally by a plausible radio announcer. Then, too, claims that are to be made in a printed form have a permanency that causes the makers of them to be much more cautious than when they are to have the ephemeral character of a radio broadcast. It is also to be remembered that impressionable young people do not, as a rule, read patent-medicine advertisements in newspapers or magazines. These same people can hardly avoid listening to the patent-medicine ballyhoo that comes into their homes over the radio.

The commission's action in the Marmola case followed Dr. Cramp's testimony but was not connected with it, according to a member of the commission. Since then has come the denunciation by Congressman Culkin of New York of the government's part in helping to make the youth of the nation "alcohol conscious" through the admission of liquor advertisements to radio channels. The changed policy announced by the Columbia Broadcasting Corporation seems to indicate a feeling among the powers-that-be, not that exploitation of the public radio domain is bad in itself, but that it can be carried too far; that, in the words of Dr. Cramp, "broadly speaking, broadcasting stations are still far behind newspapers and magazines in their recognition not merely of the dangers to the public health involved in the advertising of these secret nostrums, but also of the public loss of confidence in all advertising that such advertisements are bound to engender eventually."

Behind the Overthrow of Calles

By L. O. PRENDERGAST

Mexico City, June 27

THE Mexican Revolution has reached the parting of the ways. Usually mistaken for a popular, proletarian movement but actually a bourgeois revolution nearly classic in design, in which the middle class used the force of mass discontent as a weapon for the achievement of its own aims, it has now discarded its proletarian content and avowed its class character. The cycle which began in 1911 with the overthrow of General Díaz reached its apogee in the years 1917-24, and it has since been slowly descending the curve of completion. The abdication of General Calles, whose sensational declarations published in the Mexico City press of June 12 precipitated the crisis which unseated him, marks its end.

There is an apparent paradox here in the fact that in the crisis just surmounted Calles took the reactionary position and President Lázaro Cárdenas, who succeeds him as actual as well as nominal ruler, the radical-progressive. But that the paradox is only apparent and not real the following analysis should make clear.

The last four years in Mexico have been marked by one political crisis after another. Superficially the product of that selfish ambition and personalismo which have ever been the curse of Mexican politics, they have nevertheless sprung, in a more profound sense, from the new economic forces stirring in the country. The impact of the world depression, while it has had little effect on the mass of the rural population, which lives in a state of permanent depression, has had serious repercussions among the city workers. The result has been a rising unrest which has begun to produce a division of opinion among the ruling groups over the manner in which the as yet unchallenged domination of the Partido Nacional Revolucionario (PNR) might best be maintained. Above this still embryonic schism, holding his henchmen in line with an iron hand, distributing punishment and rewards as occasion required, loomed the powerful figure of General Plutarco Elías Calles, ex-President and, since 1924, virtual dictator of Mexico.

The first open indication of the rift came with the "resignation" of President Pascual Ortiz Rubio in 1932. After the assassination of President-elect Alvaro Obregón in 1928, Calles appointed Emilio Portes Gil as ad interim President until elections could safely be held for a new chief executive to fill out Obregón's term. In 1929 Calles directed the convention of the National Revolutionary Party to nominate Ortiz Rubio, and he was duly elected by the usual comfortable majority. Some time after he took possession of his office in 1930, this feeble puppet was encouraged by ambitious fools, seeking to control him for their own purposes against Calles, to believe that the President of Mexico had a right to think and act for himself. By 1932 a division of the party, based on personalities and involving no economic, social, or political issue, was being created. Calles, who could tolerate no such split in his hand-fed instrument of political domination, acted swiftly and ruthlessly. Ortiz Rubio was forced to resign and leave the country the day after he had told an opening session of the national congress that the rumors of his impending resignation were without foundation in fact.

General Abelardo Rodríguez, close personal friend and business partner of General Calles, was appointed to fill out the unexpired term of his unhappy predecessor, the third President to take office for the period for which Obregón had been elected. The "revolution" now took a sharp turn to the right with a "business" administration under which both native and foreign capital began to bloom. The inside group of enriched revolutionaries around Rodríguez and Calles had feet and hands in the public trough. Building contracts, concessions, and other favors yielded them millions of pesos. Industrialization of the country took a sharp upswing.

But unrest was growing. By 1934 real wages in Mexico City and other industrial regions had shrunk approximately 25 per cent. A false prosperity induced by the depreciation of the currency and by the growing tourist boom provided a semblance of well-being, but the substance was lacking. As always under capitalist "prosperity," the masses were for the most part excluded and the lower middle class was receiving a relatively small share. The labor unions, which for years had existed in a state of suspended animation comparable to that of the American Federation of Labor prior to the NRA, now began to stir. The end of President Rodríguez's term was marked by strikes and a growing solidarity among the unions. Something had to be done.

Rodríguez and his powerful financial and industrial friends knew very well what they wanted to do. Nazi propaganda was making progress in Mexico through the almost open instrumentality of the German Embassy. Jew-baiting, hitherto unknown, suddenly appeared. The Acción Revolucionaria Mexicanista, also known as the Camisas Doradas, or Gold Shirts, was born, with the support, it was everywhere said, of Rodríguez, Aarón Sáenz, governor of the Federal District, and the Monterrey group of heavy industrialists. The reactionary leading circles of the PNR were preparing to throw overboard the crimson demagogy which had served them so long and so well. A resort to an active offensive against workers and peons and an open approach to fascism were in the offing.

However, Calles decided that the traditional methods by which the PNR had maintained its rule for a decade were good for at least one more whirl. On his advice the convention of the party which nominated the new President also adopted a Six-Year Plan as its platform. The plan was designed to advance the proletarian cause, to solve the agrarian problem, to reorganize the national economy, to construct a vast system of public works, to instal socialist education in the schools, and, in the words of one of its more frenetic propagandists, who became Minister of Education in the Cárdenas Cabinet, to prepare for the final abolition of the capitalist system and the dictatorship of the proletariat! General Cárdenas was selected to sell this fantastic piece of demagogy to the Mexican people.

On December 1, 1934, General Cárdenas was duly installed in office. Calles had been careful not to allow him too much latitude, and his first Cabinet, although it contained a few personal followers of the President, was in its key positions filled by such figures as Rodolfo Elías Calles—son of the General—Juan de Dios Bojórquez, Aarón Sáenz, Narciso Bassols, Tomás Garrido Canábal, and Abraham Ayala González, all of them staunch supporters of Calles and representing his will in the government. At the head of the PNR was another Calles man, General Matías Ramos. The Senate and Chamber of Deputies both contained a Callista majority. In the army a majority of the generals with forces at their command were followers of Calles.

When he was inaugurated, President Cárdenas realized very well that he was universally considered a mere instrument of Calles, without any personality of his own. Everyone supposed that like Ortiz Rubio before him—until, that is, Rubio lost his head—he would faithfully carry out the policy of his master. But Calles had made a mistake. Cárdenas, or his political advisers, saw an opportunity and they were not slow to take advantage of it. It was a dangerous game, for failure meant political suicide at the very least and perhaps physical extinction as well. But in the lofty promises of the Six-Year Plan Calles had given the new President a magnificent weapon.

During his first six months Cárdenas did little but run for office. Although elected by a prodigious majority—the party machine had seen to that—no one knew better than he how meaningless that was. He now set out deliberately to create a personality for himself independent of General Calles. To attract the peons, he promised land and yet more land, not only to the villages in the form of ejidos, the former practice of the revolution, but to individuals as well. To attract the workers, he encouraged strikes and organization. He carried on a well-planned campaign to gain the confidence of the army, placing military chieftains loyal to himself one by one in command of the various military zones.

In the meantime Calles had retired to his estate in Sinaloa, ostensibly to allow Cárdenas a free hand in the government. Garrido Canábal, ex-governor of the state of Tabasco, a tool of Calles, was instigated to carry the formal "revolutionary" antagonism of the government toward the church to outrageous lengths, with the purpose of embarrassing the new administration before conservative opinion at home and, more important, in the United States. Garrido, a fantastic Mexican version of our own Huey Long, had built himself a personal dictatorship in Tabasco with the help of his Red Shirts, a private army of guntoting hoodlums. When he entered the Cabinet he brought them with him to Mexico City. Now he turned them loose on the churchgoers of the Federal District. The "anti-religious" campaign filled the American newspapers with indignation. In the United States Senate a resolution was introduced calling for an investigation—almost for intervention.

But for a time, and in a roundabout way, even this trick worked for Cárdenas. It provided him with a much-needed diversion to raise his prestige among the organized workers and peasants. A government which strove actively to curb the power of the church, to close religious schools, to substitute socialist for bourgeois-Catholic education must be revolutionary! What ground Cárdenas was losing with the religious and politically negligible sections of the middle class he was gaining with the lower classes, where he needed it most. As for the bad publicity in the United States, he could afford to take his chances.

But prices were still going up and wages down. The promises of the Mexican New Deal must be made good by something more than the kidnapping of the Archbishop of Mexico. Under the frank encouragement of the President the labor unions grew. Strikes increased in number and soon developed into a wave of unrest similar—although much smaller in scale—to the struggles initiated by Roosevelt's New Deal.

Calles had gone to the United States for medical treatment and while he was away lost contact to some extent with developments at home. On his return to Sinaloa he was besieged by political friends complaining of the strong anti-Calles sentiment being formed in the government, the object of which was to eliminate Calles from control and establish the independence of Cárdenas. Also to the dictator in his "retirement" came the anguished laments of the big capitalists, who wanted to know how much longer President Cárdenas was to be permitted to run riot. In March Calles returned to the center of affairs and installed himself in Las Palmas, his residence in Cuernavaca, near Mexico City.

Cárdenas, too, began to worry, feeling, perhaps, that the game had been played too fast. Socialism was all very well so long as it was confined to paper plans and an ill-defined future; the official demagogy was being taken altogether too seriously and was feeding the confidence of the labor unions and fostering a growing radicalism. The Communist Party, illegal for several years, had been legalized for the elections, part of the government's show of liberalism and revolutionary sincerity. Now it was gaining ground, striking root among several important sectors of the industrial workers, notably the railroad workers, and carrying on a determined campaign for a united front of all workers' and peasants' organizations.

Cárdenas retreated momentarily. The labor leaders were called into conference with the government, and the subject of obligatory, in place of the existing optional, arbitration in strikes was delicately broached. The despicable Morones, hoping to regain the government support he once enjoyed, readily assented, but Lombardo and the others refused. Cárdenas made no further move backward.

In the meantime signs of discord between the friends of General Cárdenas and General Calles were becoming more visible daily. At the end of May a division took place in both chambers of Congress; a "left wing" was formed by the Cárdenistas. In a minority at first, they nevertheless strove to affirm their liberty of opinion and to free themselves from the control of the PNR, which claimed the right on grounds of party discipline to control all acts of senators and deputies. In spite of the "left-wing" designation, which was so much eyewash, the party was dividing itself according to the traditional personalismo of Mexican politics into Callistas and Cardenistas.

On Tuesday, June 11, a commission of left-wing senators went to Cuernavaca to lay the situation before Calles, whom they still recognized as their "chief," and to seek his support against the majority in Congress and the PNR. It was then that Calles loosed the thunderbolt which appeared in the Mexico City press the following morning. Categorically disapproving the attitude of the left wing, he denounced all divisions in the party and accused the dissidents of attempting to foment discord between President Cárdenas and himself. In even stronger language he delivered an attack on the workers' organizations and their leaders and on the series of recent strikes as unjustified, the product of "illegitimate" interests, and prejudicial to the prosperity and stability of the government and to the period of reconstruction which the revolution had now entered.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

As everyone in Mexico instantly realized, Cárdenas was confronted at last with the showdown. Mexico waited breathlessly for the decision, while the newspapers were filled with messages of congratulation to Calles from the Chamber of Commerce, business men, and all the conservative elements, including even the Catholics, to whom his name had been anathema only a short while ago. A development which Calles had obviously not expected—in his declaration he had made contemptuous reference to the inability of the syndicates to agree among themselves—gave Cárdenas his ace in the hole. The very same day the Sindicato Mexicano de Electricistas called a meeting to which all but two labor organizations sent delegates. The united front was voted and a resolution adopted branding the Calles statement as a fascist provocation and threatening a general strike if any rights of the Mexican working class were encroached upon. Within forty-eight hours after Calles's declarations a united front comprising at least 70 per cent of the Mexican workers became a reality.

It is impossible to think that this unexpected result of the political struggle for domination between Calles and Cárdenas did not play a decisive course in setting the latter's course, since he waited until after the formation of the united front to give his answer. It was published on Friday, June 14. Without mentioning Calles personally or even alluding to his declarations but appealing generally to public opinion on his administration, Cárdenas said in substance that he considered it essential to continue his pro-labor policy, since, even though industrial conflict was temporarily damaging to the national economy, in the long run it would provide a better equilibrium between capital and labor. At the same time he warned both capital and labor that while they would continue to enjoy the rights and guaranties provided by the law, the government would tolerate no "inconvenient agitations," a broad hint of what was to come later. This statement was taken as the definitive break between the two men and signified in effect that Cárdenas proposed to assume the full responsibility of his office and to eliminate Calles from all voice in the government. The following day he convoked a special meeting of his Cabinet at which he demanded the resignation of all his ministers and heads of departments so as to leave him a free hand to reorganize his government on a more homogeneous base, both personally and politically. On the same day the Cabinet members presented their resignations, and the President of the PNR, who in Mexico is a sort of Minister of Policy without Portfolio, also resigned.

Calles had lost. His ultimate hope might have been the army, but Cárdenas had done his work well. With the adherence to the President of General Saturnino Cedillo, the most powerful of the military commanders, Calles realized that he was through. On Monday he issued a brief statement announcing his complete retirement from politics. It was his abdication. On Tuesday he left the capital to return to El Tambor, Sinaloa. In place of the huge crowds which ordinarily gathered to see him off on his journeys, there were relatively few people.

President Cárdenas then proceeded to reorganize his government, eliminating all the Calles elements and replacing them with men personally loyal to himself. There is in Mexico no Prime Minister who takes the responsibility of forming a new Cabinet, but in practice the president of the PNR has acquired this function. Emilio Portes Gil, ex-President of the republic, Attorney General under Rodríguez, and until recently Minister of Foreign Affairs in the first Cárdenas Cabinet, became the new president of the PNR and is considered Cárdenas's most dependable aide.

Not until the announcement of the new Cabinet late on Monday, June 17, was it known just how astute was the political game which Cárdenas and Portes Gil had played. They had forced Calles into a position where he could be branded a reactionary and so eliminated from political life. In so doing they had gained the redoubled confidence of the workers' and peasants' organizations. It now remained to draw in the other sectors—business, the conservative-religious elements, and Washington. From Fernando Gonzáles Roa, ex-Ambassador to the United States, who now becomes Minister of Foreign Affairs, to General Saturnino Cedillo, protector of the Catholics in the state of San Luis Potosí of which he was governor, now Minister of Agriculture, the Cabinet is either avowedly conservative or else composed of elements over which Cárdenas has complete control. Gone are the firebrands, Garrido Canábal and García Tellez, former Minister of Education. The case of the latter is particularly revealing of the new tendency. Although a close personal friend of Cárdenas, he was let out because the new government must divest itself as quickly as possible of its "radical" taint, and García Tellez was held largely responsible by the conservative public for the anti-clerical campaign and the implantation of socialist education in the schools. Religious persecution will now die down and socialist education will languish. The demagogy of the Six-Year Plan has served Cárdenas well, but now it must be toned down, for with Calles gone he will begin to play Calles's role.

His task will not be easy. The united front of labor is an accomplished fact. The workers are in a militant mood, and while they are solidly behind Cárdenas now, he will begin to lose their support as he turns more openly to the right. The strike movement is increasing, as the working class becomes more determined to raise its standards of living and to obtain some share of the current spotty prosperity. What will Cárdenas do? As the strike movement grows, he will be forced to take action, and the united front, which helped him to defeat Calles, will become a problem. The danger of fascism in Mexico is for that reason greater now than with Calles in the saddle. If he is pushed to it, Cárdenas may himself attempt a fascist coup. On the other hand, if he should fail to control the whirlwind he has helped to raise, the way would be open for the return to power of Calles or some other spokesman of big capital in a fascist dictatorship which would be accepted as the only alternative to a possible uprising of the united workers and peasants. But whatever happens, one thing is certain: the Mexican Revolution is dead.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

The New British Cabinet

By HAROLD J. LASKI

London, June 16

ON June 7 Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's political career effectively came to a close. Mr. Baldwin was sworn in as Prime Minister and Mr. MacDonald became Lord President of the Council—a titular office to which no functions attach. As a general election cannot now be long postponed, and as Mr. MacDonald is pretty certain to be beaten if he fights Seaham again, it is a reasonable political speculation that he will no longer play any important part in the nation's affairs.

The new Cabinet is not very different from the old. Amid universal relief Sir John Simon ceases to be Foreign Secretary, but a price has had to be paid for his retirement. He has taken over the Home Office, and is to be deputy leader of the House of Commons. Everyone hoped that Mr. Eden would have succeeded him at the Foreign Office. But that would have been too explicit a criticism of Sir John. Sir Samuel Hoare, who conducted the India bill through the House with great energy, therefore gets his place, and Mr. Eden becomes a Cabinet Minister especially concerned with League of Nations business. Whether the experiment of having, practically, two Foreign Secretaries will work well remains to be seen. Sir Samuel is said to have very much the pre-war mind in international relations; and Mr. Eden is certainly of a very different temper. It is, I think, a good guess that harmony will be made by Mr. Baldwin himself, who is likely to be fairly active in this realm.

Lord Londonderry ceases to be Air Minister—a post in which his failure was complete—and is succeeded by Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister, who leaves the Colonial Office to Mr. Malcolm MacDonald, the ex-Premier's son. The latter, who is thirty-three, is a pleasant young man, of no particular ability, whose sudden elevation may be taken as a kindly way—typical of Mr. Baldwin—of easing the ex-Premier's retirement by soothing his paternal feelings. To preserve the balance of parties this has involved the retirement of Lord Sankey from the Woolsack. It is a fairly open secret that Mr. Baldwin was loath to let him go, and that Lord Hailsham, the new Chancellor, was also eager for Lord Sankey's retention. But Mr. Ramsay MacDonald made no effort to keep him, and with his retirement the best reforming Chancellor of modern times probably disappears from public life. His retirement is another instance of Mr. MacDonald's curious inability to be loyal to those who have rendered him devoted service.

Mr. Thomas, of course, remains, though everyone feels that he is completely unequal to the delicate post he holds. He has badly muddled Ireland, and he is now engaged in badly muddling the affairs of the African protectorates. Mr. Oliver Stanley gives up the Nessus shirt of the Ministry of Labor for that of Education; and the latter office is surrendered by the profound Christian mystic Lord Halifax, who becomes Minister for War. Lord Zetland, who has been Governor of Bombay, becomes Secretary for India—a good appointment, as he has both energy and imagination. Lord Eustace Percy becomes Minister without Portfolio, and it is said that he is to concern himself with economic matters. Mr. Ernest Brown is the new Minister of Labor—a surprise appointment. It was expected that this would go to Mr. Hore-Belisha; but the latter is that pushing, publicity-seeking type in whom a good deal of ability does not compensate for the pretty obvious outlook of the careerist. Sir Hilton Young is pushed from the Ministry of Health into the Lords; and Sir Kingsley Wood, who has been a great success at the Post Office, takes his place.

In a sense, this may fairly be described as a stopgap Cabinet. There is nothing for Mr. Amery, nothing for Mr. Churchill, nothing for the able younger group of the Tories. Mr. Baldwin wants to fight the general election on the "National" ticket; and the changes he has made are minimal to that end. His party can assume that, afterwards, there will be another ministerial reconstruction. For Mr. Ramsay MacDonald will disappear and, probably, his son also; and since nearly all the "National" Labor members will lose their seats, including, I think, Mr. Thomas, there will be a decisive case against the present distribution of offices. If "National" Labor members go, the pressure for ending the whole experiment of coalition government will be strong. It is therefore, I think, a pretty good prophecy that after the general election we shall be back again to a straight Conservative government. If the Simonite Liberals remain, they are likely, like the Liberal Unionists after the Home Rule split, to be absorbed into the Tory party.

The first big act of the new government is, clearly enough, likely to be the rejection of the Lloyd George policy. There have been long discussions, but the distance between him and the Cabinet has been too wide to bridge. That means that whatever influence Mr. Lloyd George possesses will be thrown against the government at the general election. Already, with the assistance of men like Professor Gilbert Murray and Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, he has launched a manifesto which seeks to draw away that part of the Nonconformist vote which is still pacifist and progressive from the government. He will do some damage to its influence. But it does not look as though he will be the important factor he seemed likely to be six months ago. He shot his bolt too early, and the long-drawn-out negotiations with the Cabinet have deflected interest away from his plans.

All in all, the experiment that has now closed bears out the general historic lesson that, in the long run, coalition government always redounds to the interest of the Tory party. Mr. MacDonald is one of the unburied dead; his supporters make no impact whatever on affairs. They are merely a façade of temporary confusion behind which Mr. Baldwin may do just as he pleases. In the four years of his coalition Premiership Mr. MacDonald has simply managed to betray that Labor Party which made his whole career possible without even earning the respect of his new allies. Under his rule the interests of property have been able to consolidate themselves as at no time since the war. Blow after blow has been struck at the strength and prestige of the League. The Disarmament Conference has been reduced to a pathetic nullity. Economic nationalism has been gravely intensified by Ottawa and the new protective system. Education and the social services have suffered seriously. India has been given a constitution which no political Indian of prominence even pretends to defend. Anglo-Irish relations are worse than at any time since the treaty. A tacit encouragement has been offered to Hitlerite Germany of which its masters have taken full advantage, to the detriment of any possible hope of security—and therefore recovery—in the next few years. This is the price we have had to pay for Mr. MacDonald's decision of 1931. He protests whenever he speaks that he is still a Socialist. His former associates may be pardoned for their conviction that they are now entitled to doubt whether there was ever a sense in which he was a Socialist at all.

The new Cabinet, one may suspect, will make no serious innovations between now and the general election. It will fight that on two issues. It will say that under its auspices Great Britain has weathered the storm better than any other great power, and it will argue that a Labor victory would mean confusion and possible crisis. It will fight with the additional advantage on its side that the international situation will make a large number of electors timid about the prospects of change. If it is victorious, and if there is no war, it will repeat the habits of the Baldwin government of 1925-29. At all costs the government will play the business man's game. The distressed areas will remain distressed; the League will remain a polite fiction to which adequate lip-service is most scrupulously paid; doles and subsidies will be handed out to industries where support can be counted on; and diehard Tory opinion will be placated by heavy increases in armaments and the "reform" of the House of Lords. Of these two last we shall hear nothing until after the general election. They will then be introduced on the pleas, respectively, that they make for international security and for domestic stability.

The tragedy of it all is that British public opinion is ready for a great move forward both abroad and at home. It can get neither under the present institutional set-up of affairs. The men of property are prepared for none of the risks of great adventure. Their standards of good are set by those grim considerations which in the past have made them yield out of abundance to pressure what they would never yield to justice. Now, in their view, the abundance is gone, and they are not, accordingly, prepared to yield at all. Even the attitude of Mr. Roosevelt is unthinkable to them; and few things have been more interesting than their obvious Schadenfreude at the Supreme Court's decision in the Schechter case. A few years from now I think it certain—war apart—that the Labor Party will come into its own. But in those years the gap between the ideology of parties is certain to widen, and the consequences of that disparity will be momentous when the Labor Party gets its majority.

More and more the events of the past few years have convinced me that parliamentary government in a capitalist democracy is unlikely to transcend the limitations of its capitalist base. It might have done so if the Labor government of 1929 had shown itself bold in the face of its problems. Its failure put the initiative in the hands of its opponents. Property, as I read history, has rarely failed to grasp its opportunities when these have been presented to it. It is grasping them now; and the habits it displays are causally linked to the events abroad of which Hitlerism is only the logical term.

Hull House on Pennsylvania Avenue

By PAUL W. WARD

ALTHOUGH under the Roosevelt Administration virtually nothing has been done to ease international tensions and much has been done to increase them, no rational man can assert with accuracy that the New Deal has been disappointing in its foreign relations. Hope must precede disappointment, and the rise of Roosevelt to power offered no grounds for hope of a change for the better in the foreign policy of the United States.

There were, to be sure, some encouraging utterances from Mr. Roosevelt—his "good neighbor" iterations, for example—but then he himself warned all and sundry not to attach much importance to that or any other section of the New Deal libretto. "Remember well," he said at Butte on September 19, 1932, "that attitude and method, the way we do things, not just the way we say things, is nearly always the measure of our sincerity." And six months later he signalized his true attitude toward foreign relations by naming Cordell Hull, a shy and gentle vote-getter from Tennessee, as his Secretary of State. Roosevelt might just as well have hung from the White House portico a banner saying, "No foreign relations wanted."

The only qualifications Hull had for the ranking post in the Roosevelt Cabinet were his low-tariff fanaticism and the backing of Louis McHenry Howe, who, in addition to being Roosevelt's secretary, was the fire in Roosevelt's flint until ill health laid him low. Howe, Hull, and Wilson's alter ego, Colonel House, formed a triumvirate of elder statesmen to whom Roosevelt looked for guidance in his preconvention campaign, and in that period Howe—ever jealous of his powers as a king-maker—acquired a vast liking and admiration for the self-effacing Hull. House shared the liking but not the admiration; his candidate for the State Department portfolio was his old friend, the once militant pro-League partisan Robert Worth Bingham, the Louisville lawyer and publisher who became, instead, our Ambassador to the Court of St. James's. Roosevelt's own candidate was Owen D. Young, but he soon was persuaded that Young smelled too much of Wall Street. So the office went by default to Hull.

What Roosevelt needed, if there was to be a New Deal in our Foreign Office, was, in the first place, a Secretary of State to whose opinions he granted at least as much authority as he does not only to his own but also to those of such luminaries as Professors Warren and Rogers, Raymond Moley, General Johnson, and Joe Kennedy, the former steel manufacturer and Wall Street speculator whom he made chairman of the SEC. In the second place, he needed a Secretary of State who would keep dinning into his forgetful ears the necessity either for whole-hearted acceptance by this nation of the internationalist responsibilities attendant upon its creditor position or for, at least, resolute avoidance of such steps as were likely to aggravate the distress and insecurity of other nations and so bring war nearer. Had he had such a Secretary of State, it is unlikely that we should be draining the veins of China with our indefensible silver-purchase program; or that with our dollar-devaluation program we should be increasing instead of decreasing our "favorable" balance of trade; or—most important of all—that we should be launched upon the greatest peace-time program of military and naval building in our history, thereby giving aid and comfort to those war-makers, the international munitions racketeers, who are fattening upon the anxiety of Japan and other nations to keep step with our war preparations.

Roosevelt, flitting fretfully from policy to policy under the harassment of multifarious and conflicting counsel on domestic problems, is incapable of constantly envisioning the external effects of his internal maneuverings. Hull is not, for what he lacked in knowledge of foreign affairs when he took over the State Department helm he is rapidly making up by intensive study. But determined and tenacious as Hull is—and no man in Washington matches him in tenacity of purpose—he is incapable of keeping Roosevelt in leash. He is too waterlogged with long years of discipline in party politics to place imposing obstacles in the path of his dashing Chief Executive. Furthermore, he is preoccupied with his studies and with his efforts to chip away mountainous tariff walls with the penknife of reciprocal trade agreements. And even if he were inclined to scream warnings and protests into the President's ears, nothing would come of it, for those ears are reserved for others—for men of "authoritative" opinions, dazzling personalities, and the gift of tongues.

Hull is inept at phrase-making and so devoid of literary sense that the men who compose his speeches sometimes nearly weep over the interpolations he chooses to make in them. He also lacks a striking personality. He is quiet and slightly rustic in his manner. During the Montevideo conference Hull explained a disappearance of several hours by saying he had gone calling on "this yeah local president." He had been visiting the President of Uruguay. He made similarly impromptu and sack-coated calls on all the other dignitaries. Incidentally, it was the modest informality of his manner—in contrast to the "come, make obeisance" bearing of his predecessors, such as Hughes and Root—that more than his official utterances made that Seventh International Conference of American nations into something like a love feast instead of the traditional chorus of hate for the Colossus of the North.

Hull has a deep dislike for pomp and circumstance, a fact that does not endear him to the careerist clique in the State Department. At Montevideo he would countenance no effort by the American delegation to match the lavishness of entertainment offered by other delegations. In Washington he and Mrs. Hull make it a rule to eschew all social affairs other than those which his official position requires him to attend. Handsomely gaunt and finely bred, he cuts a distinguished figure and is not ill at ease at such affairs, though his customarily downcast gaze sometimes gives him that appearance. He bears a fancied resemblance to Lincoln, and it is rumored that there is in his wardrobe—put there by Mrs. Hull—a complete outfit of clothes such as Lincoln wore but that Hull has never had the courage to wear them in public.

It would be too much to expect that Roosevelt, a product of Groton, Harvard, and the yachting world, though no snob, should accredit to such a man more authoritative opinions than his own on world affairs, especially since Hull was chosen not for his opinions but for his politics, and for most of his life had viewed the world from a seat in the House of Representatives or from the even more dubious vantage-point of a rural county in Tennessee. Hull, who is ten years older than Roosevelt, was born in what is now Overton County, Tennessee. His family was comfortably established there in farming and lumbering, and as a boy he rafted logs down river. When he grew up he went to an obscure little college—Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tennessee—and was graduated as a lawyer. Politics was his immediate resort, and he served two terms in the lower house of the state legislature. After the Spanish-American War, in which he served as a captain in the Fourth Regiment, Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, he was appointed—and later elected—a Tennessee circuit-court judge. He left the bench to run successfully for Congress in 1906 and continued to sit in the House of Representatives from then until the Harding landslide of 1920 dumped him out. He returned two years later to serve in the House until 1930, when he sought and won election to the Senate and thereby made himself available for the Cabinet appointment that came in 1933. From 1921 to 1924 he held the then thankless job of chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Hull has had the best press of all the Roosevelt Cabinet members. Save in the Catholic journals, which lambaste him for turning a deaf ear to the church demands for Mexican intercession, scarcely a word of criticism of him has been printed. That, perhaps, was to be expected since he, a conservative, is not and makes no pretense of being a New Dealer. But whether or not it was to be expected, his consistency, in contrast to the waverings of his Cabinet confreres, has made praise for him certain. Similarly, he was bound to be consistent. He has an abiding faith in low tariffs as a cure-all for the ills of the world. It is a religion with him, and one he practices with moral rather than economic fervor. Adam Smith, not Karl Marx, is his crucifer. He asks no monument in life except a deep nick in a tariff wall. His credo is, "International laissez faire capitalism can and must be revived." With more than slight verity it has been said of him that he would not recognize a surplus unless there were a boundary at hand across which to push it.

His interest in tariff reciprocity, so consuming that he is quite willing for the time being at any rate to let Roosevelt personally handle all other phases of our foreign relations, was born in those long years he spent in the House. He specialized on taxation, and though he was the only member able to write a tax bill—he wrote the income-tax bill of 1913, the revised act of 1916, and the first federal estate-tax law, which was passed in that same year—he remained an obscure figure. His high, rasping voice seldom was raised on any other than the tax theme and then only to read long dry-as-dust manuscripts painstakingly prepared but not painstakingly enough to keep the galleries from emptying and the members from snoozing while he read. He was content to have his remarks go into the record, if not into the ears of those around him, and when he had finished one of those readings he would go into seclusion again and begin the long and tedious process of preparing another.

He has gone about his State Department duties in the same scholastic fashion. If he has an appointment with a foreign diplomat at nine in the morning, he not only spends most of the preceding evening in reading all available data pertinent to the appointment but gets down to his office half an hour early the next morning for a last-minute brush-up. He is setting a hard pace for the career diplomats in his retinue, and one which merely increases their dislike of him. If he were less a scholar and more a fighter, he would have found ways by this time to clear a large part of the careerist clique from the public payroll—another prerequisite to a New Deal in our Foreign Office. To most of these gentlemen the diplomatic service is merely a gentleman's way of seeing the world at the public expense and in nice company. They are products, for the most part, of the tonier schools and families and have a fine assortment of class prejudices which, combined with a certain languor toward all but the more fashionable sorts of work and learning, color their reports from foreign stations with a haute-bourgeoisie pallor.

Their influence permeates and deadens the whole State Department. They maintain, in addition to a rigid caste system, an invincible espionage machine, which they use not only to advance the interests of career men but to subjugate non-career men, many of whom live in terror of the career clique. Although most of the members of this group are pseudo-aristocrats with a sniffish contempt for the New Deal's avowed social objectives, the clique has increased its strength under Roosevelt. Its present chieftain is the Under Secretary of State, William Phillips, a New England blueblood who was at Harvard with Roosevelt and has had thirty years in the diplomatic service.

Another typical careerist holding high station in the department is the wealthy Sumner Welles, who has had fifteen years in the foreign service and, like Roosevelt, is a product of Groton and Harvard. Welles, an Assistant Secretary of State, was called home from Cuba because, responding to the call of the clan—the ABC, which is made up in large part of the Cuban equivalent of Groton and Harvard clubmen—he could not resist meddling in Cuban affairs. Having assisted in bouncing Machado, he went on to assist in maintaining the Machado system, a tradition carried on by his successor, Jefferson Caffery, to the accompaniment of increasing frowns from Hull. The other assistant secretaries, in addition to Welles, are Wilbur J. Carr, a nonentity who handles the mechanical details of the department; Francis B. Sayre, Wilson's son-in-law, a criminal-law professor of none too marked astuteness who is understudying Hull in his reciprocal-agreements work; and R. Walton Moore, an aging Virginia gentleman who finds a State Department berth congenial,

The New Deal has been only slightly more successful in filling its foreign posts with men of caliber than was the Old Deal, and what credit is due belongs largely to the depression, which has erased from the lists of campaign contributors Rotarians and stove magnates seeking a few years of honorable dalliance abroad. Roosevelt has kept Mr. Hoover's Norman Davis running about the world as his ambassador at large for no perceptible reason other than that Davis seems to know his way around the world rather well and likes to travel. Roosevelt also has kept the pretentious careerist, Hugh Gibson, but shuffled him off to our embassy at Rio de Janeiro. To Rome he sent Breckinridge Long, a wealthy Missouri lawyer who waited patiently and covetously for some such fruit of Democratic success at the polls, and who is said to be paying for the award with some lively as well as illuminating dispatches on Il Duce's doings. In Mexico we have Josephus Daniels, who, though no Dwight Morrow, is minding his own business with great determination and appears to have incurred the good-will of most Mexicans in consequence. Claude G. Bowers, the historian-journalist, is reported to be putting on a similar performance at Madrid, and at Paris Jesse I. Straus, the New York department-store magnate, is performing as an expert observer of the Bank of France's operations. Our ambassadors to China and Japan—Nelson T. Johnson and Joseph C. Grew, respectively—are both career men of long service. To most of our other foreign stations the New Deal has dispatched ministers or ambassadors of the usual political or hack strain.

Only two appointments struck a veritable New Deal note—those of William C. Bullitt and Dr. William E. Dodd. The appointment of Dodd as Ambassador to Germany created almost as much excitement as did the appointment of Bullitt as Ambassador to the U. S. S. R. James M. Cox, who was Roosevelt's running mate in the 1920 Presidential election, declined the Berlin assignment before it was offered to Dodd, a Chicago University professor of history who was familiar with Germany through years of study there. Save for a brief splash when he criticized dictatorships in a public address right under Hitler's nose, nothing has been heard from Dodd except in the secret precincts of Hull House on Pennsylvania Avenue. Little more than that has been heard from Bullitt, who did the groundwork for Russian recognition and was rewarded with the ambassadorship to the chagrin of the career clique, who feared his somewhat unconventional manners and broad social point of view.

Similarly, Roosevelt had groomed Bernard M. Baruch for the chairmanship of the American delegation to the Monetary and Economic Conference at London in May, 1933, only to have to ask him to step aside and make way for Hull, who had his heart set on that job. There are only a few things on which Hull has his heart set, and it is better to grant him his desire than to resist, for there is a relentless strain in the man that gives him at times the aspect of a Southern feudist. He let his passions rise twice in the New Deal's first two years, and on each occasion he returned to the State Department with a scalp dangling from his belt. The first to dangle there was that of the ambivalent Moley, whom Roosevelt made an Assistant Secretary of State merely because he wanted to have him handy; since the jealous Howe would not permit Moley to have an office in the White House, Roosevelt sent him to the State Department just across the street. The second scalp to dangle from the Hull galluses was that of George N. Peek, and it took a Supreme Court decision to help Hull accomplish the slaughter. Peek, too, was tossed athwart Hull's path merely because Roosevelt could think of nothing else to do with him and could not bear to be without his services.

Peek's offense was that of thumbing his nose constantly at Hull's reciprocal-trade-agreements machinery for reviving foreign trade. Like the scalping of Moley the scalping of Peek was not fatal, for Peek remains in the government as head of the export-import banks. Moley was forced out of the Administration, but he retired to an editor's chair within easy commuting distance of the White House, where he continues to be a frequent visitor. Hull doesn't mind that Moley continues more closely in the confidence of the President than does his ranking Cabinet member, so long as Assistant Secretary of State is not the badge by which Moley attains to glory.

[The ninth article in Mr. Ward's series on "F. D. R.—the Boss in the Back Room," will describe the role of Messrs. Morgenthau and Eccles in the story of banking and taxation under the New Deal. It will appear in the issue of July 31.]

Correspondence

Mr. Stolberg and the Socialist Party

To the Editors of The Nation:

This is in reference to the article on the Socialist Party by Benjamin Stolberg in The Nation of June 5.

The statement that the League for Industrial Democracy is subsidizing Norman Thomas is typical of the lack of factual basis for this article. Norman Thomas has not received a salary as an official of the L. I. D. for approximately three years.

The statement that the present Declaration of Principles of the Socialist Party was "fashioned as a compromise by Mr. Thomas" is not true. Neither Norman Thomas nor anyone except the members of the Resolutions Committee saw the document before it was brought to the floor of the Detroit convention. I should also like to see Mr. Stolberg's authority for the statement that "workers' democracy" is Thomas's paraphrase for "dictatorship of the proletariat."

I am authorized by Mr. Thomas to deny that he said at any time that he did not know what the Declaration of the Principles really meant. Possibly this is Mr. Stolberg's method of reporting that the National Executive Committee of the Socialist Party referred this document to a committee of lawyers to determine "whether or not the Declaration of Principles made any change in the status of the Socialist Party under the criminal-syndicalism statutes of the various states."

The statement that the New Deal is doing pretty much what the Socialist Party would have done indicates a profound ignorance of basic socialism and of the expressed plans of the party. Morris Hillquit and Norman Thomas publicly called upon Franklin Roosevelt within two weeks of his inauguration to demand public ownership of banks instead of alleged banking reform. The National Executive Committee stated on July 3, 1933 (the NIRA was adopted June 16, 1933) that "the NIRA is an effort to stabilize capitalism" and "will operate to preserve for the owners the privilege of wringing profits from workers through low wages and high prices."

The statement that the New York State organization refuses to abide by the referendum on the Declaration of Principles is untrue. The New York State Committee has acknowledged that this document is binding on all party members but reserves its unquestioned right to advocate its amendment or repeal.

I do not challenge Mr. Stolberg's right to appoint himself the Walter Winchell of the radical movement and I do not attempt to contradict his scurrilous characterizations of various party members. This is a matter of free opinion and still permitted in this country. It is, however, a matter of considerable surprise that The Nation should have published Mr. Stolberg's article without attempting to determine the accuracy of his statements.

New York, June 20 John F. Sullivan,
Secretary, Public Affairs Committee,
Socialist Party of America

To the Editors of The Nation:

During the recent Weyerhaeuser kidnapping case the Chicago Tribune published a front-page story purporting to be an interview with an important head of the Washington state police, in which he declared that vengeful radicals connected with the lumber strike were being investigated and were probably connected in some way with the kidnapping. The editors of The Nation would, I am sure, join in deploring and protesting such vicious journalism, but you have apparently no qualms about publishing an article on the Socialist Party by Benjamin Stolberg which is no more responsible or objective than the Tribune's story of the kidnapping.

Stolberg reveals a highly developed ability to wisecrack at no point matched by his ability to assemble facts. A critic has only to point out the contradiction between the fact of the increase in membership of the Socialist Party and the statement that the Socialist Party is losing ground. Most laughable of all is Mr. Stolberg's assertion that the Socialist Party as a force in the trade-union movement completely disintegrated with the coming of the New Deal and the NRA. Before 1932 and particularly before the NRA the Socialist Party was an insignificant and dwindling factor in the trade-union movement, and every mite of increase has occurred in the last few years; in fact, while political successes have not been noticeable, the most encouraging thing for those who know what is going on in the Socialist Party is its growing orientation toward and influence in the trade-union movement.

As for the statement that the Declaration of Principles was referred to a lawyers' committee to see if it was legal, that is a distortion which reveals the complete lack of accurate information characteristic of the article throughout.

I will not try to take up the long series of unsupported and uncheckable assertions, such as that the Socialist Party program and psychology are adequately delineated in the New Deal, but I should like to mention two things which Mr. Stolberg ignores. The first is the steady and healthy growth of the Wisconsin movement as distinguished from the strictly Milwaukee Socialist organization. In the recent judicial election, when the reactionary Republican incumbent, with the indorsement of the Progressive Party of the La Follettes, was elected with 385,000 votes, the Socialist candidate in a judicial election ran up a total of 218,000 votes, twice the total cast for a Socialist candidate in the state before.

The other matter is the undisputed fact of Socialist leadership in the newly formed Workers' Alliance of America, the only significant national organization of the unemployed, and in the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union, springing directly from Socialist inspiration and declared by the students of Southern farmer and labor movements to be one of the most successful unions of white and Negro working farmers yet achieved in America.

Chicago, June 22 Arthur G. McDowell,
Executive Secretary,
Local Cook County Socialist Party

PUBLIC

The Rights of Man

To the Editors of The Nation:

For over a year federal officials have made a determined effort to suppress the anarchist journal Man, and to punish anyone connected remotely with its publication. Subscribers have failed to receive copies of various issues; foreign-born readers have been intimidated by personal visits from government operatives. Vincent Ferrero and Dominick Sallitto, Italian restaurant keepers who rented editorial space to the publishers, have been ordered deported to Italy where certain execution or long imprisonment awaits them. The hounding of this particular radical publication, not by state but by federal officials, is a grim foreboding of what may happen to the entire nonconformist press if determined resistance is not aroused. My sympathies with the Communist Party are a matter of record. I disagree with the policy of Man concerning the Soviet Union, and I do not think that the anarchist millennium can materialize overnight. But the obligation of every radical group to defend the democratic privileges of another group is as elementary as was the obligation to defend Sacco and Vanzetti. Our internecine differences may be settled after the establishment of the new social order. For the present, it is the duty of all liberal and radical individuals and groups to protest to Postmaster General Farley against the treatment accorded Man. Equally important is the obligation to protest to Secretary of Labor Perkins against the proposed deportation of Ferrero and Sallitto. We cannot afford to split hairs in a storm!

Austin, Texas, June 10 HAROLD PREECE

Auction Block

To the Editors of The Nation:

Perhaps you do not know about the revival of slavery that is going on in the Bronx. The people who suffer from it are domestic workers, and I am one myself. We go out to the street corners on Walton Avenue between 160th and 170th streets and wait for white women to come along and buy our labor. Sometimes it is only for two or three hours, but the white women haggle till they get the price down to ten cents an hour. Sometimes they put their clocks back to cheat us.

The Negro Liberator has reported these conditions but they ought to be reported in all the papers or they will never be stopped. Please print this letter. I ask all your women readers please not to go to the auction block for their domestic help, but get in touch with the Domestic Unit of the Building Service Workers Employees, at 236 West Fifty-fifth Street. Pay union wages—give us houseworkers a chance!

New York, June 25 A. VERA JONES

An Appeal for Milk

To the Editors of The Nation:

May we have a few inches of your space for the urgent appeal of 250 children who will go without one of the most vital essentials of healthy childhood—milk—unless we succeed in enlisting widespread support in their behalf?

These children are the wards of the Prisoners' Relief Department of the International Labor Defense. Their fathers, political prisoners, are serving from one year to life in the jails and penitentiaries of the United States as a result of their activity in the labor movement. Their mothers are discriminated against by local relief authorities; they cannot find work.

Their sole support is a regular monthly relief check sent them through our organization. We feel sure that every justice-loving person who learns of their plight will be glad to support the drive for our Summer Milk Fund. These children live in small mining towns, farm areas, and cotton plantations, which have not the free-milk facilities sometimes found in larger centers. They depend entirely upon the generous support of the world outside. All contributions no matter how small will be welcomed by the Prisoners' Relief Department of the International Labor Defense, 80 East Eleventh Street.

New York, July 1 ANNA DAMON,
Acting National Secretary

The Mother Lode Strike

To the Editors of The Nation:

Your issue of June 5 carried a very worthy article by Milla Zenovich entitled The Mother Lode Mines Strike. In the last paragraph, however, the following error appears:

> At the beginning of the strike, government intervention was sought, and a conciliator was sent to Jackson. At the end of one day's investigation—he is not known to have gone into the mine—he advised the men to return to work and to negotiate with the company without the protection of their union standing.

It was Mr. Timothy A. Reardon, chairman of the California State Industrial Acceptance Commission, who took the position that the strikers should return to work without the protection of their union standing. Two government conciliators entered the field, but neither of them assumed to make any such statement and one of them announced publicly that he had stated to the mine workers that should any violence occur in the Jackson area, the owners would be responsible.

Sacramento, June 19 J. L. R. MARSH,
Secretary, Sacramento Federated Trades Council

"BRICKBATS AND ORCHIDS"
A COMING NEW BOOK
For and against modern active dated money (Non-STAMP) by Editors, Economists, etc., of world-wide reputation and up and coming young Lippmanns, Mark Sullivans, Brisbanes, etc. Editorial Board of well-known men to select articles. Variable time limits and amount of exchange fees provide regulation and control on a scientific basis. Read "Debt and Production" by Bassett Jones. Part of proceeds from book sales to be offered Institute of Public Affairs, University of Virginia, at tenth annual session in 1936, as an endowment fund for research in special subjects along Brookings Institution lines. "I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man" Thomas Jefferson, Founder University of Virginia. Recent high spot bibliography "Money in Motion," John Chamberlain, New Republic, June, 1933. "Mayor Unterguggenberger's Plan," Hans Cohrssen, New Outlook, March, 1933, "Booms and Depressions" and "Stamp Scrip" by Irving Fisher, Yale, Esquire, May, 1935, "A Matter of Modesty" by Ezra Pound, about Silvio Gesell.
THIS WEEK'S SESSION UNUSUAL! Why not attend? Address me University of Virginia until July 15th. Yours for streamlined private capitalism, sound money, taxes from increased business volume and Money in Motion and the desire to uncover new hard-hitting ward Engineers able to take either side. P.S. Should banks be allowed exchange fees as a profit!
J. B. N. CARDOZA.

Psychic Impotence
Is the title of the feature article in the July issue of The Modern Psychologist. Causes, treatment and cure of the various phases of impotence are being discussed in a frank, though scientific, manner.
This article is an important contribution and should not only clarify prevailing common mistakes, but also help to destroy false ideas of virility.
This article is meant for the intelligent reader and serious student of vital social problems, not for the thrill hound.
Send 25 cents for single copy or $1.00 for trial subscription.
to
The MODERN PSYCHOLOGIST
325 West 103d Street, N.
New York City.

The Modern Psychologist
What Makes
How Your Nerves Work

Labor and Industry

Tacoma: Timber and Tear Gas

By SELDEN C. MENEFEE

Seattle, July 3

BAYONETS and tear gas have been brought to Tacoma, the greatest lumber center in the Pacific Northwest, by the lumber operators in their attempt to break the strike of 40,000 sawmill and timber workers for a living wage. On Sunday, June 23, Washington's Governor, Clarence D. Martin, stood at attention at Fort Lewis, near Tacoma, while 7,600 national guardsmen from their summer encampment passed in review. The next morning 300 troops were ordered into Tacoma; on Tuesday the number was doubled. The strikers call the boys "Governor Martin's tin soldiers." The guardsmen are mainly youngsters, many of them only seventeen years old. The story is told in Tacoma that one of them, unused to handling a bayonet, swung sharply and cut the cheek of the youngster next to him, who thereupon burst into tears. All these troops are recruits from the agricultural region east of the Cascade Mountains. The boys who hail from the Puget Sound Region have many friends on strike, and some have union cards themselves.

The effect of this military strategy has been to make the strikers more radical than they were before. They blame the Governor, not the guardsmen. Many have lost what confidence they had in the impartiality of an arbitration board appointed by a government that allows troops to be used against them. Public sympathy has also been turned toward the strikers. Five thousand citizens of Tacoma got tear gas in their eyes in Monday morning's Battle of the Eleventh Street Bridge. At that time several hundred pickets and sympathizers were driven by the National Guard across the bridge between the industrial and business sections to clear the way to the mills for strike-breakers.

Technically, Tacoma is not under martial law, the Governor never having bothered to declare it to be so. The troops are "assisting the state police in preserving law and order." The state police had previously been used to protect the loading and shipping of "unfair" lumber on trucks without visible license plates at Lowell and other points. They have used tear gas freely in Tacoma. According to Hubert K. Spahr, president of the Tacoma Sawmill and Timber Workers' Union, state troopers arrested two pickets at a logging camp at Vale, near Tacoma, where they were picketing peacefully. These men were forced to run ahead of the patrol car for nearly two miles and when they fell down were beaten until they stumbled to their feet again. A Tacoma labor attorney is filing suit for these workers against the state government. As a result of these and other incidents the state police are cordially hated by the strikers, who merely express contempt for the National Guard.

The power of the mill-owners to control governmental policies, as well as the avenues of publicity, is becoming clear to the strikers. The daily press actually stated that the troops were called out at the request of the lumber operators, against the wishes of the mayor of Tacoma. Governor Martin, in a radio address to the people of the state on June 26, spoke of the "right to work," and the need for protecting the "workers" who wished to return to the mills. All the daily papers have adopted the policy of referring to the strike-breakers as "workers," as opposed to the "agitators," strikers, and pickets. Newspapers told of 1,300 "workers" functioning in fourteen mills on July 2; but the official union count of men entering the mills that same day was 566, or about one-sixth of the normal crew. A headline reads, "Mill Operators Watching Tacoma," and Governor Martin is quoted as saying that mill operators in other sections of the state are cheered by the events in Tacoma and are contemplating reopening their plants. He said that he stood ready to consider the applications for troops "if the operators and local authorities feel unable to control the situation."

If this military drive to break the strike succeeds, a new series of red raids is to be expected. Already signs of fascism are apparent. All picketing is prohibited by military order. The city council on June 26 voted to allow the strikers to stage a tag sale to support the strike, but Brigadier General Carlos Pennington of the National Guard refused to allow the tags to be sold on the streets. Pedestrians are not allowed to stop in certain areas of town. Tacoma and Seattle police were said by the papers to be cooperating in getting the names of any "radicals" coming in from other towns to "agitate." A meeting of 500 persons called in Firemen's Park by several left-wing groups on Wednesday was dispersed by National Guard troops generously supplied with tear gas. Homes of strike-breakers are protected at night by guardsmen. President Spahr of the Tacoma union and several other strikers were arrested on June 27 and held in the armory for several hours without charges. The Seattle branch of the American Civil Liberties Union investigated, but could find no record of the arrests. Spahr is suing the National Guard commander for false imprisonment.

The mediation board appointed by Secretary Perkins on June 26 consists of Judge Roscoe R. Smith of Seattle, Judson W. Shorett, a Seattle attorney, and Father George E. Thompson, a Portland priest. But Governor Martin, who was elected as a liberal Democrat, expresses opposition to arbitration, except "in certain cases." The mill operators, with their eyes still on Tacoma, oppose any arbitration. And the strikers in most places have adopted a policy of refusing to arbitrate, since such a step would mean that their demands for union recognition, a thirty-hour week, and seventy-five cents an hour would be lost or hopelessly compromised. So the battle will probably continue until the strike is broken or won.

The morale of the strikers is holding up well. Since the loggers are also out, the mills can operate only as long as the logs on hand last, if they succeed in getting the wheels turning. Longshoremen in all ports are refusing to handle lumber which is picketed by the mill workers. Protests by the thousand have been sent to Governor Martin and to President Roosevelt by trade unions and other organizations.

One striker said to me, "What have I got to look forward to if we go back to work now? I was making an average of $13 a week, working three or four days a week, last winter. Even if we get our demands, we'll have a hard road trying to support the kids on $22.50 a week, some weeks. Look at Weyerhaeuser and the rest of the timber barons! And yet they say they can't afford to pay us a living wage. I'd rather stay on relief for a year than see this strike lost. We're staying out."

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

A visit to the Tacoma strike headquarters on Wednesday provided further proof of the strikers' solidarity. They had not attempted to picket that morning; but at 8:30 a.m., when the guards were loaded on their trucks and retired temporarily for the first time in two days, the strikers were greatly cheered. They immediately organized picket lines, three men for each gate of every mill, and the pickets functioned like clockwork until the return of the troops that evening. At strike headquarters a soup kitchen serves coffee for the strikers at all hours and dinners at noon. In the rear is a large hall with neat benches made by the strikers themselves.

Tacoma's local of the Sawmill and Timber Workers' Union is controlled by the rank and file. It is integrated with the other strike centers chiefly through the Northwest Joint Strike Committee, a left-wing body with offices in Everett. The locals of nearly every important lumber center in the Northwest, with the exception of Bellingham and Seattle, are also affiliated with this committee. Seattle is expected to affiliate by next week. This rank-and-file movement for control was a revolt against the activities of the old-line union heads, especially Abe Muir, district representative of the Carpenters' and Joiners' International, of which the Sawmill and Timber Workers' Union is an offshoot. Muir attempted to get the men to go back to work in Longview, Portland, and other places under secret agreements which he worked out with their employers. In Longview, when the men found that the agreement did not include union recognition, and that it involved an increase of only five cents an hour over their former wage of forty-five cents, with no decrease in hours, they went back on strike the following day. Muir then took away the charter of the Longview local. In Aberdeen he has split the union by organizing the loggers and the mill workers into separate locals. In other places a red-baiting campaign has been used by the old-time "labor leaders" to prevent the locals from affiliating with the rank-and-file Joint Strike Committee. In Seattle more effort has been devoted to fighting the "reds" than to winning the strike, but in spite of the conflict within the union the strike continues to be solid in nearly every locality.

The policy of the Northwest Joint Strike Committee is that of mass action. It advocates strong picket lines, and has flying squadrons from Everett and other centers of militancy traveling constantly to bolster up weak points. It also raises funds for the neediest locals. At Wednesday's strike meeting in Tacoma it was announced that $220 had been received from the locals in Aberdeen, Olympia, and Everett alone. In view of the increasing strength of this committee, it is probable that any negotiations by the employers will have to be carried on through it. Recognition of the union is the first thing demanded; if that is granted, negotiations for wage increases and shorter hours will be referred for decision to the locals directly concerned.

The lumber strike expresses the growing militancy of the labor movement in the Pacific Northwest. On July 6 the strike enters its third month. Latest reports indicate that the lumber barons are staking everything on an attempt to force open the mills. On July 1 state police were on hand at Longview and Aberdeen to "protect the rights of the workers." Tear gas was again used to disperse mass picket lines. Those going back to work also have the sanction of the Carpenters' and Joiners' International, which has finally disowned the rank-and-file locals which insisted on voting on the terms of the settlement before they returned to work. But in spite of the combined attack of the operators and the labor "leaders," less than 200 men out of 3,500 returned to work in Longview, and a like proportion at Aberdeen. The outcome depends on whether the rank and file of the unions can continue to hold their strike lines solid in the face of this offensive.

Redder than the Roosevelts

By HEYWOOD BROUN

A KIND client has sent to me my dossier from Mrs. Albert Dilling's "The Red Network," which unfortunately I had not read at all. This single all-too-slender biography has sold the book to still another customer. I am fascinated not only by the subject matter but caught up with the manner of the telling. The style is terse and also free. Mrs. Dilling is, I suspect, own cousin to the Garble sisters whose dialogues are featured by Hi Phillips in his Sun Dial column.

But let me quote and try to show how completely an endearing revolutionary can be limned within the span of a couple of sticks. Had they been chafed together, think of the fire which might have been engendered. That is not the Dilling method. Dispassionately the author states her case and lets the reader soak it in. Here goes:

> Broun, Heywood: New York World-Telegram newspaperman; resigned from Socialist Party recently, saying, it was reported, that it was not radical enough for him; Rand School; wife, Ruth Hale of Lucy Stone Lg., went to Boston to help stage last-minute Sacco-V. protest meeting (N. Y. Post, Aug. 10, 1927); ousted as columnist for N. Y. World because of friction over his abuse of the authorities in the Sacco-V. matter; at once engaged by radical Nation; principal speaker at Level Club, N. Y. C., blacklist party of speakers barred by D. A. R. as subversives, May 9, 1928. James Weldon Johnson, colored radical, was master of ceremonies and mock trial for revocation of D. A. R. charter was held, Norman Thomas being the judge and Arthur Garfield Hays one of the attorneys; nat. com. W. I. R., 1929; nat. com. W. R. Lg., 1930-31; L. I. D. (bd. dir., April, 1931); Recep. Com. Soviet Fliers; Fed. Unemp. Wkrs. Lgs. N. Y., 1933; contrib. New Masses, 1933; Nat. Scottsboro Com. of Action, 1933; Emer. Com. Strike Rel., 1933; Il Nuovo Mondo Nat. Com.; supporter Rand Sch., 1933; nat. coun. Berger Nat. Found.; Nat. Com. to Aid Vic. G. Fascism; pres. and org. Am. Newspaper Guild, 1933; Conf. Prog. Pol. Act., 1933-4; Roosevelt appointee, Theatrical Code Authority, 1933.

It is true that I am the pres. but I am not the org. of the Am. Newspaper Guild and most bitterly do I wish to enter a denial of the last accusation hurled by Mrs. Dilling. President Roosevelt did not appoint me to the Theatrical Code Authority. In all fairness to Mrs. Dilling it must be admitted that she did not weave this serious charge out of whole cloth. I must admit that I sat at one hearing before the theatrical code administrator and that Mrs. Rumsey had informed me that I was there to represent the consuming public. But I was not alone in this reckless deed. Side by side with me sat Joseph Wood Krutch, who, as I later learned, is bd. of eds. and drm. ctc., and lit. ctc. of the Nat. At the end of the session, in which William A. Brady, thr. pd., made a long and eloquent speech, a Mr. Rosenblatt asked me if I wanted to say anything. I told him no. He then asked Joseph Wood Krutch, ed. radical Nat., who was almost as eloquent. I was informed that I could get my expenses by turning in an account at the proper office but it happened to be at the far end of the Commerce Building on one of the uncharted corridors and so I said, "Oh, what the hl. I'll stake my country to the $6.15." And that, as Jvh. (Bibl. dty.) is my witness, is the only warrant for the charge that I was appointed to the Thl. Cd. Athy.

That was all the consuming or the theatrical public ever heard from me. And in justice to Mr. Rosenblatt it should be added that undoubtedly when he asked me if I had anything to say he was not cognizant of the fact that I was nat. com. W. I. R. In bringing this matter to light I'll freely confess that Mrs. Dilling has me worried. Indeed, this one revelation in "The Red Network" keeps me tossing and turning at night. Like the young lady in the song, I couldn't say yes and I couldn't say no. Nor is it sufficient to ask indulgence on account of the fact that this was way back in 1929 when I was a young man only nineteen years out of college. How on earth can I explain or justify my being nat. com. W. I. R. when I have not the slightest recollection of what the W. I. R. may be?

Of course, it could be World Institute Reds or Wabbling into Republicanism. Or for that matter the When in Rome Society. The best I can do is to say that, whether I was a W. I. R. or not in the past, its purposes and its practices elude me now. I can truthfully say that I haven't been to any W. I. R. dance, banquet, or business meeting in the last five years. It must be that I was trying to forget and in this I have succeeded admirably. But there is just one tragic possibility. Perhaps Mrs. Dilling has also forgotten. Come on, Mrs. D., be a good scout and tell me what the W. I. R. is or was so that I can make amends and once more sleep peacefully at night.

Mrs. Dilling has fallen into an inaccuracy in stating that Broun, Heywood (with a little better detective work she might have dug out the "Campbell" for the middle) was "ousted as columnist for N. Y. World because of friction over his abuse of authorities in the Sacco-V. matter." My abuse of the authorities did lead to a situation during which I absented myself from the columns of the World for several months. That was of my own volition. I got fired by Ralph Pulitzer, almost a year later, after I had returned to the job. The offense was an article in the "radical Nation" attacking the editorial policy of the N. Y. World as administered largely by Walter Lippmann, p.s.b. Lest there be confusion I may state that p.s.b. is in no sense a radical organization. Some of the most respectable people in the American community belong to it. I appointed them myself. Nicholas Murray Butler is a member and William Randolph Hearst might very appropriately be the org. of this large and inclusive fraternal organization. Madison Square Garden being solidly booked for the season, the members of the p. s. b. have no clubhouse at the moment, although I believe guest privileges have been offered them by the S. N. S. S.—Society of Native Stuffed Shirts.

But to get back to Mrs. Dilling and her all-too-brief biography of Broun, Heywood. Much as I regret to say it, I feel that we have both failed. She has not made out her case and I do not deserve the accolade she has offered. As I read the account of the activities of this "World-Telegram newspaperman" I find, not the solid outlines of a red, but merely the portrait of a joiner. Better luck next time Mrs. D.

Another Language

IN the annual report of the Department of Labor Miss Frances Perkins wrote as follows:

> Labor policy in a democracy is not a program conceived by a government. It is a program of action which the people who earn their living as wage-earners and those who employ them in a profit-making enterprise must work out together in a society which develops naturally out of the work that they do and the life that they lead.
>
> The function of the government is to serve as a stimulating agency to facilitate the formation of such a policy, which will be just and fair to all the people and in the line of human progress.

Here is an authorized translation by, say, a New England textile worker:

> I'm a weaver, a skilled weaver ("the people who earn their living as wage-earners"). During the war I used to get as high as forty and fifty dollars a week. Course that was a lot of money. Most of the time I've made a lot less, but I figure a weaver even in these times ought to get about twenty-five dollars a week. It's skilled work you know. But there's a lot of people out of work and the boss ("those who employ them in a profit-making enterprise") says he ain't making any profit; maybe he's not but he keeps the books. So he keeps cutting wages because he knows he can get away with it with all those people wanting a job. ("It is a program of action which [wage-earners and employers] work out together in a society which develops naturally out of the work that they do and the life that they lead.")
>
> Well, then the government comes along and sets up that minimum wage. Before that I was making twenty dollars a week some of the time. But now everybody except maybe the loom fixers and those others that have strong unions are getting the minimum whether they're skilled or not. And when the government let the mills shut down 25 per cent, people were getting about $9 a week. ("The function of the government is to serve as a stimulating agent to facilitate the formation of such a policy, which will be just and fair to all the people and in the line of human progress.") By the way [concluded the textile worker] there was a swell Fourth of July speech at the fairgrounds last week.

Books

To the Tall Buildings New York

By ROSS EDWARDS PIERCE

"But who were the mighty men who put up these tremendous buildings,
These latter day Scyldings
Who with gigantic and sky-tapering finger were given
To challenge heaven—

"Who with granite and nail and cable
Put up such topless towers that only the Furies of Time and of Night might disable—

"Whose countless brown rows
Now
After a thousand years still look out sternly and unperturbed from under their shaggy and disheveled brows?"

"Some say they had compass and quadrant from a people were Seamen rare,
Voyagers of the air,
Who though less than a fly
Still had a magical method to manage the sky.

"Others that they had strange power in bottomless caverns of the heart
Dwelling apart,
And designed
Climbing the tall cliffs of infinity within the mind.

"At any rate we know
When winter glistens the tower-tops cataracting up row on row
That they understood the white sanctity of snow.

"And in the violet fields of the late West when God puts up the evening pasture bars
Where yonder turrets are
They held high converse with the coming stars."

"But where are the mighty men who put up these tremendous buildings,
For surely they were Scyldings—
Has Time then banished
These too with all the rest who now have vanished?"

"Nay, that is known.
Their bodies are one
With the strong serenity of stone.
But as for their souls—where are the waves o' the sea that each heaves upward and gleams—and then in a moment is gone.

"Only this, this
There were some—a steel cutter or a painter and sometimes the devil got jealous of their paints—
And they fell—they were the saints.

"But when the wind sweeps along
Over the topmost girders why you can hear them singing in its melodious song.

"And when the shadows of the evening fall
Massive and somber over their walls—
Dim emerald,
Then high up from a thousand watchman windows
Why you can hear them call . . ."

Radix Malorum

The Treasure of the Sierra Madre. By B. Traven. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

It is not hard to understand why the two books of this author have enjoyed such an enormous vogue in the various European countries in which they appeared before being published in English. If "The Death Ship" has sold over a million and a half copies in Soviet Russia, and sold over 200,000 copies in Germany before it was banned by the Hitler government, the reason is to be found in the fact that it is based on a situation which, while realistically conceived and rendered, is actually a symbolical representation of much that is weighing upon the European mind at present. Unlike the Falladas, the Célines, and the majority of the Marxist writers, Mr. Traven is not so much concerned with expressing an abstract point of view toward the modern world as with offering an epitomized impression of that world so vivid and complete that the reader can arrive at a point of view of his own. He is almost entirely free from the greatest of all the vices of the contemporary fiction writer, which is to work from the idea to the experience. In both his books the experience constitutes the pattern, what T. S. Eliot once called the "objective correlative," for ideas and attitudes that are perhaps only incompletely formulated in the mind. The experience is the idea. And because of this building so solidly on the situation or experience or "story" Mr. Traven has to depend very little on style or the other idiosyncratic graces of the modern novelist. The virtues of his writing, construction and detail, suffer no loss in translation. The "objective correlative" that he supplies for the mood of self-inquiry that is passing over the Western world is comprehensible in every tongue.

The central situation in the present book is one of the oldest known to story-telling. It was old when Chaucer appropriated it for "The Pardoner's Tale," and with minor variations it has never ceased being used in narrative and drama. Yet Mr. Traven has filled it in with such an abundance of freshly imagined anecdote and detail that it produces the effect of a tale that is being told for the first time. Three derelict Americans in Mexico set out on an expedition in search of a fabulous gold mine abandoned centuries ago by the Spaniards when it was found to be under an Indian curse. After many hardships they discover the mine, work at it arduously for many months, and finally depart with their treasure. But on the journey home the oldest of the trio is forced to stay behind in an Indian village, trusting his share of the booty to his companions. One of these is gradually overtaken by the compulsion to kill his comrade and keep all the little bags of gold dust for himself. Forcing the other man into a forest clearing, he shoots him down in cold blood. A little farther on the road, however, he meets with a band of Mexican bandits who deal him out the same fate, severing his head from his body with a single stroke of a machete. The gold dust is scattered to the four winds. It should be added that the main story is supported by a kind of anecdotal history of all the stories of cruelty and bloodshed that have grown up around gold prospecting in Mexico from the time of the Spanish to the present. The book is itself a mine of melancholy information about the effects of gold on races and individual men. It includes also, without departing from the main subject, as profound an insight into the Mexican psychology as will be found in any recent work on the subject. But it is as a parable, in the broadest sense, of the impingement of greed on the whole of a man's character, as in the case of the rather ordinary young American in the story, that the book will appeal to a world that is becoming more and more aware of the importance of the theme. It is certain to meet with the same popularity in Russia and the same disapproval in Germany as the author's first book—and for precisely the same reasons. WILLIAM TROY

Whither America?

American Messiahs. By the Unofficial Observer. Simon and Schuster. $2.

Back to Work: The Story of the P. W. A. By Harold L. Ickes. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

The Citizen and His Government. By Alfred E. Smith. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

The New America and the New World. By H. G. Wells. The Macmillan Company. $1.

IN these four books we have timely and cogent comments on the current American political and economic impasse from various angles—the critics and left-wingers, a major spokesman for the New Deal, a leading and articulate member of the American Liberty League, and a talented foreign observer of progressive and collectivistic inclinations.

The breezy and intelligent appraisal of "American Messiahs"—Long, Coughlin, Townsend, Upton Sinclair, Norman Thomas, the La Follette brothers, Milo Reno, General Johnson, Mayor LaGuardia, and others—is written by the same man who gave us a comparable description and evaluation of "The New Dealers" some time back. It is the best volume we have on those who find the New Deal wanting and seek to improve matters—mainly by a leftward swing and the achievement of a real "new deal" of one sort or another. These men are studied without fear, hysteria, or favoritism. Throughout there is the sound implication between the lines that if Mr. Roosevelt and his followers do not like these critics they have nothing to blame except the lack of resoluteness, imagination, courage, and consistency in the New Deal itself. Had Mr. Roosevelt lived up to the promises made and implied in his inaugural address, few of the "messiahs" would today have more than a handful of followers except as occupants of the Roosevelt band-wagon.

Huey Long is shown to be at least consistent and his "Share the Wealth" program no bit of transitory boloney suddenly seized upon to discomfit the Roosevelt Administration. The author prints a letter written by Huey to the press back in 1918 containing the full germ of Long's present thought.

> He can fairly claim to have been consistent in advocating these fundamental issues, which did not become visible to others of our leading statesmen until the depression was biting deep into an unsound economic structure.

If the debatable taste in Huey's political methods is waved aside, the chief argument which can logically and fairly be used against him is skepticism as to whether he would "come through" if placed in a position of power and authority. And the hardest thing for Huey to laugh off here is his record in Louisiana, where he has had the power to instal a local "share the wealth" program. Not even his most fanatical disciples can fairly contend that his record in this regard even faintly approaches the La Follette achievements in Wisconsin. Those who are wise and wish to expose and silence the Kingfish will do well to remind him, in season and out, that social justice, like charity, may well begin at home, and that those who live in glass houses should be wary about throwing stones.

Father Coughlin, "the microphone Messiah," is given credit for having made the country alert to the depredations of Wall Street, and for having done more than anybody else in this country to popularize the social and economic liberalism of certain popes and Catholic leaders. The author predicts that Coughlin will have to choose between going on as a critic and entering active politics at the price of being unfrocked.

The La Follettes are presented as of prime importance for the New Deal. Without their support President Roosevelt is not likely to carry the Middle West in 1936. Hence, their chief utility at present is their power and influence in holding the President loyal to a considerable proportion of his progressive principles. Things have not yet shaped up so as to allow them to head a promising third-party movement.

Norman Thomas and the Socialist Party do not impress the author as having much prospect for growth and power along the line of direct Socialist expansion and triumph. But they may serve as a very important—indeed, indispensable—stimulus to Roosevelt through impelling him to take the lead in "gradualistic" social transition. The volume is almost uniformly good and intelligent, and constitutes a real contribution to what is, for a time at least, one of the most important phases of current American history.

There is one threadbare but persistent American tradition which needs to be corrected. The publishers tell us that the book deals with "the more important members of the 'lunatic fringe.'" It is high time that Americans came to understand who are the real lunatics. We should put aside the respectable illusion that soundness and sanity are represented by the methods and principles of predatory finance capitalism and that social insanity is to be identified with a passion for social justice. Judged even from sane capitalistic logic, "General" Coxey and "Sockless" Jerry Simpson were far more sane than Mark Hanna, President McKinley, Harriman, the elder Morgan, and the like. And today Milo Reno and "Doc" Townsend, to take the more extreme of the messianic group, are towers of social and economic stability compared to Coolidge, Mellon, the younger Morgan, Owen Young, and their kind. Reno and Townsend at least yearn for a fairer distribution of wealth and the assurance of mass purchasing power—the soundest planks in any capitalistic platform—while the Mellons and the Morgans are doing more to destroy capitalism than all the agitators in America since the first labor troubles in the Virginia of John Smith. A hundred years from now historians will indeed write of a "lunatic fringe" in the America of 1935, but they will not be dealing with the principals in the volume by the "Unofficial Observer."

Secretary Ickes gives us the authoritative apologia for the Public Works Administration of the Roosevelt era. He has wisely decided that the best defense is to tell the story of what has been accomplished and how, rather than to quarrel and cavil with critics over minor issues. The value of the book is greater as a factual summary of the Roosevelt public-works policies and achievements than as a controversial tract, though the Secretary does occasionally sail into his opponents. He makes no effort to conceal the difficulties in restraining the vultures of political patronage and economic greed. Few informed persons doubt that Mr. Ickes is a conscientious, honest, and efficient administrator. His book confirms that impression. However, it is one thing to get public works executed honestly and efficiently, even if a little slowly. It is quite another to spend rapidly and widely enough to boom prosperity effectively. For the first purpose the Roosevelt program is moderately well adapted and the Ickes administration superbly suited. But it is fair to raise the question whether enough is being spent and with sufficient expedition to boost capitalism back on its feet. As W. E. Woodward pointed out in his "Money for Tomorrow," restoring prosperity through public spending is like pushing a man out of the ditch. Nothing except a big enough push to get him out will do any good at all.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

Now that Alfred E. Smith has aligned himself with property interests and economic reaction, many have hoped that his new book would be a forthright and slashing defense of the principles of the American Liberty League. But they are doomed to disappointment. His book is an excellent statement of political liberalism and a defense of at least moderate state action for social reform. There is little direct criticism of the New Deal and much implied criticism of the principles of the men associated with Mr. Smith in the Liberty League. The philosophy is, for the most part, that of the Al Smith of pre-1932 days. The volume is chiefly based on the former governor's political experience in New York. It would make admirable assigned reading for a course in state government, and the last chapter is a stinging criticism of the antiquated system of government in New York, which would go for most other states. There is an excellent chapter, built around the prohibition controversy, on law enforcement and the futility of trying to make people good by law, some of which could be quoted with deadly irony relative to Mr. Smith's recent scampering to Albany at the behest of his church to bulldoze the legislature into passing anti-nudist legislation. By and large, if the book is neither novel nor exciting, it is for the most part sound and substantial and reflects far more credit on Mr. Smith than his wisecracks and growls at the New Deal.

The pleasant and incisive little volume by H. G. Wells is the product of a somewhat chastened Wells. When he came to the United States to study the New Deal in 1934, Mr. Wells was inclined to put much store by Mr. Roosevelt's New Deal—even to find that both Stalin and Roosevelt were working toward much the same end without clearly realizing this to be the case. Now, even a rather hasty and "personally conducted" second visit finds him less sure of his ground. Roosevelt is, perhaps, less resolute. Criticism of the New Deal has become more vehement and voluminous. Americans as a whole have made no progress in realistic apprehension of the state of economic life or of world politics and are even less inclined to resolute experiment than a year or so ago. Valuable time is being lost in the moment of crisis.

Mr. Wells is especially interested in Huey Long, Father Coughlin, and other lambasters of the New Deal. While he is not carried off his feet by any of them, he gives a most sane appraisal of the significance of the whole movement of "messianic" protest. It is the natural and logical response to Mr. Roosevelt's failure to live up fully either to his own words or to popular expectations. If we do not get a New Deal, it may not be so long before there will be a demand for "a new sort of game." Especially cogent is Wells's statement of the bankruptcy of the reputable opponents of Long et al.:

> The really ominous thing in the contemporary American situation is not what these raucous voices say, but much more what is said against them and still more what is not said by way of a reply. I am not so much impressed by what Senator Long or Father Coughlin asserts and suggests as by the unsubstantial weakness of those who would oppose and discredit them. If the inferior voices, so to speak, are raucous and vague, the superior voices seem to me thin and even less explicit than the crowd shouters, and moreover contradictory to an extreme degree.

If things continue as they are today, Mr. Wells sees revolution ahead for America. Yet we are not likely to copy slavishly European precedents:

> It is not communism that threatens America, or any fascism of a European type. These things came in because of the moral and intellectual bankruptcy of the classes and types in charge of affairs in Russia, Germany, and Italy, and their characters were determined by local conditions. It seems to me more probable that an intellectually cruder and more instinctive sort of revolutionism is likely to appear in America, if this confused inexplicitness, this failure to state and direct in a way understandable by the popular mind, on the part of those who should lead in reconstruction, continues.

It would be a rash dogmatist who would predict more specifically the next step in the United States. That predatory capitalism and nose-counting democracy have broken down beyond any effective repair must be conceded. Beyond that it is hard to go just now. If Roosevelt is able to hold his party together through 1936, he is likely to be elected easily and he may then make the long-expected leftward swing. But there is no certainty of this. Even if he does, he will find the going hard through opposition from both right and left. More and more it is becoming apparent that Mr. Roosevelt sowed for the whirlwind by declining to take over the pirate ship of predatory plutocracy in 1933 when its crew was demoralized and its guns in part spiked. Should the Republicans slip back in through a split in the Roosevelt vote of 1932 and 1934, we may expect a rapid suicidal movement within capitalism, for the plutocrats have shown a sheer stupidity and an incapacity for enlightened self-interest which must tax the credulity of even the most dogmatic Marxian.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

General William Booth

God's Soldier: General William Booth. By St. John Ervine. The Macmillan Company. Two Volumes. $7.50.

As a boy St. John Ervine went with his grandmother to Salvation Army meetings, saw the soldiers march to battle, flags flying, drums sounding; saw them return wounded, ragged, and filthy, but always radiant. They had a source of joy that never failed. Twice he heard General William Booth preach in the Ulster Hall, and the memory of "that fiery man whose faith filled the world" remained with him always. Later he wanted to write Booth's life, seeing him as a genius and hero of religion, one of those "who, having no social influence, rebel against authority, defeat authority, and create authority." Such men command his admiration. But when he began to write the task seemed endless. It became not only a life of Booth and of his wife, Catherine, but a saga of the Booth family, a history of the Salvation Army; and this necessitated an "Interlude on the History of Methodism" and an elaborate epilogue on the various schisms that developed after Booth's death, most spectacularly represented by the deposition of Bramwell Booth. "The life is the length it wished to be," says the author, ". . . it took possession." The strong organic relation of the book with its author is obvious. In its amplitude and leisurely pace, its solidity and detail, its wide scope and brilliant portraiture, the complex aspects of the subject are fused with ease and richness; so that we have by a natural progression the life of a man, the chronicle of a family, the growth of a schism, the dynamic story of a religious movement.

William Booth rose out of abject poverty and ignorance to be the leader of millions. His adolescence was spent in a pawnshop which he hated. He knew from personal experience the miseries of industrial England in the desperate forties. He began to preach while still in his teens, at first under the aegis of Methodism. He lost his job in the pawnshop because he would not work on the Sabbath, and came to London, where Catherine Mumford heard him preach and fell in love with him. She was as complete a religious as he, an intense, sickly girl who by the time she was twelve had read her Bible many times and revolted against the harsh determinism of Calvin. The marriage of these two was a great romance. In his old age William Booth still wrote her the letters of a lover. They lived the hard life of itinerant evangelists. Catherine bore eight children in thirteen years, each in a different lodging house. The frail girl performed miracles of endurance. She was second only to him in their own kind of greatness. Only on one point did they ever disagree, and Catherine won. It was on the right of women to preach, and the fact that women were always the equals of men in the army is her work. This was contrary to Methodist doctrine, and the ensuing controversy gave her her first prominence.

Booth could not stay within the Methodist fold. He was too authoritarian to be able to bear authority, too eager, too original in his methods, too much imbued with the conviction of rightness, too justified by his success. Men as ardent as he brought him the offering of their fanaticism and became his trusted lieutenants. Some of his best ideas came from these aides. A saint, a showman, a genius of organization, a despot, he dominated the huge machine completely while he lived, and even left a testament which virtually established a dynasty.

Booth cared only for saving souls and tried to avoid the entanglements which were inevitable if he recognized any connection between poverty and vice. But soup kitchens and rescue homes were inevitable. Little by little the Army acquired property and complications. Its relation to church and state, from outcast, became comparatively respectable. It is strange that its usefulness in scotching discontent was so slowly recognized. The snobbishness of the Established Church hindered this recognition. It was shocked to see the lower orders thoroughly enjoying religion, with noise and vulgar vitality. The Army did what the church couldn't do, as Booth often pointed out in reply to criticism. In the early years policemen looked the other way when the soldiers and lassies were stoned and rolled in the mud. But by dint of jumping up with bleeding foreheads, shouting "Bless you, Brother!" and praying loudly for their assailants, these soon made a profound impression on their audiences. The terrible conditions and the callousness of the well-to-do explain the success of the Army among the "despised and rejected." By the 70's and 80's its value was recognized at least tacitly by the upper classes. Mrs. Booth corresponded with Queen Victoria on the subject of the age of consent; later Booth had an audience with King Edward. Peers and peeresses began to make substantial donations. The Army meanwhile had spread into other countries. The campaigns in France, Switzerland, and America are told in some detail and make excellent reading.

Even before Booth's death there had been murmurs against his arbitrary sway but they were little more than murmurs. With the accession of Bramwell, a man of integrity and administrative genius but without his father's demonic magnetism, clashes within the family and against the family burst into the open. The last three hundred pages are taken up with the story of Bramwell's deposition and various appendices. However valuable for the record these additions are, most readers will feel that the unity of a really magnificent biography is somewhat marred by them. One does not have to share Mr. Ervine's emotional involvement with his subject—or accept his suggestion that once we have discovered all that communism and fascism have to offer us there will be nothing left but religion to turn to—to find this an absorbing book, to admire the skill and humanity with which the author has handled his complex material.

Clara Gruening Stillman

An Old Battle

Fortune and Men's Eyes. By George Cronyn. Covici-Friede. $2.50.

THOUGH the setting of George Cronyn's latest novel is contemporary America, the book is, in its own way, as clearly a "period" novel as was its predecessor, the medieval "Fool of Venus." In "Fortune and Men's Eyes" we find Mr. Cronyn restaging the old battle of man versus society. Ten years ago this might have been a whacking good fight. Today it seems a ludicrous-sad bout between two one-time ring favorites, now aging and punch-drunk. Once this conflict was a popular peg on which any writer might hang his plots. Samuel Butler did it, and Shaw, and Sinclair Lewis, and their works were, in varying degrees, good, because they dramatized a war which was really being waged in the daily life of the time. However, such a conflict can only be symbolized in satisfactory artistic terms if, at the historical moment in question, it truly exists, if, in other words, numbers of individual men actually find themselves pitted against an established, inflexible social code. Now, in 1935, lacking a rigid society, we accordingly lack one of the two protagonists of the drama. Society, being in flux, is as puzzled, as uncertain, as insecure as man himself. There is very little fight left in it. No longer is it possible to imagine the figure of man grappling with the giant of society; we must think of man in society, or of man as society itself.

Therefore, when we discover that the hero of Mr. Cronyn's well-made contemporary novel is compelled, in his race toward his destiny, to run the gauntlet of the whole series of organized, antiquated social and moral taboos, we must believe either that the author has deliberately falsified facts for the sake of a good story or that his novelist's eye is singularly myopic. This hero of Mr. Cronyn's is Byron Peirce, one of three sons of a fleshly but idealistic Presbyterian minister, and, for the son as well as for the harassed father, the sin of sexual indulgence represents man's rebellion against the artificial code that has been pressed down on him, man's assertion of his manliness, of his humanity. Now, Mr. Cronyn to the contrary, I do not believe that it is any longer necessary for a man to assert his manhood by a grim, conscience-stricken fornication; man's sexual independence has by this time been pretty well established. Again in defiance of Mr. Cronyn, I think that the food, the opinions, and the wearing apparel of the Byron Peirces are matters of general indifference to the world in which they live. In consequence, Byron's exposition of his sex-society problem, his struggles with it, and his solution of it seem to me, at best, picayune affairs, and Mr. Cronyn's novel seems anachronistic for its preoccupation with them.

In only one respect does the novel impinge with any pointedness on contemporary reality. Only when Mr. Cronyn touches on the economic aspects of the brothers' lives does his mechanical story spring to life, since on this front alone can it conceivably be said that man still does battle with organized society. It is a pity that Mr. Cronyn should have regarded the economic implications of his family history as of secondary importance, for in his sections on Canadian lumber camps and Minnesota Farmer-Labor campaign battles there are moments when his writing suggests the proletarian saga that must soon be written, and the younger brother, Clyde, has about him slim, fiery touches of the proletarian hero who is even now being imagined.

Mary McCarthy

Marlborough as Soldier

Marlborough, His Life and Times. By the Right Honorable Winston Churchill, C.H., M.P. Volume III, 1702-1704. Volume IV, 1704-1705. Charles Scribner's Sons. $6.

THE four years covered by these volumes mark the height of Marlborough's glory as a soldier. He was to win other great battles after Blenheim, but it is with Blenheim that his name is inseparably linked. Including the evolution of the "Grand Design" against Louis XIV, the relations between Marlborough and Prince Eugene of Savoy, the storming of the Schellenberg, and the devastation of Bavaria, nearly half of the two volumes is devoted to the Blenheim campaign. For all the wealth of manuscript material which Mr. Churchill has had at his disposal, his account does not make any large addition to what was already known about the episode, but his narrative gains in clearness and vividness from his own practical acquaintance with warfare and the technical aid given by Colonel R. P. Pakenham-Walsh, a professional student of the campaign with whom he "visited the battlefields and traversed the marches." The devastation of Bavaria which followed the Schellenberg battle, he declares, "was not senseless spite or brutality, but a war measure deemed vital to success and even safety," although "to the wretched sufferers it made no difference what the motive was"; but he also notes, as if by way of apology, that while "perhaps four hundred villages were burned" the devastation was "neither so sure nor so widespread as that which France had inflicted upon the Palatinate a quarter of a century before," and "of course" was "incomparably less efficient than the destruction wrought by the Germans in their withdrawals from France and Belgium in our own times."

Marlborough at this time, however, was much more than a great commander; indeed, the "easiest part" of his task, Mr. Churchill thinks, was "to beat the French in the field." He was the "mainspring" of the Grand Alliance and, with the aid of his staunch friend Godolphin, virtually Prime Minister of England. He was the personal representative of England's foreign policy on the Continent, but he had also to make sure of political support in England for his military program while struggling to obtain "effective military action from the crowd of discordant, jealous, and often incompetent or lukewarm allies." It is the high distinction of Mr. Churchill's biography that it does not allow any one part of Marlborough's career to overshadow others. The irritating obstructiveness of the Dutch, the unique cooperation of Prince Eugene, the difficulties of Queen Anne's first government, and the dreary but inevitable controversy over the Occasional Conformity bill—all find their proportioned place. William III was strong in diplomacy and politics, but dominant military genius was lacking; Frederick the Great had military genius, but the "width and complexity" of the affairs over which he presided were not comparable to those in which Marlborough was absorbed. Only with Napoleon does Mr. Churchill find Marlborough's combination of military, political, and diplomatic functions "applied again upon a Continental scale."

In view of Marlborough's well-known hunger for money and honors, Mr. Churchill's remark that "he liked at odd moments to reflect upon his growing fortune and the princely setting in which his heirs and successors would dwell" seems studiously apologetic. It would, however, have been better for Marlborough, he thinks, if "something like" Godolphin's economical suggestion of a national thanksgiving for Blenheim had been adopted instead of the gift of the royal manor of Woodstock, on which the Queen proposed to build Blenheim Castle, and a permanent grant of £5,000 a year, for the rewards were later to disturb both his happiness and his dignity. Fortunately,

"Most Powerful . . ."

The author of Tobacco Road and God's Little Acre confirms his brilliant position in American letters with these seventeen new stories. His most mature work to date, this volume is being enthusiastically welcomed by an ever-increasing audience. It is Erskine Caldwell's fastest-selling book, and, according to Harold Strauss in the N. Y. Times, it is, ". . . Erskine Caldwell's most powerful work. . . ." $2.50.

KNEEL TO THE RISING SUN
by Erskine Caldwell

•

Dream—and Reality

Shvambrania was discovered in their own imaginations by two Russian boys, brothers, who took refuge in it from the drab reality of the everyday world. In Shvambrania, wars were glorious and bloodless adventures, justice always triumphed. Then came the Revolution of 1917 and a new, exciting world called to them. These naïve memoirs reflect clearly the impact on growing minds of the most significant social change of our time. $2.00.

THE LAND OF SHVAMBRANIA
by Leo Kassil

THE VIKING PRESS N. Y.

Distinguished Teller—
Distinguished Tales . . .

Arnold Zweig, creator of The Case of Sergeant Grischa, has long been known in Europe, not only as a superb novelist, but also as a master of the short story. These tales of simple men and women, the anonymous populace, although wrought with a light and delicate touch are significant comments on contemporary European life. $2.50.

PLAYTHINGS OF TIME
by Arnold Zweig

there is little else in Marlborough's character or bearing to apologize for in these four years. If ever a biography deserved to be called definitive, this one does, for if what is still to come equals what we already have, there will be one period of English history which will not need to be reworked on either its political or its diplomatic side.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Law as Sociology

Law and the Social Sciences. By Huntington Cairns. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

FOR a long time now jurists with flushed faces and rapid pulses have been talking about the need for a sociological jurisprudence. The need for a stock-taking has occurred to Mr. Cairns, a young Baltimore lawyer, who has read widely in the social sciences. He has surveyed successively the contributions to legal science of anthropology, economics, sociology, psychology, and political theory. The results, as he has developed them in the course of his review, appear surprisingly meager despite the fact that he is highly sympathetic with the aspirations of sociological jurisprudence. Again and again Mr. Cairns's critical sense forces him to admit that this or that contribution of the social sciences is of no great value to the jurist. In view of this it becomes particularly depressing to consider that other contributions which he accepts will not stand a more searching analysis, or that they represent theories which are not indispensable to legal progress. It was certainly realized, for instance, long before the formulation of the theory of cultural lag that legal institutions were often anachronistic, and as Mr. Cairns takes pains to emphasize, the Roman jurists were, after all, the first sociologists.

Perhaps the most interesting part of Mr. Cairns's survey describes the contribution of anthropologists in clarifying the origins of primitive legal institutions. Only too frequently eminent legal historians have talked glibly of this or that characteristic of early law in blissful ignorance of anthropological investigations. But even here it is easy to make much of their failings. It should be remembered that they are dealing with the legal history of the cultured peoples, and that a generalization which will not hold good of the Trobriand Islanders may be valid with respect to the history of Greek or Roman or English law. In this connection it is unfortunate that Mr. Cairns has omitted altogether to survey the contributions of social and economic historians in illuminating various phases of legal history.

In view of the importance of "human nature" in legal problems, it might be supposed that psychology would have particularly great contributions to make. But Mr. Cairns only succeeds in demonstrating that it has surprisingly little to offer. A great deal of attention has been attracted in recent years by examination of legal rules of evidence in the light of psychological experiments. Many of the tested rules, however, have stood up surprisingly well. Moreover, the importance of this type of investigation is confined largely to Anglo-American law. Other systems do not have a law of evidence in the sense of a complex of exclusionary rules, but admit all logically probative facts.

Of more importance is the fact that psychological truth is not always legal truth, for there are political elements involved in legal administration which often make inadvisable the application of psychological knowledge. Thus Mr. Cairns ridicules the rule that damages will not be awarded for the effects of fright unaccompanied by physical injury, on the ground that psychologists have shown that fear may often produce palpable if not devastating effects on the human organism. This may readily be conceded, but the legal rule might still rest upon the risk of encouraging fraud in accident litigation.

The political dangers of an enthusiastic application of social science can be best illustrated by the history of penology. Mr. Cairns omits any consideration of penology on the ground that it has been written about too much, but an examination of penological theories would have been highly instructive in connection with the correlation of law and social sciences. It would have been interesting to demonstrate that penological theories are often utopian, not because of their inherent character, but because of the realities of judicial administration in the milieu in which we live.

Curiously, the longest but least interesting chapter of Mr. Cairns's book is devoted to law and economics. His review here breaks down because of the very richness of the material! His selection of such specific topics for discussion as taxation and small loans seems arbitrary. On the other hand, his elaborate examination of the nature and justification of property seems far removed from legal practicalities, and in at least one respect is highly scholastic. Mr. Cairns insists that property is purely "a legal relation," and hence that the physical nature of property is of no importance to the jurist. This, in view of the obvious importance of the traditional distinction between real and personal property, is rather startling. According to his theory, a mortgage on an automobile would be governed by precisely the same formalities as a mortgage on the Empire State Building.

The confusion in Mr. Cairns's book is due fundamentally to the present immaturity of the social sciences. He has wisely eschewed in his review any general disquisitions on method. But the confusion would have been lessened if he had kept in mind more constantly and consistently the internal problems and limitations inherent in legal method. The chief value of sociological jurisprudence has lain in its fundamental point of view. But its importance in this respect is too easily exaggerated, particularly in the field of the ordinary civil law, in which it is often important merely that a recognized and well-established rule be available. Much has been heard of the undesirability of attempting to deduce results from existing legal precepts by exercises in pure logic irrespective of social needs. But the mischief has only too often been due not to the fact that the logical method has been used but to the fact that the logic has been bad. Moreover, those who have campaigned for sociological jurisprudence have proceeded on the theory that judges have gone wrong largely because they have had inadequate knowledge of social processes. But the mischief, of course, has lain far more in their self-interest than in their ignorance of sociological method.

WILLIAM SEAGLE

Contributors to This Issue

RICHARD LEE STROUT is a Washington correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

L. O. PRENDERGAST is a Los Angeles journalist living at present in Mexico City.

HAROLD J. LASKI is professor of political science at the University of London and author of "Democracy in Crisis."

SELDEN C. MENEFEE is a teaching assistant in sociology at the University of Washington.

HARRY ELMER BARNES is on the editorial staff of the Scripps-Howard newspapers.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN is the author of "Samuel Butler."

WILLIAM MACDONALD is a historian and journalist.

WILLIAM SEAGLE was assistant editor of the Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences until its recent completion.

PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Burlingame, Cal.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 24, 1935 No. 3655

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 85
EDITORIALS:
The Foolish Spending Program 88
The Wolf and the Lamb 89
There Will Come Thousands 89
Censored! 90
ISSUES AND MEN. MIRAGE OF GOLD. By Oswald Garrison Villard 91
CARTOON: "But, Dear, I Only Want to Civilize You!" By Fritz . 92
HUEY LONG CHOKES NEW ORLEANS. By C. H. Campbell . . 93
STORM OVER THE VIRGIN ISLANDS. By Raymond Gram Swing 95
COLD TERROR IN CALIFORNIA. By Herbert Klein and Carey McWilliams 97
REVOLT IN PANAMA. By Carleton Beals 99
CORRESPONDENCE 101
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 103
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
Seven Against Horvitz. By Heywood Broun 104
Academic Cossacks in Pittsburgh. By Rose M. Stein 105
Trouble in Paradise: Academic Freedom in Westchester. By J. W. 107
BOOKS AND FILMS:
On the Human Face. By Ross Edwards Pierce 108
The Negro's Role. By Sterling D. Spero 108
Medicine Must Be Socialized. By Frederick C. Lendrum . . . 109
Portrait of a Poet. By Eda Lou Walton 109
Tragic Mississippi. By Alice Beal Parsons 111
Shorter Notices 112
Films: The Film Library. By William Troy 112

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING CHARLES ANGOFF
Associate Editors
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
Contributing Editor

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of subscriber's address.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second-class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by The Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

SENATOR BLACK'S COMMITTEE investigating the utilities lobby rushed into action by calling to the witness stand Philip H. Gadsden, chairman of the Committee of Public Utility Executives. At once it was divulged that this organization had raised $151,865 from twenty-six utility companies, and that another $150,000 had been supplied by the Edison Electric Institute to pay two New York law firms. A further $50,000 had come in from utility companies, but according to Mr. Gadsden this is still on hand. Though summoned unexpectedly he had a statement ready, prepared with exemplary care, showing apportionment of every cent until June 30. But the statement chiefly covered printing and mailing, and did not even touch the cost of sending telegrams to Members of Congress. A memorandum found in Mr. Gadsden's files, presumably addressed to holding-company members, contained this sentence: "Your own advertising will further stimulate editorial comment all over the country." Mr. Gadsden professed to know nothing about it. Senator Black wisely decided to postpone further hearings while the groundwork of a nation-wide inquiry was laid. But the session was enough to demonstrate that the Senate committee means to uncover the utility lobby if it can be done, as against the House Rules Committee, also presumably investigating it but interested more in the activities of the Administration in behalf of the holding-company bill. Representative Brewster's charge against Thomas Corcoran has been fully aired. The propriety of Corcoran's activities is now merged into the greater question of the propriety of any attempt of the Administration to press forward its own program. But Mr. Brewster in raising this issue discredited himself as a man without convictions and as having an unhealthy preoccupation with the problem of how best to get himself reelected.

WHEN CONGRESSMAN DIES introduced his bill for bigger and better deportations he put it forward as a cure for unemployment. "If there were no aliens in this country," he said, with all the self-confidence of a patent-medicine advertisement, "we would not have an unemployment problem." The conservative press pounced upon his kindergarten economics and informed the Congressman that aliens are also consumers; and no less a person than Commissioner of Immigration MacCormack revealed that his mathematics were as bad as his economics by pointing out that the number of immigrants illegally in the United States may be estimated at 100,000 and not 3,500,000, as Mr. Dies, out of an overheated imagination, had asserted. But a reading of the bill itself indicates that its concern is not with solving unemployment. As we pointed out in our issue of July 3, the bill would require every alien to hold a permit from the Department of Labor. "The Labor Department," reads the text, "shall not issue a permit to work to any alien unless such alien can show that he entered the United States legally and is of good moral character and has not been convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude and is not engaged in subversive political agitation or conduct, and unless the alien or his employer can show that there is no American citizen able and willing to accept or hold the job or position." Here is language as vicious as it is loose. Like the Tydings bill to protect the armed forces from propaganda, the Kramer bill providing a heavy fine and imprisonment for persons suggesting the "propriety" of "overthrowing the government by force and violence," and the Dickstein bill to deport aliens who disseminate "propaganda from foreign sources," the Dies measure is aimed at the growing number of people in the United States, citizens and non-citizens, who maintain that all is not quite right with our political system. Every one of these bills must be defeated.

CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE throughout the country are marshaling their forces to oppose the President's tax program. Their campaign will not do them great credit. Any economist worthy of the name will tell them that if capitalism is to be saved there must be much heavier direct taxation in all brackets, particularly the upper ones. Capitalism is a system of privilege; it also imposes a responsibility which those who benefit from it must bear. British capitalists know this, and consider most American business men in the kindergarten age for expecting to get their privileges at present rates. The representatives of business before the House committee made a sorry showing. The President's program is far from perfect, but they did not aim at its weak points; they fired at it with broadsides. The estate of the late Harry Payne Whitney, according to Roy C. Osgood, a Chicago banker, would have shrunk under the proposed schedules from $72,700,000 to $26,700,000. This will strike anyone but a banker as more than adequate for an American family. But Mr. Osgood was trying to make Congressional hair stand on end. The weakness in the President's program is that it is not comprehensive. It also puts into operation the philosophy of anti-bigness in its corporation-tax feature. Against this business men might make legitimate protest if they themselves were ready for government control of bigness. But they are ready for nothing but to escape paying their full share of the freight of capitalism. George H. McCaffrey for the Merchants' Association of New York laid down the amazing proposition that the only conceivable purpose of a tax plan is to balance the budget. Unless American capitalists are more seriously interested in creating a more social state, they will be astonished by the rapidity with which capitalism collapses. Its worst enemies are not the radicals but these business men when the subject of tax reform comes up for discussion.

THE TARIFF AGREEMENT with the Soviet Union lifts our relations with Russia to a level of wholesome normality, after the inexplicable collapse of the debt negotiations early this year. The debts were a thing apart from trade, and yet they were permitted to overshadow immediate realities. Now trade comes out of the partial eclipse, and we are assured of Soviet purchases in our markets of more than $30,000,000 worth of goods in twelve months, for which we offer lowered tariffs to Russian goods which should increase our Russian imports to about the same figure. These are not impressive figures but they double our exports during 1934, and more than double our imports. The debt question remains out of the picture, since the agreement was made under the powers vested in the President in the Tariff Act of 1934 and is not subject to Senatorial review. Russia, having no tariffs, offers no tariff reductions, agreeing instead to make the increased purchases. We offer the tariff rates given to Sweden, Belgium, and Haiti—not, be it noted, to Brazil. Brazil was granted a special rate on manganese which will divert some of our normal buying of this metal from Russia. So the bargain with Brazil is being kept. One immediate effect of the agreement was to annoy those Members of Congress who want us to have no truck with Russia even if it increases trade. Since there had been no news of the agreement before it was signed, they charge that the government did not fulfil the requirements of the act, which stipulate that the President shall give reasonable notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement under the act, so that special representations can be made to him by interested persons. We do not know what, if any, notice was given, but as the agreement is of obvious benefit we cannot see that any interest, beyond the maintenance of prejudice, has been injured. The agreement gives Ambassador Bullitt his first sizable success on a mission that has been for him a succession of disappointments.

THE DECISION to crown young Otto, candidate for the throne of Austria, will not be made in Vienna, or in Paris or Rome, but in the capitals of the Little Entente. If they choose, they can accept a Hapsburg restoration as being on the whole preferable to the nazification of Austria, and thus make it certain. Or they can hold to their determination to prevent it even at the cost of war. Rome is now ready for the coronation of Otto. Paris, weighing only its own interests, is not unfriendly to a plan which sets a high hurdle in the way of the Anschluss. But France cannot dominate the Little Entente over this issue as well as the Little Entente can dominate France. Austria has voted to restore to the Hapsburgs the royal property nationalized after the overthrow of the monarchy, and Otto is to be permitted to visit Vienna in a private capacity. Thus the campaign for restoration comes to the edge of success. But Titulescu, Rumania's Foreign Secretary, announces that the Little Entente has not abandoned its principles. "Mobilization," he declares, "would follow as a matter of course if the dynasty were reestablished in Vienna." As he has recently consulted King Carol and Prince Paul, the statement carries full authority. The rulers of Rumania and Jugoslavia agreed, it seems, to consider the restoration of Hapsburg properties as an internal Austrian affair, but to reaffirm their hostility to restoration. In the meantime, Austrian instability is seen in the brutal swiftness with which the Heimwehr leaders seized on the tragic accident in which the wife of Premier Schuschnigg was killed to try to capture his office for Prince Starhemberg, their leader. Had Schuschnigg been injured in the accident, Austria would have had to live through another coup.

THE BRITISH CABINET finally has rejected Lloyd George's "New Deal" after four months of delay, and he now can use his program for campaign purposes. This includes a "prosperity loan" of a billion and a quarter dollars for public works, the control of the Bank of England by industry and commerce as well as high finance, a permanent planning board to coordinate public expenditure, the reduction of the Cabinet to four or five ministers without portfolio, and government regulation of the coal, steel, cotton, and shipping industries. The scheme means little unless he can rally enough support in the next Parliament to hold the balance of power between the Conservative and Labor parties. At seventy-two Lloyd George remains mercurial and provoking. He is that rare occurrence, a lonely leader who has survived the shipwreck of his party.

WRITERS ON CENTRAL EUROPE have many times pointed out at length the toll which the post-war years have taken of those beleaguered peoples, but as an indication of desperation the suicide figures for Budapest are revealing in a way that a general discussion of the subject does not quite equal. In 1932 the average number of suicides was six per day; in 1933 it was nine; in 1934, eleven; and in the current year the average has reached thirteen. Recently twenty-eight persons committed suicide in Budapest in one day, out of a population of a million. The same number of suicides per million population in New York City would make a total of 33,125 annually. On the basis of such figures in Hungary the current year may show the appalling number of 4,745 suicides in the capital alone.

LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

At the same time the birth-rate has fallen by two-thirds. Four years of war and seventeen years of peace accompanied by fierce racial dissension and economic collapse have brought the once sparkling city on the Danube to these straits. And it is the crowning irony that the future seems to hold little promise of recovery, but on the contrary the threat of still another war.

ALFRED DREYFUS was once as famous as any man in his time. Families quarreled about him over the breakfast table, and his vindication was a world-wide triumph. It is difficult to remember, after more than thirty-five years, that Dreyfus actually spent a bare five years in prison before he was publicly exonerated by his country and given the cross of the Legion of Honor to boot. Yet those five years he once said left a mark on him which he would carry to his grave, and one need not doubt that they did. With just about as little evidence of his guilt, Tom Mooney has lived almost four times as long in a cell. If he is released, it will be because, as in the Dreyfus case, there were enough disinterested persons in the world to persist in championing him until justice was finally done. And now that August is coming around again, it should not be forgotten that two other prisoners of whose guilt the evidence was almost equally meager may not look forward hopefully to their ultimate release. Because a Governor of Massachusetts hoped to inherit the political good fortune of his predecessor, the sentence of Sacco and Vanzetti was not commuted to life imprisonment. Because they are dead, they will not in time know what it is to be free again, with their names cleared of a crime which to the last they steadfastly and credibly denied having committed. Proponents of the abolition of capital punishment sometimes seem as tiresome as single taxers, but there is no case which advances their cause more steadily or gives it more logic than that of the two in Massachusetts, who, unlike the more fortunate Dreyfus, were not permitted the simple decency of dying in their beds.

BECAUSE of our crowded space at the time we were unable to comment upon the excellent commencement address delivered last month by retiring President Joseph Ames of the Johns Hopkins University. Compared to the similar addresses of most other university presidents this year, especially the Hearstian anti-red one by President Angell of Yale, it is a little masterpiece. It is brief and sensible, but what particularly commands admiration is Dr. Ames's vigorous and courageous stand for free speech within and without the university classrooms. The conflict in its behalf, he said, "will never be over. Do not underestimate the forces against you. At the present time in this country they are fighting under the banner of patriotism and Americanism. But who defines the words for you? Look at them! . . . Back of all this talk of Americanism . . . lies the worship of that demi-god of the lower world, Orthodoxy, and back of Orthodoxy lurk the so-called Vested Interests." Then he added this sentence, which must have made strange reading to some of the members of the Johns Hopkins Board of Trustees: "It is absurd to think that the possession of money or the attainment of success in any way means that proof of right thinking or of right doing is secured." Dr. Ames's speech formed a glorious ending to his career as president of one of the most influential universities in the country.

SIR JOSIAH STAMP, chairman of Great Britain's largest railway system, and director of the Bank of England, recently made a 12,000-mile journey through the United States, and sums up his impressions in the Times of July 14. He expresses his amazement at the failure of the country to appreciate the gravity of the constitutional issue, but he does so in words which will give small comfort to the Liberty League. "So far from the Constitution being fixed," he writes, "and any change or new features treated with great jealousy as something to be undertaken only under direct pressure, it should be a feature of the Constitution that provision for amendment should arise systematically and automatically, and at regular intervals. The burden of political discussion should be what matters are proper to insert in the regular constitutional-amendment act of a particular forthcoming year. It would be prepared for with the regularity of a Presidential election." Sir Josiah, who rose from the British civil service, finds that Americans do not understand that "one cannot safely legislate beyond the capacity of experienced administration to execute. There is little sense [in America] of the truth that administration is both a tradition and a technique." He reports that we take a too rosy view of British recovery, but he understood that orthodox Britain is not so much being praised as the Roosevelt regime is being blamed. "American reporters see things in black and white and have not much use for half-tones. . . . To say anything that would qualify the high optimism about British recovery was, in a sense, to blunt the edge of a favorite political weapon."

DEFINITIVE—for the moment—figures have come out on the subject of drunken automobile drivers, and we offer them for what they are worth. Assembled from official police statistics of forty-three cities in New York State, including New York City, they show a decrease of 33 per cent in arrests of drivers for drunkenness in 1933 and 1934, as compared with four typical prohibition years. In New York City, in 1928, 1,501 drunken drivers were arrested; in 1931, 1,214; in 1933 and 1934, 835 and 887, respectively. Other states show comparable declines as follows: California, 10 per cent; Connecticut, 32.2 per cent; Illinois, 33.8 per cent; Iowa, 40 per cent; Michigan, 34 per cent; and Virginia, 33 per cent. Pennsylvania alone shows an increase—29 per cent. These figures will doubtless be challenged by the one-time drys; and in the absence of strict definition of what constitutes a drunken driver, perhaps they should not be considered conclusive. They may indicate a real decline in the intemperate consumption of strong waters; they may, on the other hand, merely indicate that ten years of drinking prohibition spirits have so fortified the American driver that he can now hold equal quantities of better liquor with results less damaging to public safety. A new menace, however, has been discovered on the public highway. Young ladies in bathing suits are not allowed to promenade in sight of motorists on the Boston Strandway. According to Police Captain Edward Fallon, they constitute a danger to automobile traffic in that they might lure drivers to take their eyes from the all-important road ahead. So far no statistics are available as to the number of drivers arrested for looking at a bathing beauty, but we once knew a man who bumped into a lamppost because he had turned to watch a pretty girl.

The Foolish Spending Program

OF all the contradictions and obscurities conjured up by the Roosevelt Administration, nothing surpasses the confusion in the policy of spending for public works in relief of unemployment. What is the objective of public spending? Is it merely to "purge the relief rolls," or is it to create employment? The newspapers agree that Harry Hopkins now is Number One spender, with Secretary Ickes a poor second. Mr. Hopkins is setting up a glorified and reformed CWA with the new qualification that all his projects must meet a high standard of social usefulness. Since he had 2,400,000 persons on work relief before the four-billion-dollar fund was created, he need only continue, elevate, and expand his former policy if he is to "purge" the rolls of a few hundred thousand more relief workers. Then the President's promise to find "useful" work for 3,500,000 persons this year will have been kept.

This would be reasonable only if the national objective is merely to purge the relief rolls, that is to say, if the chief evil is the cash dole. But a child can see that the evil is unemployment, and the policy must be not to end the dole but to create work. If it is argued that Mr. Hopkins, in purging the relief rolls, is creating work, the contention is a misleading half-truth. He is creating work for those on relief. The unemployed not on relief number probably another six million. For them Mr. Hopkins is doing nothing. They now find themselves in a penalized class; because they have managed not to appeal to the community for help, they are rewarded by not being helped. Not only that, the national policy of spending which might help them falls under the control of one man who is obsessed with the objective of purging relief rolls. More attention is paid to fulfilling the President's promise of taking all the able-bodied persons off relief than to finding work for the unemployed. This is sheer perversity. Assume that the relief rolls are purged; the unemployed not on relief will come to their senses and see that they only defeat themselves by not going on relief. The administration will then have a new roll to purge, which will cost another pretty sum of billions.

Strangely enough, this is being done in the name of self-respect. The cash dole is declared demoralizing; work relief is justified as strengthening individual character. The argument does not bear scrutiny. Things were better as Mr. Hopkins at first administered work relief, for he asked a person to work only for the hours, figured at his normal wage, which would equal the amount of his relief. That is, a dollar-an-hour man, drawing fifty dollars a month, worked fifty hours a month. Thus Mr. Hopkins recognized the price of a person's skill. Now the worker is classed as unskilled, intermediate, skilled, or professional, is made to work a fixed minimum of 140 hours a month, and receive payment which, at a rough estimate, is about 30 per cent below current wages. The price value of his skill is thus destroyed, and the self-respect he derived from having it socially recognized is destroyed with it. The alleged degradation of cash relief is supplanted by the genuine degradation of a work-gang status.

The projects of Mr. Ickes are let out under contract, and labor is employed by the contractor at current rates. The PWA takes men where it can find them; they can be on relief, they can have fought sucessfully to stay off relief. They are paid the going wage. Here no sophistries are called for about saving self-respect and preserving skills. A man gets a job which without PWA he would not have had. He earns his money—he will be discharged if he doesn't. As far as he is concerned his status is no different than if the project had been created by private enterprise. Why is this not in every way a more desirable method of relieving unemployment? The common answer is that Mr. Ickes is painfully slow, and has set up such rock-ribbed standards that few projects can meet his requirements. He did hurriedly create an unwieldy central administration, which has not always functioned smoothly; and when it was a choice between time on the one hand and legality and security on the other, he snapped his fingers at time. In so far as the PWA machine became clogged, he can be criticized, but this defect should not be exaggerated. He has made worse mistakes; for instance, he might have pressed much more actively the building of municipal light plants, instead of getting lost in the jungle of negotiating rate increases with local utilities. But he deserves full credit for setting a high standard for performance and integrity once work was under way. His greatest difficulty was the limitation of the public grant on PWA projects to 30 per cent. That has now been raised to 45 per cent, and the government is offering an unusual bargain, a public-works project, quality beyond challenge, for fifty-five cents on the dollar. This ought to bring plenty of new projects; it opens up the prospect of relieving unemployment on a national scale.

But here we come to the astounding contradiction in this spending policy. Mr. Ickes is offering his bargain at a 45 per cent reduction. Just across the street Mr. Hopkins is bidding against him (it comes to this) by offering to build public works for nothing. That is, Mr. Hopkins can make a public grant up to 100 per cent. His wares are not so alluring, for his projects have to be built by relief-roll labor, working at depressed wages, and the job on the whole is hastier and likely to be less perfect. The division between Mr. Ickes, who controls projects costing more than $25,000, and Mr. Hopkins, who controls all lesser ones, is not genuine, since the projects rejected by the PWA can go back to Mr. Hopkins for further consideration. Is there any doubt which bidder will get the business? A few will go to Mr. Ickes because they like the quality of his services. Most will go to Mr. Hopkins to get something for next to nothing. This policy is ridiculous, and must be revised. Mr. Hopkins must not bid against Mr. Ickes; the unemployed not on relief must have every consideration; the money must be spent at current wages until it is demonstrated that no more can be spent in that way; and then the unemployed should have cash relief. There are signs that the folly of the present system is making itself apparent, and Mr. Ickes is to have sole charge, at least, of low-cost housing. But we see no sign that the false philosophy of "purging the relief rolls" will be abandoned.

The Wolf and the Lamb

THE League of Nations, wounded at Corfu in 1923, and over whose corpse Japan seized Manchuria and the war in the Gran Chaco went on for years, should, now that the Abyssinian affair seems well on the way to its denouement, be buried, not so much in the interest of justice as of public health and decency. After several weeks of footless discussion the Italo-Abyssinian Conciliation Commission gave up the ghost at Scheveningen. Although the purpose of the commission's negotiations had been peaceful settlement of the Italo-Abyssinian dispute, with particular reference to the affair at Ualual, the Italian delegates refused further mediation when Professor Gaston Jeze, in presenting Abyssinia's case, insisted on declaring that Ualual was in Abyssinian territory, as pertinent to the discussion. Although the creation of the League commission of four on May 25 provided, in the event of a disagreement, for the selection of a fifth member who might bring about an adjudication, the commission adjourned without any proposals for further meetings. Abyssinia has now demanded that the dispute be brought before the League Council at its meeting in August, but even Emperor Haile Selassie must know, what the European countries are at no pains to conceal, on how frail a reed he is leaning when he suggests such further negotiation.

How pertinent is the old fable! The wolf said to the lamb, "I shall eat you for muddying the water," and when the lamb attempted to explain that this was impossible, since he was drinking below stream, the wolf replied: "Then I shall eat you anyway. Why do I need an excuse?" In the modern version there is, of course, a difference. The wolf is supported by a circle of other wolves, which, if they are not prepared to join in the banquet, are at least determined not to interfere.

It is predicted that the war will begin in September, when the rainy season has ended. Signor Mussolini declares that nothing shall stand in the way of his conquest of Abyssinia! Rome considered the attempt of the American and French delegates at Scheveningen to prolong the discussions a plan to "wreck the commission," and Italian officials are unable to understand any suggestion that the United States might invoke the Kellogg Pact, since this country "has no sphere of influence" in Abyssinia. Simple adherence to a treaty to which Italy and the United States were parties, and which attempted to make war impossible, is incomprehensible to a country bent on territorial aggrandizement at whatever cost.

As a result of Secretary Hull's latest discussions with the French, British, and Italian ambassadors on July 11, at which, without actually invoking the pact to outlaw war, he expressed the deep concern of the United States for the preservation of peace, it is not unlikely that further discussions will take place in an attempt to prevent hostilities. But it would be idle to suppose that any such negotiations will be successful. The Duce is playing the game with all his cards on the table, and he is well aware that no country has given any indication of effectively challenging him, or is likely to do so. France, Great Britain, Japan, even Sweden are politely disassociating themselves from the affair, if not directly then by joining the embargo against the exportation of arms to Abyssinia. A particularly ominous note has been struck in the declaration of the International Red Cross that it will not be able to be of aid to Abyssinia in the event of war, since the Emperor has not yet found it possible to give the necessary guaranties demanded by the Geneva Red Cross Convention of 1929. The lamb, in other words, will be eaten; and not only will the slaughter take place without interference, but such wounds as it may suffer before its final demise will not be ministered to in the manner which has been demanded by humanity for more than half a century.

At least one thing should be eminently clear from the progress of the Italo-Abyssinian struggle. Not only is the League of Nations shown—one may hope for the last time—to be hopelessly inadequate to deal with international disputes when these are projected by a determined and predatory government, but treaties to "outlaw war" are equally displayed to the world in all their futility. The system of economic sanctions, moreover, when it takes the form of an embargo on the exportation of arms to a belligerent or about-to-be belligerent country, is shown to have its weaknesses. Italy, with a handsome corps of munitions factories to call upon, is not concerned with the problem. Abyssinia must buy arms from other countries, and however admirable in principle may be their refusal to sell munitions of war, in fact this refusal contributes to the weakness of what is already incomparably the weaker nation. In the face of the time-honored processes of aggression, in short, our modern diplomacy is shown to have few advantages over the old system. It takes more than a signature on a treaty to stop a tyrant.

There Will Come Thousands

TWENTY-TWO obscure Americans were killed in the first six months of 1935 in the course of that ceaseless battle between the haves and the have-nots which at any moment may cause some quiet American street to bloom with tear gas and bring armed men running to factory gates. Of the twenty-two thirteen were killed during strikes; the following accounts of how their lives came to an end reveal in a few sharp strokes the plight of the disinherited and the forces ranged against them.

February 3. Columbus ("Pink") Walker, Rossville, Georgia. Walker was an unemployed man, a sympathizer of the United Textile Workers of America. He was shot by a scab during a strike at the Richmond Hosiery Mills.

February 17. Paul Knight of Santa Maria, California. Killed at El Centro by vigilantes during a strike of lettuce workers, under the leadership of the Fruit and Vegetable Workers' Union.

April 4. Ignacio Velarde, Gallup, New Mexico. Unemployed veteran killed by the fire of the sheriff and his deputies during a workers' demonstration against the eviction of unemployed miners.

April 17. Andy Latiska, Toronto, Ohio. Killed when guardsmen poured a hundred shots into the crowd of strikers at the Kaul Clay Company.

May 11. Fonie Stephens, La Grange, Georgia. Injured by national guardsmen who were evicting strikers from the company houses. Died in hospital as result of these injuries.

June 14. John W. Duster, Omaha, Nebraska. Killed by police fire during the strike of street-car men.

June 14. George Melhelm, Canton, Ohio. Died in hospital from injuries received when struck by tear-gas bomb fired by Republic Steel Company guards during the strike at the Berger Manufacturing Company.

June 21. W. H. Kaarte, Eureka, California. Killed in attack by police with riot guns and tear gas at Holmes-Eureka mill, where lumber workers were on strike.

The idiocy of poverty in the midst of plenty has often been pointed out. It is as nothing to the tragedy inherent in the facts here tabulated. In practically every case it would be found that the immediate point at issue in the struggle that ended with the death of one opponent was not the right to that good life which could be provided to every American out of the richness of his country and the intelligence and skill of his fellow-countrymen. Instead, the point at issue was the difference between one starvation wage and another, between twenty cents an hour for picking lettuce and thirty cents an hour, between ten dollars a week for working long hours in a dangerous industry and twelve dollars a week, and in the case of the miserable share-cropper between complete destitution and abject poverty. There is a final idiocy. In every case the forces of the government were aligned not with those who were attempting to realize ever so faintly the intelligent American dream of material well-being, but with those who would shatter it to bits in order to preserve the anachronism of private profit.

Such a state of affairs cannot last forever. Meanwhile such organizations as the International Labor Defense, which compiled the casualty list here cited, perform an extremely important function. The I. L. D. has just issued a pamphlet on the occasion of its tenth anniversary which provides a brief history of working-class heroism in the fight for that "American standard of living" which all school children are taught to believe in. (It also contains explicit practical instructions on what to do when arrested.) In general, it makes excellent reading. We had forgotten that this inscription is engraved on the Statue of Liberty: "Send us your huddled masses yearning to be free. . . ." We were moved as by the Spirit of '76 when we read the telegram that Joe Hill sent to Big Bill Haywood just before Hill's execution by a firing squad. "Goodby, Bill. I will die like a true-blue rebel. Don't waste any time in mourning. Organize." And the speech of Angelo Herndon as he faced an all-white jury just before being sentenced to long years on a Georgia chain-gang is authentically American in its revolutionary eloquence:

> You may do what you will with Angelo Herndon. You may indict him. You may put him in jail. But there will come thousands of Angelo Herndons. If you really want to do anything about the case, you must go out and indict the social system. . . . You may succeed in killing one, two, even a score of working-class organizers. But you cannot kill the working class.

Twenty-two workers have already been killed in 1935. Many others are in prison. In their behalf we pass on the slogan of the I. L. D.: "They gave their freedom. Give them your support."

Censored!

IN the striking little pamphlet "Censored!" got out by the National Committee Against Censorship of the Theater Arts and sold for five cents, there is one thing that strikes us as a bit disingenuous. Mark Marvin contributes an introductory plea "For a Free Stage" and in the course of it discusses conditions in Europe, where "in the continuous crisis that has followed the World War censorship accompanied the growth of fascist power and fascist 'culture.'" Germany, Italy, and Austria are taken up in turn, but evidently Russia is not considered a part of Europe since no mention is made of any censorships exercised there.

Otherwise the pamphlet is well worth reading, especially for its summary of recent incidents which demonstrate how widespread is the tendency at the moment to use either police powers or extra-legal terrorism for the purpose of preventing the performance of plays written from a radical point of view. Clifford Odets's effective tour de force "Waiting for Lefty," just at the end of a long New York run, has already quite a history behind it. Boston, following its recent tradition, promptly forbade a performance. During the same week the New Haven school board revoked the permission previously granted to perform it in a school building, and in Chelsea, Massachusetts, a policeman broke up a performance. In Newark the New Theater League, after having its permission to use a school building revoked, rented a theater only to find that the police had discovered, four hours before the scheduled performance, hitherto unsuspected fire hazards in the building. Fortunately, however, the story has a happy ending in Newark. As a result of a protest meeting, the mayor and the other city officials have been compelled to grant the use of the school building and have assured a citizens' committee that no more attempts will be made to break up a performance.

The American theater has never shared even theoretically in the right of free speech guaranteed to the printed word, and it is too bad that liberalism has not in the past made any general effort to obtain a recognition of its right to the same status as any other form of expression. There is, of course, a disposition on the part of some radicals to deny the value of "constitutional guaranties," and the right of free speech is undoubtedly violated often enough. But that such are nevertheless worth a good deal is sufficiently demonstrated by the fact that in the specific case under consideration a book has rights which an acted play has not. Doubtless the same persons who object to a performance of "Waiting for Lefty" would be equally glad to suppress the volume in which it is printed. Yet any citizen of Newark can read it if he likes. And the press's theoretical right to freedom is worth just that much.

It is also worth remarking that high-handed police methods in dealing with the theater may easily pave the way for the gradual extension of such methods into other fields. Sometimes liberty is lost all at once; at least as often it disappears bit by bit. The citizen who has become accustomed to seeing theaters closed by executive fiat is already half prepared to see newspapers suspended and books refused publication in the same way.

Issues and Men

Mirage of Gold

Skagway, July 1

I HAVE just passed by train along the line of the gold rush of 1898 to the Klondike, looking down from the tracks above upon Dead Horse Gulch in White Pass. Through here, and through the Chilkoot Pass, thousands of men, in rain and snow and under clear skies, suffered, struggled, fought, and died in their mad efforts to be the first to reach the newly discovered gold. Near the summit of White Pass the train stops at a monument on which is a tablet recalling the death in this brutal vale of three thousand horses and mules, tortured, starved, beaten, and overloaded by men whose one thought was to beat everyone else to the Eldorado. Because most of their masters were unfamiliar with the art of packing, many of these animals were literally skinned alive or lost their balance in dangerous places; according to one eyewitness, the toilsome procession up that ravine passed one dead animal after another. When the stout-hearted and physically capable had surmounted the pass and crossed over to Canadian soil, into the Yukon Territory, they might well have lost heart on facing the appalling treeless waste, the mountains of rock, the deep snow, the bitter winds which confronted them there nearly four thousand feet above sea level.

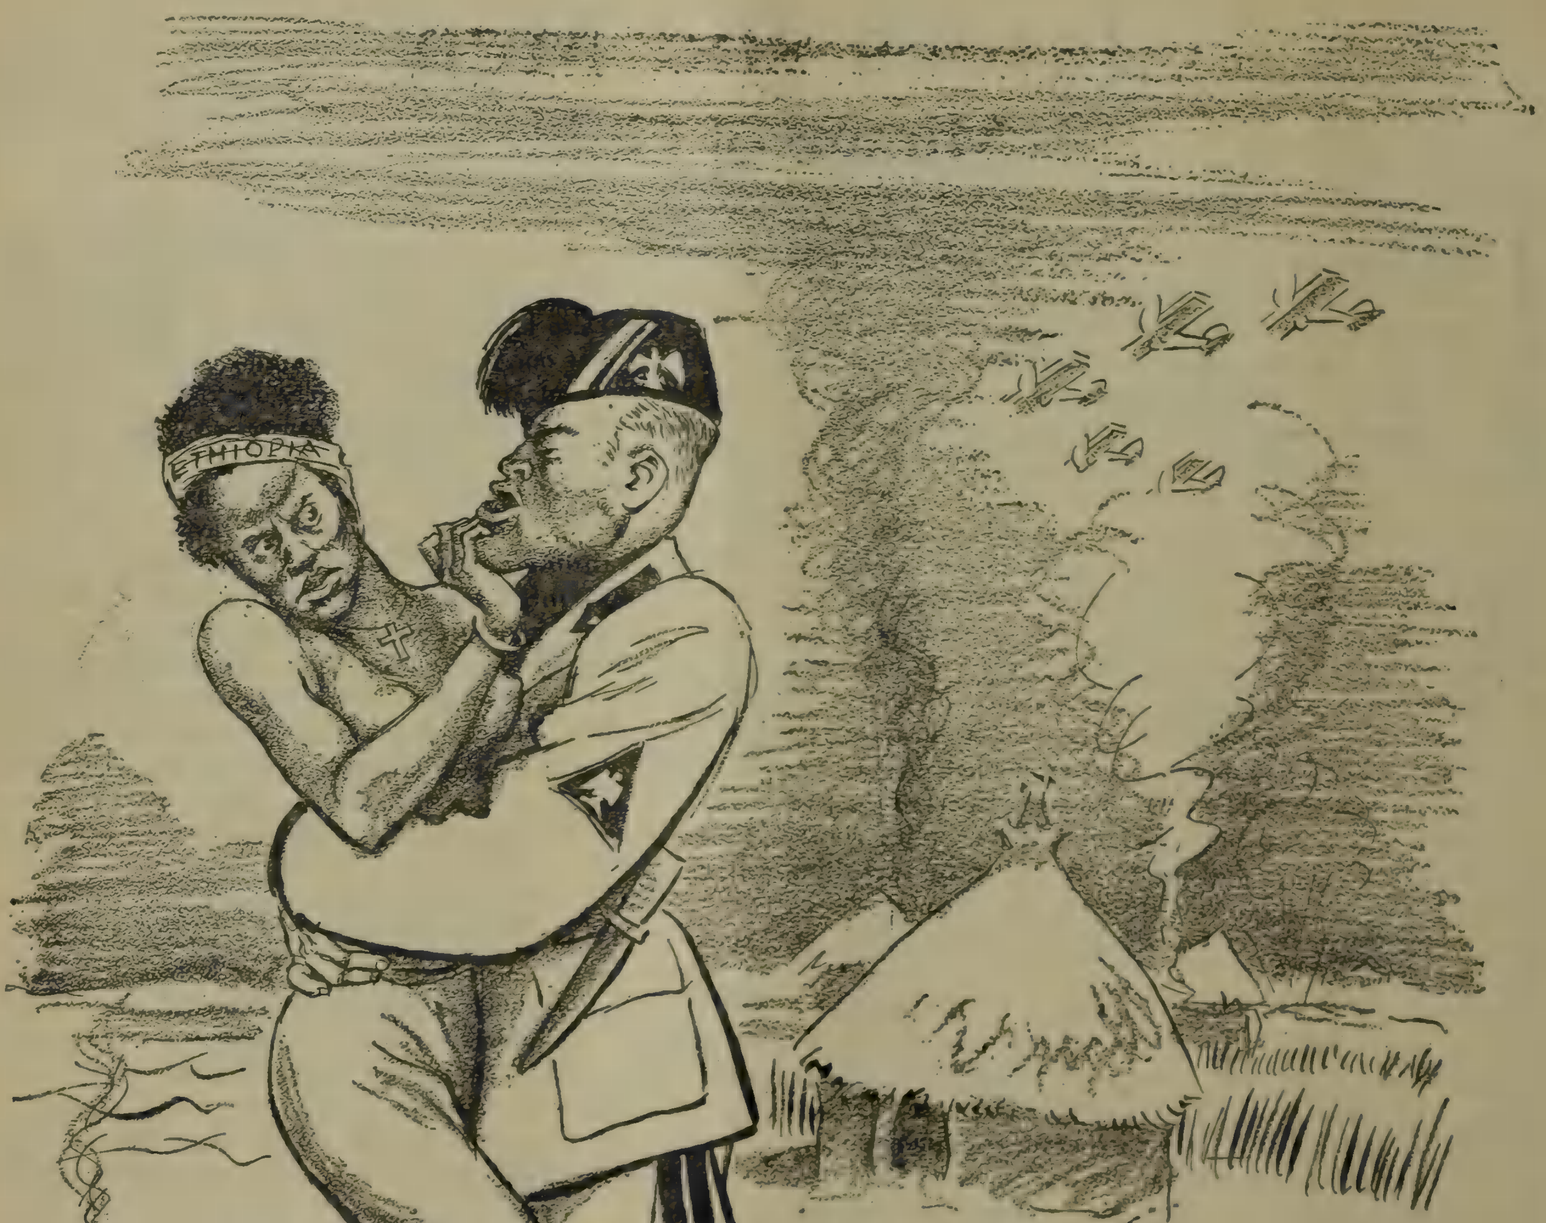
Now even the trail itself is rapidly disappearing as a result of snow slides and cave-ins and the rotting away of bridges across the mountain stream which flows through the gulch. I doubt if it could be climbed today. At the foot of Dead Horse Gulch White City arose overnight and in no time at all contained ten thousand persons—it is hard to see today how they could possibly have found places for their tents and shacks and log cabins upon those sloping hillsides. The site of the "city" is marked only by a single cabin and by a white cross erected in memory of a packhorse-caravan operator who returned a year ago to the scene of his activities and died that night as he slept rolled up in his blankets where he had camped many a night before. But the disappearance of this "city" is not an isolated case. At Lake Bennett the railroad station and a deserted, windowless, rotting log church alone survive in the place where another ten thousand lived and coined money out of the hordes who bought or built flimsy rafts and boats of every kind and description to ferry themselves and their animals—if they still had any—down Lake Bennett and the connecting rivers and lakes which finally empty into the Yukon. In the old days the lake teemed with every kind of craft because nobody went overland from there. All trusted to the water and the currents, and not a few lost their lives at White Horse many miles beyond. When we passed Lake Bennett, the only craft on the water was a seaplane—now become an extremely valuable adjunct of life under the Arctic Circle, which is only 460 miles from Bennett. What a fortune its owner could have made in 1898! Men would have torn each other to pieces for seats on that plane and the privilege of reaching Dawson, the gateway to the Klondike, in a few hours.

It now takes thirty-six hours by stern-wheel steamer from White Horse to Dawson, the end of the railroad, and four days back against a terrific current. Dawson, the great boom town, also has vanished. There were thirty thousand people there at one time in the saloons and dance halls and in cabins and tents and homes of every description, in addition to the miners who came there in droves to blow in within two or three days the money they had toiled for months to acquire. Today it is a staid, sober community, well policed by the red-coated Mounted Police, as friendly and kindly disposed as the old Dawson was reckless, devil-may-care, and utterly indifferent to the fate of any individual. Significant is the fact that mining ceased years ago to be the work of gravel-washing gold-seekers on their own. It has become the job of great corporations, whose machinery, here as elsewhere, produces steadily year in and year out, but which do not seem to have gained as much from the Roosevelt gold policy as might have been expected. Those who made or expected to make a fortune by a lucky strike have long since disappeared.

Finally, here is Skagway, a mere wreck of its former boom greatness. I counted up to fifty houses and stores falling to pieces and then stopped. There is an indescribable air of desolation about it, like the decaying villages one sees occasionally in Vermont and New Hampshire sinking gradually back into the embraces of Mother Earth. Hardly five hundred permanent residents remain here, living off tourists or connected with the railroad. Take away the railroad, and Skagway would follow White City to oblivion. Sic transit—the mirage of gold.

For it was a mirage—nothing more and nothing less. It is impossible to make a balance sheet of that gold rush, to foot up the loss of men, the destruction of animals, the waste of property and to offset it with the results achieved. But the Bishop of Yukon Territory says that more money was brought in and spent by those who took part in the gold rush than was actually taken out in nuggets of the precious material. That is astounding and enlightening indeed. Yet I have no doubt that if another bonanza were reported tomorrow, there would be a mad rush of airplanes and caterpillar tractors and motor cars and mules and horses to the scene. You would not be able to make people listen to the story of what took place in 1898 and of how little those who reached the promised land got and kept. The Bishop says that of the numerous Indians who made large sums of money by the sale of their holdings of land he knows of only one who kept a fraction of the money thus obtained. But the lure of gold, of private profit, is as great as ever and always a mirage.

Oswald Garrison Villard



ETHIOPIA
Fritz

"But, dear, I only want to civilize you!"

Huey Long Chokes New Orleans

By C. H. CAMPBELL

New Orleans, July 8

THIS tale of the City Hall That Moved to Washington was begun on July 4. But five days is a long time in Louisiana today, and last week is now ancient history. Twenty-five new laws have since then been placed on the statute books of the state, laws that have no other object than to tighten the grip of the state's dictator, Huey P. Long.

At a moderate estimate, some 50,000 employees of the state and its subdivisions are placed by this new legislation directly under the dictator's thumb as far as their jobs are concerned. They include school teachers and policemen, library workers, garbage collectors, and employees of the courts. All this was done under the pious name of civil service. But although the new laws, and some that were passed at preceding extraordinary sessions of the legislature under the Long whip, apply to the entire state, their major object is the control of the city of New Orleans, which has crept under the wing of the federal government under previous attacks by the Long machine and now seems destined to lose its independence altogether unless the national administration finances it and the federal courts support it.

Twenty days from today, the effective date of the latest state laws, there will be twelve office-holders in City Hall who are not removable at will by Senator Long, and none of those twelve may name so much as his own stenographer or clerk without Long's approval. Seven of the twelve are the assessors who fix the value of property for taxation. The other five are the Mayor and the four members of the city's Commission Council, named by the electors of the city by a decisive majority over Long opposition.

At the Criminal Courts building an efficient, honest District Attorney, Eugene Stanley, may not choose his own assistants or his clerks, and not even the name of civil service is given to this, for they are to be appointed by the Attorney General of the state, a subservient tool of Senator Long's. Furthermore, the Attorney General at any time he chooses may supersede the District Attorney in any prosecution, and the courts themselves are barred from preventing him.

Months ago Senator Long set out to bend New Orleans to his will, or break it. Here was organized opposition; here the people at the polls had defeated his candidates for mayor and council and other city offices; here he must make sure of the votes to protect him against signs of waning strength in some of his old strongholds in the country parishes. First he obtained control of the state Supreme Court, highest tribunal, a control represented by a bare majority of four votes to three—the court always shows just that ratio in decisions involving cases with a political flavor. Already the legislature, save for a dwindling minority, was merely a rubber stamp for his will. The court now would approve any act the legislature might pass.

But it soon developed that there was more in the high-court control than that. The Attorney General went into the Supreme Court and said in effect that the City of New Orleans was bankrupt, that the state desired to institute concursus proceedings to establish its exact financial status and to protect creditors, but that all the judges in the city were biased or too busy and would the Supreme Court please appoint some other judge to hear the case. Four to three, the Supreme Court did please, naming Judge Amos Lee Ponder of Amite, a country jurist who had long been a creature of the state machine. Judge Ponder immediately issued an order for a hearing and for the production of the city's financial records.

The city replied with one of its first moves for federal protection. It went into the court of United States District Judge Wayne G. Borah, nephew of the Senator from Idaho, and asked for permission to reorganize the city's finances under the terms of New Deal legislation, amending the bankruptcy act to apply to municipalities. Judge Borah stayed the action before Judge Ponder pending a hearing, and the city obtained the consent of the New Orleans banks, its largest creditors, to a reorganization plan whereby overdue loans on anticipated tax receipts would in the future have fixed maturity dates instead of being demand paper. These overdue loans resulted from delinquent tax collections, resulting, in turn, from the general business depression; they were fully covered by the property involved but the city did not wish to sell it for taxes at such a time. Judge Borah approved the plan. As soon as he had done so, the city, hard pressed financially because it no longer had the fiscal-agency contracts under which it was wont to anticipate tax revenues for current expenses, and faced further with legislative action delaying the tax-collection date until October 1, went to the banks and asked a loan of $3,286,000 for operating expenses during 1935. The bulk of this was to be used for expenses from June 1 through December, and the balance for bills incurred during the first four months of the year and for back salaries due city employees, who had been struggling along on half pay nearly all of that time.

The banks seemed about to grant the loan, when the state announced a suspensive appeal from Judge Borah's decision. Immediately the banks wrote Mayor T. Semmes Walmsley, one of the chief objectives of the Long attack, that they considered this appeal to mean that the legality of outstanding loans to the city was still under attack, and that under the circumstances they could lend no more.

Once more the city turned to the federal government. The Mayor went to Washington with a member of the directorate of every bank in the city and asked the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for a loan. The bankers said they thought the paper was good but they could go no farther because of their previous loans. The head of the RFC, Jesse H. Jones, agreed, but said he had no legal authority to make such a loan. The Mayor turned to the Federal Reserve Bank. He was told that while the bank had the right to make the loan, it was designed to assist member banks and not to deal directly with a municipality. The city was still without funds.

While the city government was turning this way and that in search of money, and paying half salaries or less to its employees from funds obtained through discount offers for tax prepayments, liquor licenses, and other smaller revenue sources, Senator Long struck another blow, this time at personal liberty; and again the aid of the federal court was sought as the only protection against oppression.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Colonel John P. Sullivan, long in politics, a bitter foe of the Senator, was charged by the Attorney General's office in the criminal court with "operating a confidence game" in connection with certain transactions between a Homestead Association of which he was attorney and a director, and a realty company in which he was a large stockholder. The transactions were years old. They had been mentioned by Senator Long more than a year before in a Senate committee hearing. But the charge was filed with the statement that prescription had not run because the facts had only just been brought to the attention of the Attorney General.

No sooner was the charge filed against Colonel Sullivan than the Attorney General obtained from the state Supreme Court an order recusing all the local criminal-court judges and naming to hear the case Judge Mark C. Pickrel, a Long appointee to a judgeship at Lake Charles, Louisiana, 200 miles away. Colonel Sullivan's attorneys then went into federal court and asked transfer of the case under an article in the federal revised statutes that provides for such transfer where the defendant can show that he would not get a fair trial in the state court. On the date set for his arraignment Colonel Sullivan did not appear before Judge Pickrel. His attorneys mentioned their federal pleading. It made no difference to the judge; he ordered a warrant issued for Colonel Sullivan's immediate arrest. The attorneys had to rush to federal court and get from Judge Borah a writ staying proceedings before Judge Pickrel and setting a hearing before himself in November.

Now Colonel Sullivan is not highly regarded by some people in New Orleans. Many who are opposed to Senator Long politically are also opposed to political leadership by the Colonel, although many of these undoubtedly would consider him by far the lesser evil. But by this case he has become a symbol for all opposition to Long. For should the federal court decide in the fall that it has no jurisdiction in his case, who could oppose Long's domination and feel safe in a kangaroo court of Long's making?

After the Sullivan charge was filed, Judge Ponder appeared again on the scene, this time appointed by the Supreme Court (four to three) to hear receivership proceedings brought by the Attorney General against the Sewerage and Water Board, which provides the city's drainage and sewerage and its water supply. The board had obtained a $2,500,000 loan and grant from the Public Works Administration to make needed improvements and to put men to work. It was a local board, named by the City Council. But the $2,500,000 looked like a lot of money to spend on patronage and fat contracts. The fifth special session of the legislature in a year rearranged the manner of appointment to the board so as to give Long control. Into federal court went the city —thinly disguised as out-of-the-state taxpayers and bondholders of the board—and obtained an injunction against the new board, which in the meantime had been declared legally constituted by the state courts. The injunction meant that the city-controlled board could go on with its spending of the federal funds, at least pending final decisions against it. Hence the receivership proceedings and the reentry of Judge Ponder on the scene, plus an injunction to prevent disbursement of the money. Once more the city appeared in federal court, seeking adjudication of the board's finances. Judge Borah remanded the case to the state court, but now is considering a rehearing. Many workmen, meanwhile, are idle.

While all these things were going on, the city began to feel the effects of the various punitive acts of the more recent legislative sessions. It had reduced its budget from $8,815,386.94 in 1929 to $6,655,058.34 in 1935, trimming everywhere possible to meet the reduction in revenues that followed depressed times. But the legislature made its position more difficult by retaining $700,000 annually turned back by the state from highway gasoline taxes for use on city streets, by taking away the right of the city to certain license taxes, and by forcing increased appropriations for the police and fire departments, which by yet another legislative act had been put under state boards having no connection with the city government, not even a nominal one.

A few weeks ago it became evident that the city could not find money to pay its employees any part of their salaries. Most of them seemed determined to carry on as long as they could possibly obtain food and rent on credit, but certain leaders among the garbage collectors, stirred up, it has since developed, by Long agents, issued an ultimatum: if their pay was not forthcoming, they would strike. And strike they did, for there was no source whence their pay could come. The city treasury was completely empty.

Once again the city looked to the Great White Father in Washington. The order came down the line to the local offices of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration. The garbage men were to be put on the relief rolls and the collection of garbage in New Orleans was to become an FERA project. Not only that, but employees in nine other city departments—"departments essential to the health and safety of the city"—were to be paid in the same way. These were employees of the city board of health, the city prisons, juvenile delinquent homes, and the like, with the exception of professional men in those departments. At one stroke 1,400 of the city's 2,447 employees (excluding the state-controlled police and firemen) were put on Uncle Sam's payroll. True, they were not paid their full salaries. But they were getting $63,000 a month in all, compared with the $85,000 a month they were supposed to be paid by the city. "And the city owes these men the difference," declared Mayor Walmsley, "and will pay it when it has the funds." The city also owes their total salaries to the remaining 1,047 employees who are working for nothing.

The action of the FERA brought Senator Long back from Washington on the first airplane trip of his life. He arrived on the night of July 3. On Independence Day the legislature was again in session. Early on the morning of July 8 it adjourned. Twenty days from that date the following new laws will be in effect:

All city property taxes will be collected by the state tax collector instead of by the city treasurer, thus putting all the employees of the city treasurer out of work.

All city license taxes will be collected by the state supervisor of public accounts instead of by the city.

The city one-cent tax on gasoline will be collected by the supervisor of public accounts and placed in a special fund for city paving, to be expended only on approval of the Long-controlled state Tax and Bond Board.

The police and fire boards, now Long-controlled, may borrow in anticipation of their revenues to pay the policemen and firemen, although other city employees are unpaid (save those on relief) and Long has blocked similar loans to pay them.

The state Budget Board will control appointment of all school teachers in the state, making possible the turning over to politics of the New Orleans school system, in which for many years the teachers have been secure in their jobs.

The state Civil Service Commission, composed entirely of Long-controlled state officials, must approve the appointment of every state, parish, and municipal employee, except those elected directly by the vote of the people. This means, in the government of the city of New Orleans, everyone except the Mayor and the four Councilmen.

The city may no longer collect licenses from liquor dealers, from whom the state already collects license taxes, but the additional licenses charged by the city will be collected by the state.

Last but not least—and probably the occasion for the whole business of the legislature's session—five laws provide that anyone who shall use relief funds for political purposes shall be guilty of a criminal offense.

Was there a political purpose in the payment of the city's garbage collectors and other employees with FERA funds when the city could not pay them, considering that the FERA in Louisiana is dominated by anti-Long leaders named by the national administration, which he opposes? May the state Civil Service Commission refuse to approve the appointment of a garbage man—a municipal employee—and then name another man in his place to be paid by the FERA?

There is a primary election coming in January. Senator Long has a seat in the Senate at issue. Eight seats in Congress and many state offices must be filled.

How much longer can the City of New Orleans manage without funds? To what extent can the federal government offset with relief funds Long's control of all the political jobs in the state and its municipalities? How much will this help, with the polls completely in charge of Long-appointed commissioners, an unprecedented situation brought about by yet another special legislative act? And how far can the federal courts go to protect the people of New Orleans and of the whole state from oppression if they oppose the dictator? Already state investigators are probing state income-tax returns, filed for the first time this year, of some of those opposed to the Senator's domination, as though to offset the scandalous revelations of the federal grand jury's probe into the graft-swelled incomes of some of Long's leaders. The next few months will tell the tale.

Storm Over the Virgin Islands

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

Washington, July 15

THE publicity given the inhabitants of the Virgin Islands, if figured on a per capita basis, establishes an all-time record. The population of the Islands is 22,000. If the newspaper space devoted to the Islands were divided among them, the share of each individual would be as great as that of a Hollywood star. This is not normal. Something is wrong in the Virgin Islands, no doubt about it. But the Islands receive so much attention as to make that wrong appear to be tremendous. Yet the evidence before the Senate subcommittee last week, which Secretary Ickes says is full of perjury, and which was accepted without cross-examination, is in the main tittle-tattle, and at its worst is not tremendous. What was tremendous was not the testimony but the method of Senator Tydings, chairman of the subcommittee. It is a matter of importance when a Senate committee invites witnesses to appear before it to make charges against a department of government, admits their statements without cross-examination, postpones rebutting testimony until a later date, and when the chairman intersperses the record with his own judgment. Thus Senator Tydings acquitted Judge Webber T. Wilson, the notorious judge of the McIntosh case, familiar to Nation readers, simply on the Judge's version of the events.

One reason why the Virgin Islands are in the news is that a politically appointed judge has to be whitewashed. The spoils system is under attack. The highest-ups in the system are involved. Judge Wilson is a protege of Senator Pat Harrison; if he is disgraced Pat Harrison is disgraced. But Pat Harrison may not be disgraced because he is too important as the Administration's lieutenant in the Senate. Secretary Ickes wants Wilson removed. He already has more than irritated Attorney General Homer Cummings, Postmaster General Farley, and Senator Harrison, all of them linked in the chain of the appointment. Senator Tydings now comes out on the side of the spoilsmen. He is hostile to Secretary Ickes. Indeed, he wrote the Secretary one of the rudest letters ever penned in the history of the Senate, when Secretary Ickes protested that he had broken his promise to let witnesses be cross-examined.

So the system of patronage is at stake. The prestige of Secretary Ickes is at stake. The relationship between the Interior Department and the Senate is at stake. Secretary Ickes wants Wilson out; the spoils system wants Governor Pearson out. Pearson is a Republican whom Ickes is hanging on to. But that still does not explain why 22,000 Virgin Islanders get so much newspaper space. If Governor Pearson really were a terribly corrupt man, shielded by a vicious Department of the Interior, that would explain it. But one needs only to reflect upon the passionate charges of Paul C. Yates and other accusing witnesses to realize that Pearson is not a crook and a grafter; nor is the Interior Department a Tammany Hall. All the Virgin Islands people put together would make one fair-sized small town. And the accusations are of small-town caliber, disseminated with the usual small-town distortion and exaggeration by whispers and gossip. Since I wrote the article in The Nation on justice in the Virgin Islands I have had interviews with "experts" on the Islands who wished to "set me straight." Most of them impressed me as being persons obsessed, pursuing fantasies, all innocent of appreciating what an impossible interpretation they gave of human nature. If they were to be believed, the satanic residue is about a hundred times more concentrated in Governor Pearson and Secretary Ickes than in ordinary mortals. One would expect at least a sizable embezzlement a day from the government in the Virgin Islands, and now and then a murder. One listens to them for a while and decides that what they say is not material for the law courts but for the pages of a novel.

Even so, there is something wrong in the Virgin Islands, that is, aside from the patronage problem. It isn't explained by Governor Pearson's corruption, since he is not corrupt. Nor is it explained by calling Morris Davis, the colored leader of the local proletariat and antagonist of the Pearson regime, a prejudiced agitator, which undoubtedly he is. It isn't explained by admitting that Governor Pearson has not made administration in these distant islands as efficient as it needs to be. The fact is that the majority of the Virgin Islanders are hostile to Pearson and to the Department of the Interior which controls him. They were hostile to his predecessor; they were hostile to the Danes who once ruled the islands. They are "agin' the government." Why? Because the government is fundamentally against them. Not consciously, not deliberately, but in the way that so many colonial masters rule their subjects. For the Virgin Islanders, though on a high level of education and ability as native populations go, have mighty little to say about their own affairs. The wealth in the islands is unequally distributed; the tax burden is also unequally borne in an inverse ratio. Voting in this "American" territory is on an income qualification, and local government is by a body chosen by this electorate with members added by the governor's appointment. Here, of course, is the real evil in the Virgin Islands, and until it is cured, there never will be peace, there never will be a popular American government or governor. And there never will be publicity measured on a normal per capita basis.

No doubt about it, Secretary Ickes means well by the Islanders, and he told Paul Yates, when he sent him to be Pearson's executive assistant, to treat the natives "like human beings." Had Pearson not been accused of crimes he never committed, and had the patronage issue never been raised, the Department of the Interior and Dr. Ernest Gruening's Division of Territories and Insular Possessions would have been free to get at fundamental problems. They have prepared a tax-reform bill for the Senate, just a beginning but showing what might be expected if the Islands were not subject to the immediate pressure of the feud. But Pearson was under attack, the department was under attack, and the feud was at its height. Yates went down to help Pearson; he was chosen by him, and he turned traitor. Ex-Congressman Wilson went down to be judge and came to be looked upon as the chief hope of the angry population against the governor and the government. Baer went down as government attorney, a Tydings protege, and turned against the governor. The motives and caliber of Yates can best be illustrated by citing his cablegram sent after his resignation to Stephen Early, the President's secretary: "I, together with other loyal Democrats, have been abused and crucified by a gang of reactionary and thieving Hoover Republicans." The value of Baer is shown by his decision to blast the Republican Pearson regime with a broadside of graft prosecutions—about a hundred of them. The Department of Interior hurried down two investigators to find out what was what. On their report Baer was dismissed, and the department was informed that one straight case of corruption was found—the man is in jail—and there was the famous McIntosh case. Readers will recall that the government tried to drop this case, and that Judge Wilson, overruling the government's motion, proceeded to try McIntosh himself, refused a jury, found him guilty, and delivered a sermon about the cross of Christ that was the finest gem of Americana for the year.

Judge Wilson told about this trial at last week's hearing. He also told about himself, disavowing any knowledge of political conditions. He had never "dreamed," he said, of becoming Governor Pearson's successor. To listen to him, one almost would have thought no finer paragon of judicial probity ever graced a judge's bench. Almost, but not quite. For when he told about the McIntosh case he had to admit that this hapless government servant did testify that he took the supplies with the authority of the assistant director of the Public Works Department, Donald S. Boreham, and that Boreham swore that this was so. "Boreham," related the Judge, of McIntosh's testimony, "had given him [McIntosh] permission to do it [take the lumber and cement] and McIntosh promised to pay it back to him some time or other, which Boreham swore that he did. Which the court did not believe, and I therefore decided that he was guilty." As a matter of fact, payment was in services which McIntosh actually rendered. But that is not the point. Here was the kernel of the situation: Boreham was a government man, a Pearson man. If he were believed, McIntosh would have to go free. If McIntosh went free, the Pearson regime would not be discredited. So Judge Wilson disbelieved the sworn testimony of a government official, found McIntosh guilty, and fined him $200. And McIntosh then listened to the representative of American justice roll out: "You have become a Judas and a Benedict Arnold to your country," after which came the story of the cross.

It was after this testimony that Senator Tydings made the remark: "I have seen nothing about his [Judge Wilson's] conduct in the Virgin Islands in connection with this case that reflects on Mr. Wilson." On this Secretary Ickes wrote to the Senator: "Before this ex parte hearing opened, you assured me that all you wanted was the facts. You told me that you would not permit hearsay evidence. You promised me that the hearing would be impartial. None of these promises has so far been fulfilled. . . . You, in effect, say in advance that any evidence that may hereafter be submitted that tends to give a true picture of Judge Wilson will be disregarded."

This letter stopped the hearing. It pushed the Tydings inquiry under the nose of the President, who smelled it, and had it closed. When it opens again it will not be this kind of hearing. And probably there soon will be a settlement of the Pearson-Wilson head-hunt. The common prediction is that both heads must fall. Pearson will probably go back to private life. Wilson, the story runs, will be given a job in Washington, not for his own sweet sake, but to save the face of Pat Harrison. Which goes to show that the cost of Pat Harrison's face is very, very dear.

Cold Terror in California

By HERBERT KLEIN and CAREY McWILLIAMS

Los Angeles, July 15

TERROR has broken out into the open again in California, the state nearest to the setting sun and organized "fascism from above." In the Eureka lumber strike two workers have been slain and scores wounded; in San Pedro Fred Friedl, an official of an A. F. of L. maritime union, was slain by police in ambush, and open street riots occurred after his death. The waterfront situation is tense in San Diego, San Pedro, and San Francisco, with every indication that a showdown on a vast scale is imminent. The state is full of propaganda organizations, such as the reorganized Crusaders, now engaged in spying on relief workers, and the New Order of Cincinnatus. The secret militaristic bodies, such as the Berkeley Nationals and the California Cavaliers, are growing fast. The state itself is arming: the California Naval Militia has been recruited by an intensive radio campaign, and the California Marine Militia is in formation. Both of these militia organizations will be commanded by the regular adjutant general of the National Guard; they constitute, in effect, an indirect attempt to increase the strike-breaking armed forces of the state. The resurgence of terror in California blasts the cheerful assumption of many liberals that oppression on the West Coast has been relaxing, that the terror has been beaten back by a wave of popular repudiation, and that fascist violence is a phenomenon of the past.

It is true that since the conclusion of the criminal-syndicalism trial in Sacramento California has been outwardly calm. The sun shines, the highways are not barricaded, and an EPIC bloc in the legislature encourages the liberals to think that a better day is dawning. But this calm does not augur peace. The period is one of transition from sporadic vigilante activity to controlled fascism, from the clumsy violence of drunken farmers to the calculated maneuvers of an economic-militaristic machine. For the time being the vigilante outrages of 1934 have somewhat abated, but terror—a cold and tightening terror—is everywhere discernible. It is the terror of preparation—violence in embryo. In no phase of the industrial life of the state is this type of terror more clearly reflected than in agriculture, the state's chief industry; and the situation in the field does not differ substantially from that on the waterfront or in the factories and mines. A highly industrialized, heavily capitalized agriculture is mobilizing for action. "We don't want any trouble," is the phrase of the hour, "but we insist on harvesting our crops."

The sort of preparation now being carried on is illustrated by the activities of the Associated Farmers, an organization notorious for the part it played in the agricultural strikes of 1933-34 and in the recent criminal-syndicalism trial in Sacramento, which was, of course, a judicial manhunt directed against the leaders of the Cannery and Agricultural Workers' Industrial Union. The San Francisco headquarters of the Associated Farmers maintains an elaborate espionage system. At present its file on "dangerous radicals" contains approximately 1,000 names, alphabetically arranged, with front- and side-view photographs of each individual indexed, and, on the reverse side of the card, biographical information, including notations of arrests, strike activities, affiliations, and a reference to a corresponding number in the archives of the State Bureau of Criminal Identification. Sets of this file have already been distributed to more than a hundred police officers in the state, and a selected list has been sent to members of the association so that they will be able to identify radicals in their communities. Incidentally, the State Bureau of Criminal Identification is closely affiliated with the Associated Farmers, deputies from the bureau frequently working in the field in cooperation with agents of the association. The state bureau had its private investigators sleuthing for the Tagus Ranch in the San Joaquin Valley; it employed, at one time or another, the various stool pigeons upon whose testimony the several defendants in the recent Sacramento trial were convicted.

The Associated Farmers maintain a smoothly functioning propaganda machine. Press releases are issued regularly and members of the organization receive confidential bulletins, some of which are interesting. They explain the operations of the Communist Party, coach members on strike-breaking strategy, point with pride to convictions in radical cases, digest the reports of stool pigeons, quote with approval such comment as that of John Lawrence Seymour, the California composer, that "a planned invasion of America's cultural sources by Communist propaganda is obvious," and encourage the drive toward fascism in the law. In a bulletin issued on March 22, 1935, Judge Dal M. Lemmon, who presided at the Sacramento trial, was congratulated on having instituted a "speed-up" system against the defense, and members of the association were urged to be in constant attendance at the trial. The association has regular radio time. It has four branch offices and it maintains in addition a representative in every county of the state. It is also closely affiliated with the state and local chambers of commerce.

It is interesting to note that Associated Farmers is not, strictly speaking, a farmers' organization. The committee appointed to raise funds for the organization consisted of an executive of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company, a representative of the Industrial Association of San Francisco, an executive of the California Packing Association, and a representative of the California Farm Bureau. At the organization meeting at Fresno on May 7, S. Parker Frisselle told those present that the "bankers, shippers, and oil companies" would raise the necessary funds, and also explained that the "farm" label was adopted so that the organization would "carry more weight with the public." Fruit exchanges, packing houses, and shipper-grower organizations, all contribute to the treasury. In the strikes in the Imperial Valley in 1934 Eastern banking interests are reported to have indemnified the farmers for the loss of unharvested crops in order that the strike activities of the Cannery and Agricultural Workers' Industrial Union might be crushed. Moreover, Associated Farmers is closely affiliated with local grower-shipper organizations throughout the state. The California Cavaliers, a semi-secret anti-labor organization, was formed in Sacramento last February at the suggestion of the Associated Farmers. "We aren't going to stand for any more of these organizers from now on," to quote from a statement of Herman Cottrell, a peach grower, in the Sacramento Bee, "and anyone who peeps about higher wages will wish he hadn't."

Organized terrorism in agriculture is producing a system of peonage. By the use of elaborate identification records the growers make the workers conscious that they are being watched and their individual histories investigated. The workers live in guarded quarters which have "no trespass" signs at the entrance and are surrounded during harvest with barbed-wire fences and "moats." The conviction of the leaders of the C. A. W. I. U., on evidence transparently false, deprived the workers of valuable leadership and warned them of the consequences of organization. Such warning was, however, superfluous, more than a hundred arrests having been made in connection with the cotton strike in the San Joaquin Valley in 1934. The great company farm-factories are watched by armed special deputies, and machine-gun equipment has been installed in several establishments. Living in company camps, the workers are made to realize that they can be summarily evicted. The existence in the locality of a sturdy "stockade" is a visible warning of possible concentration. The threat of deportation is constantly used, particularly with the Mexican laborers, many of whom, of course, have illegally entered the United States—a circular distributed in the cotton strike warned the Mexicans that if they did not go back to work they would be "deloused, defilthed, and, if that isn't enough, deported."

The various social-service agencies of the state, instead of investigating working conditions, generally spend their time and exhaust their budgets in investigating the workers. The state and federal employment agencies work in close cooperation with the growers, and the relief agencies obligingly strike names from the relief rolls whenever cheap labor is needed in the fields. That relief agencies have discriminated against workers active in agricultural strikes is well known (People vs. Lillian Dunn and Others, 1 Cal. App. 2d Series, 556). And along the highways are the state highway patrolmen, always ready to break a strike or arrest a worker.

With state officials working under their direction to help ferret out, fingerprint, and incarcerate trouble-makers, the organized big growers have sought to establish a network of "controls" throughout the state. They have pushed through anti-picketing ordinances in practically every county in the state. A sample ordinance adopted in Tulare County a year ago prohibited "unauthorized line-ups of automobiles, concentrations in camps for which permits have not been obtained, and meetings of more than twenty-five persons without permits," and also outlawed lectures, debates, discussions, loitering in alleys, halls, and the like without a permit. With this system of intimidation in force, the growers can penalize interchange of opinion and even prohibit association among workers.

But the preparations do not end at this point. Throughout the state certain curious establishments are in course of construction. About ten miles from Salinas, conveniently removed from the main highway, an inclosure has recently been built. A stout and unbroken wall of planks a dozen feet high forms a rectangular stockade which is divided off into several compartments on the inside, the whole occupying an acre or more. Along one wall are ranged a group of outhouses, the only sign that the structure is intended for humans rather than swine. A water tower rises in solitary grandeur in the midst of the camp. Surrounding the tank is a platform, splendidly adapted for observation, night illumination, and marksmanship. Flood lights are located at the four corners of the stockade in such manner that they can illuminate the interior and also encircle the stockade with a clearly illuminated zone.

When local workers became curious about this menacing structure, they were referred to Mr. Sterling of the Sterling-Harding Packing Company, and to Mr. Church of the firm of Church and Knowlton, both Salinas concerns. These gentlemen informed the workers that the stockade was being built "to hold strikers, but of course we won't put white men in it, just Filipinos." The argument usually advanced is that the stockade will be used to protect strikebreakers, that is, to keep the strike-breakers in and the strikers out. But of course the structure is equally well adapted to herd strikers into and to keep them in.

The fortress defense is a feature of the model labor camp established at Brentwood by the Balfour-Guthrie Company, a large grower concern in which British capital has been prominent. This camp has hot and cold showers, free electricity, a camp caretaker, seventy-five cottages supplied with free gas for cooking, and tents with floors and frames connected with a community kitchen. During the last strike in the community the camp was protected by "a substantial fence surmounted by plenty of barbed wire, with the entrance guarded night and day." Yet despite these evidences of solicitude the owners complained that the "agitators continually referred to it as a stockade, a cattle corral, or a prison, and to its inhabitants as slaves or prisoners." P. S. Bancroft, president of the Associated Farmers' unit of Contra Costa County, in defending the camp said that "obviously the fence and guard were there to keep the lawless element out, not to keep the contented workmen in." Yet when the striking laborers of Imperial Valley set up a camp and strike headquarters in 1934, it was raided by local police, because, to quote from the Shipper-Grower Magazine of March, 1934, "it was a concentration camp in which the workers were being kept against their wishes" by Communist labor leaders. The burning question would seem to be, When is a concentration camp not a concentration camp? Who is herding whom and what for?

With these preparations concluded, it is slight wonder that the Associated Farmers announce in a radio broadcast that their members "can go ahead and harvest your crops and not worry about agitators." But air-tight as the system appears to be, it is in danger. Recent hearings in Los Angeles indicate that still further wage cuts for agricultural labor may be expected. The employed farm laborer in California today makes on an average about $300 a year, with about 150 working days; the prevailing hourly wage for farm labor at present is about 22½ cents. Under these circumstances it can only be a question of time until the lid is blown off.

LIBRARY Burlingame

Revolt in Panama

By CARLETON BEALS

PANAMA, for most Americans, means a canal managed with noble efficiency and providing service to the civilized world. If we recall that Panama is a country larger than Austria or Ireland sprawling for hundreds of miles in either direction from the canal, we probably cherish the easy belief that the people of that unknown land have been greatly benefited by our paternalism. What are the facts?

Enthusiasts about the canal call it a marvelous socialist experiment, a proof that government ownership works. Certainly the administration, though overstaffed, is honest and relatively efficient. There have been no shady stock mergers, no looting of stockholders by bonus slices or trick holding companies. In the Canal Zone there are no rich, no poor, no unemployment. The Governor's house, though the scene of more stuffed-shirt dinners, is only a little larger than other employees' houses, which are rent free except for a small upkeep fee.

Proportionately there is less crime than anywhere else in the world. Sanitation is better than in the United States, mortality lower than in my own university city. Of course, old folks don't stay there to die. But Zone employees receive a 25 per cent bonus because they live abroad in a dangerous tropical climate. They are also eligible for a better pension than any other civil employees. Goods may be purchased in the commissariats at prices from 50 to 75 per cent lower than in the United States, yet those commissariats return juicy profits to our government. Although residents must pay high-binder gas, electric, and ice rates to the Electric Bond and Share subsidiary, soon a new government-dam project will end this. Gasoline costs eight cents in the Zone, twenty-six cents in Panama; standard brands of cigarettes, four to six cents in the Zone, fifteen cents in Panama. The Zone residents are a privileged group, better cared for than the employees of any other large enterprise on earth.

But this is scarcely socialism; rather is it bureaucracy raised to perfection. The Canal Zone is a benevolent dictatorship, a feudal paradise, not an organic functioning entity shaped by the active intelligence of its citizens. Not only is it bad taste for them to criticize the operation of the canal; it is dangerous. He who utters the least breath of discontent is soon on his way back to the United States, along with his payroll relatives who have eased into the same soft haven of stilted green houses, broad screened-in verandas, and moon-flower trellises of this lotus-like climate.

The Canal Zone has long felt that it has been most generous to Panama. Along with the State Department, the banks, and the public utilities, the Zone for a long time ran the little republic through puppet governments; and its dark-skinned inhabitants, not to mention tourists, received all the benefits of low-priced commissariats, cheap movies and restaurants, and hospital service in one of the model institutions of the world. With this large additional business of a hundred thousand Panamanians and half a million tourists annually, more than the entire resident population of the country, the Zone could sell goods ever more cheaply and cut hospital fees ever lower. And this not only created new berths for relatives from the states; it engendered a vast pride in the growing importance of Zone activities. Without doubt the Zone is far more efficient, far more generous to its inhabitants, than is Panama.

The Zonites were shocked, therefore, when a year or so ago the new President of Panama, Harmodio Arias, with commendable independence, journeyed to Washington to complain about these benefits, as well as about certain abuses connected with the interpretation of the 1903 treaty which gave us the Zone. It was at his direct request that the Zone benefits were withdrawn from Panamanians and tourists, and the Zone bureaucracy ever since has been grieved at the ingratitude of the Panamanians, who so suddenly desired to put brakes on the absorption by the United States of all the country's political and economic activities.

But why should Panamanians prefer to pay twenty-six cents instead of eight cents for gasoline? It looked as if the inefficient Panamanian economy were trying to save itself by putting up artificial barriers; as though the Panamanian commercial classes, including large numbers of Japanese, Chinese, Hindus, and Armenians, merely wished a free hand to exploit the Panamanians and the tourists; as though inferior Panamanian doctors wished to charge higher prices for sawing bones. This selfish motive does play a large part, but it is not the whole story. The republic is actually grateful to President Roosevelt for cutting off all Panamanian privileges in the Zone and making Panamanians—and also tourists—buy in Panama at higher prices and die from diseases that might have been cured by cheap expert care.

The business success of the Zone springs from two main factors. First, all supplies are purchased in mass quantities for an uncontested market of 47,000 civil and military employees. Second, no duties, no taxes, no private profits are paid on these goods. As a result no Panamanian merchant could compete. All native enterprise was stifled. And every Panamanian merchant driven to the wall meant more unemployment, lessened purchasing power, reduced government revenues. It was nice to be able to buy cheaply in the Zone, but Panama was thereby deprived of revenue. The more American monopoly expanded, the less Panama could spend for sanitation, schools, paved streets, and the less surplus remained to develop the backward interior. Money was being drained out of Panama to augment American profits, increase the number of American jobs, and make the Zone increasingly a paradise, while Panama sank into misery, with more and more of its population reduced to a peon status.

The evil was accentuated by the Zone's consistent boycott of Panamanian labor. This is officially denied, but statistics tell the truth. Preference is given to West Indian Negroes, mostly British citizens, who form the bulk of the 30,000 aliens in the Zone. Since they speak English, the Zonites are not obliged to learn Spanish. Being so far from home, the Negroes are more docile; according to Zone officials, they are also more industrious and dependable. The Zone itself, of course, has no unemployment problem because it callously shoves such difficulties off on Panama. After the building of the canal, hordes of West Indian and Oriental laborers were dumped into the adjacent republic to starve or beg. They and their children live in Panama City and Colón in festering slums, in abject poverty, crime, and promiscuity. In the fire-trap shacks covering whole blocks entire families of ten to fourteen persons occupy one room. The Zone continues to dump its unemployed on Panama in the same way as of old.

Thus in its relation to Panama the canal experiment, however much it benefits its own employees, is revealed as a great feudal enterprise, a brutal monopoly, intent on maintaining its privileges at the expense of the land of which it is a part. Nor does the monopolization stop with the sale of goods. The Panama railroad, which returns millions in profit to the United States government, controls interoceanic communications and has prevented all independent normal communication between the two coasts and between the cities and the interior of the republic. In accordance with the original 1867 concession and the 1903 renewal, Panama receives a beggarly $250,000 gold annuity (we have been trying to force it to take depreciated dollar bills) from the railroad and the canal, the former for the most part supported by Panamanian money. The rest of the income is siphoned out into the United States treasury. When any conflict arises over the interpretation of the treaty or the acts and policies of the railroad, it is settled not by mutual agreement but arbitrarily by United States officials. When convenient, the United States Attorney General rules that the railroad—our government owns all the stock—is a private enterprise; when more convenient, that it is an American government institution.

The Panama railroad is unique. It operates mostly in the Zone but caters to a foreign population. Though it is owned by the government, freight and passenger rates are high. Before me lies the bill of costs of a shipment of machinery, which shows the charges from Panama City to Colón to be higher than the entire cost of shipping from Colón to Barraquilla, Colombia, and then by river and muleback to far Bogotá. A non-competitive monopoly, the railroad tenaciously refuses to relinquish its unfair exploitation of the Panamanian people. In no sense is it run as a social enterprise to provide the greatest possible benefit to its clients.

Among its numerous advantages, the railroad has that of being one of the largest single landlords in all Panama. Besides its vast tax-free realty properties in the capital, it owns Colón, the second largest city in the republic, except for nine blocks and four scattered lots. It collects ground rents for Uncle Sam from business men, houses of prostitution, open cribs, saloons, gambling dives, pick-up cabarets, hotels, private homes, and the vilest slums on the continent. High ground rents continually force native residents to sacrifice their homes. In no other place in the world is a government the owner of practically an entire foreign city. Not only are the title and present manner of using these properties dubious, but by an improper interpretation of the original concession the railroad flatly refuses to pay taxes, and though the Zone supervises sanitation, it makes no contributions to police and fire protection, public schools, parks, or other necessary public services.

In one portion of Colón, known as New Cristóbal, the United States government, without complying with local regulations or troubling itself to take out building permits, has spent millions in building homes, schools, hospitals, hotels, clubhouses, and playgrounds for American employees, though in the Zone itself there is room for many such developments. The major reason for having thus built up New Cristóbal outside Zone property is said to have been to evade prohibition and other strict American regulations—a conspiracy of our own government to help its citizens evade its own laws. Congress, for instance, appropriated nearly a million dollars for a new Zone high school. This was erected in New Cristóbal on foreign soil. The Panamanians promptly tore down the American flag raised over the new building, but the school refuses to abide by the national school laws.

In other ways also the railroad has stifled Panamanian initiative; it has built tourist hotels, absorbed local trucking and taxi services, monopolized the supplying of vessels in transit through the canal. For more than a decade, though the three million dollars necessary have long been in the Panamanian treasury, the railroad has blocked all efforts to build a road across the isthmus. The War Department has contended that a road would menace the canal's safety, though three Zone governors have reported that actually it is a great military necessity. But a road would reduce freight costs on many things to a fourth of the railroad rates. Many business men have interests in both Colón and Panama City; a road would enable them to save the railroad fare and to motor across at convenient hours. At present, by utilizing the Gatún ferry, it is possible to get across the isthmus in rather bumpy fashion. A Panamanian bus service was started, with fares less than a third those charged by the railway, but the Zone authorities abolished the service. In 1926 the United States at last acceded to Panama's demand and a treaty was drawn up by the imperialist Francis White. Let Panama put up $1,250,000 and cede its entire sovereignty over Colón, and the United States would itself build and control the road. This monstrous scheme was blocked by the single-handed efforts of Deputy Harmodio Arias, now President.

The monopolistic spirit of the Zone is explicable. The employees, with practically permanent tenure, want more jobs for their relatives, for their children, and presumably for their grandchildren, who will not even be American citizens. They are jealous of any limitation of the number of jobs. Now that Panama is at last trying to defend itself, the original contempt of the Zonites for the "Spigomanians" has turned into fury. When the newsreel of President Arias's visit to the White House was shown last year in a Zone movie, he was hissed. Shouts of "Monkey!" went up, although he is one of the most honest and capable executives I have ever encountered. Disconcerting as it must be to the Zonites to have Panama defy the old tradition that it is an inferior land to be ordered about at their pleasure, their ill-will is basically motivated by a struggle for jobs and a snobbish feeling of superiority.

It would be tedious to recount the numerous petty restrictions the Zone has placed on Panama. No Panamanian can cross the Zone to the interior of his own country without a costly Zone car and driver's license. The 1903 treaty obliges the United States to maintain adequate communications between the two Panamanian regions on either side of the canal, but such communications exist at only a few points and are interrupted at night. Thus if a riot occurs on the far side, the government is powerless to handle it. If a Panamanian from the far side wishes to go to the theater, he must also pay for a night's lodging in Panama City or Colón. In case of illness, no doctor can be obtained and no patient can be taken to the doctor.

The Zone authorities have persistently refused to permit the installation of a government radio-broadcasting station, so much needed for communication with outlying regions and to provide programs, though under existing treaty arrangements such a station would in no way endanger the canal. For a time the Zone authorities even attempted to control the licensing of radio receiving sets.

In defiance of the treaty the Zone does not permit Panamanian customs collectors or immigration inspectors at the ports. American officials examine the baggage; the immigrant must then go over to Panamanian soil, pay the bill, and after excessive red tape on both sides, return to the Zone to get his belongings. American officials arbitrarily hold passports needed for identification and travel in Panama. A returning Panamanian must prove his identity to Uncle Sam, not to his own government.

The Zonites show their ill-will by a silent boycott of Panama stores and Panama goods. The United States government sells fifty-cent Japanese tennis rackets, but buys Argentinian or Cuban, instead of Panamanian, beef, although it is to our best interests to see prosperous economic and agricultural development of the regions adjacent to the canal. In case of war, with the approaches to the canal cut off by the enemy, the defense could not be maintained more than a month because of lack of food supply. It would be rather pathetic if the remarkable Zone defenses had to capitulate merely because not enough food existed in Panama.

Correspondence

What the Socialist Party Wants

To the Editors of The Nation:

For a long time Ben Stolberg has made it his recreation to hang about the corridors, so to speak, of places where less fastidious radicals are at work in order to pick up tidbits of gossip, scraps of documents, and ideological cigar butts for the delectation of readers unsympathetic to the radical cause. This equips him admirably to write the sort of article on the Socialist Party you recently published, but it scarcely qualifies him to produce a critical piece that would foster public understanding or promote internal Socialist improvement.

I am chiefly concerned about the preposterous yarn regarding the genesis, at Detroit, of the party's present declaration of principles. It is true that in the platform committee I was nominated by Norman Thomas to bring in a draft of a declaration; it is not true that in any particular Thomas sought to lay down the lines it should follow. It was brought back into the committee and, save for the usual deletions and corrections, almost unanimously approved.

I have no wish to evade responsibility for the more controversial portions on war and fascism which Mr. Stolberg, by the familiar devices of judicious omission and skilful juxtaposition, pictures as so hard for logical minds to grasp. Before me, requiring many hours for analysis, were two sets of representative ideas: one, the various suggested declarations worked out by party organizations and printed as alternatives in the convention agenda; another, more important in my estimation, a huge pile of resolutions on party tactics adopted by state conventions and by various locals throughout the country. These did not, of course, entirely agree; indeed at times they sharply disagreed; but nevertheless from them a definite trend of thought emerged, which I conceived it my duty to embody as far as possible in a single declaration expressive of majority desires. Although on war and fascism it seemed wise to follow a contingent policy, rather than attempt to set forth dogmatically the precise manner in which reaction might first precipitate the need for a crisis tactic, even here there was no departure from theoretical positions increasingly taken by the movement abroad and locally in this country.

I am satisfied, because of the conscientious labor I spent on this analysis at Detroit and from a subsequent review of the same material in perspective, that whatever defects the declaration's critics may find in it, it was substantially what a large majority of the party had demanded.

Wilton, Conn., July 3 Devere Allen

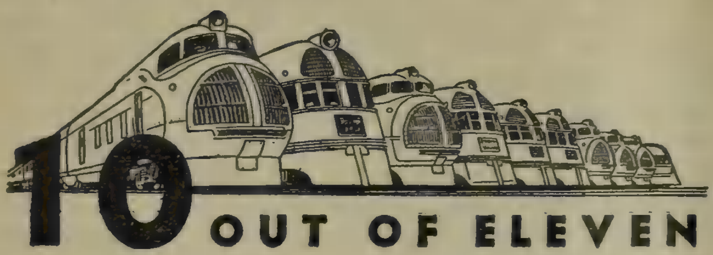
The Grand Coulee Dam

To the Editors of The Nation:

In your issue of March 20 James Rorty, in an article about the Grand Coulee Dam, had the impertinence to state that among the "interests concerned not with the use of land but with selling it at a profit" were the Spokane and Eastern Trust Company, of which I am a long-time director, the Northwestern and Pacific Hypothekbank, and the Realty Mortgage Company, of which I am the manager. The Northwestern and Pacific Hypothekbank under former management had required property in the Quincy Plains, but disposed of all of it in 1910, or about ten years before there was any talk about Columbia Basin irrigation. The Northwestern and Pacific Hypothekbank owns considerable land, principally in Adams County, nearly all of which has been farmed for wheat and is still farmed for wheat, some years at a loss and some at a profit.

As your magazine seems to be interested in the private affairs of the corporations of which I am manager, allow me to state that I have sold land in the Columbia Basin district for $3 an acre, and it has been bought by resident settlers for pasture. Right near the dam there is of course speculation for town sites and lots, as is usual near any new enterprise employing a large number of men. Neither the Spokane and Eastern Trust Company, the Northwestern and Pacific Hypothekbank, the Realty Mortgage Company, nor several of the other companies mentioned are interested in any of this speculation or lot selling, as they own no land near there. A large amount of the land in the district can be bought from the counties at $1 and up per acre. If the Spokane Chamber of Commerce has stated that there is land available for from $5 to $15 an acre they speak about agricultural land, some of which could not be bought from resident farmers at anything like these prices.

Mr. Rorty asks why condemnation proceedings were not initiated early? If he had taken the trouble to investigate he would have found that at the request of the Columbia Basin League at an early stage the legislature of the state of Washington passed some legislation to prevent speculation whenever



OUT OF ELEVEN

EAST and West, streamlined trains are flashing across the countryside—setting new standards in transportation. Seven are in operation; four more are being built. Of these eleven electrically driven trains, ten are driven by General Electric motors.

Railroads had long sought a method of economical operation whose benefits they could pass on to the public in the form of faster service and greater comfort. They have found a method in streamlined trains and in electric propulsion—a type of motive power that has been largely a contribution of General Electric research and engineering.

Thirty years ago, General Electric first equipped a railroad car with electric drive. Today, General Electric is a recognized leader in the manufacture of electric equipment, not only for railways, but also for industry, business, and the home.

96-99J

GENERAL ELECTRIC

PLANNED SAFETY

THE same meticulous planning that has promoted and governed the extraordinary growth of the Soviet Union, that has made possible the balancing of the nation's budget year after year; that has enabled it to provide economic security for its 170 million people; has been applied to the creation of a strikingly safe medium of investment—

SOVIET UNION 7% GOLD BONDS

These bonds incorporate the principle of "planned safety". A summation of the special safeguards behind these bonds will be sent upon request.

Ask for Circular N-10

Soviet American Securities Corp.
30 Broad Street Tel. HAnover 2-5330 New York

an irrigation district should be formed. But the irrigation district has not been formed, and if a high dam is ever built it will be probably ten years or even more before there is a chance to form such an irrigation district, in which case the United States government will presumably take good care that the land speculators are not allowed to play their game.

Lately the Agricultural Department has been buying land in different parts of the Northwestern states as it is doing in the Middle Western states, but it has no connection with the Columbia Basin project, and the government has agreed that if fifty acres of such land can be irrigated and an irrigation district is formed, the seller can buy back the land at cost plus 5 per cent interest.

One more statement, Mr. Rorty says that Superintendent J. D. Ross of the Seattle City Light knows that it was the Grand Coulee crowd and the Inland Empire crowd that blocked him when he asked for PWA money to complete the Skagit River development. I do not know who these different crowds are. I do know, as everyone does, that the municipal power plant of Seattle has been trying to cover the whole state of Washington, and it has been stated in the newspapers several times that the City of Seattle objected to the building of the low dam as a competitor in the production of power.

Spokane, June 25 R. INSINGER

To THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

As I pointed out in my article, there is nothing illegal about speculation. It is the traditional American pattern. The real-estate business is the business of buying land as cheap as possible and selling it as dear as possible, and where land is condemned, forcing as high a price for the condemned land as possible; and the real-estate business is a perfectly respectable business. It is also true that all owners, including farmers, do the same thing. I pointed out that this pattern is incompatible with any genuine enterprise of functional planning designed to benefit the country as a whole. Well, isn't it?

I regret the inaccuracies that appeared in my article but point out that they were minor. Certainly I directed no attack upon Mr. Insinger and his companies; I merely listed these companies among those holding land in the Columbia Basin, which was accurate. As to speculation in connection with the project, land in the Columbia Basin was certainly changing hands in considerable quantities when I was there; and the promotion campaigns conducted by real-estate companies were certainly in speculative terms—the quotations used in my article, such as "Buy at the Fringe and Wait," were from literature in my possession. Such speculative activity may be relatively negligible, as Mr. O'Sullivan of the Columbia Basin Commission alleges. It is important to keep it so, and my article, like his own official efforts, was directed to that end.

New York, July 8 JAMES RORTY

Dreams and Facts

To THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Under this title Mr. Max Nomad reviewed my book, "Leaders, Dreamers and Rebels," in The Nation of April 24 in such a way that the reader who doesn't know my work would get the impression that my writings are fascist-nationalist propaganda aimed against Marx, Lenin, and bolshevism.

At a time when the whole of capitalist Europe and even America, with vanishingly few exceptions, were as one in shaping political opinion against bolshevism, and there was no talk of "red seductiveness," it was precisely I who published two books, "Geist und Gesicht des Bolschevismus" and "Lenin und Gandhi," in which I took pains to do justice to the ideology of Russian communism and the surpassing stature of the revolutionary leaders.

My new book, which has as its subject the wish-dreams of mankind, seeks to place fascism and national socialism rightly in the history of political thought; it follows along the same lines that I have pursued in my cultural activity from the beginning and expect to pursue in the future. It may be that Mr. Nomad is right when he says that books impelled by a desire for objectivity "cannot lay claim to serious consideration." I have also been forced to listen to attacks from critics with fascist leanings who have said that "Leaders, Dreamers and Rebels" plainly flirts with socialism.

Mr. Nomad on many points displays that "sovereign contempt for facts and texts" which he accuses me of showing. Everyone who reads my book will be impressed by the fact that scarcely one type of historical occurrence is treated with less detail than are wars and conquests. Nevertheless, Mr. Nomad numbers me as a partisan of the theory that represents "the historical process chiefly as a succession of wars and conquests." Far from entertaining such a conception, I show how in the majority of cases world-history is conditioned by "dreams" and metaphysico-religious fantasies. I spend 450 pages in doing this, yet Mr. Nomad makes light of my attempt. Without offering any proof he dogmatically opposes me with the idea that every wish-dream has been simply a rationalization of material interests and an expression of personal ambitions.

According to my critic, I offer "barely a hint of the class basis of the ever-changing interpretations given to the concept of 'equality.'" Perhaps no hint—but an exhaustive explanation, which covers in over a hundred pages the path of the bourgeois ideal of equality from the French Revolution to Marx's concept of class and to the "classless equality" of bolshevism.

Mr. Nomad looks at Russia with a great deal of sympathy but little knowledge. But he must know that the terms "millennarian spirit" and deep-rooted "catastrophism," as applied to the Russian national character, which he ironically calls my "profundities," stem wholly from Russian authors, and especially from men like Berdjajev, Arseniev, and Gorki, who must needs know a good deal about the essential character of their nation. Moreover, the skeptical amazement with which Mr. Nomad casts doubt upon the authenticity of a famous statement of Lenin's does not speak well for his knowledge of fact. Why is my unfriendly critic so sure that I have no reason for the citation of this sentence except the wish to distort Lenin's principles thereby?

And since Mr. Nomad lays such great store by "facts and texts," might I ask him on what facts and texts he bases his assertion that Marx during his last days had given up his opinions on partial social reforms? The question whether Marx was for or against evolutionism has filled whole libraries with volumes pro and con, split the socialist movement, and been the occasion for terrible bloodshed. This question Mr. Nomad dispatches with a wave of the hand, and decrees a "conversion" of the great revolutionary which is really more than contestable.

In his remarks on my presentation of George Sorel, the liberty which Mr. Nomad opposes to "facts and texts" reaches its greatest heights. He ascribes to me the thesis that Sorel provided the foundation for syndicalism and the Action Française. I spoke, however, solely of the decided influence that Sorel's ideas exercised on these two currents, just as they have upon fascism. If Mr. Nomad will take the trouble to read the great basic work of Michael Freund on Sorel, he will find stated there all that I have ascribed to Sorel—also the explanation of Georges Valois: namely, the tracing back of Sorel's writings to the idea of "fatherland"; the oaths of allegiance which Sorel, as the spiritual father of the Action Française, gave over to its pages; the writing which Sorel contributed to the publications of the Action. To be sure, Sorel, as a thinker full of contradictions, often changed his views concerning the politics of the day; he later threw overboard syndicalism and activism, and became an admirer of Lenin. But this admiration has had no consequences, whereas from Sorel's theory of power the historic actuality of fascism sprang. It is therefore in no way a "desecration of Sorel's thought" when Mussolini looks upon him as a teacher.

Vienna, May 15 RENE FULOP-MILLER

Langstroth

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In your interesting editorial called Coals to Newcastle in the issue of The Nation for July 3, you make the statement that "there is no biographical sketch of Langstroth in any encyclopedia." There is, however, an accurate and authoritative sketch of him by Ernest Rob Root in "The Dictionary of American Biography," Volume X (1933).

New York, June 30 CARL VAN DOREN

Contributors to This Issue

C. H. CAMPBELL is assistant city editor of the New Orleans Item-Tribune.

HERBERT KLEIN was formerly Berlin correspondent of the Chicago Tribune.

CAREY MCWILLIAMS is a California lawyer and journalist.

CARLETON BEALS, journalist and author, has passed many years in Central and South America.

ROSE M. STEIN was formerly research secretary of the League for Social Justice of Pittsburgh. She has recently been engaged in making a digest of the record of the Senate Munitions Committee.

STERLING D. SPERO, coauthor with Abram L. Harris of "The Black Worker," was a member of the research staff which prepared "Labor and the Government," recently published under the auspices of the Twentieth Century Fund.

FREDERICK C. LENDRUM is engaged in medical research at the University of Wisconsin.

EDA LOU WALTON, associate professor of English at Washington Square College, New York University, is the author of "Jane Matthew, and Other Poems."

ALICE BEAL PARSONS is the author of "John Merrill's Pleasant Life."

THE SECURITY MARKETS

Results of a comprehensive investigation of the role of Security Markets in American economic life made by a special research staff of THE TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND.

An invaluable source book of information on:
STOCK EXCHANGES; their organization and operation
SECURITIES; their volume, who owns them
SECURITY MARKETS and the supply of capital
MARGIN BUYING; its relation to brokers' loans and bank credit
SECURITY MARKETS and the expansion of credit
SHORT SELLING; should it be discouraged?
SPECIALISTS; what is their legitimate role?
POOL OPERATIONS; their effects on the functioning of the market

providing a basis for an appraisal of the Banking Act of 1933, the Securities Act of 1933, the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and the rules and regulations of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

888 pages—84 tables—27 charts $5.00
Send your order to
TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND, Inc., 330 W. 42 St., N. Y.

Labor and Industry

Seven Against Horvitz

By HEYWOOD BROUN

LORAIN, Ohio, has a church for almost every corner, but religion is the only form of collective bargaining which is tolerated in the town. Mr. Horvitz locked out his staff when it pressed the right of group negotiation, and the Mayor said vaguely that he didn't believe in violence when a Cleveland Guild committee made a protest. Still, it was in Lorain, Ohio, a little later that a managing editor was slapped in the face and the Associated Press considered this episode of such news interest that it sent over its wires a story so vigorous that it made front page in one or two papers in distant New York City.

On the night of July 12 some three hundred citizens of Lorain marched down to the Journal plant in defiance of an injunction and shouted their intention to back the Guild in its fight for the right to unionize. That, also, was a rather startling thing, since Lorain is cradled in the shadow of the American Tube Company and the "better" element of the town boasts that it is an open-shop Eden.

By a curious coincidence, Frank Maloy, the managing editor of the Journal, is also the local correspondent for the Associated Press. To him the largest Lorain labor meeting in ten years was not news. The fact that his glasses were broken in a scuffle a few days before constituted front-page stuff. Possibly he did but interpret the official feeling of the town, for on the basis of a single slap the Mayor proclaimed a riot zone and sent in men with sawed-off shotguns, and a local judge issued an injunction which prohibits any Guild member from walking any street in the same direction as a Journal employee.

Much has been said by the management of the Journal about "outside agitators," but no mention has been made of the fact that the scab staff has been recruited from places as far away as New Orleans. Students of journalism may also be interested to know that another recruit is a junior at Ohio State. As a matter of fact, the locked-out staff of the Journal has managed its own affairs. The group of seven represents a total of forty-one years of service to the Journal. In order to get out a paper Mr. Horvitz has been compelled to hire a staff of almost twice as many men and women. Economy is no object. Lorain fears to face the example of a successful union even if it is one of only seven.

I spent last week-end in Lorain and called upon Mr. Maloy, who fulfils the difficult task of sending out news dispatches for the impartial A. P. and also maintaining the lockout against the American Newspaper Guild. I was of a mind to compliment him on his story of the managing editor who got slapped. It had in it that indignation which is sometimes lost in the quest for neutral reporting.

In reply to my question Mr. Maloy said that he had not written the story of the heroic managing editor. He had merely supplied the Associated Press with the facts. I asked him whether he had supplied the A. P. with any facts about the Guild's big labor mass-meeting. He said that he had not. Bill Davey, national organizer for the Guild, invited Mr. Maloy to attend the meeting just across the street from the Journal plant. He pointed out that it might be of potential news interest. Mr. Maloy declined to attend. I am quite certain that any fears he may have had of being molested were groundless since the Guild members were anxious to get their side of the case before the public. But the Journal did not send a reporter.

I asked Mr. Maloy as to the authenticity of a rumor which I had heard. It was to the effect that the Associated Press had informed its correspondent that his position as managing editor of the picketed plant and also agent for unbiased reporting might be considered by some a delicate one and would he please make every effort to be impartial. Mr. Maloy seemed surprised by the rumor. No official of the Associated Press had urged impartiality upon him.

Roy Howard of the Scripps-Howard papers and Mr. Sulzberger of the Times have both expressed the fear that labor news might not be accurately reported if news staffs were organized. It will be interesting to learn whether they make any protest to the Associated Press about the condition under which an unorganized journalist may both lead a fight to break a union and at the same time report any important phase of the fight without a hint of prejudice.

Since I had no opportunity to write any newspaper account of the Lorain lockout, my own role was that of observer and I do not think the Mayor can accuse me of violence. I did try out an experiment in peaceful picketing but it was unsuccessful. The city room of the Journal faces directly on the street. My guide indicated the journalist nearest the window. "That strike-breaker," he said, "calls himself 'a tough guy from Erie.' He says he doesn't need any organization."

I pressed my face against the glass and observed the young man intently. The tough guy was wrestling with "Society Notes from Amherst, Ohio," and making rather heavy going of it. Scrutiny seemed to make him a little nervous. In particular he had fearful difficulty with the head. He wrote seven and tore them up before he hit on one which seemed to him inspired. It ran "Bride-to-Be Gets Linen Shower." And when he had set this down he rather disarmed me by looking up with an engaging smile and winking. I moved over to the open door and said, "Why don't you come out with your own crowd?"

"And wear one of those silly signs?" said the tough guy from Erie, pointing to a picket's placard.

"It wouldn't be anything like as silly as writing about linen showers," I told him, but he didn't come out.

A long morning was spent in talking to thousands of workers coming in and out of the American Tube Company on the 6 a. m. shift, and from what they told us it seems evident that Lorain will be glad to support another paper which will give a fair deal to labor. Fortunately, plans for such a daily publication now seem to be well under way. However, it is only fair to admit that such a paper will not be able to get an A. P. franchise and reap the benefits of its neutral news coverage of industrial disputes.

Academic Cossacks in Pittsburgh

By ROSE M. STEIN

ON a recent visit to Pittsburgh, America's foremost architect, Frank Lloyd Wright, is said to have remarked, upon seeing the University of Pittsburgh's thirty-eight-story Cathedral of Learning, "That's the most stupendous 'keep off the grass' sign I've ever seen." Mr. Wright had reference to the cathedral's architecture. He was probably entirely unaware that this laconic description prophetically summed up the university's attitude on liberal ideas, and that the structure itself has, in effect, served as a "keep off the grass" warning to students and teachers who have and express any opinion on the controversial social and economic problems which agitate the world. Suppression of liberal activities and the dismissal of teachers who manifest even the faintest pink hue have occurred at the University of Pittsburgh so often that they have ceased to be news. What brings Pitt once again to the fore is that the situation has finally impressed itself upon the public consciousness sufficiently to call forth an investigation by a legislative committee. The investigation, in turn, is significant because, in the light of recent oustings of students and teachers from other institutions, facts revealed about Pittsburgh may very well represent conditions which prevail in many schools, perhaps in all but a few of the better ones.

One after another they came before the committee: a remarkable procession of educators who, not as university representatives but as individuals and as citizens, had dared to address strikers or to speak of their plight, and who had thereby incurred either actual dismissal or the threat of dismissal so imminent that they rushed to find other employment in time to escape the ax. Six testified. But there are many more than six upon whom the ax has fallen or threatened to fall, for reasons other than incompetence or economy, since 1921, when Chancellor John G. Bowman came to Pittsburgh, and especially since 1926, when he conceived the dream of building the highest school—in terms of floors—on money largely contributed by Pittsburgh's millionaires. Twenty-five faculty members have been fired during the last five years, and during the same period fifty-nine others have resigned.

Contributors other than millionaires helped pay for the thirty-eight imposing floors of stone, mortar, steel, and glass—many of the alumni and Pittsburgh's not so rich. But complaints from these latter groups have received scant notice. It was testified, for instance, that during the 1928-29 term the university received a complaint about a member of the faculty. The school's executive secretary called the teacher's attention to the letter, but before deciding upon what action to take, he said, "Now just wait a moment, let's see who this man is." After consulting a Directory of Directors he said, "He is small potatoes. We won't pay much attention to him." It was when this same teacher touched the sensitive toes of Pittsburgh's "big potatoes" that he was summarily fired.

Dr. Colston E. Warne taught at the University of Pittsburgh during the 1927 coal strike. In that year Andrew Mellon's Pittsburgh Coal Company broke its contract with the United Mine Workers of America, known as the Jacksonville agreement, restored the open shop, and drastically reduced wage rates; the miners who struck in protest were blacklisted, evicted from their homes, and given generally rough treatment by the company's hired coal-and-iron police. Dr. Warne became interested in the strike. During the Christmas holiday he visited a number of coal communities and was deeply touched by the plight of the workers. Upon his return early in January, 1928, he addressed the Hungry Club, an open-forum organization of Pittsburgh's business and professional people which meets every Monday for lunch and to hear lectures on topics of the day. Dr. Warne related some of his observations and stressed as means for remedying the conditions he described collective bargaining and government control of the coal industry. Immediately after this talk the Chancellor called him into conference and explained that the board had "reacted very violently" to his speech. The conference constituted an initial warning.

Some time later the Pittsburgh Press—a Scripps-Howard publication—asked Dr. Warne to write a series of articles on his coal survey. He casually mentioned the proposition to his dean and found the administration was absolutely opposed to it. The articles were not written. In the course of a discussion of the matter with the head of his department Dr. Warne was given to understand "that the university had an unfinished Cathedral of Learning and that if we were to go seriously in opposition to the Mellon interests, who were counted on to help the university substantially, and other large groups, we would be imperiling the situation of the university."

Within a few months another difficulty arose. In the course of an address to a church group Dr. Warne made remarks which wounded the sensibilities of E. T. Weir, of the Weirton Steel Company. Mr. Weir complained, and as he is no "small potatoes" his complaint received all due consideration. The situation resolved itself into a definite choice: Dr. Warne either had to drop his speechmaking on the coal industry or give up teaching in Pittsburgh's university. He chose the former. But there was a final straw. Dr. Warne was a member of Pittsburgh's Civil Liberties Committee. In a community like Pittsburgh the very few who dare speak out at all are made to bear the full burden of liberal activities. Thus it is not surprising that the same man who dared speak out against the coal barons was also forced to handle civil-liberties abuses, simply for want of someone else to do it. It is as true today, after six years of depression, as it was in 1929. As a member of the Civil Liberties Committee Dr. Warne was co-signer of a petition addressed to the Governor of Pennsylvania urging him to institute an investigation of coal-and-iron police activities. It was after this that Dr. Warne was given to understand that his contract would not be renewed at the expiration of the term, and he obtained another job.

W. E. Chalmers faced dismissal because he addressed a group of taxicab strikers. Fred E. Waltman was fired a month before the term ended for his coauthorship of an article entitled Cossacks, dealing with the brutalities of coal-and-iron police. In his case the head of his department was not even consulted. Dr. Whiting was too closely identified with the Student Liberal Club.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

The sins of Dr. F. E. Beutel outweighed all others, and it was only through fear of nation-wide publicity that he was not fired on the spot. In 1927 the United States Senate investigated the campaign of Senator-elect Vare, and Dr. Beutel was called as a witness. When asked wherein he had implicated by his testimony the university or "friends of the university," Dr. Beutel offered the following explanation:

> I made no statement involving the university other than to state I was teaching at the university. . . . When you say "the friends" of the university, yes, I testified, in detail, as to the effect of the political activity of the Mellon machine in Pittsburgh, of the amount of money they spent on that election, and the long lines of employees that got paid off at their headquarters after the election was over.

Such frankness was unpardonable. Dr. Beutel was told that he had "no future" at the university, was summarily deprived of the class he valued most, and was given to understand, of course "in all friendliness," that he had better resign. He did.

The university's cardinal stupidity was committed in firing Dr. Ralph E. Turner, the latest victim, whose dismissal took place on June 30, 1934, and resulted in the legislative investigation of a month ago. Dr. Turner was associate professor of history, had been with the university for nine years, enjoyed the highest scholastic standing, and was one of the most popular men on the Pitt campus. He was certainly not the most radical man at the university. That he, rather than any one of the six or seven "marked" faculty members, was the victim was due partly to chance but in greater degree to that peculiar quality in the Chancellor which the report of the American Association of University Professors termed "mystical" and which the Chancellor's own executive secretary described as "unpredictable."

There is, for instance, another man in the history department at Pittsburgh who is just as much admired by the students and the community, and is as active in the League for Social Justice as Dr. Turner was in the Pennsylvania Security League. Carefully measured, the first-named league might even prove to be a trifle to the left of the other. Chancellor Bowman was quoted as having said to the college dean a year earlier in reference to both these men: "What shall we do with these two radicals in the History Department?" He supplied his own answer as to the disposition of one of them. An explanation of why the other man at least was saved may be found in a private conversation between J. Steele Gow, the executive secretary, and Dr. Turner, which has since been made a part of the committee's record.

> He [Mr. Gow] said that no one could tell what the Chancellor's reactions to a situation would be. He said that not even he could tell. That the Chancellor was moody and had peculiar mental states and that he had reactions to situations that could not be rationally inferred by men beforehand. And then he went on to illustrate how the Chancellor judged certain men on the faculty and, as I recall, spoke of at least two examples in which the Chancellor had held a certain opinion of a man because he met the man on the street when he had no hat on, and that the Chancellor held a certain attitude toward another man because he didn't like the necktie that the man wore.

Here then is a situation in which the education of 12,000 students and the destiny of several hundred teachers are determined by the Chancellor's moods and whims, which in turn are affected by the color of a necktie. Dr. Bowman must be, in the estimation of his board, an efficient executive. His salary of $31,500 a year is the highest paid to any college executive in the country. He is paid, the testimony brought out, to be a good manager. This means that he must allow no one under his command to interfere with the feudal control exercised over the community by the wealthy Pittsburgh industrialists who also sit on the university's board.

Quite a number of the present faculty and students were called to the witness stand. Their testimony varied but little: fear, insecurity, espionage, suspicion. Dr. Turner was told that the Mellon-owned Union Trust Company had continually reported on his activities. No one knows who else is being watched. Everyone is afraid. Student activities even remotely concerned with social or economic problems are barred. Evidence of one of the teachers in favor of the university was characterized by J. Alfred Wilner, counsel for the "liberals," as of "no weight" since this same teacher had written a letter some time earlier in direct contradiction of his testimony. This contradiction, Mr. Wilner pointed out, "demonstrates clearly the difference between what a professor actually thinks and what he dares to say in public."

The committee's report censures the university's refusal to charter student organizations as "a distinct tendency to abrogate and nullify any attempt on the part of students to become engaged in activities of a liberal nature." It expresses emphatic disapproval of Pitt's attitude on academic freedom and insecurity of tenure, and accepts as "ideal" the principles for both as outlined and adopted by the A. A. U. P. Finally, it recommends "as soon as the same may be legally approved" a change in the present self-perpetuating Board of Trustees and suggests that fifteen members be chosen by the Board of Directors internally, that ten be chosen by the Alumni from its members, and that five be appointed by the Governor. It further suggests that the Governor of Pennsylvania, the Mayor of Pittsburgh, and the Chancellor be members ex officio.

The committee has done its duty as well probably as could be expected. The witnesses have all done well. Briefs by counsel are respectively excellent. The state legislature has approved the usual appropriation to the university, representing approximately one-fourth of its total budget, and has done so without any of the reservations recommended by the committee. What now? For a while perhaps calm will reign. No one knows, however, when Pittsburgh's steel and coal and glass and aluminum workers may find it necessary to stage a fight against oppressive conditions. Then teachers will again forget that they have to eat and will speak out. The Chancellor will again call them into conference. Or if he has found it too disagreeable to testify, he will probably delegate that duty to his secretary, who in the "friendliest" way will tell the offending teachers to seek other connections. Thus the cycle will be rounded out. Come to think of it, what right have we to expect anything else from the status quo?

PUBLIC LIBRARY Cal.

Trouble in Paradise

Academic Freedom in Westchester

By J. W.

Valhalla, New York, July 9

MRS. RUBY WARNER and Miss Mildred Babcock, teachers in the public schools of Valhalla, New York, have been dismissed after years of service because they had the temerity to join a spontaneous movement for the return of a 10 per cent pay cut. Mrs. Warner, mother of four children, graduate of the University of Minnesota, wife of a college graduate and former lawyer, taught English at School One in the Valhalla district. Miss Babcock, an enrolled Republican, a devout churchwoman, also a college graduate, about to qualify for an advanced degree at one of New York's leading universities, taught social science. For years they wrote and coached the school plays, stayed after school to instruct the laggards, and played prominent roles in all activities. No one had a word to say against either of them. Today they are a storm center in a controversy which threatens to split this little village wide open.

Two years ago Valhalla teachers took a 10 per cent cut. Their salaries had been near the minimum fixed by the state even before that. Recently rising prices made it apparent to all on the faculties of the two schools in the district that immediate relief of some kind was necessary. Instructors called a meeting at School Two, of which G. H. Remsen is principal. Mr. Remsen said he didn't care if they met there but he thought they ought to have the approval of Herman Ronnei, supervising principal of both schools and actual principal of School One. He telephoned Ronnei and got his consent.

The day before the meeting was to have been held thunder broke about the ears of the teachers. Mr. Ronnei was in a rage. He protested that no one had said a word to him about it, ordered the session called off, and warned, "It's going to be just too bad for the ringleaders." A few days later Mrs. Warner and Miss Babcock got notice that their contracts would not be renewed. Teachers in villages of this size have no tenure. They hold their posts at the will of the board, which renews contracts if it so desires, an arrangement which makes talk of "academic freedom" a laughing matter.

Mrs. Warner and Miss Babcock are popular in Valhalla. They are also good teachers. It is, for example, well known that before Mrs. Warner began teaching there students failed regents' examinations in large numbers. One year the entire graduating class flunked and there was no graduation. That was a public scandal. Then Mrs. Warner came. Since then students have passed. Miss Babcock has had similar success. But school boards are not interested in educational advances any more than the United States Steel Company when paycuts are involved.

When the annual meeting was held on May 7, trustees changed the time-hallowed procedure of such sessions and placed the election first on the agenda. Joseph Hanley, Postal Telegraph employee, and Mrs. Mabel Moody, Republican politician, were reelected president and vice-president, respectively. This done, the trustees railroaded the meeting, prevented supporters of the teachers from speaking, and abruptly adjourned the session when a motion demanding that all trustees resign was before the house.

According to Mrs. Nathaniel Poussette-Dart, a resident of Valhalla for the past fifteen years who is leading the fight for the teachers' reinstatement, nearly all of the 500 residents who crowded the Village Hall that night would have voted against Hanley and Mrs. Moody had they known what was coming.

Mrs. Poussette-Dart organized a citizens' protest committee which went into action immediately. Students threatened a strike. There were torchlight parades and demonstrations. The entire village was aroused. The trustees retaliated in black-shirt fashion. They spread rumors that a priest had a petition signed by pupils avowing Miss Babcock taught them things the church does not approve, that she taught radical ideas destructive to the community. Mrs. Poussette-Dart says that the reason why the trustees never produced this petition was that the children who signed it also signed a plea begging for Miss Babcock's reinstatement.

Joseph Hanley, Jr., stalwart young son of the board president, went around Valhalla hinting darkly: "If you knew what these women had been doing you'd want to tar and feather them." Students who protested were frightened by state troopers, warned they "might not pass" their examinations, or told they "might not graduate." Teachers who wanted to help Miss Babcock and Mrs. Warner were intimidated and then compelled to sign papers that they had not been intimidated. They had contracts of their own that wanted renewing.

Appeals have been sent to the State Department of Education but so far vainly. Commissioner Frank P. Graves says in effect that there's nothing he can do about it. Miss Lillian Broderick, president of the Westchester County Teachers' Association, has held two "hearings," but those who attended say they were farcical. The association has not lifted a finger.

Meanwhile, the fight for reinstatement goes on. A permanent Teachers' Rights Committee has been formed with the aid of the Westchester Branch of the American League Against War and Fascism and is now functioning on its own. Many prominent educators and others interested in education are members. In addition, a group of ten or more nationally known educators, among them Professor George Counts, Professor Theodore Brameld, and Professor Childs, have agreed to serve on an investigating commission which will weigh the merits of the case. The campaign threatens to become Westchester's cause célèbre.

Next Week

Life Insurance:
The New Offensive Against Policy-Holders
by Mort and E. A. Gilbert

Books and Films

On the Human Face

By ROSS EDWARDS PIERCE

A glory is that lightens in Man's face
At the mere mention of immensities,
Things not yet hinted of this mortal race,
All highest hopes the life may yet release:

An ecstasy as that where curtains drawn—
Far up the shores of morning soars the lark
And from the yellow burning wharves of dawn
The Argonauts swift striving to embark:

Pregnant of all that pyramidal mass
The joys-loves-raptures time may bring to pass
All other loveliness it doth o'erpass,

And no Shakespearean poet ere shall scroll
Its epilogue—or think to plumb the whole
Of this divine infinitude of soul . . .

The Negro's Role

Black Reconstruction in America. By W. E. Burghardt Du Bois. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.50.

IT is not surprising that the publication of this book should be hailed as a literary event. Dr. Du Bois is a great personality. He is the hero of one of the outstanding social controversies of recent American history—the great debate with Booker T. Washington, outwardly a clash of conflicting theories of education, actually a bitter political fight over the Negro's place in American society. In this fight Dr. Du Bois stood squarely and bravely for full educational opportunity and complete social and political equality, as against Washington's insistence upon the Negro's adjustment to the inferior status which the white world imposed upon him. While Dr. Du Bois, through his books, through the Crisis which he long edited, and through the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which he helped to found, has continued this fight without giving or asking quarter, the struggle has more and more been losing its reality. This is not because it has been attaining its objectives—these are almost as far away as at the start—but because Dr. Du Bois and the movements he has led have never realized the social basis of the things for which they were fighting. The suppression of civil liberties, no matter what racial complications it assumes in the case of the Negro, is primarily the suppression of the rights of labor. To Dr. Du Bois the issue was primarily racial. He never fully grasped the economic basis of racial discrimination, and he therefore never attempted to lead the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to realize the need of working out an economic program. He has held to his racial approach to the Negro problem with increasing intensity, finally reaching the point where he is willing to accept segregation and an independent black economy inside white society as an instrument of Negro liberation.

And now as an old man Dr. Du Bois has turned to reading Marx. The child of this strange intellectual marriage is "Black Reconstruction." Written with all the poetry and fervor of his "Souls of Black Folk," one of the authentically important books of its generation, "Black Reconstruction" sets out to correct the false impressions and disprove the lies and slanders of the white historians of the Civil War and Reconstruction.

The Reconstruction, Dr. Du Bois points out, took place amid "the slime of [an] era of theft and corruption, which engulfed the nation and did not pass by the South. Legislators and public officials were bribed. Black men and white men were eager to get rich. In every Southern state white members of the old planter aristocracy were part and parcel of the new thieving and grafting." New York had its Tweed ring; other states had equally unsavory though less famous machines; the federal government experienced the worst period of corruption in its history, going through a series of scandals in which a Vice-President, a Speaker of the House, chairmen of leading Congressional committees, and Cabinet officers were involved. When the Negro Reconstruction governments showed similar corruption, the South blamed the situation on the Negro and "reiterated this charge until it became history." The Reconstruction governments, on the other hand, despite the inexperience of their members and the poverty of the states they governed, accomplished great and positive gains. They broadened the popular base of the government, they improved the criminal law, they laid the foundation of Southern public education. Much of their legislation still remains on the statute books. The constitutions which they adopted remained in force for years after the return of white control.

This book would have been an important contribution to historical literature if the author had been content to show by this method that the Negro "is an average and ordinary human being who under given environment develops like other human beings." But Du Bois's old race consciousness and new Marxism do not allow him to remain content with the demonstration of this major thesis; they lead him to transform the Negro plantation slaves into a revolutionary working class and make the Reconstruction legislatures into dictatorships of the proletariat.

Not satisfied to accept the fact that the emancipation of the Negro was the result of the defeat of the Southern planters by the Northern industrial capitalists, Du Bois insists that "the black worker won the war by a general strike which transferred his labor from the Confederate planter to the Northern invader." That the Negro participated in the Civil War is a historical fact beyond refutation, but the part he played can by no manipulation of terms be made to fit Du Bois's interpretation. About 178,000 Negroes—78,000 freemen and 100,000 former slaves—fought with the Union armies, and nearly 4,000,000 remained loyal to their slave masters, raising the food, making the supplies, transporting the troops to fight for their enslavement. Nearly 28,000 actually fought with the Southern armies. The Negro masses did not play a conscious and decisive role in their own emancipation. The hundred thousand black men who joined the Federal forces came largely from areas invaded and conquered by the Northern troops. Some joined freely; others were inducted by force, in a process more like the corvée than a general strike. Only on the theory of the last straw could we call these additions to the Northern armies decisive.

But even more fantastic than this thesis of Du Bois's is his insistence that the Reconstruction legislatures were proletarian dictatorships. He declares:

> . . . among Negroes, and particularly in the South, there was being put into force one of the most extraordinary experiments in Marxism that the world, before the Russian Revolution, had seen. That is, backed by the military power of the United States, a dictatorship of labor was > to be attempted, and those who were leading the Negro race in this vast experiment were emphasizing the necessity of political power and organization backed by protective military power.

This is the central thesis of "Black Reconstruction." A proletarian dictatorship resting on the military forces of victorious industrial capital! Indeed, this was "an extraordinary experiment in Marxism." Dictatorships the Reconstruction governments were, and the dictatorship here, as always, was a dictatorship of the power which controlled the military force.

Marx's hero was the proletariat. Du Bois's hero is the Negro. Du Bois, fresh from his reading of Marx, makes the Negro the proletariat. Everywhere throughout this book, in many ways an extraordinary work, Du Bois's race consciousness distorts his Marxism; so that the net result of "Black Reconstruction" is to add more confusion than light to the understanding of one of the crucial epochs of American history.

Sterling D. Spero

Medicine Must Be Socialized

The Doctor's Bill. By Hugh Cabot. Columbia University Press. $3.

A LARGE number of families in this country are suffering because they cannot afford medical care. But the problem of paying the doctor's bill is far from being the only economic difficulty connected with our present medical service. For example, thousands of well-trained young physicians sit all day in empty offices. On the other hand, numerous "fashionable doctors" are so rushed that they have no time to examine a patient carefully and adequately. In both cases valuable diagnostic ability is going to waste.

Furthermore, the public has no means of distinguishing a well-qualified expert from an ignorant bungler. Our present laws permit any licensed practitioner to proclaim himself a specialist in any field he may choose, and to perform any operation to which he can persuade a gullible patient to submit. Moreover, the patient who can pay large fees may receive even less scientific treatment than the poor man. The expression of an unbiased diagnostic opinion is difficult when a surgeon can easily charge a thousand dollars for an operation but will have difficulty in collecting more than twenty-five dollars for examination and advice. As a result we have with us the "fee-splitting" racket and an appalling increase in the number of unnecessary operations.

Yet when the Wilbur Committee on the Cost of Medical Care made its timid suggestion of a socialized medical service, the American Medical Association replied with a blast of anathemas. "The issue is one of sovietism versus Americanism," the official journal thundered. The A. M. A. denounced even the august American College of Surgeons for suggesting a prepayment plan for medical costs. It sabotaged the efforts of the Michigan State Medical Association and the Milwaukee County Medical Society to give the public some form of health insurance. It has threatened with ostracism private groups of physicians who have attempted to offer insurance for medical expenses. The complaint about the hardship of payment for medical services is generally answered by the wholly irrelevant argument that our national expenditure for medical care is smaller than the amounts we pay for tobacco, cosmetics, soda-water, and silk underwear.

Why does the A. M. A. take this reactionary attitude? Delegates to the national convention are usually elected because they have been successful in the practice of medicine, and success in our present economic system necessarily means financial success. The House of Delegates accordingly tends to represent opulence and senility. Yet other medical organizations somewhat similarly constituted have displayed a much more kindly feeling toward "socialized medicine." The suspicion is unavoidable that the association which claims the sole right to speak for the profession does not truly represent the feelings of the whole body of American physicians.

Dr. Cabot opens his book with an amazingly lucid outline of the changes in the conditions of medical practice during the past forty years. Our present dilemma is shown to be not the result of "subversive activities" but an inevitable consequence of social, economic, and technical changes. The growth of specialism, hospitals, and complicated laboratory procedures are demonstrated to be the result neither of a demand by the public for fancy frills nor of a faulty emphasis in medical education. Instead, they are necessary developments if recent scientific discoveries are to be applied in healing the sick.

The book makes a careful survey of the various systems of socialized medicine in Europe and also of the numerous forms of organized medical service which exist here. Dr. Cabot obviously does not wish to sell any European system for use in this country. He hopes, however, that unhindered expansion of our own beginnings in the direction of socialized medicine will result in a system adapted to our conditions and needs.

Dr. Cabot has no rigid formula to solve all medical problems. Certain features must be present in the future medical service, however, if the best care that medical science can offer is to be made available to all who are sick. Medical care must be administered by well-integrated groups with adequate hospital and laboratory facilities. Free competition must go; only about 10 per cent of the patients at present can pay a fee large enough for the physician to make any profit, and the future promises only "more and more fierce competition for the privilege of treating fewer and fewer patients." Payment must be based upon some form of health insurance. Health insurance will no doubt ultimately be compulsory, but Dr. Cabot is skeptical of the success of any system that might be created at the present time by a fiat of Congress.

Physicians should probably receive flat salaries: the collection of fees is a very dubious incentive to conscientious medical service. As for the repeated demand of the A. M. A. that the patient shall have "the free choice of a physician," Dr. Cabot notes that the demand for this freedom of choice generally comes from the physicians concerned and not from the patients. Contrary to the official dogma of the A. M. A. the system of socialized medical services should not be wholly, or even chiefly, under control of the profession. The public which pays and the patient who suffers should have a voice, not of course in the technical problems of medical treatment, but certainly in the social and economic aspects of how medical service is to be delivered. The sole right of medicine to exist is that it serve the health of the community, and not that it furnish an income to its practitioners.

Frederick C. Lendrum

Portrait of a Poet

The Letters of Gerard Manley Hopkins to Robert Bridges, and the Correspondence of Gerard Manley Hopkins and Richard Watson Dixon. Edited by Claude Colleer Abbott. Oxford University Press. Two Volumes. $10.

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS destroyed his personal diary. Another notebook on matters of criticism and of scholarship he kept, and this became the basis for Lahey's biography. Canon Dixon's personal diary, which might have had notes on Hopkins, has not been found. Furthermore, Robert Bridges himself destroyed his own letters to Hopkins—just why is not easily determined. Hopkins's poems, then, and these two volumes of his letters are all that are allowed us of his life's record. He disciplined himself even for posterity. But he left to Bridges the decision as to what should become of his poems, and in 1918 Bridges gave these poems to the world. They are record enough for any sensitive reader.

Hopkins's letters to Robert Bridges are, for the most part, letters about poetry, about prosody, and, in the last years, about music. Many of them are detailed criticisms of Bridges's work. Many are analyses of Hopkins's technique, paraphrases of his own poems. These two gentlemen and scholars were intimate only in their aesthetic interests. The man who had renounced medicine for poetry was far from sympathetic with the priest who, had he considered it necessary, might have renounced poetry altogether for service to Christ. Twice, obviously, Bridges and Hopkins came near to complete misunderstanding: once when Hopkins delicately but directly tried to win Bridges to his own God; once when Hopkins wrote the now famous letter stating that he was always thinking of the Communist future.

> The too intelligent artisan [wrote Hopkins] is master of the situation. . . . However, I am afraid some great revolution is not far off. Horrible to say, in a manner I am a communist. . . . Besides it is just. . . . I do not mean the means of getting to it are. But it is a dreadful thing for the greatest and most necessary part of a very rich nation to live a hard life without dignity, knowledge, comforts, delight, or hopes, in the midst of plenty—which plenty they make. They profess that they do not care what they wreck and burn, the old civilization and order must be destroyed. . . . But as the working classes have not been educated, they know next to nothing of all this [the value of tradition] and cannot be expected to care if they destroy it. The more I look, the more black and deservedly black the future looks.

A curious formality runs through the one-sided correspondence, from which Bridges obviously gained far more than Hopkins. Many times Bridges altered lines in his own verses because Hopkins had pointed out defects; Hopkins very seldom accepted suggestions. Bridges, to be sure, knew when to stand his own ground; he persevered in his more conservative technique and became one of the greatest Victorian prosodists. The two men spoke to each other as equals, sometimes even bluntly. Apparently they actually saw very little of each other, but their correspondence continued for about twenty-three years, until Hopkins died at forty-five.

The correspondence between Hopkins and Dixon, which covers only the last ten years of Hopkins's life, is more personal. Canon Dixon, a curate in London, remembered Hopkins as a schoolboy. When, therefore, Hopkins expressed his sympathy and admiration for Dixon, who had never had his deserved recognition, Dixon came to love the younger artist. He could, moreover, sympathize with Hopkins's vocation. And even while he urged Hopkins to continue writing he did not quarrel with his supreme faith or question over-much his renunciation. For Hopkins's poetry Dixon had only the highest admiration, acknowledging at once a genius so original that it must have its own way. There was whole-hearted communication between them; and from these letters we learn how sensitive and passionate a schoolboy Hopkins had been, how terribly he had struggled, how much he had renounced for his calling.

Hopkins not only saw and felt with unusual sensitivity; he deliberately attempted to draw into himself every impression taken by his senses so that each in its turn might be registered indelibly on his inner mind. From so acute a sensibility and so intense a cultivation of it he suffered nervously all his life. Delicate from childhood, he came at times close to death from exhaustion due to inner conflict. He was not content merely to describe beauty, he must transmit it directly to the reader. Therefore his need of a new technique, a new syntax, was constant. This process of drawing sensuous impressions inward he calls "inscape." The effects of it in his poetry are easily pointed out. Hopkins, for example, records not a description of the lark's song, but the way it affects his own ear; he describes a starry night, a dappled day, as if his own nerve-ends were giving back their sensitivity. Since he saw everything in motion, his fundamental metaphysical problem was to see unity in the dynamic physical world. Each image, as he gives it, alters. He had a passion for watching the beauty of clouds, of light and shadow. This is evident in the prose essays included in the appendices of these volumes. But his poems also reflect his peculiar sensitivity to motion, to the effects of light. They are, moreover, dramatic, full of action. Denied action himself, denied physical expression of his intense sensuous delight, he projected both in his poetry, resolving it always into the theme of unity, of peace in God.

Actually Hopkins had chosen a calling in accord with only half his mind, utterly contradictory to his almost morbid sensibility. Stomach disorders, nervous prostrations indicate a constant strain. But his will power never broke down. "Feeling," he writes, "love, in particular, is the great moving power and spring of verse." Then he adds: "And the only person that I am in love with [God] seldom, especially now, stirs my heart sensibly, and when he does I cannot always make capital of it. It would be a sacrilege." So all of the feeling, the fresh, violent delight he had in nature, must be willed to God. Youth's intensity of emotion mercifully faded a little; the intellect took hold. But Hopkins never rose to any great office in his chosen calling. About his failure he could be humorous, but he also grieved. And the more he was convinced of his failure, the more he determined to renounce everything but the priesthood. In the eight years before his death he found time to write only twenty poems, but among these were his amazing "terrible sonnets," heart-breaking poems of conflict between doubt and faith, our most magnificent record of the way in which a man's will can prevail even though every sense takes its toll of pain.

On entering the priesthood, Hopkins foreswore poetry for seven years. "The Wreck of the Deutschland," written at the request of a superior, allowed him to take up his pen. The next few years were his most prolific. In this period he learned his technique. Then came the totaling up of his record in his last sonnets. And we have today a small but very precious and original collection of poems. In them is revealed the man's soul, the battleground between a terrible sensitivity and an iron will which had accepted a dogma.

Caught in the religious zeal of his Oxford days, Hopkins was led by Newman into Catholicism. But he was almost biologically determined for poetry. His sensibilities remind one of Dorothy Wordsworth's or of Proust's. Over them he drew down the bars of his faith. Poetry results, always, from inner conflict and must always, for the purpose of the poem itself at least, resolve that conflict. Hopkins's poetry is one of the greatest illustrations of how this creative process takes form in words. Much could be said about his technique. He learned his use of "sprung rhythm" from Anglo-Saxon. He believed that poetic language must be the current language of the age, but he adds that this language "must be to any degree heightened and unlike itself." He noted that his own use of alliteration was unlike Swinburne's in that he used it only for stressing meaning, never for mere sound. He studied Milton's contrapuntal choruses in "Samson Agonistes," and so found that rhythm running against rhythm could be made to stress meaning. The very violence of his feelings and statements demanded that no word be left unstressed if it confirmed meaning, that language must be condensed in order to state emotions felt as if all in one flash. His innovations were, in other words, all necessary to his art. Therefore he dared and, for the most part, he succeeded. Hopkins was writing music when he died. Music was merely a purer, less questionable release for a caged heart.

EDA LOU WALTON

Tragic Mississippi

Deep Dark River. By Robert Rylee. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

SOCIAL evil is a complicated thing, and the novelist who would show it both truthfully and effectively must as a rule evolve an elaborate factual structure. When in his admirable endeavor to help the Southern share-croppers Erskine Caldwell writes a story as impossible as "Kneel to the Rising Sun," he injures his cause by his faulty structure. Mr. Rylee evidently has no less at heart the atrocious conditions under which the share-croppers live, and he avoids the pitfall of the young and inexperienced crusader by evolving the very sort of elaborate, casually cruel plot by which actual life prepares its tragedies.

He gives us Mose, a husky young farm Negro who works contentedly for a meager living because his imagination has been completely captured by the great legend of the Christian faith as it has been transmitted to him, after undergoing at the hands of his poetic race changes no less extraordinary, grotesque, poignant, and beautiful than those the same faith underwent at the hands of the stone-carvers of Europe in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. In giving us Mose, Mr. Rylee gives us in large part his race.

Through a series of credible incidents, one leading inevitably to another, and all of them ironical commentaries on the helpless lot of an underprivileged man in personal conflict with one more fortunately circumstanced, Mose incurs the hatred of Birney, the manager of the plantation on which he works. But even in Mississippi a likable, hard-working, unoffending Negro has some rights. Instead of waylaying Mose and beating him to death, Birney hires another Negro to pick a quarrel with Mose and shoot him. The plan miscarries slightly; Mose kills the trouble-maker in self-defense.

Up to this point the book affords the reader the delighted surprise that comes when he encounters a new novelist who writes with fine seriousness and a profound appreciation of the beauty and tragedy of the human lot—this in spite of the fact that Mr. Rylee's prose, though always sensitive and often moving, is never really distinguished. But with the indictment of Mose for murder and the attempt on the part of Mary Winston, a woman lawyer, to save him, Mr. Rylee's ignorance of the ways of the world betrays him sadly.

It is incredible that anyone with enough intelligence to pass the bar examinations and with several years of active practice behind her could have entered the case with the blithe ignorance shown by Mary Winston. Although she knows that Birney has the active support of the two corrupt sons of the plantation owner, and although she knows that the three have for years carried on an illicit business without any interference from the local officers, with whom they are thick as thieves, it doesn't occur to her that the jury will be rigged, and she enters court relying exclusively on the justice of her case. Although she knows that the plantation Negroes who are her sole witnesses as to the real cause of the shooting depend for their very existence on their white bosses and live in constant terror of them, it never occurs to her that they will be frightened out of giving true evidence for Mose. And when she makes her final plea, she talks to the jury very much in the manner of a Sunday School teacher urging her pupils to better things.

Mussolini marches in Africa! Japan moves into north China! Hitler's Germany rearms, on sea and land! War within the next few years seems overwhelmingly likely.

Will We Stay Out Of the Next War?

Under that general title The New Republic will publish, in consecutive issues, beginning in the issue of July 31, a series of four articles of paramount importance.

1. How We Entered the Last One, by WALTER MILLIS of The New York Herald Tribune, author of The Road to War.
2. Neutrality by Statute, by W. T. STONE, of the Foreign Policy Association.
3. Propaganda and the Next War, by O. W. RIEGEL, Professor of Journalism at Washington and Lee University, author of Mobilizing for Chaos.
4. Economic Problems of Neutrality, by GEORGE SOULE, of the staff of The New Republic, author of *The Coming American Revolution, etc.

The series of articles faces the question whether the United States is likely to be drawn into the next war, and the even more pressing question whether the dominant political and economic forces in this country will want to stay out.

The time to act to keep the United States out of the war is now! The time to explore the dangers and difficulties is now! To make the articles in the series Will We Stay Out of the Next War? widely available, The New Republic is offering a special short-term subscription.

13 weeks for $1

The New Republic, 40 East 49th St., New York

For the enclosed one dollar (check or money order, if possible) please send me The New Republic for the next thirteen weeks.

Name ______________________________

Address ____________________________

____

N-7-24-35

A lawyer so naive and so ignorant would probably have lost her case even if her client had not been a poor Negro in darkest Mississippi. Yet the difficulties that confront her are true to fact, and taken together constitute a damning picture of injustice and the suffering it entails.

Alice Beal Parsons

Shorter Notices

The Last of Mr. Norris. By Christopher Isherwood. William Morrow and Company. $2.50.

This gently shocking portrait of an international spy, modish as it may be with its bright references to homosexuality, flagellation, and communism, is nevertheless reminiscent of Compton Mackenzie's humorous novels of war-time secret service in the Balkans. The comic method is, in both cases, the same. The secret agent is no longer the stock sinister figure of melodrama and romance; he becomes, instead, a small, mild-mannered, inefficient man, the dupe in most cases of the personages he seeks to betray. While Mr. Isherwood is not so resourceful as Mr. Mackenzie once was in handling the comedy of this inverted cliché, he does manage to furbish his joke until it glitters almost like new. The account of Mr. Norris and his haunts and habits in fatigued London and decadent Berlin is as accurate as farce should be. In its static aspects the novel is clever and creditable. Unfortunately, once it begins to move, the work lacks that which is essential to any fictional venture into international espionage—a good, involute intrigue plot. The end and middle of Mr. Norris are only too inherent in his beginning. At almost every point in his narrative the author lags two or three steps behind his reader, and as a result of this sluggishness a gay little novel turns into an anti-climactic bore.

Tsar of Freedom; The Life and Reign of Alexander II. By Stephen Graham. Yale University Press. $3.50.

Mr. Graham is a belated Slavophile who believes the Marxist movement in Russia only seems to endure and that Slavophilism only seems to be dead. He sees the Russian nation as a mystic entity existing between the Czar on the one hand and the revolution on the other. Its essential nature is expressed by "The Brothers Karamazov," which will outlive all changes of regime. "Tsar of Freedom" is a romantic idealization of Alexander, an attempt to interpret his reign, combined with a series of "philosophic" musings of the utmost triteness. National psychology is the basis of Mr. Graham's interpretation of history. The psychology of the Russian people is humble, mystical, and emotional. It needs a church and a master. The psychology of the radicals and the Westernizers was full of arrogant rationalism, the materialism of the West, and the internationalism of the Jews. Hence it was unsuited to the Russian temperament. Though the author mentions the existence of historic currents which underlie the surface of events and give them their real significance, he fails to tap those currents at many crucial points.

"BRICKBATS AND ORCHIDS"
A COMING NEW BOOK
For and against modern active dated money (Non-STAMP) by Editors, Economists, etc., of world-wide reputation and up and coming young Lippmanns, Mark Sullivans, Brisbanes, etc. Editorial Board of well-known men to select articles. Variable time limits and amount of exchange fees provide regulation and control on a scientific basis. Read "Debt and Production" by Bassett Jones. Part of proceeds from book sales to be offered Institute of Public Affairs, University of Virginia, at tenth annual session in 1936, as an endowment fund for research in special subjects along Brookings Institution lines. "I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man" Thomas Jefferson, Founder University of Virginia. Recent high spot bibliography "Money in Motion," John Chamberlain, New Outlook, June, 1933. "Mayor Unterguggenberger's Plan," Hans Cohrssen, New Outlook, March, 1933, "Booms and Depressions" and "Stamp Scrip" by Irving Fisher, Yale, Esquire, May, 1935, "A Matter of Modesty" by Ezra Pound, about Silvio Gesell.
THIS WEEK'S SESSION UNUSUAL! Why not attend? Address me University of Virginia until July 15th. Yours for streamlined private capitalism, sound money, taxes from increased business volume and Money in Motion and the desire to uncover new hard-hitting word Engineers able to take either side. P.S. Should banks be allowed exchange fees as a profit!
J. B. N. CARDOZA.

Films

The Film Library

THE Museum of Modern Art Film Library has just offered at a private showing in New York a specimen of the kind of program which it intends to make available for circulation among libraries, universities, museums, and other institutions throughout the country. This opening bill included the celebrated kissing scene from "The Widow Jones," made by May Irwin and John C. Rice in the nineties; "The Great Train Robbery," the first of the westerns, produced in New Jersey by an Edison camera man in 1903; and an example of a new type of cartoon photography entitled "Joie de Vivre," recently imported from the studios of two young artists in Paris. The bulletin from the Film Library also announces the acquisition of a portfolio of ninety photographic studies made by Edward Muybridge at the University of Pennsylvania in the eighties. Each of these studies is composed of twenty-four individual photographs which record different segments of a single continuous action. As Muybridge's analysis of motion with the still camera was undoubtedly one of the most important steps leading to the invention of cinematography, ownership of this portfolio must cause the same sort of satisfaction to the Film Library that the Morgan library is supposed to experience upon acquiring a Gutenberg Bible or a first-folio Shakespeare. In any case, the Film Library has made an excellent beginning in its attempt to provide a sanctuary against time for what is, in a quite literal sense, the most perishable of the arts. Future Ph.D's, making a study of the early twentieth-century cinema from the standpoint either of its technical evolution or of its sometimes bewildering reflection of our culture, will be grateful for the spirit of devoted foresight which has prompted its founding. It is certain also that the existence of such an institution will have the immediate effect of increasing the prestige of the films in those quarters which still consider a serious interest in them a sign either of affectation or of intellectual decay. It endows them with a kind of respectability which may be only academic but which tends to place them on an equal footing with the other arts.

Among the current pictures which need not encumber the archives of the Film Library is "Escapade," in which William Powell and a newcomer named Luise Rainer are to be seen in an adaptation of a German triangle comedy of Vienna in the period of Johann Strauss and Frau Sacher. Despite Mr. Powell's unconvincing transition from a Dashiell Hammett sleuth to a society artist of the Danubian epoch, the film retains much of what must have been the elegant naughtiness of the original. Several scenes in the artist's studio make the sort of old-fashioned appeal which causes one to remember that there was once an organization called the League of Decency. But the real interest centers on the closeness of Miss Rainer's impersonations of Elisabeth Bergner. The difficulty with Miss Rainer's American debut is not that she has insufficiently mastered the tongue, which is her apology in the trailer following the film, but that she gives us too little opportunity to determine what her own personality may be like. A comparison between her first love passage with Mr. Powell and any of the similar passages in the Bergner pictures will confirm the often challenged assertion that there is such a thing as sincerity in acting. It may be that Miss Rainer has a personality of her own and that she will be permitted to discover it, but in the meantime her emergence on the Hollywood screen is a matter of much less consequence than the advertisements would lead one to believe.

William Troy

AUG 2
SEP 7

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 31, 1935 No. 3656

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 113

EDITORIALS:
- The Battle for Civil Rights 116
- Making America Safe for Martial Law 117
- Æ 117
- Monkey Business 118

ISSUES AND MEN. HOME AFTER VACATION. By Oswald Garrison Villard. 119

LIFE INSURANCE: THE NEW OFFENSIVE AGAINST POLICY-HOLDERS By Mort and E. A. Gilbert 120

THE SABOTAGE OF THE LEVIATHAN. By Peter Ehlers . . . 122

WHO GETS SUPPLEMENTARY RELIEF? By C. Hartley Grattan 125

BOOKS IN GERMANY. By I. A. Levitan 127

CORRESPONDENCE 128

LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
- Connecticut Forms a Labor Party. By Nathaniel Sherman . . . 131
- Lessons from Lorain. By Heywood Broun 132
- Victory in New Jersey. By McAlister Coleman 133

BOOKS:
- Realism—Old Style. By William Troy 135
- Portrait of a Year. By Margaret Bourke-White 135
- Literary History at Its Worst. By Charles Angoff 136
- Communist Ideology. By Edgar Sheffield Brightman 137
- Fearing's Metrotone News. By Philip Blair Rice 138
- Erskine Version. By Helen Neville 140
- Shorter Notices 140

CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 140

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING CHARLES ANGOFF

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of subscriber's address.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second-class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by The Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE who were against the "death sentence" in the holding-company bill have now learned that the pressure of home investors which, in some cases at least, decided their vote, was nothing more than a smack from a city directory. The result is that several members are ready to change their votes, and it is within the bounds of possibility that the "death sentence" may yet be enacted. The comedy of Warren, Pennsylvania, has put the utilities to rout. The spectacle of a local utilities employee writing hundreds of telegrams, signing them with names chosen from the local directory, then burning the originals so that the crime should not be detected shows to what lengths of deception the utilities are ready to go. It also raises a question of ethics for the Western Union Telegraph Company, whose local office knew the telegrams were spurious. Associated Gas and Electric, whose employee was the comedian of this episode, admitted to the Senate committee investigating lobbying that it had spent $700,000 to defeat the holding-company bill and justified it as a modest one per cent of its outstanding stock. But it is seventy times more cash than was originally invested by the two men who formed this holding company, for they gained control of assets worth $640,000,000 on an original outlay of $10,000. Philip H. Gadsden, chairman of the Committee of Utility Company Executives, pleads pitifully that the misdeeds of a few individuals should not reflect on the honest attempt to save millions of stockholders. But the holding-company bill will not injure honest properties, or take from stockholders a cent which represents honest value. It is written in the defense of stockholders in general, as much as of the public which now pays for services at extortionate rates based upon watered valuation.

"NOTHING," said a Washington wit, "frightens this Administration so much as to win a court decision." The remark fell after the United States Court of Appeals had overruled Judge W. I. Grubb in the TVA case, and had given careful reasons for finding the act constitutional. As if disturbed by recent Supreme Court philosophy, the judges of appeal offered this idea: "We live under a dual government of divided powers, not under two separate governments of conflicting powers. The power over navigable waters granted to the federal government is not in conflict with but necessarily superior to the dominion over such waters which the states reserve to themselves." The Supreme Court may accept this little lesson since it applies only to navigable waters and not to human beings. But it also may prefer the staunch reasoning of Judge Grubb that since the Constitution does not confer on the federal government the authority to embark on undertakings like the TVA the federal government is prohibited from doing so. Even if the government wins in the highest court it will find it has a high hurdle to leap. The fight is being made not on the right of the government board to sell power, but to sell surplus power of a war-time dam. It owns Wilsom Dam, built in the national defense. It has a constitutional right to sell what it owns. But the power companies denied that it could sell surplus power if it competed with private business. The Circuit Court of Appeals now finds it can sell the surplus power, even if in so doing it competes, because it has the right to dispose of its property. But that hardly makes it clear that the government can dispose of power from dams built not for national defense but for the mere defense of the victims of public-utility companies.

NOT UNTIL the Ways and Means Committee of the House drafts a bill will it be possible to comment seriously on the President's tax program. The move to substitute an excess-profits tax for the graduated tax on corporation profits was placed before the President, and he is said to have worked out a characteristic compromise, retaining the graduated tax but reducing its spread, and adding the excess-profits tax as well. Thus he establishes the principle of the tax on bigness without using it with any real effect. Preliminary forecasts indicate that higher death duties will begin with inheritances of $75,000, and higher income taxes on net incomes of $150,000. Until we see the scale of inheritance taxes we are unable to say whether they are sharp enough to conform with the President's own intention of breaking up great fortunes. Certainly income-tax increases should begin in the lowest bracket. The cost of government is being borne, in part by borrowing, in part by indirect taxation—therefore by the poor, and in part by taxing the well-to-do. No one can accuse us of opposing borrowing in an era of extreme destitution, but we are aghast that a widely heralded tax reform should fall short of taxing the rich in preference to borrowing. And as the rich are the loudest to cry out against the unbalanced budget, they cannot consistently decline to bear their share of the cost of fiscal probity. One should be able to expect them to exert influence on Congress to this end, but it will be left to the progressives to wage the fight for sound finance, and they will have to defeat the spokesmen of the rich if they win.

A LITTLE MORE than a year after the infamous "purge" of June 30, the Nazis have broken out again against their enemies, the Jews. Jews are being subjected to indignities and injuries on the streets of Berlin; Jewish shops are being attacked and their customers threatened; and a blanket ordinance forbids the operation of ice-cream parlors by Jews after 7 p. m., although these establishments traditionally do most of their business in the evening. All this is a departure from the established procedure of forbidding German Jews to practice in the professions and the arts, but on the whole permitting them to continue in business. It indicates a split between the more conservative Nazi anti-Semites, represented by Prime Minister Göring, and the radicals of whom Goebbels is the leader, and who would like to see every Jew expelled from the country or forced to live in a ghetto. James G. McDonald, High Commissioner for Refugees Coming from Germany, in a comprehensive report on the condition of Jewish exiles, reports that some 80,000 Jews have left that unhappy country since the beginning of the Hitler regime. The McDonald report urges that responsibility for these refugees be assumed by the League of Nations, since the Nazi government has taken drastic measures against their return, and the countries to which they have fled are not in an economic condition to welcome or maintain them. The recent anti-Semitic outbursts cannot fail to add to their number.

AS IF TO MAKE IT QUITE CLEAR that the excesses under the Hitler government are continuing and will continue as long as the Nazis are in power, not only the Jews but the Catholics are being subjected to continued persecution and harassment. There is considerably less pulling about of Catholics in the streets, but the Reich Ministry of Justice has issued orders for the strictest suppression of Catholic clergymen discovered to be making "insidious attacks on the state." At the same time Catholic youth groups have been forbidden mass appearances in public and Catholic newspapers have been confiscated and suppressed. On Sunday, July 21, the day after the latest decree was issued, only the Catholic priests in Freiburg were so rash as to ignore it. Curiously enough, although promises of drastic action had been announced to accompany any violation of the order, the Nazi lightning did not strike the Freiburg clergy dead, but instead it was explained that the decree had not actually been published in Freiburg before the sermons were preached. But this need not be interpreted as a tempering of the Nazi storm. It has long since been evident that there were no lengths to which the Hitler cohorts would not go in their kultur madness and in their attempts to bolster up a desperate economic situation by dragging out diversions for a succession of Roman holidays. In so far as the latest manifestations of violence indicate a split within the Nazi ranks between the extremists and the moderates, they may serve to hasten the day of reckoning. Hitler himself is reported to be away "on a cruise"; one may guess whether this means that he has absented himself to escape responsibility, or that his lieutenants are taking advantage of his absence to put through changes which he refused to sanction.

THE NEW YORK Times writes sensational headlines over a dispatch by Clarence Streit from Geneva giving details of a "secret" protocol between Britain and Italy in 1891, by which Italy was to have nearly all of Abyssinia as a sphere of influence. Streit in his dispatch admits that the protocol and the agreement which followed have both been published and languish in the dust of public libraries. Furthermore the agreement was modified by a long series of further agreements on the same theme, in which later France joined, and it was finally superceded when Abyssinia, under the special auspices of Italy and France, joined the League of Nations. Britain in 1891 was prepared to relinquish Egypt and the Sudan, and therefore was not concerned as to the control of Lake Tsana in Abyssinia, through which flows the Blue Nile. No dusty protocol of that year would make Britain today feel bound to turn over this region to anyone else. Today Egypt and the Sudan are firmly in Britain's keeping, and their prosperity depends on the Blue Nile, with its rich deposits of silt. Britain itself had its eye on Abyssinia, and after the World War began talking of a mandate over this slave-ridden land. As much as anything this made Abyssinia's reception into the League appeal to Italy and France. Of all the agreements made, we suspect that a secret one of last year between Italy and France is the most important, for it signalized the withdrawal of French opposition to Italy's claims against Abyssinia. But the factor determining Mussolini's intention to conquer Abyssinia, by war or by peaceful means, is no written or unwritten agreement; it is the simple fact that now it can be done, and nobody is ready to oppose him effectively. If the League lives up to its obligations, Italy will withdraw from membership. Even Britain, concerned as it is over Lake Tsana, cannot invite this situation. Mussolini outside the League is almost inevitably a menace; inside the League he remains part of the anti-Hitler front.

ABYSSINIA now finds itself cynically abandoned by its guarantors, and in turning to self defense is obstructed in buying munitions. Orders from European countries, some even paid for, are not being filled. This is a predicament the American advocates of strict neutrality must explain away. Not to sell munitions to either party in a dispute may be to determine the extinction of the country not possessing its own munition factories. Emperor Haile Selassie is making fine speeches, dramatically offering to die for his country. The fact is that he is confronted by strong tribal opposition at home, and if he should try to give away territory to Mussolini he probably would be killed. He arouses our pity in mentioning the possibility of a Morgan loan. True, his country and Finland are among the few to which American bankers can make advances under the Johnson act.

But he reveals a saintly naivete if he believes Morgan and Company would stake him in a fight for national survival, which he already has lost. For our part we shall not be naive, either, about Abyssinia. The country is deep in the dark ages, its millions of blacks are kept in bitter subjection by their ruthless masters. Our indignation over the policy of Mussolini, and the final collapse of all international morals at Geneva, does not make us defenders of the tragic feudalism of Abyssinia. The best we can say for the country is that it has a right to lift itself from the depths under the protection of the League.

THE NEW FRENCH BUDGET is interesting for the decrees by which Premier Laval has reduced house rents, the income from government obligations, and the prices of bread, gas, and electricity. They set a precedent which a government either to the right or left of the present middle-party regime will find useful. The reductions themselves, along with the higher taxes on large incomes and on munitions manufactures, served to disguise the force of the blow against the French standard of living which is contained in one of the most deflationary budgets on record. The 10 per cent reduction in the wages of government employees—an annual salary of $663 now becomes $596.70—will not, of course stop there; and it will not be offset by the reductions in the cost of living. Purchasing power will be cut all along the line and there is no assurance that France will be able to avoid devaluation after all. Robert Dell, in our issue of July 10, pointed out the tie-up between the Comité des Forges and the Bank of France, which precipitated the financial crisis and has just dictated the terms of its solution. The Comité des Forges, he wrote, along with the French fascists, would like to see an alliance between France and Germany "for it would make it necessary for both countries to be heavily armed" with resulting profits to the iron-and-steel trust. We note that Laval, now that he has saved the franc, is "anxious to renew conversations" looking toward agreement with Germany. Two-thirds of the French national expenditure goes to support the army, navy, the air force, and the service of the national debt. No doubt, the savings effected by the new budget will also be put where they will do the most harm, namely into the perfecting of that vast armament machine which will presently go off and blow Europe to pieces again. Premier Laval is to be congratulated on the mildness of the riots with which his budget was greeted.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST'S anti-Soviet campaign has come a cropper in a way peculiar to his journalistic genius. Thomas Walker, whose real name is Robert Green and who "wrote" the first sensational expose of the "real and whole truth" about conditions in Russia, turns out to be a notorious forger and violator of the Mann white-slave act. For the latter offence he had served a term in Leavenworth, and he was later sentenced by the Colorado courts to serve eight years in jail on a forgery conviction. He escaped prison after a year and a half, and roamed over the USSR for the purpose of "fact-finding." He had great difficulty in selling his "facts" until last year when he met Mr. Hearst in London. Mr. Hearst, whose eye for scoops and newspaper geniuses is proverbial, immediately put him to work for his papers. Having finished his series for the Hearst papers, Mr. "Walker" returned to the United States, and he had no sooner reached our shores than federal officers detained him for using a false name on his passport. The Colorado authorities were notified, and at this writing he is on the way to that state to serve the remaining six-and-a-half years of his forgery term.

THE GOVERNMENT, being possessed of a Labor Relations Board (whose three new members will be named in a few days) should at once submit to it the dispute between Postmaster W. R. Jackson of St. Louis and the National Association of Substitute Post Office Employees. This has been in progress since last summer when William F. Hill, a substitute post office worker, wrote a letter to the St. Louis Times-Star, conservative in tone and making constructive criticism of the Post Office. There followed a quiet campaign by the postmaster to make Hill leave the union, and to drive some of his Jewish fellow-unionists out of the service. Both anti-Semitism and hostility to the union were apparent in the postmaster's behavior. At one conference with his men he cast aspersions on the Jewish race, called members of the union "rats," and denied the right of employees to criticize the post office. Since then Theodore Bronstein, Samuel Raban, and Samuel Rosen have been dismissed in a manner which suggests discrimination of a serious order. Protests of the union to Washington have received no consideration. The dispute resembles in many details cases which the National Labor Relations Board ruled were discrimination due to union activities. The Post Office Department obviously is trying to stifle the dispute by the familiar strategy of delay. It should set an example to private employers by submitting this case to arbitration.

THE LATEST ATTACK on the sanctity of the home comes not from the communists who, as we all know, invariably believe in free love, but from the school-board trustees and other educational administrators who insist that married teachers, if they happen also to be women, must give up their jobs. At a recent session of the National Association of Women Lawyers at Los Angeles it was reported that many women teachers, afraid for their positions, are concealing their marriages, or are actually going to the lengths of getting divorces from their husbands—with whom, however, they continue on amicable terms—so that they may technically preserve their single status. If this were the height of the Educational Silly Season, it would be bad enough, but in New York City, a further peak has been scaled. Miss Rose Freistater has been refused a permanent teaching license because she is thirty pounds overweight. The alleged grounds for the refusal are partly that Miss Freistater is not a good insurance risk for the pension fund, and partly that embonpoint is not "esthetic." In the good old days teachers could be fat or thin, some of them were decidedly not "esthetic," and a few had perceptible mustaches. Obviously this was a slovenly way to appoint our teachers, and still more regulation may be in order. We suggest the following: All applicants for a teaching position must be blonde, slender, must dislike the company of males over fourteen, and must vote the Republican ticket regularly; they must not chew gum. This will put everything on a high intellectual level, and we can sit back and feel that our children's future is in safe hands.

The Battle for Civil Rights

HOWEVER much various groups of radicals and liberals may disagree over doctrine and procedure, there is one cause in which they can fight shoulder to shoulder: the maintenance of the time-honored liberties incorporated in the American Bill of Rights. Freedom of speech and of the press, the right to petition for redress of grievances, the right of peaceful assembly must be cherished as faithfully today as they were when written into the Constitution, and by an active minority of the population they are as faithfully defended. The yearly report of the American Civil Liberties Union provides a thrilling record of this struggle; with an astonishing small membership and annual budget, the Union, aided by some of the most capable lawyers in the country, who offer their services in most cases without remuneration, has carried on the fight for civil rights with a zeal and persistence of which every sincere American patriot cannot fail to be proud.

The attack on workers' rights, the report shows, took precedence, for the number of persons involved and the violence of the repression, over every other aspect of the civil-rights struggle. There were many fewer lynchings than took place in the previous year, the situation has improved with respect to labor injunctions and the censorship of plays and books, the absurd deportation proceedings against John Strachey were dropped by the Department of Labor, and despite the efforts of the D. A. R., the American Legion, the Elks, and William Randolph Hearst, not one of the gag bills has at this writing succeeded in passing both houses of Congress. Of five Supreme Court decisions affecting civil liberty, two have been favorable: the Mooney decision, which may open the prison doors for Tom Mooney after almost two decades; and the Scottsboro decision which demanded a new trial for the defendants on the ground that Negroes were excluded from the jury panel. The court refused to take jurisdiction over the Herndon case; it upheld the right of a state university to demand military training of its students in spite of religious objections; and it upheld also the right of the Democratic Party in Texas to exclude Negroes from the primaries.

The opposition of employers to collective bargaining as provided for under Section 7-a of the NIRA has been the occasion for the fiercest contention between workers and their bosses. With the impetus given organized opposition to labor by the San Francisco general strike in the summer of 1934, the labor war has gone on in California, in the onion fields of Hardin County, Ohio, the truck gardens of southern New Jersey, and among the share-croppers of eastern Arkansas, to name only the high spots in the struggle. Workers' camps have been burned over their heads, union headquarters have been ripped to pieces by vigilante committees, the right to picket has been denied or nullified by the activities of police and in some cases by the militia, demonstrations of the unemployed demanding improvements in relief have been brutally crushed, and workers have paid with their lives for their temerity in attempting to carry out the letter of the federal law which affirmed their right to a labor union.

As an aspect of the labor struggle, an unprecedented number of criminal-syndicalism and sedition cases have come into the courts, the protest of reactionaries against unemployed demonstrations and left-wing unions. Criminal anarchy, criminal syndicalism, and sedition laws were invoked in Arkansas, California, Illinois, Iowa, and Oregon; the State of Georgia revived an ancient insurrection statute for the same purpose. As a result of the most publicized of these trials, that under the criminal-syndicalism law in Sacramento, eight defendants convicted out of seventeen tried are now serving sentences of from one to fourteen years. Attorneys and investigators attempting to aid the cause of workers arrested under criminal-syndicalism laws for strike activities have been kidnapped, run out of town, beaten, and otherwise intimidated. In the case of Robert Minor and David Levinson, seized in Gallup, New Mexico, driven out of town, beaten, and left in the desert, an attempt was made to get the Department of Justice to intervene on the ground that the two men had been taken into federal territory on an Indian reservation. The Attorney General not only denied jurisdiction, but the local authorities declared the kidnapping a hoax to get publicity.

This brief résumé of a pamphlet which should be read by everyone for whom the Bill of Rights is a reality worth defending indicates that the emphasis in the struggle to preserve a true Americanism is changing. A few plays are censored—notably Clifford Odets's "Waiting for Lefty"—the ban has been lifted on almost all books, bills requiring teachers to take loyalty oaths have been passed in twenty states, five Negroes were lynched from January to June, 1935—but these manifestations of reaction and lawlessness, serious as they are, are not the important aspect of the civil-rights battle. Old-fashioned liberals who have never failed to protest against violations of freedom of speech must realize that those violations occur most frequently and most flagrantly on the labor front. In the mines and factories, before the mill gates, in the halls of labor unions where legitimate work is being done in an orderly manner, the Bill of Rights is being violated and traduced by those persons who have taken an oath to defend it. No longer is it possible to assume a sincere, forthright—and detached—championship of civil liberties. The battle is being fought on the picket lines, at labor meetings, in the courts where striking workers must be defended. Journals of opinion like The Nation are forced to concern themselves more and more with labor. Membership in organizations like the American Civil Liberties Union should be increased a hundred-fold. The forces of reaction realize this perfectly well; they are tightening their belts for a struggle in which they clearly see the opposing factions, and which they mean to win with the aid of every government agency they can capture, by force, by money, by strength of numbers. It is heartening to know, as the Civil Liberties Union report shows, that protests are not lacking whenever they are needed. But these protests must be reinforced by many more thousands of persons giving their time, energy, and money if a democratic government in this country is to be preserved.

Making America Safe for Martial Law

THE sedition bill which slipped through the Senate by unanimous consent, now (as HR 5843) is certain to be reported out of committee to the House and will pass, if it comes to a vote. So we are close to the enactment of a bill as dangerous to democracy as anything since the Espionage Act of 1917. The Senate text has been modified by the House Military Affairs Committee. The bill now requires proof of intent on the part of those charged with inciting soldiers and sailors to disobedience. The words "military and naval forces" have been changed to "army and navy," but this alteration is worthless if it is meant to keep the bill from safeguarding martial law, since legally the army includes the national guard. The description "regular" should be inserted before army.

The language of the bill loses its apparent innocence in a study of the Espionage Act and what happened under it, for that act too appeared innocent. But it will be recalled that the Circuit Court of Appeals, overruling Justice Learned Hand in the Masses case, found that "the utterance of words which may cause insubordination" came within the meaning of the statute. The present bill would punish all who "advise or counsel, or publish material which advises or counsels disobedience." So it is left to the courts to decide whether advice and counsel are to be measured by possible results. The insertion of the proof-of-intent clause in the present bill does not save it from being a sweeping denial of freedom of speech. For during the war the courts ruled that intent might be inferred from the reasonable effect of a publication. Thereupon, to quote Chafee's "Freedom of Speech,"

> . . . it became criminal to advocate heavier taxation instead of bond issues, to state that conscription was unconstitutional, though the Supreme Court had not yet held it to be valid, to say that the sinking of merchant vessels was legal, to urge that a referendum should have preceded our declaration of war, to say that war was contrary to the teachings of Christ. Men have been punished for criticizing the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A., while under the Minnesota Espionage Act it has been held a crime to discourage women from knitting by the remark: "No soldier ever sees the socks."

When the Espionage Act was passed the public had no inkling how it would be used, and Congress did not weigh the measure with any understanding of its implications. Nobody foresaw the blight it would prove to genuine Americanism. But now the country has had experience with this kind of "innocent" legislation, and should be on its guard. For the Espionage Act can be pleaded the extenuating circumstances of war and the lunacy it engendered. No such excuse can be offered now. This sedition bill is a clear attempt to lay the broadest possible legal basis for the suppression of free speech and a free press in times of civil disturbance. It is not as though the army and navy have no legal means to punish incitement to mutiny. Both forces have existed without this proposed legislation for a century and a half, and nobody asking for this bill is able to supply the slightest evidence that it is needed for the protection of military and naval discipline. If the national guard is used to break a strike, or if martial law is invoked, any critique of these measures as policies becomes criminal. A newspaper expressing doubt of the wisdom of its elected representatives at such a time can be seized, and its editors fined and imprisoned. It would become criminal merely to object to the presence of troops in a city where there was an industrial conflict. The aim of the bill is better understood, too, in knowing that it is sponsored chiefly by chambers of commerce from all parts of the country, by their agents in Washington, and by the business men's lobby advising the President through Secretary Roper. What they want is plain enough. If it comes to a test of democracy, in which labor seeks to wrest a greater share of economic power from management by withholding its services, business intends to throw the national guard and the courts into its fight to maintain supremacy. This is pure fascism, differing no whit from the familiar technique of Hitler and Mussolini. This fascist bill will pass unless it gets lost in the pressure of legislation at the close of the session. Not enough time remains to wage a nationwide campaign against it. Also it is easy to divert attention from its real purpose by pretending that it applies only to communist agitation in the regular army and navy. The National Publishers' Association, as quick as lightning in defending the freedom of the press when the employment of child labor and union reporters is under discussion, refuses to lift a finger to defeat this bill.

Æ

THE career of George W. Russell (Æ) is among other things a reminder of the fact that a national movement in literature can be international at the same time, and perhaps had better be if it hopes to succeed. The now famous Irish renaissance which got under way during the 1890's has come to be thought of as a purely local affair, and critics of a latter day who deplore the cosmopolitan character of contemporary writing look back with envy at a city, Dublin, which had the courage to cut itself off from other capitals and nourish a deep provincialism.

But Dublin did not cut itself off. Standish O'Grady's passionate "History" was trying to be Homeric, and succeeding; and the particular movement which drew Russell into it around his twenty-fifth year was so far from taking its impetus from native soil as to require the importation from London—yes, London—of a fertilizing mind. The movement was theosophical, and its bible was the books of A. P. Sinnett, the Esoteric Buddhist. When Æ began to publish poems in the Irish Theosophist he was speaking not merely as the Irishman that he was but as one who had ranged the earth for ideas and symbols with which to materialize his vision. "I know I am a spirit," he wrote in the foreword to his first volume, "and that I went forth in old times from the self-ancestral to labors yet unaccomplished; but, filled ever and again with homesickness, I made these homeward songs by the way." It was from the Movement that he had learned about his Ancestral Self, and the Movement had heard about it from the wise men of the East. Thus it was with a cultivated tongue that a man destined to become Ireland's prophet began to speak. With an imagination trained elsewhere Russell commenced a career which was to exhibit him before his death the other day as a poet, a playwright, a story-teller, an editor, a conversationalist, an agricultural economist, a painter, and a political philosopher. And his career was what it was, and Ireland is in part what it is, because he never lost contact with the two poles of his thought, the near and the far, the provincial and the universal, the Irish and the human.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIB.

As a poet Æ has usually been considered with William Butler Yeats the best of his time and place. But he is a very different poet from Yeats, and indubitably inferior. To be sure he has never incurred like Yeats the charge that he was posing; he has never played around among the philosophies; he has not gone through "phases." From first to last he has made his poetry serve a single vision, and the integrity with which he has done this is not the least impressive sign of his sincerity. Yet his endowment has never been one-tenth as brilliant as Yeats's. His "Collected Poems" is a monotonous volume, nowhere brightened by flashes of that felicity which Yeats possesses in a degree unique among his generation. Not merely is Æ invariably mystical, concerning himself from poem to poem with that life within his own life, that Oversoul inside the soul, which he considers it his sole business to search out; he is also invariably twilight in his mood, returning page after page to the same colors and sounds and to the same half-lighted landscape. All of which proves his sincerity rather more clearly than it does his genius. Possibly he is to be more respected than Yeats, and more implicitly believed; but less admired.

His influence while he lived was to a remarkable extent impalpable, and this influence will be the more difficult to measure as time goes on. Much of his best prose has never been collected from the files of the Irish Theosophist, the Internationalist, the Irish Homestead, the Irish Statesman, and other Dublin periodicals. His conversational powers, while there have been many to attest them, will in the nature of things have to go for the most part unrecorded. Padraic Colum has said that Æ seemed to have a "charm to prevent the world from wearying him." His talk was inexhaustible not only in itself but in its ability to stimulate the brains and tongues of others. Yet it must live on in the others rather than in anything which remains of him; just as his effort in the fields of economics and politics must be lost sight of as "progress" goes on and history is made.

Nevertheless he will be remembered in this latter connection as one who always kept himself superior to the moment and above the battle. He was a mystic even when it came to cooperative creameries and credit societies. And on the whole it could not have been bad to live in Ireland thirty years ago when a young patriot was exhorting his people in such words as these:

> Ah, my darlings, you will have to fight and suffer; you must endure loneliness, the coldness of friends, the alienation of love; . . . laying in dark places the foundations of that high and holy Eri of prophecy, the isle of enchantment, burning with druidic splendors, bright with immortal presences, with the face of the everlasting Beauty looking in upon its ways, divine with terrestial mingling till God and the world are one.

Monkey Business

It was just ten years ago that a distinguished American statesman so far forgot that gratitude to his mother which statesmen commonly emphasize as to declare upon the witness stand his inalterable conviction that "man is not a mammal." This is, in other words, the tenth anniversary of the "monkey trial" at Dayton, and though the occasion has not passed unnoticed in the daily press, we have seen no comment upon what is uppermost in our own minds, namely, the sense that the trial was the climax of an epoch which, in wistful retrospect, seems charmingly innocent. The reactionaries of Tennessee were worried about the pernicious doctrine of evolution because they had nothing more serious to worry about.

The only important results of the trial were purely incidental. The champion of orthodoxy died of overeating a few days after he had won a hollow victory, and Mr. Mencken was enabled to compose a classic of American prose entitled "In Memoriam: W. J. B." The high moments in the trial were (1) when Mr. Bryan made the contribution to physiology mentioned above, (2) when a bewildered high-school student testified that he could remember nothing he had been told about evolution except that all life begins as a single cell and then confessed that he had continued to go to church after learning this distressing fact, and (3) when Mr. Mencken fell off a table into the lap of another visiting journalist. As for the anti-evolution law which the trial was supposed to test, it still remains on the statute books but it has not affected the teaching of biology in the state university. The Supreme Court of Tennessee disposed of the matter with characteristic courage by declaring a mistrial on purely technical grounds and then recommending that the case should not be reopened.

Over the entire proceedings brooded the spirit of Mencken. He himself in the flesh was heard to remark that he was having the best time of his life, and there was no reason why he shouldn't have been. This was his America behaving as he had always said that it did. He didn't invent the trial, but if it had not existed already it would have behooved him to invent it. Nothing that he had previously been privileged to report fitted so completely his favorite adjective, "gaudy"; nothing so perfectly illustrated his conception of the typical behavior of Homo Sapiens.

But the trial at Dayton was also a pre-depression phenomenon absolutely inconceivable today. The only threat which the embattled farmers felt was a threat to their traditional orthodoxy. Great lawyers could afford to devote their time to an extravagant junket. Even the principals knew that they were fighting shadows, and the animosities aroused were merely froth. The pleasant custom of "running him out of town" was not resorted to and nobody was lynched. Even the hill-billies were anxious to hear what the opposition had to say, and Mr. Mencken was treated with that respect which is the devil's due. It is not over such intellectual questions that we fight today, and the liberal lawyer will no longer be found having a limeade with the prosecuting attorney at the village soda fountain. Mr. Hays and Mr. Darrow are grimmer now; so, unfortunately, are the forces they oppose.

Issues and Men

Home After Vacation

I HAVE been away on a vacation which actually took me out of the country—that is, I crossed and recrossed the Canadian boundary several times. For nine days in Alaska I was practically without news. But when I got back and received the daily newspapers, there wasn't any doubt whatever that I had returned to this country. For the headlines in the newspapers were the same old familiar ones. I believe I could have spoken most of them before opening the sheets. Sure enough, there they were: "Huey Long Calls Roosevelt a Liar"; "Roosevelt Taxes Scored as Menace by Business Protestants"; "Roosevelt Demands His 'Must' Program"; "Ickes in a Violent Controversy"; "Virgin Islands Scandal Aired"; "Glass Amends Administration Measure"; "Utilities Send Bogus Telegrams to Influence Congress"; evidently all was well and normal under the stars and stripes. But there was further confirmation of this fact: "J. E. Hoover Denounces Those Who Coddle Criminals"; "Department of Justice Declares Arrest of Chief Weyerhaeuser Kidnapper Near"; "Ex-Convict Slain in Streets, Two Seized"; "Two Policemen Killed Chasing Fugitives"; "Two Negroes Lynched in Mississippi"; "Watch on 55,000 Known Criminals Ordered By Commissioner Valentine"; "Special Prosecutor Appointed in New York to Investigate Rackets"; "Treasury Department Announces Impending Nation-wide Drive Against Liquor Violations"—its two-hundreth similar proclamation. Nothing but "normalcy" here, sufficient to delight the heart of any Warren G. Harding. What further proof need there be of our steady march toward law and order and universal happiness?

Then there were the usual disasters. Floods in New York, train wreck in the state of Washington, an earthquake in California, and that other familar natural phenomenon, Nicholas Murray Butler, returning from Europe and giving an earth-shaking interview on peace. Investigation after investigation; inquiry after inquiry. The stupid old public-service corporations making their usual blunders and going about the influencing of public opinion in just the wrong way; reams and reams of sports; the familiar bathing girls and beauty contests in the Sunday rotogravure sections. Industrial strikes, of course, unending, and the Administration announcing once more that it is going to put a lot of people to work and take them off the public relief rolls at some time and some place and somehow, in the near future. Business is going on as usual, with the usual amount of loud grumbling by business. And, alas, from every quarter fresh incidents in the bitter conflict between labor and capital, between liberalism and reaction, between liberty and fascism. No one can doubt that our great Ship of State is on an even keel!

Let me confess that somehow it was a good deal of a shock. I had been sailing on marvelous inland waters, skirting vast glaciers, seeing endless snow-topped mountains, and studying those outlying American fishing and fur towns which cling to their tiny bits of shore line and are cut off from the rest of the continent by impassable mountains or island fastnesses and wide straits. To come back from this fascinating scene to the realities of our everyday social and political struggle, and to realize how slow we are in making headway against the evils which confront us is not possible without considerable sinking of heart. Why is it that we cannot grapple effectively with some of these evils? Is it all due to the profit-making system as increasing numbers think? Somehow I cannot quite feel that. But who could deny that if at first everything did seem to change under the New Deal, little or nothing has actually changed? We are not even clear that we shall retain the social gains which at first seemed certain and secure.

The cynic could not fail to find much that is amusing and depressing in the declarations by a bar association and by Attorney General Cummings that the legal profession is now finally to be purged of its crooks—one serious proposal just made is that no lawyer except a public defender shall be permitted to appear in court to defend criminals. In that way, this reformer declares, we shall get rid of all shyster lawyers by one fell blow. I recall how many times Joseph H. Choate, William H. Taft, and Charles Evans Hughes demanded that the bar be purged and the standards of justice raised, and how year after year nothing happened. Must we wait for a Soviet State to go the advocate of the public defender one better and wipe out the whole legal profession? One also hears reports on one's journeyings that the liquor situation has not been improved by the abolition of prohibition, and that in some states, at least, conditions are much worse than under that discarded system.

Well, according to custom I must end this piece on a cheerful note, or I shall be accused of having an unusually bad attack of the grouch that so often accompanies a return from a particularly restful and helpful vacation. And so I must add in all sincerity that the ferment that we are in is in considerable degree proof of the awakening of large sections of the people to the struggle which is at hand. In Oregon I spent an evening with some fourteen liberals and radicals, all disillusioned followers of the New Deal, who assured me that liberal Oregon was done with F. D. R. and that they were determined to find some other way of expressing themselves at the ballot box than through either of the old parties. Every college campus I visit gives me proof that the young people are considering social problems and political issues, and are thirsting for knowledge about them, as never before in my lifetime. The number of small weeklies springing up in the West as journals of protest also tells the story. This will not avoid the clash or delay it, but it does mean that multitudes will go into it with genuine understanding of much that it signifies and portends.

Oswald Garrison Villard

Life Insurance: The New Offensive Against Policy-Holders

By MORT and E. A. GILBERT

THE life-insurance companies have launched a new offensive against policy-holders. This spring they pushed through the New York State Legislature a new amendment to the existing insurance law. According to Albert Hirst, counsel for the New York State Association of Life Underwriters, "the law aims to prevent twisting [rewriting of policies]. . . . The amendment became necessary because of the rather startling experience that the New York City Association had in the prosecution of a certain Mr. Legg."

The Legg case, unique in many important respects, demands the attention of policy-holders. Mr. Legg, an independent insurance counselor, had advised a policy-holder to buy new insurance policies and cancel his old. The amount of insurance involved was $50,000. Without impairing this protection, the insured, by rewriting, reduced his costs by $728 and retrieved $10,870 in cash. The Mutual Life Insurance Company, from which the business was "twisted," took action against Mr. Legg. He was indicted for alleged violation of the state "anti-twisting" law, enacted in 1892, amended in 1923, and never enforced. The companies had never utilized the law in order to curb twisting because, contrary to popular conception, it is not an "anti-twisting" law at all. It merely declares it a misdemeanor to ". . . make any misleading representation or incomplete comparison of policies for the purpose of inducing [a policy-holder] to lapse or surrender his insurance."

By invariably referring to this law—and to similar laws in other states—as an "anti-twisting" law the companies have prejudiced policy-holders and intimidated agents. Thanks to the flood of company propaganda against rewriting, both the insured public and the soliciting agent are convinced that the practice is illegal. Rarely do the companies attempt to use the law as anything more than a threat. In Pennsylvania, for example, where an "anti-twisting" law has been on the statute books since 1921, not a single case has been tried under it, the companies being afraid even to test the law. Undaunted, certain companies in New York State determined to misuse the law to prevent Mr. Legg or anyone else from giving policy-holders further aid.

In the case of The People vs. Legg et al. (1931-32), the court had to decide whether Mr. Legg, in suggesting a rewrite, had resorted to "misleading representation and incomplete comparison of policies." The decision was based, of course, upon the consequences of the rewrite. Did the policy-holder gain or lose by the transaction? The perennial contention of the companies is that the insured "almost always loses." In keeping with this contention, they insisted that the twister must have violated the law, since only by misrepresentation could a policy-holder be induced to rewrite. If, on the other hand, the advantages promised by Mr. Legg were genuine, there could have been no material misrepresentation. Moreover, if he had no need to misrepresent, the implications are of tremendous significance in that they impugn the fundamental honesty of life insurance. Can policy-holders advantageously substitute new policies for old? If they can, we must conclude that the latter are basically unsound, that the overpayments, presumably for savings, made by the insured are not returned by the company at his death. For the most important effect of a rewrite is that the policy-holder salvages his overpayments.

The case finally reached the New York State Supreme Court. We will follow it through. Mr. Legg's contentions were taken from a statement he had submitted to the policy-holder, explaining and summarizing the replacement of policies. The Mutual Life Insurance Company had secured this statement and relied upon it as sufficient evidence to convict. The alleged misrepresentations in the statements were pointed out by an expert analyst, Joseph B. Maclean, associate actuary of the Mutual Life; his indictment included eight separate counts. The majority opinion of the Supreme Court was written by Justice Alfred H. Townley.

Legg, referring in his statement to the cash-surrender value of the policy, amounting to $10,870, had said, "You receive none of the earnings from this equity." Maclean claimed misrepresentation in that ". . . the insured received all of the interest earnings from the equity of the policy . . . part of it in cash as a dividend, and part of it as an increase in the cash value." The court held that Legg's statement was not open to that construction. In the words of Justice Townley:

> The statement itself in estimating the net insurance premiums upon the existing policy allows a credit of $570 for dividends. . . . The obvious intent of the representation was that, until the insured had taken the cash-surrender value of his policies, none of the income thereof would be available to him for any use outside of his insurance policies. . . . Taken as intended this statement was true.

(It is curious to note that Mr. Maclean, in an article published in the Eastern Underwriter, October 7, 1927, had presaged the court's opinion: "Part of the cost [to the insured] where the policy has a cash-surrender value is represented by interest on that value. . . . The company actually holds the amount of the cash value and earns interest upon it which is not paid to the policy-holder. The insured, therefore, pays over the interest on his cash value just as clearly as if he held the cash value himself, earned interest upon it, and paid the interest to the company.")

Legg further contended that "in case of death, this equity, $10,870, is a loss to your estate." The company, aware that the fundamental principles of life insurance were at stake, tried to establish misrepresentation: "The equity of a policy is not a loss [to the insured] in the event of death, since it forms a part of the amount of the insurance, and, in fact, was the whole basis of the level-premium life insurance under which both the Prudential [which issued the new policy] and the Mutual operate." The court was not taken in by actuarial sleight-of-hand; its interpretation is in effect a recommendation of twisting:

> This statement [Legg's] is literally true. In case of death the insured would only receive the face of the policy [$50,000], and would receive nothing more. . . . By surrendering the existing policies and taking out new straight-life policies, the insured would have insurance for the same amount, and at death would receive the face of the policies and have $10,870 in addition thereto, which would not be true if the present policies remained in force.

The remaining six counts of the indictment are not distinguished by their appeal to reason. We cite the opinion of the court on only two of them:

> The fifth alleged misrepresentation is the sentence, "In case of total disability prior to age sixty, you pay no more premiums." This is claimed to be false because suspension of premiums only occurred in case the total disability is permanent. That anyone would have understood it any other way seems incredible. The trivial character of this claim fairly indicates the spirit in which the criticism of this statement was undertaken.
>
> The eighth alleged misrepresentation is that the words "Net Annual Cost" at the end of the summary implied that the amounts . . . were payable for the same length of time. That anyone could possibly understand that a twenty-payment life policy with only ten more payments due would require the payment of premiums for the same period of time as a straight life policy is inconceivable.

We will skip the other four counts. Lest we be suspected of stacking the cards against the companies, we quote the Supreme Court's summation of the entire case:

> These alleged misrepresentations taken as a whole reflect nothing but a hypocritical examination of these statements [Legg's] undertaken in the hope that in a multitude of trivial criticisms might be found enough substance to support the charge made against these defendants. They are wholly insufficient to support the charge of misrepresentation, or to indicate any criminal intent on the part of the defendants. . . . The statements relied on by the people [vide Mutual Life Insurance Company] to sustain this conviction [of Legg in the lower court] concerned minor details and incidents connected with the insurance contracts which did not affect or destroy the substantial merit of the suggestion made by the defendants to the insured with respect to his policies. . . . The judgment should be reversed, the information dismissed, and the appellants [Legg et al.] discharged.

It is significant that the minority of the Supreme Court could dissent only by accepting Mr. Maclean's testimony in toto without the slightest investigation of its validity. Justice Francis Martin, who wrote the dissenting opinion, seemed to hold that Mr. Legg's manner of approach to his client was enough to convict him. According to Justice Martin:

> The indirect method of approaching the subject indicated that they [Legg, his associate, Stapler, and the insurance agent, Anderson, who was acquitted in the lower court] were not frank in presenting the proposition, and that it was being carried out through fraud and deceit. The attempt of these defendants to avoid each other while carrying out the details of the transaction and their failure to disclose their connection or identity emphasize the fact that they knew they were attempting to carry out a scheme or transaction which was forbidden by the insurance law.

Rich in unconscious humor, Justice Martin's opinion fails to mention the inexorable fate of agents who twist openly. Legg's "indirect method" was patently an effort to protect the agent from the wrath of his company.

Beyond doubt, the outcome of the Legg case was, as Mr. Hirst called it, a "rather startling experience" for the companies. This precedent materially weakened the effectiveness of the existing law as a threat; hence the need for the amendment. Intended to reinforce the "anti-twisting" law, to make it more difficult for policy-holders to obtain help, the provisions of the amendment merit scrutiny. First, the amendment forbids the issuance of any illustration which misrepresents the conditions of any policy or falsely estimates dividends. No one can quarrel with that. A true representation usually makes an overwhelming case in favor of a rewrite. Second, it prohibits misleading representations as to the standing of any insurance company or of the legal-reserve system. An unstable system based upon fundamentally unsound principles cannot be perpetuated by legal benediction. Third, the amendment debars incomplete comparisons, that is, comparisons which do not include net premiums and gross premiums, growth of the theoretical cash value, disability and all other benefits, for the duration of the contract according to the expectation of life; to be complete, the comparison must mention possible differences as to amount or period of premium payment, including differences in incontestability and suicide clauses. The transparent intent of the companies is to compel twisters to analyze policies from a specious, actuarial point of view in the hope that, owing to limited knowledge, the policyholder will be "taken in." Furthermore, the twister is obligated to warn the insured that under the terms of the new insurance he must postpone committing suicide for two years!

A revealing light on the foregoing provisions is cast by the one which stipulates that the policy-holder is not presumed to know the contents of his policies. The companies seem unaware that their request for this provision is tantamount to an auto-indictment. Had the agent who sold the original insurance given "complete representation," had he presented "complete comparisons" with other forms of insurance, the policy-holder could not be ignorant of the conditions in his existing contract. Moreover, the chances are that he would not have purchased it had he known them.

The real significance of the amendment is in its intentions and implications. Despite the "substantial merit" of rewriting, the companies are intensifying their campaign against it. Insurance is inordinately overwritten; nine policies out of every ten taken out are lapsed or surrendered, only one being carried to its intended completion. Behind the statistical computation of the enormous lapse ratio lie the unrecorded tragic case histories of unprotected dependents. Yet the companies persist in their indifference to the plight of their policy-holders. Little concerned with the original purpose of life insurance, they have become simply big-business outfits disguised as mutual benevolent institutions, each controlled by a self-perpetuating management. In theory, policy-holders own their companies. Unless they establish and assert their ownership, there will be serious repercussions in life insurance.

The Sabotage of the Leviathan

By PETER EHLERS

THE ship-subsidy racket flourishes under the New Deal as under the old. Despite Senator Copeland's whitewash of the Department of Commerce on the Mitchell charges, the department is working hand in glove with the same shipping executives who drove a bung into the Treasury under Coolidge and Hoover.

The peak of interest in the three-day investigation by Senator Copeland's Commerce Committee came at the final session, when the Leviathan lay-up was disposed of. Mr. Mitchell's poorly considered and loosely worded charges were generally accepted as duds after the first day's hearings—that is, all but the Leviathan charge. (He had written to President Roosevelt that "Secretary Roper recently has executed the contract involving the permanent lay-up of the Leviathan, which results in Vincent Astor, Kermit Roosevelt, the Franklins [P. A. S. and his son John M.], and other stockholders of the International Mercantile Marine Corporation being relieved of paying $1,720,000 justly due the government, without any consideration whatsoever for such release.") The vessel and the numerous deals involving her, from the close of the war on, have been a constant subject of sotto voce conversation among shipping men in New York and Washington. Secretary Roper, therefore, took no chances. He appeared at the final hearings with a long string of Commerce Department subordinates laden with data in refutation.

Roper testified that the vessel was "unseaworthy" and that "fear existed in the minds of passengers on these trips as to the safety of the Leviathan, some alleging it was a firetrap"—a serious charge, and one that might well have been looked into immediately by the Steamboat Inspection Bureau. He called Mitchell's figure of $1,720,000 "purely imaginary," and ended by expressing enthusiasm for the proposal that the Leviathan be made into a school for training sea personnel.

James Craig Peacock, director of the Shipping Board Bureau, was the principal witness really acquainted with the facts. He explained that the International Mercantile Marine lost money every time it ran the ship. At the close of the season last year the New York Times printed the company's claim that it had lost $500,000 from the five voyages. Peacock put the loss at $741,000. He went on to describe the new lay-up plan as "a fifty-fifty split" whereby the government assumes half the estimated loss on the vessel in return for a promise by the I. M. M. to build a new cabin liner of the Manhattan-Washington type. Withdrawal of the Leviathan from operation, he told the committee, was a "sound proposition" from the standpoint of the government.

Senator Copeland, after telling newspapermen not to "take any stock in rumors that ship-subsidy legislation will not be enacted at this session," declared: "So far as I have any influence with the government, we will never operate the Leviathan."

Both Peacock and Roper denied that the lay-up contract had been executed at the direction of the President, but said that the President had approved it. Just before the contract was signed, in fact, President Roosevelt was reported at a press conference as "losing patience" with its critics. The President reiterated his approval while the Copeland hearings were progressing. According to the Times, he "regarded it as silly to cause a company to take a certain loss provided they would take the expected loss and devote it to building new ships." A wholly one-sided case, it would appear. A shipping firm contracted with the government to operate a vessel a certain number of voyages per season. The vessel lost money. Why not, then, lay her up, take the money that would have been lost, and put it toward the building of a new ship, to the greater splendor of the American merchant marine?

These would seem to be all the facts—but they are not. The whole story of the Leviathan involves, besides the lay-up contract executed this spring: (1) an unsuccessful attempt to take the vessel out of service last spring; (2) the contract by which the International Mercantile Marine took over the United States Lines from the so-called Chapman interests in 1931; and (3) the contract by which the Chapman interests took over the United States Lines from the government in 1929. It is simplest to start with the last mentioned point and work up chronologically.

In 1929, after the Jones-White act had been passed and mail subsidies instituted, the government put up for sale its choicest ships. This was in direct compliance with the "take the government out of business" cry set up by the shipping propagandists as soon as it had become clear that there would be more profit in the mail contracts than in the previous, and none too stingy, managing-operator contracts for government-owned vessels. P. W. Chapman, a Chicago banker, working with Joseph Sheedy, a former Shipping Board official, entered a high bid of $16,500,000 for the Leviathan, Republic, George Washington, America, President Harding, President Roosevelt, and a fleet of five American Merchant liners. Chapman paid about $4,000,000 down and gave the government a mortgage for the remainder. While this deal was an almost incredible gift to him, it should be remembered that the professional ship operators were in such a sanguine state of mind that the highest bid offered by any one of them was only $10,000,000—for eleven transatlantic vessels, including the largest ship afloat! These professional operators at once got to work to put the skids under the Middle Western outsider. With the help of Postmaster General Brown, Secretary of Commerce Lamont, and Lawrence Richey, Hoover's closest secretary, who sent an unsigned memorandum to the Shipping Board, they succeeded in ousting Sheedy as operating chief of the Chapman lines; and as Chapman knew almost nothing about shipping he soon found himself suffering heavy losses and in financial hot water, especially in the matter of the Manhattan and the Washington, which were at the time building in Camden with the government putting up three-quarters of the cost. The Shipping Board then prepared to auction off the fleet again—less the old George Washington, the America, and the Republic, which were taken back by the government; this left the Shipping Board's equity in the reduced fleet at $8,457,000—the amount, that is, that was unpaid from the sale price of $16,500,000. This $8,000,000 is a key figure in what follows.

Two groups bid for the liners. On the one hand was the powerful International Mercantile Marine, headed by P. A. S. Franklin. On the other were Western shipping and banking interests, including R. Stanley Dollar, of the Dollar Steamship Company, Herbert Fleishhacker, and Kenneth D. Dawson. Chapman, in a surprise move, lined up the Western interests and put in the high bid. But it was said that it failed to comply with specifications, and the I. M. M. forthwith claimed the ships. Fleishhacker went to President Hoover, and as a result the Shipping Board commenced private negotiations with Mr. Dollar. But these were stopped by the late James Francis Burke, lawyer for the I. M. M., secretary of the Republican National Committee, and close friend of the President. Hoover was in the middle. It was then suggested that the rival groups go to a hotel room and "get together"! Bids were changed, and in the wrangle Chapman was eased out.

The upshot was that the I. M. M. got the ships for a new company, the United States Lines, in which the Dollar group took a large block of securities. The total price paid was only $3,170,000! The government wrote down its equity about $5,000,000 and made a gift of this sum to the I. M. M. Nor was this all. First, the interest rate was cut to one-half of 1 per cent. Second, the I. M. M. was not required to pay a penny of interest for three years. Third, it did not have to pay a penny of principal for three years. Fourth, it was given the half-built Manhattan and Washington, started by Chapman. (The United States Lines, for all its prating about building up the American merchant marine, has not laid a single keel since the construction subsidy became available.) Fifth, the $500,000 mortgage interest that had accrued under the Chapman management was canceled. It should be added that through June 30, 1933—that is, before the I. M. M. had paid the government a dime—a total of more than $6,000,000 was paid out by the government in mail-contract subsidies, twice the amount of the fleet purchase!

The important thing here is that during all the negotiations the Shipping Board was adamant on one point: the consideration for the I. M. M.'s being given the fleet so cheaply was that the Leviathan must be run. There was never the slightest doubt that she would lose money. Testimony in the Black Ocean Mail Committee hearings by the I. M. M. officials bears this out as follows:

> SENATOR BLACK: The Leviathan was taken over with a definite understanding about it?
>
> R. M. HICKS [I. M. M. lawyer]: If you had not agreed to operate the Leviathan and knew you were going to operate her at a loss, you would have had to pay more than the $3,000,000 for the note [that is, the I. M. M. would not have been given the $5,000,000 write-down]. [Page 4,104.]
>
> JOHN M. FRANKLIN: We said before we bought the line, which is exactly what we did say, the Leviathan losses would be very heavy, and that was one reason we got the fleet so cheaply. [Page 4,146.]
>
> P. A. S. FRANKLIN: There isn't any question or doubt that the payment was reduced on the understanding the Leviathan would be taken. [Page 3,785.]

The contract provided that the giant liner be run seven voyages a year for five years (1931-36), with the option of omitting up to two voyages each year on the payment to the government of $10,000 per voyage. In addition, there were large forfeitures to be paid for total non-operation of the vessel. It is partly upon these that Mitchell bases his $1,720,000 loss to the government; the figure is disputed, but it will be shown later that, if anything, it is too small.

The contract was executed at the end of 1931, and hence only one voyage was made in that year, as was provided for. In the summer of 1932 the Leviathan made all her seven voyages. Then the I. M. M. made an additional contract to run the ship eight extra voyages through the winter of 1932-33. The contract's validity was challenged by the Comptroller General. Moreover, it was charged that the I. M. M. was seeking to pile up the Leviathan's losses during the lean winter season so that the government might permit her withdrawal, which would remove her from competition with her sister ship, the Majestic, of the British White Star Line, in which the I. M. M. had a heavy interest (while receiving subsidies for building up the American merchant marine). It is noteworthy that when the I. M. M. got the vessel from the Chapman company it at once changed her destination to Bremen, which put her in direct competition with the Europa and Bremen and removed her as a competitor of the Majestic.

After the unprofitable extra voyages during the winter of 1932-33, the company received permission from the retiring Hoover Shipping Board to take the vessel out of service. In the spring of 1934 the I. M. M. again applied for lay-up permission from the Roosevelt Shipping Board Bureau, for, despite the unsupportable action of the Hoover board the year before, the 1931 contract was still in effect and the vessel was supposed to run. At that time Henry H. Heimann, executive manager of the National Association of Retail Credit Men, was director of the bureau. Previously Heimann had been head of the shipping subcommittee of Roper's Business Advisory and Planning Council. On being made head of the Shipping Board Bureau he wrote a memorandum to Roper approving the lay-up. Roper himself was reported, after I. M. M. officials had called on him, as favoring the proposal. But the move was blocked by Thomas M. Woodward, who with Heimann and Admiral Hutch I. Cone formed a sort of executive board in the bureau. Shipping executives would love to have Woodward's scalp; he has upset their apple-cart on many occasions. In a minute and almost unanswerable memorandum to Roper, Woodward took up P. A. S. Franklin's arguments for the lay-up and one by one let the sawdust out of them. Roper ordered the Leviathan to run. The memorandum was never given to the press, and was inserted into the record of the Black committee in the last few minutes of the hearings. Inasmuch as the I. M. M. offered the same arguments this spring as last—with one difference—the document is pertinent now.

The gist of the I. M. M. proposal was that the Leviathan stood to lose $500,000 during each of the three contract years then remaining, and that the I. M. M. would take this

$1,500,000, add to it $500,000 of new money plus the $500,000 it had saved through the non-operation in 1933 allowed by the Hoover Shipping Board, and undertake to build a new $10,000,000 vessel of the Manhattan-Washington type, if the government would loan it the remaining $7,500,000 under the construction-loan terms of the Jones-White act of 1928. In short, it asked the government to sacrifice the prestige of the American merchant marine contracted for in 1931, when, as has been shown, a whole fleet was virtually given away with the operation of the Leviathan the chief consideration. The presumption of the I. M. M.'s demand is heightened by the fact that the Jones-White construction-loan law was in itself a means of obtaining favors from the government. The law was extremely generous and led to loans that will probably never be collected. President Roosevelt has denounced the construction-loan principle, but it is included in the new Bland-Copeland subsidy bill. In support of its proposal the I. M. M. argued (1) that the Leviathan was twenty years old; (2) that unless there were a vast increase in transatlantic travel she would always be operated at a loss; (3) that she could not compete with the more modern sea giants—it was alleged that she pushed tons of water before her by reason of her design, and was therefore too slow.

These claims can be almost entirely refuted. Although the Leviathan is twenty years old, she was reconditioned by the government in 1921 at a cost of nearly $10,000,000, which added ten years to her life, so that she will be good until 1942. Probably the vessel will always be operated at a loss. P. A. S. Franklin's estimate of that loss at the time his firm bought the ships was $700,000 a year. Note however, that when it came to drawing money out of the I. M. M. till, the estimate, in the construction-loan proposal, was $500,000. But it is worth while to look farther. The total gross loss of the Leviathan for the sixteen voyages she made under the I. M. M., until the spring of 1934—including the eight off-season voyages during the winter of 1932-33—was actually only $625,016, less than that estimated for a single season, and all this during the worst of the depression. What is more, the $625,016 figure is padded in that the Roosevelt Steamship Company, a subsidiary of the I. M. M., milked the United States Lines of a commission charge of more than $27,000 per voyage. Still more, "excessive intercompany charges, commissions [other than that of the Roosevelt Company], and wharfage helped to swell the losses of the United States Lines," according to Woodward. And further, the claimed loss on the Leviathan was $40,751 per voyage, yet from April, 1929, to December, 1931, the Chapman group operated her for forty voyages and realized a gross profit of $2,809,819, or $70,245 per voyage. In 1931, before I. M. M. operation, the Leviathan carried more passengers than any other ship except the Bremen and Europa, and carried more first-class passengers than either of those vessels.

As to the ship's inability to compete with "speedy, modern monster steamers," as Kermit Roosevelt calls them, there is a good deal of argument. It is true that she is not fitted out in the penthouse style of the Normandie. But that she is necessarily slow by reason of her design is not true. The ship, according to Woodward:

> . . . was designed for standard commercial maximum speed of 30 knots, but is capable of doing substantially more without injury to hull or frame [on her first voyage the Normandie averaged 29.68 knots and her top speed was 32 knots]; she is designed, and is the outstanding example of such design, on the seaplane principle . . . instead of pushing before her tons of water, as suggested by Mr. Franklin, the faster she goes the more she will rise out of the water . . . her original design has been changed and rendered much less efficient by the wrong location of wing tanks which have tended to unbalance the stem-to-stern position in that the tanks as now placed make her sink head down when all tanks are full. In addition, the propellor blades now on the Leviathan are not the type originally designed for the vessel, and not so efficient.

The last two assertions would be a good subject for a Congressional investigation.

When the I. M. M. officials applied for a lay-up this year, the situation and the arguments, as has been stated, were the same as in 1934, with one exception. This spring they stood to save two years' losses instead of three, and instead of offering to put in escrow for construction of a new ship $1,500,000 ($500,000 for each year of the three years), they offered only $500,000. According to their proposal of last spring, they should offer twice $500,000—based on their original 1931 estimate, it should be twice $700,000. And this, one concludes, is what James Craig Peacock, present head of the Shipping Board Bureau, meant when he said the arrangement was a "fifty-fifty split."

The government subsidized the United States Lines partly, as the shipping propagandists never weary of repeating, to "compensate for the difference between foreign and domestic operation [labor] costs." Yet the Black committee discovered that in 1933 at the beginning of the Roosevelt Administration, when the committee had just begun its disclosures and the shipping people, fearful of contract cancelation, were sending out a flood of press releases on the above theme, 24.81 per cent of the employees of the United States Lines were "first-papers" foreigners, that is, men who are still essentially foreigners and are accustomed to working sixteen hours a day.

To sum up, in its transactions involving the Leviathan and the I. M. M. the government (1) failed to obtain the full benefit that was to accrue to American labor; (2) gave away five million dollars in the 1931 write-down; (3) signed away the merchant-marine prestige that went with operation of the Leviathan in the summer of 1932 and subsequently; (4) allowed the I. M. M. to save $2,100,000 estimated losses in those years, on the figures of Franklin himself; (5) paid the United States Lines more than $10,000,000 in mail subsidies after 1931, to say nothing of the subsidies to other I. M. M. affiliates—the Baltimore Mail Line, the Panama Pacific, and the American Pioneer.

What valid excuse, then, did Secretary Roper have to reopen, this spring, the Leviathan lay-up negotiations? The only point brought out at the Copeland hearings that might have warranted such a move was Roper's claim of "reports of passengers" that the ship is "unseaworthy" and a "firetrap." And Roper stressed the losses of the ship more than the "unseaworthiness." I have it on the authority of an expert well acquainted with the entire Leviathan situation that there is no basis whatever for the firetrap theory. And if the Leviathan is a firetrap, then so is her sister ship, the Majestic, which the British have seen fit to continue in operation.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

Who Gets Supplementary Relief?

By C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

WHO gets supplementary relief? Relief administrators, with their minds and eyes closed, say one group. The facts show that another and entirely different group is aided. Taking the nation as a whole, about one-sixth of the households on relief have one or more members holding jobs with private employers. The fact that these households are on the rolls clearly implies that the earnings of employed members are not, singly or jointly, sufficient to enable them to purchase the minimum-subsistence living allowed relief clients. Since that living is of an appallingly low standard, to require supplementary relief and to obtain it simply means that the worker's earnings are almost infinitesimal when placed against his responsibilities.

The outstanding factors in this situation as it is viewed by the relief administrators are three: (1) low wages; (2) underemployment; and (3) family responsibilities. While theoretically no worker is accepted for relief who is working full time, no matter how insufficient his earnings, practically this prohibition is not observed in all instances, for on humanitarian grounds it must occasionally be ignored. By and large, underemployment at low rates of pay, combined with large family responsibilities, explains most of the cases. While it is not possible to review the situation in detail, since the extent of supplementation varies not only from city to city and section to section but also, and most importantly, from family to family, it is nevertheless possible to obtain some enlightening glimpses of the nature of the problem. Take a notoriously high-profit industry like tobacco. A study made in Winston-Salem, Durham, and Richmond showed that about one-eighth of the households on relief included tobacco workers. Of these, 29 per cent "had some employment during November (1934) and also received relief during that month," but "whatever the size of the family, earnings were insufficient for minimum subsistence according to the relief standards in the cities in question." Here is a condensed picture of the situation:

	Households with one person working	Households with two or more persons working
Median number of days worked	16.3	30
Earnings per month	$21.91	$42.91
Median number of persons dependent	4.4	4.7
Relief received	$11.58	$14.66

A little calculation will reveal that several important points are concealed in these figures. Since the "two or more persons" data cannot be analyzed, let us take the "one person working" household. Assuming that a normal working month is four six-day weeks, or twenty-four days, these figures clearly show that at full time the worker could earn but $29.21, or $4.28 less than the relief standard of $33.49 for minimum subsistence. In short, the tobacco industry, with its huge profits, cannot afford to pay its unskilled workers (mostly Negro females in this instance) wages equal to relief—approximately $8.36 for a six-day week. This is the most revelatory study yet made, but additional light on how much the relief households earn is available.

In Dayton, Ohio, it was discovered that 98 per cent of the households receiving supplementary relief had incomes of less than $20 a week—usually much less. A study made in Philadelphia, the results of which are reported in a somewhat different fashion, showed that of 10,358 families on direct relief whose situation was analyzed, 4,092 had non-relief incomes in the week studied to a total of $14,167.19. The total budget was $120,951.19, leaving a deficiency made up out of relief funds of $106,784. Finally, as to the extent of the problem in various cities, it is known that in Bridgeport and Baltimore in May, 1934, 22 per cent of the relief households had non-relief earnings, in Chicago 13 per cent, and in Seattle 6 per cent. The average earnings per person in the household varied from $3.16 per week in Baltimore to $1.78 in Chicago. Obviously these incomes required supplementation. As to rural conditions, a study of incomes in scattered farm areas brought out that relief households other than those of farm operators, with members employed in October, 1933, had incomes of $32 a month for whites and $23 for Negroes. Such cases were necessarily receiving supplementary aid also.

These facts were turned up by research workers taking an official and exceedingly blinkered view of the situation, and in themselves provide a complete justification for a humanitarian policy. The official notion is that it is the worker who is getting supplementary relief. This is hardly an accurate statement of the situation. The person whose income is supplemented is the employer. It is by this "humanitarian" device that the employing class chisels in on the relief funds—the only funds distributed by the Roosevelt Administration which have directly benefited the masses of the people.

From any sensible and civilized point of view the maintenance of the population is a legitimate charge upon the economy of the nation. Under present conditions that economy is in the hands of private owners. Except in rare instances—one of which will be discussed below—the private owners of industry have not taken general responsibility for the workers and their dependents. In times past the workers, when in difficulties, have been shifted to the care of private charities or to the care of the state as provided by various kinds of social legislation. During the present depression the federal government has underwritten unemployment relief by design, and by accident has picked up thousands of casualties who more properly require other kinds of aid not currently available. The government is more and more coming to carry the burden of taking care of those who, for one reason or another but chiefly because no work is available, cannot maintain themselves. It gets the money to perform the job from taxes. Indirectly, then, private ownership takes care of the casualties of our economy. But only indirectly—and never completely. How incompletely it takes care of unemployment cases—the vast majority of those now receiving federal funds—can be seen by comparing the probable wage loss of the workers since the beginning of the depression with the amount of relief paid out. The difference will run into eleven figures and represents the extent to which private ownership has received public aid from this particular source. In the case of what is technically known as "supplementary relief" it is possible to see the process unmistakably at work—without concealment.

It is because so much confusion exists in the minds of the specialists in relief problems that this fairly elementary point may strike the reader as a novelty. Loose thinking has resulted in the separation of the economy and the state in spite of the obvious dependence of the latter on the former for funds. It is but infrequently perceived that when the state assumes burdens properly chargeable to the private owners of the economy it is, in effect, subsidizing the owners. By relieving them of the necessity of maintaining workers formerly attached to their industries, it at one and the same time protects property from the assaults of the dispossessed and protects the profits, or drastically reduces the losses, of the owners. Thus relief becomes, under present arrangements, only to a minimum degree a humanitarian enterprise ("Nobody shall starve"), for it is to a far greater degree a method of propping up the system of private ownership. This is most clearly apparent in the case of "supplementary relief." The employers allege that they cannot pay higher wages or employ the workers for longer hours because it would make operations unprofitable. (This is an obvious lie in the case of tobacco, but let that pass.) They thus compel the relief administration to provide the difference between what they choose to pay the workers they employ at all and minimum subsistence. The relief administrator, by maintaining the workers, gives a direct subsidy to employers.

The fate of the Southern share-croppers clearly illustrates how agricultural employers, for many years directly responsible for their workers, have gone about acquiring the traditional prerogatives of industrial employers. From the close of the Civil War until just the other day share-cropping involved the provision to the cropper by the landlord of "furnish" (goods and services) sufficient for a full year. As the system has fallen into decay, this has become a burden to the landlord from which he has attempted to escape. Several methods have been used, one of which is to force the share-cropper into the status of a landless day laborer paid only when he works and hence responsible for his own "furnish"; another is to refuse "furnish" to all members of the cropper's family who cannot work—thus cutting off from subsistence the very young, the very old, the ill, and the handicapped members of the household; and the third is to supply "furnish" only during that part of the year in which the cropper's labor is indispensable for production. The refuge of the cropper subjected to these policies has been the relief office. When no day labor is obtainable and resources are exhausted, or when non-workers cannot be cared for from household earnings, the croppers go on relief, and the landlord thereby derives a subsidy from federal funds and is on a par with the steel, coal, copper, tobacco, and automobile barons.

In the share-cropping and other agricultural areas where low pay is notoriously the rule, it becomes quite a problem in the busy season to get the workers off relief, for a better living may be had on relief than off—to the eternal disgrace of the owning class. In such circumstances the collusion between the local relief administrators and the landlords emerges into the open. For while the latter will not pay decent wages and keep the workers off relief altogether, the former have no scruples about supporting low wage scales by excluding the workers from relief during those seasons when the miserably paid work is available. In effect, relief is used to maintain a cheap working force for the landlords. How this is arranged is clearly revealed by a proposed "solution" of the farm-labor problem in Gloucester County, in South Jersey, as printed in the Woodbury, New Jersey, Evening News, April 3, 1935. The four-point program follows:

> 1. Put relief matters up to the local municipalities with responsibility centered in the hands of those knowing the needs of those in that community.
> 2. Stop relief in rural communities during the growing season.
> 3. Employment needs of the farmers to be supplied through the county relief offices.
> 4. Lowering of relief so that the unemployed will be spurred to accept positions when offered.

Usually, however, the arrangement is tacit and not open. In fact, the South Jersey cooperative scheme was scotched as an open arrangement, but it is probably being carried out secretly. Such a program was carried through in the tobacco regions of North Carolina last year, where tobacco growing as well as tobacco manufacturing is subsidized by relief. The technique has been applied in the Colorado beet country, in Michigan, and in strawberry-growing regions as well.

Thus the euphemism that it is the relief client who gets supplementary aid plainly breaks down under analysis. The question is one that is likely to become more and more acute during the next few months. As the pious efforts to keep to NRA code wages and hours collapse under the drum-fire of competition, two things will happen: there will be an increase in unemployment because fewer people will work longer hours; and there will be a rise in the relief load. Part of the increase will consist of completely dependent households; part will be cases where low pay will require "supplementation." The relief authorities will necessarily be forced to care for the completely dependent, but how will they solve the problem of supplementation? Douglas Falconer of the New York City Home Relief Bureau has indicated the probable line: Since sufficiently great increases in relief appropriations cannot be anticipated, cases now on the rolls will be thrown off if the household income is as much as $5 a week; and naturally no new cases will be accepted if the income equals that amount. This will automatically cut by more than one-half the relief standard in New York City, where the average allowance in December, 1934, was $48.38, for if this $20 standard is applied to supplementation cases, how long will the completely dependent families escape the ax? Thus the pressure of supplementation may wreck even the current disastrously low standards of relief. The chiseling of employers, combined with the responsible administrators' unclear conception of just what relief—particularly supplementary relief—is, will make a further contribution to what the employers seem hell-bent on achieving—low wages and low living standards for the working class. It is imperative that the situation be seen in a clear light in order that the blame may be placed where it belongs. Nowhere is the light murkier than where relief officials solemnly gather.

Books in Germany

By I. A. LEVITAN

SATURDAY afternoon in Berlin. The day's work is done and I walk aimlessly through the streets. I enter a bookstore in an old, dilapidated building. A man of about seventy with a long white beard greets me. I look around the half-empty shelves. Few good books are there; in the main there are only theological volumes and cheap novels. Though the books do not interest me I want to talk to the old man. I hesitate; one seldom speaks to strangers. "You do not have many interesting books," I venture.

"No, not many," he replies in a slow, meditative tone. "But where will you find interesting books now? Nobody cares for books any longer, or those who still care are ashamed to admit it. I would not be able to sell good books if I had any. Besides, the best books are prohibited."

I am astonished at the bravery of the old man; to speak so freely to an utter stranger! A storm trooper walks up and looks in the window. I point to him and ask the old man to speak more quietly.

"I am not afraid of anyone," he snaps back at me angrily. "I am an old man, over seventy. I have lived my life, and all my life has been associated with books. Only two years ago I had three of the largest bookstores in the city, with a stock worth well over a million marks. Only two years ago I had an international reputation. Book collectors and librarians the world over knew my firm and I supplied them with the rarest books. What have I today? This little shop which my Jewish landlord permits me to keep though the rent for the last six months is still unpaid. Why should I fear? My reputation, my name, my life accomplishments are ruined. Should I fear for my life? A man over seventy does not do that. What have I in this world? How can I sell books? To whom? The best books may not be sold; the internal market is ruined; foreign purchasers refuse to buy from us."

In the building where I lived there was a bookstore and lending library on the first floor when I moved in; it was gone before I had to leave. One evening I dropped into the shop. It was a mess. Books lay all over the floor; the proprietor and his young daughter looked frantic. "What is the matter?" I asked casually.

"What is the matter? Man, life is becoming impossible. First, when this government came to power, they confiscated the best-sellers. Well, that I could understand. They were socialist and communist books—propaganda, theory, and books about the Soviet Union. But now new prohibitions are announced every day. One does not know where one is. S. A. men just invaded my store and confiscated twenty-eight books, works by Strasser, Röhm, and other former leaders. And the robbers even wanted me to sign a paper saying that I was donating these books of my own free will, for the good of the fatherland, I suppose."

"And father refused to sign," the girl interrupted. "He is so stubborn. He will end in a concentration camp."

"Well, why not? Our present income might suffice for you alone; now it has to feed two. For the last four months we have not taken in more than three marks a day. Out of that we have to pay rent and live. And the intolerable taxes! Our customers used to be civil servants and government employees. They used to borrow three or four books a week even when we charged forty pfennigs a volume. Now we charge only twenty, but few of them still come, and those who still borrow take only a single volume. I do not blame the poor souls. Their salaries have been cut, and besides they complain of the lack of interesting reading matter. They have read most of the old books I have, and as to the new ones—well, after trying one they refuse to take another."

One morning about two weeks later I saw a sign hanging in the window: Zu Vermieten (For Rent).

I met a Communist by appointment in a cafe in Moabit, the proletarian section of Berlin. The best way to describe Moabit is as an old German woman once described it to me: "Das rote Moabit bleibt schon immer rot." (Red Moabit will always remain red.) After talking a while we took a walk. We passed a bookstore. Half a dozen copies of Hitler's "Mein Kampf," some of Göring's books, the Propaganda Minister's masterpieces, and others of the same category graced the window. "Let's go in," I suggested, "and look over the new literature."

"You will be surprised by what you will see," my companion said.

"Not at all," I assured him, "I have seen that stuff often enough, even read some of it."

We entered. My companion greeted the young fellow behind the counter. "An American correspondent," he introduced me. "He wants to see what you have."

"Here are the works of Rosenberg on culture," the clerk began. "Here are Zimmermann and Bartels on the same subject. The latter I can sell you at a reduced price. Have you read 'Schlageter' by Hans Johst? Ehrinberg's 'Deutsche Passion, 1933,' too, is highly recommended. Would you perhaps care for Günther, Doree? They are very important. They have revealed to us the Teutonic soul and the importance of racial purity. Perhaps politics interests you? Economics? Please let me show you—"

"Zum Donnerwetter, Fritz," my companion interrupted, "he is safe. He is one of us, an American friend. Show him what you have."

Suspiciously Fritz's glance fell on me. He was at a loss.

"I guarantee him," my companion said. The shopkeeper gave me his hand and said, "Let me show you." He took out from the shelves a few copies of Ehrinberg's "highly recommended" drama. Then he pulled out another book which stood behind these, took off the wrapper, and handed it to me. I could not believe my eyes: "Lenin on Imperialism." He jumped around from one shelf to another, revealing to me one prohibited book after another. Marx, Engels, Stalin, Lenin, Kautzky, Lunacharsky, and dozens of other Russian writers; Minzenberg, Remarque, Ossietzky, Herzfelde.

"But aren't you afraid to keep these books? Is it not too dangerous to keep them right on the shelves? Why don't you hide them?"

"No safer place to keep them. A bookstore must always be prepared for a sudden raid. Bookstores are constantly suspected nowadays. We are, as the Beobachter says, a hangover from the Jewish-Marxian-liberal era. But our salvation lies in the nature and character of the Gestapo [the secret police]. They are not conspicuous for intelligence. When they come to a store, they search in the back rooms. If there is a cellar they immediately rush there. They ransack the corners, look in every nook and crevice. But here, on the shelves, in the open—they do not suspect anything. Experience is the best teacher."

"But how do you get these books?" I asked.

"To tell the truth, I do not know much about that. Your friend can probably tell you more than I can. I only know that a man, who identifies himself by a number, comes every month on a certain day and takes an order. I pay on the spot. A week later the books arrive by mail, in these wrappings just as you see them."

"And do you sell any?"

"How do you think I manage to stay here?" he asked. "Do you think I sell any of that junk?" pointing to the official Nazi books standing on the shelves. "Even the Black Shirts are tired of it. I have a couple of hundred customers who come often. They buy for themselves and for their friends. I do not show these books to strangers."

"Are there many such stores in Berlin?"

"Plenty," he replied. "More than you think."

The experiences here described are not unusual or exaggerated. I am merely copying them from my notebooks, just as they were recorded on the day the event happened. There is plenty of independent evidence to confirm my personal observations. A few months ago a questionnaire was sent around to the largest German bookstores. It asked: "What sociological changes in the book market have you observed since the National Socialist revolution?" Here are some of the published answers:

Theodor Körner of Altenburg replied: "The manual laborer has not as yet returned to the book market."

Karl Buchholtz, one of the most famous Berlin book dealers, observed that his customers "have considerably declined on account of the political events."

Arthur Collignon of Berlin wrote: "From a sociological point of view we may say that the book-purchasing classes have not changed. Only individuals have ceased buying and the total quantity has considerably declined."

Christian Kaiser's bookstore at the Rathaus in Berlin was somewhat more explicit: "Naturally nearly all non-Aryans have ceased purchasing."

The magnificent Bismarck bookstore in Berlin admitted: "Our customers, who are chiefly government employees, have been buying very much less. Probably on account of the decline of wages."

The Lindemann bookstore in Stuttgart concluded its answer with the following sentence: "The assertion that the love of books is growing in Germany . . . we hope is true, but we cannot as yet assert it to be a fact."

Correspondence

The Nation and the Mercury

To the Editors of The Nation:

It was in the pages of The Nation that the League of Women Shoppers found its first correct information on the unfair labor policy of the American Mercury. We used your material in our investigations, found that you were accurate in your facts, and took our position of supporting the strike of the American Mercury employees accordingly. At meetings of our members, and in our approach to American Federation of Labor unions we read from the columns of The Nation to explain our support of the strike, and to persuade others to do likewise.

From your editorial of May 22 we read that "if they [American Mercury employers] carry out this threat [fighting the Regional Labor Board decision] and fail to reinstate the strikers, they will have lined up with those reactionary newspapers which are content to purvey generous ideas in their pages while resisting legally established standards in their own office." And in your correspondence columns of June 26 we read the complete report of the Regional Labor Board, which refuted every lying statement of the owners of the American Mercury.

Then suddenly on July 3 we find splashed all over the back page a joint offer of The Nation, liberal magazine, and the Mercury, also "liberal" magazine. We were mystified! One statement in the advertisement, "In order to create more work for our circulation departments during the summer we have arranged this tremendous bargain," is particularly astonishing, since you must know that the circulation department of the American Mercury is manned entirely by strike-breakers. The employment mentioned is not as praiseworthy as The Nation would seem to indicate. The statement is both false and misleading.

Immediately upon the appearance of the advertisements our members began telephoning protests. Has The Nation found new facts? Is The Nation now supporting the editors of the Mercury we were asked? The strikers came. They felt that this was a strike-breaking act on the part of The Nation. At our Board of Directors' meeting several women said that The Nation was becoming unreliable. Our president, Mrs. Aline Davis Hays, among others, decided to cancel her subscription to The Nation. Our board felt that advertising matter in The Nation was to some extent an extension of editorial text. Because The Nation is a magazine of opinion, and not a frankly commercial press, they felt that The Nation would not print an advertisement solely for revenue when it conflicted with their editorial stand. Therefore it was logical to assume that if the editors of The Nation were forced to print the advertisement because of a previous contract they should certainly have printed an explanatory editorial.

As a result of these protests from our members, we sent a representative to your offices for an explanation. She returned with the following report: That your business manager signed a contract with the Mercury after the strike had begun for several exchange advertisements which were to appear in your pages during the course of a year. When you realized the importance of the Mercury strike, you tried to cancel the contract; since you were unable to do so, you were forced to print the advertisement. Our representative also reported that your editors greatly regretted the appearance of the advertisement.

We still place the question, however, whether The Nation does not feel the same compulsion to integrity in its advertising pages that it demands from its editorial matter? We request that you publish this letter of protest in behalf of a great number of our members who are disturbed to find The Nation unreliable in support of the strike. We request also that you print an editorial comment to repair what damage the advertisement may have done to the cause of the strikers, which you as well as we have at heart.

New York, July 15 ALINE DAVIS HAYS,
for the Board of Directors,
League of Women Shoppers

The Nation has received several protests, including the one published above from the League of Women Shoppers, against the appearance in our issue of July 3 of an advertisement offering a joint subscription rate for The Nation and the American Mercury. The League of Women Shoppers charges that we have been "unreliable" in support of the strike and inquires whether we do not "feel the same compulsion to integrity" in our advertising pages that we demand from our editorial matter. Last week's issue of the New Masses carried an editorial based on the report of the League of Women Shoppers implying that the insertion of the advertisement was a denial of our "pretensions to support labor." The Nation has devoted more space and more vigorous language to the cause of the American Mercury strikers than has the New Masses. As to our "pretensions to support labor" we are content to let our readers judge our sincerity.

The letter of the League of Women Shoppers lays down a rule as to agreement between advertisers and editors which on second thought few persons would care to impose on periodicals in present-day America. An honest magazine sells its space to an advertiser with the guaranty that he will not be immune from criticism, that he shall not interfere with editorial policy, and that the text of his advertisement shall conform with the magazine's standard of taste and accuracy. We see no more reason why the American Mercury should be excluded from buying our advertising space than should other companies whose labor policies we also freely criticize. We are not afraid that anyone who knows us will believe that our editorial policy is or can be warped by consideration for our advertisers.

The joint-subscription offer of July 3, however, is advertising of a special character, because in it The Nation, through its circulation department, recommends the American Mercury to its readers. The arrangement to run a series of exchange advertisements with the Mercury was made February 21, two months before the strike. The text of the joint offer, which was to appear in both periodicals, was agreed on by the officials of the two companies without knowledge of all The Nation staff. This was shortly after the strike began. The Mercury fulfilled the terms of its contract by publishing the offer. When members of The Nation staff objected to the form and language of the agreed text scheduled to appear in The Nation, the Mercury was asked to release us from our contract, or to use the space in an advertisement in which we did not recommend the periodical. The Mercury, as it had a right to do, declined. Since we were under contract we felt obliged to keep our promise and did so. This did not indicate any change in our editorial attitude toward the strike. No further combination subscription offer is provided for or will be made under the contract.—Editors The Nation.

NEXT WEEK

The Elks Save America

By A. B. Magil

New and Challenging Conclusions Regarding Human Sex Relations

This new work by the "great master" is already recognized as a monumental landmark in the field of sexual knowledge. It is the logical result of a long lifetime of study, specialization and original research, in the far-flung and ever-widening realms of sexual science. It is systematic, comprehensive, concise and up-to-date. It sheds important light on sexual behavior, normal and abnormal, enabling the individual better to comprehend both his own nature and the natures of those about him.

It is essential in the library of the physician and scholar; it is invaluable for those intellectually mature persons who may be sexually perplexed; it belongs in the library of the habitually well-informed.

Note skeleton outline of contents herewith.

PSYCHOLOGY of SEX by HAVELOCK ELLIS

I. INTRODUCTION
II. THE BIOLOGY OF SEX
The Physical Basis of Sex—Erogenic Zones—The Biology of Courtship—The Factors of Sexual Selection—(1) Touch, (2) Smell, (3) Hearing, (4) Vision.
III. THE SEXUAL IMPULSE IN YOUTH
The First Appearance of the Sexual Impulse—Auto-Erotism — Erotic Day-Dreaming — Erotic Dreams in Sleep—Masturbation—Narcissism.
IV. SEXUAL DEVIATION AND THE EROTIC SYMBOLISMS
Sexual Deviation—Urolagnia and Coprolagnia—Erotic Fetichism—Stuff Fetichisms and Erotic Zoöphilia—Kleptolagnia—Exhibitionism—Algolagnia (Sadism and Masochism Sexual Senility.
V. HOMOSEXUALITY
Sexual Inversion—Eonism (Transvestism or Sexo-Esthetic Inversion)—Treatment.
VI. MARRIAGE
Introductory (The Problem of Sexual Abstinence)—The Advisability of Marriage — Satisfaction in Marriage — The Monogamic Standard — The Control of of Procreation—The Problem of Childless Marriage—Impotence and Frigidity—Chastity—The Menopause.
VII. THE ART OF LOVE
The Sexual Impulse in Relation to Love—Why Love Is an Art.
VIII. CONCLUSION
Dynamic Nature of Sex—Sublimation.
GLOSSARY
INDEX

ALMOST 400 PAGES
—Over 100,000 Words—

Authoritative Comment

"It would be idle to say that this book is the best of its kind. It has no kind. It stands alone. There is nothing to compare with it. . . . No intelligent adult should be without it." — Norman Haire, Ch.M. M.B. (eminent gynecologist).

"Few books on the subject of sex can be so confidently recommended to all and sundry as this truly admirable volume."—Bertrand Russell in The New Statesman.

"Although primarily designed to instruct the medical profession, it is to be hoped that the general reader will take this opportunity under Dr. Ellis' masterly guidance to acquaint himself with the workings of that [sexual] impulse."—Times Literary Supplement.

Please mail this to your bookseller or to:

EMERSON BOOKS, Inc., Dept. 75-N,
333 Sixth Ave., New York City

Enclosed herewith is my remittance for $3.15 (price $3.00 plus 15c for delivery and handling), for which please send prepaid a copy of PSYCHOLOGY OF SEX by Havelock Ellis.

Name ....

Address ....

City.................................. State..............

☐ Check here if book to be sent C.O.D.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIB.

Send a Postcard!

To the Editors of The Nation:

On June 5 the official Brown Shirt organ, the Angriff waxed merry over 50,000 postcards mailed as birthday greetings to Ernst Thaelmann in his cell at Moabit. The Angriff, turning Punch, referred to them as "political chain letters," "lost in the sand." Doubting, with that omniscience the Nazi editors are noted for, that 50,000 Bobbies, Wills, and Jims in America were concerned with the fate of a certain Thaelmann, the Angriff concluded by saying that if these letters had arrived from America, perhaps "we might have sent them Teddy in a bright red cockade. . . . But they wouldn't let him get off in New York, and he could cruise the ocean like the Flying Dutchman."

Americans interested in justice fail to catch the humor of the Nazi wit of the Angriff. The Anti-Nazi Federation, 168 West Twenty-third Street, supported by the United Anti-Nazi Conference, has now organized a great campaign to obtain 100,000 signatures and postcards which will be mailed to Berlin, demanding the release of Thaelmann and all other anti-fascist fighters. At the same time replicas of the signatures will be sent to Secretary of State Hull demanding for Thaelmann and all other political refugees that historic right to safe asylum which is one of the basic traditions of the American people.

We should like to urge your readers to obtain these postcards for themselves and their friends. They can be had free by merely writing to the organization headquarters. Already several thousand Americans have signed and dispatched them. Delegations are also being formed to be sent to Washington and Germany. The stuffed mailboxes of the Third Reich will be ample proof to the Brown Shirt comedians that there are 100,000 Americans willing to "lay out a stamp" to help set free these valiant fighters, the anti-fascists of Germany.

New York, June 18 June Croll,
Secretary, Anti-Nazi Federation

Japanese in California

To the Editors of The Nation:

Carey McWilliams's article on the Japanese in California gives puzzling prominence to a short discussion of the same subject that I contributed to the New York Times more than six months earlier and denies the truth of two statements ventured by me. I remarked that prejudice against the Japanese in California had abated. And I said that the anti-alien land legislation had effectually stopped Japanese land ownership. Mr. McWilliams makes a qualified denial of the first, and says of the second that "the exact opposite is true."

The person who should know most about the questions at issue is Samuel J. Hume, of Berkeley, executive secretary of the California Council on Oriental Relations. This is an active statewide organization that exists to combat prejudice and discrimination against Orientals and to remove causes of friction. It was Mr. Hume who lobbied against and defeated without much difficulty the bills aimed at Japanese fishermen, to which Mr. McWilliams devotes considerable space, but the defeat of which he fails to report.

In response to my query, Mr. Hume writes me under date of July 5:

> Anyone familiar with the state, recalling the situation of ten years ago, would say that anti-Japanese feeling, that is, antagonism toward the Japanese in California, has definitely subsided and is dying out. This is due principally to two causes:
>
> First, the adult population of the state has increased 60 per cent in the last ten years. The tremendous influx of people from other states accounts for a large proportion of this increase. Neither these newcomers nor the younger generation of Californians have the old emotional attitudes and prejudices toward the Japanese.
>
> Second, the action of the alien land law and the improved economic status of the Japanese have drawn many Japanese into the cities, with the result that the economic competition of the Japanese is now more diffused and consequently less obtrusive.

Mr. Hume's testimony is supported by that of Professor E. G. Mears of Stanford University. In an article contributed to the Survey-Graphic of May, 1926, Professor Mears wrote: "The Oriental cheap labor of the past has gone to the cities—at any rate, it is disappearing from farm and ranch. Anti-alien land laws are fast driving the decreasing number of Asiatics away from rural pursuits." Professor Yamato Ichihashi, professor of Japanese government and history at Stanford, in "Japanese in the United States" attributes the decline in Japanese land ownership since 1920 chiefly to the subsidence of the war-time agricultural boom, but adds that the hostile land laws "undoubtedly had a share in producing that decline." He cites figures showing the rapid decline and concludes: "The law alone can explain the aspects of the situation noted." And again he sums up:

> The Japanese have interested themselves in farming from the beginning of their appearance on the Pacific Coast, at first working as farm hands, then gradually emerging as contract, share, tenant, and independent farmers. The intention of the land laws was to check the further development of the process, and the laws everywhere having proved effective, many Japanse have left the farm and drifted to towns and cities to find other occupations.

On the other question of anti-Japanese prejudice, Professor Ichihashi writes in the same book: "The problem of alien Japanese residents has practically exhausted itself. Even the anti-Japanese agitation seems to have become well-nigh extinct."

This is a matter of common knowledge with most of us. Mr. Hume's organization has made great headway in organizing California support for repeal of the 1924 exclusion law and substitution of a quota control on the same basis as that which controls immigration from Europe. In San Francisco, for instance, the demand for quota is supported by the Chronicle and News and opposed only by Hearst. Feeling against the Japanese in California must of course be distinguished from feeling against the militarist Japanese government, which exists in California no more and no less than in other parts of the country.

There is always plenty of prejudice and Mr. McWilliams does well to take it seriously and expose its manifestations. I would not think of denying or questioning the evidence he brings of a renewal of agitation in Southern California, where he lives. And controversy is stupid. But Mr. McWilliams's curious singling out of a six-months-old fugitive newspaper piece that was not before your readers to use as the text of his article, and his less than courteous manner of flatly denying the truth of my statements require this much of a rejoinder in justice to that reputation for accuracy that is one of the journalist's dearest possessions.

San Francisco, July 8 George P. West

Labor and Industry

Connecticut Forms a Labor Party

By NATHANIEL SHERMAN

Hartford, July 15

THE political air is full of talk about new parties, third parties, and labor parties, but it has remained for organized labor in Connecticut to take the lead in the actual formation of a state labor party. In Hartford on Sunday, June 30, representatives of 150 Connecticut Federation of Labor locals, meeting at the call of the Hartford Central Labor Union, unanimously voted for the formation of a Connecticut Labor Party, "anti-capitalist in nature," to be based on A. F. of L. unions, independent unions, and other mass organizations, irrespective of present political affiliation. The meeting was the first statewide political gathering of A. F. of L. unions in the United States.

A few brief statistics are required at this point to indicate the scope of the conference. More than 41,000 Connecticut trade unionists were represented by 165 registered delegates from 31 cities and towns. Equally important is the fact that the Central Labor Unions of Danbury, Waterbury, Hartford, New Britain, Meriden, and New London, all important industrial centers, sent official delegates. Sixteen independent locals, with a membership of 14,200, were represented and also pledged their support. There are approximately 75,000 members of the A. F. of L. in Connecticut, and more than half of these, through their local delegates, are supporting the new move. And new the move is, not only in form, but in content. The conference, which will meet again on July 21, when an even larger representation is expected, unanimously voted for the formation of a Labor Party based not only on the trade unions and other "working-class organizations" but also on the support of "professional people, farmers, veterans, and Negro organizations."

Such a party, the program states, is to be actively built and supported by the whole labor movement "for the purpose of creating a mighty weapon in the fight against wage cuts and company unions, and to achieve genuine unemployment insurance at the expense of the employers and the wealthy; for the immediate cash payment of the bonus by taxation of the rich; for the thirty-hour week, without pay reductions, for the defense of civil rights of the workers; for the defense of the trade unions against employers' attacks; against the use of National Guard and the police in strikes; against taxation of the toilers and farmers, but for the taxation of the wealthy to meet the needs of the unemployed and labor growing out of the capitalist-induced crisis; against the threat of fascism which endangers the labor movement; and against the threat of a new world war."

The opening paragraph of the resolution, unanimously adopted by the conference, states that it is "becoming plain to labor that after five years of economic crisis its conditions of life have been growing worse, and that the old political parties, the Republican and Democratic, clearly represent the interests of the wealthy employers, bankers, and others who live off the toil of labor." Obviously the unanimous adoption of the foregoing resolution implied the absence from the conference of politicians and party hacks. Present at the meeting, however, as registered observers, were representatives of farmers and fraternal organizations and representatives of the Socialist and Communist parties. Plans were drawn up for the formation of local Labor Party committees in each city and town; every A. F. of L. local will be asked to indorse the movement; delegates to the State Federation of Labor convention to be held in the fall will be instructed to vote their support of the party. A pamphlet in an edition of 25,000 is now being published, and more complete plans will be drawn up at the second conference to be held in New London on July 21. At present authority resides with a Continuations Committee of fifteen trade unionists, headed by William E. Kuehnel of Hartford, president of the Central Labor Union of that city.

According to Kuehnel, who is himself a former munitions worker, and who signed the call for the conference, the movement arose from "our realization of the complete failure of labor's traditional political policy—that of rewarding its friends and punishing its enemies. Bitter experience in the Colt Fire Arms strike, and in the strike of our brothers in the textile unions, demonstrated clearly that this traditional policy meant that we played right into the hands of either the Democrats or the Republicans. . . . The reason is not hard to find: the Democratic and Republican parties are in the hands of the employers and represent their interests, not ours." Kuehnel also points to the fact that labor has helped to elect governors and mayors "who have used the state militia and police against us while we were trying to get a decent living wage."

"We in Hartford," he says, "felt the full effect of the present political set-up when, in the Colt strike, the government refused to enforce Section 7-a. Our brothers in the textile unions not only had similar experiences, but had to contend with the National Guard, called out by a man elected to office as 'a friend of labor.' It was our experiences in these strikes that led to a preliminary conference on the part of those active in the Colt and textile strikes. The result was encouraging and predicted, to some extent, the success of our first conference."

The political orientation of the new party, it may be said, will be based on advice given to the conference by Miss Mary van Kleeck, Director of Industrial Studies of the Russell Sage Foundation, who maintained that it should grow out of the day-to-day struggles in the workshop and be directed toward a program arising out of these struggles.

"Vital issues for American civilization center in the workers' day-to-day struggles to maintain their standards of living," Miss van Kleeck said. "The task of a labor party is to center the political program around these struggles, to keep both the program and the leadership responsive and responsible directly to the workers' organizations for their immediate economic interests, broadly conceived as the basis for the standards of living for all workers, industrial, agricultural, and professional. Upon these living standards civilization itself is based."

Lessons from Lorain

By HEYWOOD BROUN

I WISH there were some way to tell the story of the Guild fight in Lorain, Ohio, to the huge public of America. Obviously I am not competent to do it even aside from my own partisanship for the newspaper union. But I must insist that the issues involved ought to be of interest to a much wider audience than editorial workers.

In the first place a little research in Lorain, or some similar town, would do much to open all our eyes to the vital faults of the American press. This city with a population of some twenty-five thousand has one paper, the Lorain Journal, which comes out at four o'clock in the afternoon. It is owned by Sam Horvitz who is a paving contractor. Some years ago the Journal, then under different management, undertook to criticize Mr. Horvitz very sharply and so to end all that he bought the paper and continued it as a sideline.

This sort of set-up becomes increasingly familiar in small American cities. When small-town journalism is mentioned the average American thinks of William Allen White and the Emporia Gazette. In fact the phrase "the small-town paper" conjures up in the minds of many a sentimental picture of the kindly boss who is Bill or Joe to his fellow workers and shares a cot in the city room with the office boy. I have a decided quarrel with the paternalism which I think Bill White typifies but that can wait for some later article. In fact it can wait indefinitely because the Emporia idea is rapidly on the way out. And no matter what kind of case I tried to make against Mr. White I would have to admit that he is a newspaper man and not a paving contractor. In fact I have always maintained that he was a newspaper man and not a philosopher or a novelist.

Today the small-town paper seems to be doomed to become a sideline in the hands of somebody who has large outside financial interests. This is very bad for small-town journalism. Every now and then I run into somebody who has the archaic idea that there is a certain rugged honesty and virtue in the smaller papers as opposed to those of the big cities. With a very few honorable exceptions the smaller papers are more unfair and venal than the big ones and I am not forgetting the press of Chicago. I do not intend it as any very staggering comment when I say that in my opinion the newspapers of New York are about the best America has to offer.

But as the small-town papers become even more brazenly organs of special and local pleading for privileged interests they tend to corrupt the whole loaf. If a New York publisher said and really meant, "I intend to be absolutely fair in my treatment of labor news throughout the country," he would find the greatest difficulty in making good his pledge. He would be dependent for much of his news on one of the large press services and this is the spot where bias seeps in. To simplify the argument I will waive certain decided mental reservations and say that the press associations sometimes give the fairest stories of which they are capable about disputes in big cities. But strikes and lockouts in small communities are woefully manhandled.

If the fight assumes first-page proportions somebody may well be sent in who is capable and who is sincerely desirous of furnishing his press-service executive with the true facts. But where there is no bureau the local correspondent of any press services owes a much stronger allegiance to his immediate boss who is likely to be the owner of the town's only paper. Not infrequently the strike is in a plant in which the local newspaper owner is a heavy shareholder. In any case the paper's interests lie with those of the management of the plant. Under such circumstances the man who originates the dispatch for the news service is under terrific pressure to give the strikers the worst of it and the entire press of the country is poisoned at the sources.

Last week I pointed out that the managing editor of the Lorain Journal who is the active leader of the lock-out against the Guild, Mr. Horvitz being in Florida on a paving job, also happens to be the Lorain correspondent for the Associated Press. I made a formal written complaint about this condition to Kent Cooper, general manager of the A. P. I said distinctly that my complaint was based not entirely on any specific treatment of news during the lock-out but on the set-up itself. My reply came from Jackson S. Elliott, the assistant general manager, who completely evades the point. Mr Elliott wrote:

"This acknowledges your letter of July 16 to Mr. Cooper, informing us of your recent visit to Lorain, Ohio, and commenting on a story from Lorain, June 21, covering an incident related to the controversy between the management and former employees of the Lorain Journal. Your letter caused us to reexamine the recent exchanges of correspondence between our Cleveland and Columbus chiefs of bureau with Mr. John Dunn, chairman of the Lorain unit of the Cleveland Newspaper Guild. Assuming that you had access to the correspondence, mentioned above, while in Lorain, it seems that you must be convinced of the desire of our staff employees to deal with this controversy with entire fairness."

I didn't see the correspondence and I have no idea what it contains nor do I see what it could contain which would impair my argument that a man should not be the active leader of a lock-out against a labor union and at the same time the so-called neutral observer who is expected to furnish the papers of the country with a fair account.

But my true quarrel is not with any A. P. reporter, not even with Mr. Maloy, the managing editor of the Lorain Journal. My quarrel is with the A. P. executives. Why should I think that Jackson S. Elliott, assistant general manager of the A. P., is fair when I find him slipping so readily and probably unconsciously into that telltale phrase "the controversy between the management and former employees of the Lorain Journal." Mr. Elliott is either ignorant or biased if he does not know enough about labor disputes to realize that he is using the phrase always utilized by employers when they war against the right to collective bargaining. It has been said over and over again in similar situations, "Why there's nothing to bargain about—these people don't work for me any more—they're just former employees." The theory of 7-a was that workers who were fired for organizing were illegally dismissed and that they still retained a right to their jobs. That is the contention in Lorain today. I see no reason why I should not reiterate my charge that the position of the A. P. in the Lorain lock-out is wholly wrong both in principle and specific act.

Victory in New Jersey

By McALISTER COLEMAN

NEW JERSEY consumers of electricity rubbed their eyes in frank astonishment the other day when they read the headline, "Commission Orders Public Service to Reduce Rates." For the first time in its thirty years of domination over the political and economic life of the state the Public Service Corporation of New Jersey has been forced to have a subsidiary reduce its rates. It has been forced to do so, furthermore, by a utility commission generally considered to be subservient to the will of the corporation, which monopolizes 80 per cent of the electric and gas business of the state and practically all the street-car and bus service as well. In June the Public Service Gas and Electric Company of New Jersey cut its customers' electric bills 20 per cent, thereby reducing the amount it receives from New Jersey consumers by $5,176,566 a year. For domestic consumers rates formerly starting at 9 cents for the first twenty kilowatt hours, on top of a dollar monthly minimum, will now be 7 cents, with similar reductions as consumption increases.

In the opinion of most unbiased experts these rates are still far too high. To those acquainted with the history of Jersey utilities, however, a rate cut of any size is so unprecedented as to warrant widespread jubilation among the long-suffering consumers. Thomas Nesbitt McCarter, president of Public Service and its subsidiary companies at a salary of $150,000 a year, now goes up and down the state talking darkly about attempts to "ruin the electric industry" and threatening cuts in the 15 per cent dividends of the gas and electric company. (It is to be noted, however, that the rate cut has not affected the price of Public Service stock.)

How did it all happen? What overnight change took place in the policies of a commission whose past performance has been practically 100 per cent in favor of Public Service? The answer is to be found in the activities of a small group of determined men and women who for two years have been doggedly battering at the powerful defenses of Public Service. When this group first petitioned for a reduction in rates, they were told that to fight McCarter was about as healthy as making faces at Hitler on the streets of Berlin; that the Utility Commission was no more than a preparatory school for lawyers graduating into the service of the utility companies; that the press of the state was hostile. Mindful of the odds against them, they nevertheless went forth to battle, with John A. Matthews of Newark, a former assemblyman and one of the leaders of the New Jersey bar, representing Herman W. Brams, the first individual petitioner, and the Utility Users' Protective League of New Jersey acting as intervenor in the hearings.

The Utility Users' League was an organization which had been formed shortly before the electric rate case started for the purpose of fighting Erie commutation rates in northern Jersey. Among its members were four men whose nicely timed team-work and willingness to accept the most difficult of assignments, without thought of compensation, proved, together with the militant tactics of Matthews, to be the determining factors in this fight. These four men were the brothers George and Samuel Slaff, young lawyers, residents of Passaic, who practice in New York; Dr. John Bauer, veteran valuation expert, who bears the scars of many a rate battle with the power trust; and A. Raymond Travis, Jr., the league's secretary.

In an article in The Nation for November 21, 1934, called Jersey Power Costs Too Much, I gave the arguments employed by both sides in the long-drawn-out hearings before the utility commissioners at Newark. As it turned out, the case hung on the valuation of the company's properties. High-priced experts were marshaled by the company to swear that the rates should be based on a valuation of $450,000,000. Dr. Bauer took the witness stand to contend that $150,000,000 would be a fair valuation.

Early in the case the forebodings of the pessimists seemed justified. Joseph F. Autenreith, chairman of the commission, who had heard much of the important testimony, suddenly resigned, saying that his commissioner's salary of $12,000 a year was insufficient for his needs. A month later he popped up as counsel for the New Jersey Central Power and Light Company. In his place, over the heated protests of the league, Governor (now Senator) Harry Moore appointed Frank J. Reardon of Jersey City, a protege of Mayor Hague's. But to the vast relief of counsel for the people, Mr. Reardon, from the time he entered the involved proceedings, seemed to have a much clearer idea of what they were all about than did his colleagues, Mayor Bachrach of Atlantic City and Thomas L. Hanson, former secretary to Governor Larson.

It was Commissioner Reardon who made gestures of incredulity when an expert for Public Service testified that under the head of the company's "going value" there should be included and capitalized in the rate base the George Washington Bridge, the Holland Tunnel, the highway system of the state, and finally the flourishing birth-rate in the thirteen counties of the Public Service domain. These items were included, it was gravely explained, because the company was entitled to levy tribute upon so rich a territory. This same witness admitted under the raking cross-examination of George Slaff that he had included in his final estimates duplicate appraisals of a power plant which the peoples' counsel claimed was obsolete anyhow. He was followed on the stand by another company witness who, testifying as to the condition of the poles carrying Public Service electric wires, said that he had inspected all the company's poles and found them well-nigh perfect. This inspection had been done by "observation." Under the questioning of Slaff it developed that the "observation" was made from a high-powered car in which the expert was speeding through the state.

The significance of the Jersey reduction, outside the saving in dollars and cents to the people of the state, lies in the proof it offers that men and women with courage, intelligence, and persistence can sometimes win a victory over the huskiest of Goliaths.

PARETO

THE MIND AND SOCIETY

"The immense riches of this book, in its discussions and wealth of facts about religion, politics, history, morals, sex, philosophy, science, psychology, language, literature, art, ideals, can only be known by those who take the trouble to read it."—Henry Hazlitt, New York Times. "In its creation of a technic for the more accurate analysis of social phenomena, it is a work of the very highest genius."—Bernard de Voto, Saturday Review. 4 vols., large quarto, $20.00.

W. E. B. du BOIS

BLACK RECONSTRUCTION

"Of the Negro's part in Reconstruction it is beyond question the most painstaking and thorough study ever made . . . An imposing contribution to a critical period of American history."—N. Y. Times. "Written with the hot, impassioned eloquence that is Dr. du Bois's. A thoroughly documented . . . presentation of neglected evidence."—Literary Digest. 746 pages, $4.50.

KURT KOFFKA

PRINCIPLES OF GESTALT PSYCHOLOGY

"Probably the best presentation thus far of the subject of gestalt psychology."—Scientific Book Club. $4.50.

FRANCIS M. CORNFORD

PLATO'S THEORY OF KNOWLEDGE

A new translation, with detailed commentary, of the Theaetetus and the Sophist, the two masterpieces of Plato's later period. $4.50.

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

383 Madison Avenue, N. Y.

Books

Realism—Old Style

The Furys. By James Hanley. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

IN England Mr. Hanley's realism has earned for him a unique position that he can hardly expect to enjoy in this country. It is not surprising that a nation whose principal literary nourishment in the past fifteen years has been the crepuscular symbolism of Virginia Woolf, the robustious whimsies of J. B. Priestley, and the silver-plated mysticism of Charles Morgan should be shocked into respect for a writer who manifests something more than a hat-tipping acquaintance with contemporary actuality. Not since "Sons and Lovers" has so much of the concrete substance of England been allowed to sully the pages of the English novel; indeed, Mr. Hanley has caught up English realism at the point at which it was abandoned by the early Lawrence. That such critics as the late Arnold Bennett and John Cowper Powys should lose their heads a little in saluting him is, under the circumstances, understandable enough. But we in this country have suffered too arduous an exposure to realism in all its forms, from the ponderous social documents of Dreiser to the mordant case histories of Faulkner, to be any longer capable of the kind of open-mouthed astonishment before the revelations of "life" or "reality" which it seems to be the sole end of pure realism to provoke. It is not that the recent American novel is better written than the English, or that it is wiser and more balanced in its attitude toward experience, but that it has at least passed beyond the stage where it believes that experience by and for itself is a sufficient guaranty of interest or significance. We have come to demand again in a work of fiction that pretends to be anything beyond the paranoid or the journalistic the presence of a theme that will give to the materials represented a consistent form and a comprehensible meaning. It is the total indifference to these two things in "The Furys" which makes it, for all its fine psychological insight in the treatment of individual characters and scenes, a source of very special exasperation for the American reader.

Mr. Hanley has created a world which his intelligence has not striven hard enough to understand. The result is something that one may find it hard to believe—a novel without a theme. And because it is without a theme it is without center, without focus, without form. The only boundary that exists is that set up by the three generations of the Furys, an overwrought family of immigrant Irish marooned in the working-class district of an English seaport city that is undoubtedly Liverpool. At the beginning it would seem that the central conflict is to be between the strong-willed mother and her youngest son, who has just been dismissed from a seminary in Ireland for bad conduct. But this is soon abandoned for an intensive treatment of half a dozen almost equally important situations involving other members of the clan. There is a general strike which affects most of the characters in one way or another: Mr. Fury is left jobless; Mrs. Fury is forced to appeal to a loan shark; another son is active in the fight between police and workers. But how all this is related to the essentially pschological struggle between mother and son, to the domestic troubles of Desmond Fury and his prostitute wife, and to the reconciliation between the elder Furys, is never made clear. Always in the background is the speechless, motionless figure of the aged grandfather, whose day dreams are of Ireland and his childhood and the body of his mother lying dead from starvation. Here, one would think, Mr. Hanley might have found his theme, or at least a beginning for the Furys' long history of sorrows and tribulations, even the most distinguished of which are traceable to economic necessity. But this writer lets it be known through the character of a half-mad professor of sociology that he is above all such interpretations. Like his character, he sits on a high place and surveys the tortured and self-torturing human masses with a sort of perverse satisfaction. The formula for immunity is elsewhere expressed by the opportunist Desmond: "Our real enemies are our own people."

But the real objection to this book is not that it fails to give expression to the proletarian revolutionary theme. It is rather that it deals with a vast body of material without informing it with any meaning or significance whatsoever. A young boy's resistance to his mother's influence is no longer a sufficient subject for a book of this length and scale. Yet to bring his work to some sort of conclusion Mr. Hanley is forced to have the boy turn on the mother in what is no more than a fit of meaningless perversity. Unable wholly to concentrate on the psycho-pathological aspects of family relationships, as D. H. Lawrence was able to do some decades ago, and unwilling to give weight to the social and economic forces operating on the family, this talented young writer falls into a confusion that is reflected in everything in his work.

William Troy

Portrait of a Year

Eyes on the World. By M. Lincoln Schuster. Simon and Schuster. $3.75.

"THE hair-trigger opening and closing of thousands of camera shutters" enables us "to fix comprehending eyes on the world," writes Mr. Schuster. And in synthesizing the outstanding photographs of the year with the flow of the year's news, he has, I believe, set a new form which will influence books for years to come. Photographs for too long have been isolated phenomena, expressive of events and people but uncorrelated with the main stream of history. It is something new to weave these photographs through the headlines, through the news, through the titles of the year's outstanding books, through the cartoons, speeches, proclamations of the year, into a new and integrated fabric. "Eyes on the World" attempts to show us what history looks like when it is being poured red hot from the ladle.

"Eyes on the World" represents a new method of communication. We have had books of pictures before, we have weeklies which digest the news, we have rotos and newsreels which are sketchy and uncoordinated, but "Eyes on the World" gives us a vivid picture of the year as a whole, classified and edited. Many people may quarrel with Mr. Schuster's editing, but none is apt to deny that this is a vivid and stimulating way to delineate a year. We have strikers dying in Toledo, violence on the Coast, the jobless sleeping on the sidewalks, cows being shot in the drought-stricken corn belt—the story of America's year told in headlines and photographs that are full of conflict and bloodshed. We see thousands assembled under the swastika in Germany; we have flashes of Mussolini, of Mosley's Black Shirts, of fascist riots in France and Austria, student conflicts in Spain, and preparations for war in Japan, with machine-guns being set up in Manchuria. We have the "war against illiteracy" in Russia, medical students attending the tuberculosis college, Soviet citizens going to the circus and the ballet, Bolshevik babies being brought up in nurseries, Stalin good-humoredly discussing literature with Maxim Gorki, healthy-bodied boys and girls running down to the beach near Leningrad.

The following headlines will sound familiar to anyone who takes his morning paper with his breakfast coffee: "Troops Fight Paris Rioters," "Greek Revolt Spreads," "Dollfuss Slain by the Nazis." But assembled with these headlines we see a French woman, her baby on her shoulder, pushing back a gendarme; we see the strained faces and tense figures of the Greeks, in postures that only the candid camera could capture; we are shown the hands of Heimwehr troopers reaching up toward a windowsill from which the dead body of a Viennese Nazi is being rolled into their outstretched arms. We all of us remember having read about these things in the daily press. We shall remember many of the pictures reproduced here. But "Eyes on the World" does something to these memories of ours. It condenses them in a form that is startling and vivid.

This book is interesting not only as a historical document but as an evidence of the changing style of photography. The ever-growing position of the candid-camera photography is made emphatic. There is nothing artistic on the page entitled A New Spanish Custom, but the picture of the clash between students and civilians has a swirl of activity that the old art photographer, laden with cumbersome equipment, would be powerless to express. A short while ago I was prevailed upon to judge a "salon" of photography in one of the larger art museums of the country. What a collection of dew-filled landscapes, scarf-draped nudes with vases, and Corot-like trees waving fuzzily against the sky! The difference between the Corot imitation and the Acme news shot of national guardsmen firing on Toledo strikers, the ground bouncing with bricks, the attitude of each man in the picture eloquently expressive, is the difference between the past and the future of photography. The never-to-be-forgotten shot of the assassination of King Alexander of Jugoslavia (for which the camera man as well as the king gave his life) may not follow the laws of dynamic symmetry, but the content of the picture is so breathtaking that it will take its place among the historic photographs of the world.

Other photographs show that dynamic composition can exist with the candid-camera news quality. The pictures entitled Japanese Man of War and Samurai have great power. There is sheer beauty in the glistening ebony backs of natives in Man Power by William La Varre. It is difficult to think of any art form which could be more expressive of the tawdry glamor of burlesque than the Jacobs photographs. And pictures like Little Women, from China, and the Sovfoto picture, Red Square, are exquisite examples of photography gleaned from a news service, the work of some unknown photographer.

The book, among other things, reveals that montage as a method is difficult and in its infancy. But the imperfections of some of the more crowded layouts are more than compensated for by the beautiful balance of pages like the one entitled Coolie, where the young Chinese face rises out of a background of surging Oriental humanity, the composition interestingly cut through with headlines, "China's forgotten millions: Life is cheap in Manchuria." Sometimes we feel that the captions tend to be too flashy, but we cannot complain when the portrait by Pierre Verger, expressing all the dignity of a man who comes from the soil, is underlined with the title: "The good earth yields this Chinese peasant an income of twenty-nine cents a month."

"Honest pictures," writes Mr. Schuster, "can give us an impact, a startled awareness, a deep flooding illumination which even honest words cannot always attain. In the right hands, an artist's lens is an instrument of truth, a probing and searching instrument. It can unlock secrets lodged in ponderous sociological surveys. It can unseat error and destroy partisan pleading." We hope that "Eyes on the World" will go on year after year unrolling the life behind the headlines.

MARGARET BOURKE-WHITE

Literary History at Its Worst

The First Century of American Literature. 1770-1870. By Fred Lewis Pattee. The D. Appleton-Century Company. $3.50.

THIS book completes Professor Pattee's three-volume history of American literature. Though published last, it is the first in point of time. The first half of the era it deals with, 1770-1820, produced nothing of enduring value in our literary annals, but the remaining fifty years brought forth a group of writers who are still our chief glory in the realm of literature: Hawthorne, Melville, Thoreau, Whitman, Lowell, Emily Dickinson, and Emerson. Professor Pattee's general discussion, unfortunately, is similar to that in all his other historical works—comprehensive, bizarre in its critical opinions, and poorly written. His previous books have been severely attacked on all these grounds by non-academic folk, and one had hoped that he would be somewhat influenced for the better by the continuous onslaught, but apparently it is too much to expect a radical mental and emotional change in an academician of seventy-two.

Like nearly all his colleagues he thinks that Franklin's simple, cheap, and shoddy "Autobiography" is a "classic to be rated with the greatest of the world's autobiographies," but that the magnificent Tom Paine was no more than an "impetuous . . . journalist who thought only in superlatives and who knew nothing of prudence." Most of the younger college professors now agree that Philip Freneau was at best an ambitious but mediocre versifier, but Professor Pattee still holds to the opinion of the Revolutionary literary critics that he is "one of the glories of American literature," and that "in strength of conception and in sustained mastery over the vaguely terrible" some of his work surpasses "the English poetry of the early Romantic movement." To bolster this view Professor Pattee quotes such "vivid and contagious" lines as, "She walks the ocean like its queen" and "She stays to guard her native shores." His final judgment is that "a half-dozen of his best lyrics—Poe can show no more—are worthy of any anthology."

In the first decade of the nineteenth century there lived a Philadelphia literary critic named Joseph Dennie. He was a man of slight learning and fairly adequate taste, but Professor Pattee sees in him one of the great critics of all time, adding specifically that a good deal of his work was "worthy of a critic like Hazlitt." And "the second reviewer in the new decade was also a man of genius . . . Charles Brockden Brown," whose idea of a good novel was a fantastic adventure story of the sort he himself wrote. Professor Pattee's reverence for the early American writers is so deep and indiscriminate that he sees good even in Parson Weems's biography of Washington. He admits that it is an absurd book, but he immediately adds that it "has its merits. It is written with vivacity and complete conviction; its battle stories are told with gusto."

Hawthorne's "The Scarlet Letter" makes little impression on Professor Pattee. He thinks that "the characters are symbols; the dialogue is unnatural; . . . Tragedy was the intent, unrelieved by humor, but emotion is lacking, gripping power, realism. It can be read in cold blood with thoughts only of the method, the literary artifice, the highly finished style." Unlike Hawthorne, Whittier was a real artist. His "Snow-Bound" is "primitive in its feelings, simple, intensely human. . . . The snow storm actually happened." Whittier gets a full chapter of fourteen pages, but Melville gets only cursory mention. Perhaps one of the reasons for this is to be found in the low opinion Professor Pattee has had of "Moby Dick." In his "Century Readings in American Literature" (third edition, 1926) he said that the book is "a wild mélange of adventure and of Gothic romance. . . . As a novelist Melville was a failure."

The present volume by Professor Pattee is full of strange night-school English. I quote a few samples:

> Latin it was that seems first to have laid hold of the young student's [Philip Freneau's] imagination.
>
> Written not at all was it [H. H. Brackenridge's "Modern Chivalry"] for profit.
>
> Tremendously was it [Paine's "Common Sense"] successful.

When Professor Pattee attempts to explain or define literary phenomena he achieves remarkable conclusions. For example:

> The geography of the South made not for literature. In contrast with New England, it had an out-of-doors climate.
>
> To comprehend Emerson, one must begin, perforce, with ancestry.
>
> Romanticism may be defined as the spirit of youth.

Professor Pattee's textbooks on American literature are perhaps the most widely used in our colleges and universities. A founder and editor of American Literature, the chief organ of the professors in that department, he commands great respect as an authority in the field. The influence he has had on the academic study of the national letters has thus been tremendous. How harmful it has been to the development of intelligent criticism and sound scholarship, the present book—his fifteenth—proves for the fifteenth time. CHARLES ANGOFF

Communist Ideology

Russian Sociology. By Julius F. Hecker. John Wiley and Sons. $3.

Religion and Communism. By Julius F. Hecker. John Wiley and Sons. $3.

Moscow Dialogues. By Julius F. Hecker. John Wiley and Sons. $3.

HERE are three forthright, authoritative books which bring together information essential to the understanding of what the Marxians, on one of their off days, have taught us to call the "ideology" of communism. Yet these books are by no means exclusively an exposition of communist social philosophy; they present the main currents of Russian thought and religion for the past two centuries in a unified picture hitherto not available to readers unfamiliar with the Russian language.

Dr. Hecker is a European of international descent who received his chief education in this country, including a religious training, returned to Russia after the revolution to participate in the reconstruction of the cultural and religious life of the Russian people, became himself converted to communism, and has now been appointed professor of philosophy in the University of Moscow, his special field being the interpretation of British and American culture. He is a man of transparent honesty, great integrity of character, and sound scholarship. He has the confidence both of the Communist authorities and of the church, anomalous as this fact may appear.

Hecker's trilogy is neither a history of events nor a description of social and economic conditions. It is confined to an account of Russian "ideology." But it is not mere partisan propaganda such as we have learned to expect from Soviet sources and such as Hecker himself at times avows. He tells us that "Communist teaching is not unlike religious dogma, it is frankly partisan; it accepts its proletarian class bias and scornfully rejects any so-called objective, impersonal, or superclass science and philosophy." Such dicta leave one groping for light on proletarian or religious mathematics, astronomy, or biology. But the spirit which thus induces Hecker to expound loyally the most meaningless items of the Communist creed does not seduce him into practicing this particular article of the creed. His books, while obviously written in full sympathy with the Communist conception of class warfare, are nevertheless objective and scientifically impartial in the presentation of facts, as is recognized by eminent authorities like John Macmurray and Sidney Webb, who have written prefaces for two of the books, and by Harold Laski.

"Russian Sociology" is the most solid of the three books. It begins with the Decembrist movement of 1825, and after discussing early Slavophil and Westernist theories sets forth the thought of the subjectivists—Peter Lavrov, Mikhailovsky, and Kareyev—of anarchists like Kropotkin and Chernov, and of P. A. Sorokin, whose move from Minnesota to Harvard has been overlooked by the author. The next section of the book, a suprisingly brief one, is concerned with Marxo-Leninism and revisionism. Plekhanov, Peter Struve, and Bogdanov receive special attention. The exposition throughout is well documented and the criticism is both restrained and instructive.

When one turns from "Russian Sociology" to "Religion and Communism" one can hardly avoid the impression—doubtless quite unintended by the author—that dialectical materialism is an impregnable rock, while religion is a life of dialectical movement. The history of Russian religion is traced back to the origins of Christianity in Russia, and the extraordinary potpourri of the superstition, magic, czaristic politics, avarice, mysticism, and moral idealism which have constituted Russian religion is vividly pictured, along with the growth of the anti-religious tradition which began under the influence of Voltaire, Diderot, and Holbach. Anyone who wishes to understand the historical justification for the revolt of communism against religion will find a better explanation of it here than in any other available account. He will also be led to wonder what would happen if an enlightened form of religion should arise in Russia—animated by social ideals akin to those of communism, like dialectical materialism utilizing all the methods and results of the sciences and rejecting mechanistic philosophy, but unlike it viewing the evolutionary process as the experiments, creations, struggles, and sufferings of a cosmic mind. There are signs that such a religion is dawning here and there in the Western world, although ignored by pundits. But Hecker wisely refrains from vaticinations about the future of religion in Russia or elsewhere.

One who has read "Russian Sociology" and "Religion and Communism" does not need to read "Moscow Dialogues," for it contains very few facts or arguments which are not to be found in them. But if he skips it he will miss a most delightful review of the subject as well as a corking good time. The book represents a series of informal discussions between the Communist Socratov and a group of Americans—a Senator, a Rotarian, a banker, a humanist, a reformist, and a professor. Needless to say, each is a stage type, true to form and entertainingly done. This book will doubtless be the most popular of the three.

Hecker's work is the best available in the field, but it is not perfect. The religious ideals of Alexander and the Holy Alliance are merely mentioned. One must look to Clarence Ford or Bertrand Russell for light on that amazing person, Baroness Krüdener, although the somewhat analogous Rasputin is mercilessly etched. There might well be a reference to the influence of Edwin Markham's social poems on prerevolutionary Russia. One regrets the lamentable proofreading of all three books, especially the "Moscow Dialogues." Finally, one may be permitted the wish that some sort of consistency might be established in the spelling of Russian proper names. We have in these books Dobrolubov and Dobrolyubov; Milyoukov, Milyukov, and Miliukov; Pugachev and Pugatchev

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

August

SALE

Our entire stock of magazine combinations, guaranteed to entertain and enlighten you for one year.

GREATLY REDUCED!

"Let's have an August sale," exclaimed our Circulation Manager. "I want more people to know how inexpensive The Nation is when bought in combination with other magazines. And I want to keep our girls busy this summer. Cut the prices as much as possible!"

"Not so near the Fall Season?" we queried in astonishment.

"Yes—just before the pick up. Mark them down. And have them polished up, ready for delivery," added the Circulation Manager. "I want every combination to look its best—even put some unusually good features in The Nation. Let the subscriptions be new or renewal and don't ask for payment before 30 days. Let's have a real sale this summer!"

Some of Our Values in

MAGAZINE CLUBS

The Nation with

American Girl	$6.40	Natural History	$7.85
American Review	7.00	New Current Digest	6.50
Arts & Decoration	7.75	New Masses	8.00
Asia	8.50	New Outlook	7.75
Atlantic Monthly	8.00	New Republic	8.75
Child Life	7.75	New Yorker	9.00
Collier's Weekly	6.75	Parents' Magazine	6.75
Common Sense	5.75	Popular Mechanics	7.25
Current History	6.50	Popular Science	6.35
Field & Stream	7.25	Reader's Digest	6.00
Foreign Affairs	9.75	Real America	7.25
Forum	7.00	Redbook	7.25
Golden Book	6.50	St. Nicholas	7.85
Harpers Magazine	6.50	Saturday Review	7.50
Living Age	8.00	Scribner's	6.50
Manchester Guardian	6.00	Survey Graphic	6.50
Mid-Week Pictorial	8.25	Today	6.85
Modern Monthly	6.25	USSR in Construction	7.50
Modern Psychologist	6.50	Vanity Fair	7.25
Moscow Weekly News	6.50	Yale Review	8.50

Others Not Advertised

We don't have space to list all our bargain combinations —unusual ones are not advertised here. But order any magazines you wish—we'll combine it with The Nation at a price that will please you. And remember all subscriptions may be new or renewal and may be mailed to separate addresses. Foreign and Canadian Postage additional, of course. Charge it for 30 days!

The Nation

The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City

Please send me the magazines specified below. ☐ I enclose payment in full $.......... OR ☐ Bill me in thirty days.

MAGAZINES	SEND TO

The lay reader is convinced that Pobyedonoscev and Pobyedonostsev are one man, but that N. Karev and N. I. Kareyev are two he cannot so easily tell. These and any other defects, however, should deter no one from reading Hecker's admirable volumes.

EDGAR SHEFFIELD BRIGHTMAN

Fearing's Metrotone News

Poems. By Kenneth Fearing. With an Introduction by Edward Dahlberg. Dynamo. $1.

A POET'S vision of evil may take various forms. Satire, of the usual sort, is the mildest of them; however stern the satiric poet may be in his primary intent, an irrepressible sympathy with human nature and a sense of the universality of folly cause him to wear the mask, at least, of geniality. Then there is the philosophical poet's attempt to explore and fix the laws of evil; his desire to extract the essence of the bad and the good may lead him to do a certain violence to the mixed quality of human character and action, and to set an Inferno in unrelieved blacks against the whites of a Paradiso. There is, finally, the nightmare vision of horror, chaotic and meaningless, which springs from overwrought nerves.

Kenneth Fearing's poems have something in common with each of these types. In the first place, they are intended as social satire, and more specifically as an indictment of capitalist civilization. The cruelty and hypocrisy of the present order are driven home by ironic juxtapositions: "It is Infant Welfare Week, milk prices up, child clinics closed, relief curtailed"; and "All winter she came there, begging for milk. So we had the shacks along the river destroyed by police." Sometimes the irony overreaches itself by crossing the borders of the fanciful, as in Obituary, where the dying worker's trinkets are parceled out among the Standard Oil, the D. A. R., Mr. Hoover, Gene Tunney, Al Capone, and the truck driver who ran over him. Those who are able to beat the game are represented in the figures of the gangster, the movie queen, the hero of popular fiction, and the plunger:

> And wow he died as wow he lived, > going whop to the office and blooie home to sleep and > biff got married and bam had children and oof got > fired,
> zowie did he live and zowie did he die . . .

Against the background of a bourgeois hell are flashed revelations of a future proletarian heaven. That these seem to be conjured out of a hat, and are not made to emerge inevitably from their context, is caused in part by the general atmosphere of the poems, which is that of the nightmare vision. This atmosphere is created very skilfully, with a craft which draws upon the French Décadents and Surréalistes and the advanced movie. The repetitious, hypnotic rhythms punctured by shocks of surprise, the rapid shifts of perspective, the cinematographic fadings and fusions of characters, all contribute to the effect of a grotesque and convulsing dream, tense with "stacked and waiting murder" and permeated by "a touch of vomit gas in the evening air." The horrors are cumulative, leading up to such refrains as:

> Morphine. Veronal. Veronal. Morphine. Morphine.
> Morphine. Morphine.

The result is very pungent stuff, and, with regard to its "literary" qualities, some of the most capable verse written so far by the revolutionary group. But these poems are primarily designed, I gather, not as a kind of macabre entertainment—for the sufferings of people today are hardly a fit subject for that—but as a social weapon. Although it is close enough to current realities to be often very telling, the social

☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐

DR. ELIAS TARTAK will be guest lecturer at TIMBERLAND August 1st to August 10th

TIMBERLAND

A Modern Camp for Adults

●

Booklet on Request
33 W. 42nd St.
PEnn. 6-7663

The Rare Charm of An Intimate Congenial Group

Rate $29.50 a week

Superior Cuisine

De Luxe Accommodations

Fare $5.00 by Packards

TIMBERLAND In The Adirondacks
Pottersville, N. Y., Warren County
Esther R. Kessler — Israel H. Kessler

A NEW UNITY HOUSE RISES FROM THE OLD!

NEW modern buildings, new roads, improved athletic facilities. Once again the leading personalities of musical, literary and theatrical world will entertain you. Added attractions: The Group Theatre presents "Awake and Sing"; The Theatre Union; The Chicago Opera Company and others. Write for booklet.

$27.00 week
Reduction for Union Members

UNITY HOUSE
Forest Park, Pennsylvania
Owned and operated by the I. L. G. U. on a non-profit basis.
N. Y. Office: 3 W. 16th ST. ■ CHelsea 3-2146

In the Heart of the ADIRONDACKS...
Most Beautiful Summer Resort
●
9 Hole Golf Course on Premises
9 Clay Tennis Courts
8 Hand Ball Courts
½ mile Sandy Beach

SCAROON MANOR
ON SCHROON LAKE, N. Y.

BERKSHIRE PINES
10th Season

and still sounding a new note in summer places. Solves every vacation problem for you and your child. Successfully combining a full-time day camp for children under the supervision of trainer councilors.

Complete program of adult activities.
Tennis—Swimming—Boating—riding
Badminton—Concerts—Plays, etc.
Golf (nearby). Accommodations in Main House and spacious bungalow arrangements. All modern facilities.

For details:
Pearl Cheifetz, Berkshire Pines
West Copake, N. Y. Phone: Copake 46

WEEK-END (July 26-27-28) PROGRAM
FRI. EVE. Concert—G. Leoni, baritone
SAT. EVE. Outdoor Operetta
SUN. EVE. Radiocasters Revue
Tennis, handball, baseball, boating, swimming.
Individual solarium cabanas.

Reduced R.R. fares every week-end.
Taxis meet all trains at Harmon Station.

BLUE MOUNTAIN LODGE
Phone Peek. 1403 — Peekskill N. Y.

CAMP TAMIMENT
the playground for adults in the Poconos

NIGHTS of sparkling entertainment, talking pictures, musical and dramatic programs directed by Mac Liebman.

SPORTS—Seventeen fast tennis courts, handball, 100 boats and canoes, swimming in private lake, saddle horses.

Daily lectures by Authorities.

$29 weekly, de luxe cabins at small extra charge.

Streamlined bus service direct to camp.
Air conditioned cars on Lackawanna R. R.

TAMIMENT
TAMIMENT PENNSYLVANIA
New York Office: 7 East 15th Street
ALgonquin 4-6875 Booklet on request
Philadelphia Office—Rittenhouse 3394

"The Camp with that Wonderful Spirit"
CAMP MILFORD
KENT CONN.

MICKEY MICHAELS, Manager
A modern adult camp in the heart of the Berkshire Hills. Every outdoor activity. Congenial fellow guests.

RATE JULY & AUGUST $27.50
Daily Rate $5

Special R.R. rates N. Y., N. H. & H. Write for illustrated Booklet "N".
N. Y. office. 1440 Broadway. Phone PEnn. 6-7842.

MOON HILL Lodge
ON SCHROON LAKE
IN THE HEART OF THE ADIRONDACKS
HOTEL ACCOMMODATIONS
COUNTRY CLUB ATMOSPHERE

ENJOY Golf, Tennis, Riding, Swimming, Etc. Large, Versatile Social Staff. Famous Cuisine. (Dietary Laws.)

Write for Booklet "N."

Sarah Solomon, Man. Dir.
Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y.

N. Y.: 11 W. 42d St.
PE. 6-7949

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
A Camp for Adults in the
ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG

City Phone
VAn. 3-9874

10th Anniversary
Gayer, more colorful than ever. Smart, original diversions. Musicales, Extravaganzas, Revues.
New Game and Tea Room . . . . . . :

CABANAS
["Something new under the Sun."]
All land and water sports including golf.

RATES: FROM $28 WEEKLY

"The Gateway to Your Perfect Vacation"
LAKE CHODIKEE COUNTRY CLUB
Highland, N. Y.
(The Beauty Spot Within 2 Hours of N. Y.)
400 Acres of Summer Wonderland
Rustic Lodge and Bungalows
All Modern Conveniences

NIGHTS OF GAIETY: Broadway Acts, Dramas, Revues, Talkies, Campfires, Bridge, Concerts, Around the Samovar, Amateur Nights, Bohemian Nights.

DAYS OF FUN: Tennis, Bowling, Fishing, Golfing, Baseball, Basketball, Handball, Boating, Saddle Horses, Swimming, Hiking, Gymnasium, etc.

FREE INSTRUCTION by professional teachers. Classes daily in Modern, ballet, tap and ballroom dancing, conversational French, tennis, swimming and riding.

Weekly rate, $25 up.

Write for Illustrated Booklet
N. Y. O., 277 Broadway WOrth 2-3733
"Key Up At Chodikee"

UNCAS LODGE
UNCASVILLE, CONN.
9th SUCCESSFUL SEASON

A charming, unpretentious, modern adult camp and 165-acre old New England farm. An ideal retreat for lovers of rustic beauty.
- Private Twin Lakes.
- 5 Clay Tennis Courts.
- Saddle Horses and Golf nearby.
- Unexcelled Cuisine.
- Socials, Theatricals, Camaraderie.

Uncas Lodge
"Send for Booklet"

RATES FOR JULY
$22.50 Per Week $3.50 Per Day
Special New Haven R.R. excursion train Sunday—2½ hours, $2 round trip
Camp phone: Norwich 1858 Ring 5
New York Phone: NEvins 8-2384—Evenings
DELIGHTFULLY DIFFERENT

25 SUCCESSFUL SEASONS

WEIL'S PINE FOREST COLONY
on LAKE ELLIS
WINGDALE, N. Y.

A most beautiful vacation spot for adults in the Berkshires. All land and water sports. Nine hole Golf course on the premises. 2 hours from New York.

RATES: from $29.50 per week.

PHONE: WINGDALE 41

criticism tends to be submerged in caricature and melodrama. From a proletariat bled until it is dazed, and from a ruling class so demoniacal, the promised land seems very remote. Like a cross-section of events in a newsreel, Fearing's picture of the contemporary world is pieced together out of "shots" chosen for their sensational quality, and it conveys no sense of direction. (That Fearing's Metrotone News gives us scenes ignored by Hearst's is highly commendable, but does not affect this particular criticism.) Consequently it is much less effective as commentary than the work of such poets as Hart Crane and Day Lewis, who bind the future to certain elements of the present and the past in a continuity of purpose and aspiration.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

Erskine Version

Solomon, My Son! By John Erskine. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

As novelist, John Erskine seems to be much more at home in the past than in the present. The reason lies in his special limitations: his experiences with the novel have so far developed him in the direction of but two themes. The first is the superiority—no less complete for being diplomatically asserted—of women over men; the second is the similarity—in point of invariable human nature—that exists between past ages and contemporary life. In "Solomon, My Son!" Mr. Erskine's first theme is stressed to a degree where women, no matter how restricted or obscure their position, become the real makers of history, and where men figure as their feeble and all but inadequate tools. Solomon has none of the force and wisdom which are commonly attributed to him. The force belongs to his mother, Bathsheba; the wisdom is divided equally between his Egyptian wife, Magsala, and Abishag, his concubine; it is to their skilful machinations, conducted modestly behind the throne, that Solomon, according to Mr. Erskine, owes his reputation for wisdom and justice. Mr. Erskine's second theme—the similarity between past ages and contemporay life—is developed to its fullest, and most obvious, extent: Solomon's era is the New Deal. Mass discontent and social agitation on the one hand are balanced by Solomon's plans for recovery on the other. It seems hardly necessary to add that the irony behind Mr. Erskine's point of view is of the most innocuous kind; far from being a weapon of reform, or a cry of despair over human fallibility, it has no other purpose than that of providing entertainment.

But we demand of entertainment that it be rich in surprises—and in Mr. Erskine's entertainment the surprises are very few. He clears the way for comedy, but it is so overworked by his two major themes that it becomes before long a pretty dull and predictable affair. From any clash between the sexes we know that women will emerge as the uncrowned victors, and that every economic situation which shows itself in Solomon's reign will provide the usual quota of parallels to our own predicament.

HELEN NEVILLE

Shorter Notices

Playthings of Time. By Arnold Zweig. The Viking Press. $2.50.

This collection of short stories still leaves Arnold Zweig's reputation resting on "Sergeant Grischa." Of the twelve stories three have merit beyond the author's gentle, easy notation of the simple traits of very simple people and his preference for slightly naive incidents. In The Enemy and "Eleven-Eleven-Fifteen" a fuller talent is evident. Both are war stories in which the war is used, not to make or break character, but to point it, to show in a curious mocking way how even amid war's fatality, the characters of two men can to some extent determine those men's destinies—one of death, the other of life, one confused and pathetic, the other petty and ridiculous, both consistent and inevitable. By far the best piece is Kong at the Seaside, eight pages of exciting and adept narrative. The bitter bargaining over a dog is cruel and tense, loaded with surprisingly complex implications, while the statement is sharp, neat, and conclusive. For the rest it can only be said that they lose no opportunity to be convincingly anti-war, anti-German, and tiresomely sentimental.

Cat Across the Path. By Ruth Feiner. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.50.

For a first novel this is a pretty slick performance. Miss Feiner knows her characters fairly well—but she knows her public even better. And thus she has been able to mix together the right amount of thrills, joys, and sorrows, and to leaven the whole with a dash of insight which is never too thick for the average reader's capacities—even a best-seller, these days, cannot hope to appeal by thrills alone to a public which has had at least one good dose of realism and Freud. The comparison, which has already been made, between Miss Feiner and Vicki Baum is a just one; for while "Cat Across the Path" has structurally not much in common with "Grand Hotel," it is at bottom the same kind of ready-made shocker, with just enough sophistication to keep it this side of absurdity and just enough "philosophy" to keep it this side of Elinor Glyn. There is the same careful planting of situations thought out in advance; as for the characters, they are about as complicated as the figures in a morality play: they have one characteristic apiece, and any given situation will serve to emphasize it. Add to this a style whose tedium is not even relieved by the tumult of incidents that crowds the pages and we have a piece of summer fiction which is neither better nor worse than usual. "Cat Across the Path" is marketable stuff; the enthusiasm accorded it in certain literary circles must remain a mystery—even, one suspects, to the author herself. For it is such a thoroughgoing commercial job, so faithful to its inherent limitations as to give the impression that Miss Feiner knew all along what she was doing.

Contributors to This Issue

MORT and E. A. GILBERT are completing the manuscript of a book to be entitled "Life Insurance: A Legalized Swindle," from which their article in this issue is an excerpt.

PETER EHLERS is on the staff of the Philadelphia Record.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN has for the past year been making a study of the relief problem. He is planning a book on the nature of American poverty.

I. A. LEVITAN was born and educated in Germany. After coming to this country in 1927 he engaged in reporting, magazine writing, and teaching. In 1934 he returned to Germany and served as Berlin correspondent of the Jewish Telegraphic Agency until compelled to leave by the Gestapo.

NATHANIEL SHERMAN, a Connecticut newspaperman, is a correspondent for the Federated Press.

MCALISTER COLEMAN is the head of the information bureau of the New Jersey Utility Users' League.

MARGARET BOURKE-WHITE is a well-known photographer.

EDGAR SHEFFIELD BRIGHTMAN is a member of the Department of Philosophy at Boston University.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE contributes reviews and criticism to various periodicals.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 7, 1935 No. 3657

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 141

EDITORIALS:

"They'd Rather Live on Relief" 144
Moscow Offers an Olive Branch 145
Germany's Heavy Burden 145
Three Inches of Human Knowledge 146
ISSUES AND MEN. GOVERNMENT BY GANGSTERS. By Oswald Garrison Villard 147
CARTOON. S. O. S. By LOW 148
ENVOY BIDDLE, FAITHLESS TRUSTEE. By William Francis 149
THE NEW MACHADO IN CUBA. By Carleton Beals 152
THE BUSY UTILITY COMPANIES. By Fred Woltman 154
CORRUPTION, SACRED AND PROFANE. By Raymond Gram Swing 155
CORRESPONDENCE 157

LABOR AND INDUSTRY:

Can Hotels Pay 18 Cents An Hour? By Elinore Morehouse Herrick 159
"Every Man a Penny." By Heywood Broun 161
"Just Paddle 'Em Down the Road." By Richard Neuberger . . 162

BOOKS:

Spivak, Star Reporter. By James Rorty 163
Soviet Salvation. By Ludwig Lewisohn 163
Heredity and Disease. By David Beres 164
Four Rebels. By Mason Wade 165
Renaming Old Directions. By Kenneth Burke 166
Merrill Moore. By Eda Lou Walton 166
Shorter Notices 167
Films: "She." By William Troy 168
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 168

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING CHARLES ANGOFF

ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of subscriber's address.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by the Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

FEELINGS AGAINST NAZI GERMANY have justifiably risen in this country in consequence of the renewed persecution of Jews and Catholics, but New York expressed them in two episodes which cannot be excused even on the plea of impetuosity. One is Mayor LaGuardia's refusal to license a German masseur because of alleged discrimination against American Jews in Germany. The other is the riot on board the Bremen. The Mayor need only recall the time when Big Bill Thompson was "running King George out of Chicago" to realize how absurd a mayor can be who takes up a private war with a foreign government. And he is only a little less absurd if his war is in a worthier cause than that of "pure" history for Chicago school children. The riot on the Bremen is not even an outburst of impetuosity, but is the first of a series of similar disturbances to be staged on every German ship that harbors in New York. Mayor LaGuardia and the Communists who pulled down the Bremen's flag have no knowledge of German conditions if they believe their action weakens the Nazi regime. It may influence those who make policy, but an illegal outburst rallies to the German government more than one waverer who becomes indignant over the treatment of Germany and Germans abroad. The fight against fascism must be waged, but it should be fought first against fascist tendencies in this country, where there is a real threat to traditional liberties. The State Department has smoothed over the incipient troubles from the New York excesses, but it was near to having to make a humiliating apology to the Nazi government for American lawlessness.

WE FAIL TO UNDERSTAND why the President is afraid to come out in the open against the Tydings-McCormack sedition bill. One nod from him, and that assault on the democratic liberties of the nation will not be "given a rule" in the House, and so will never come to a vote. It slipped through the Senate by accident, at a time when only a handful of Senators were present. In the House, Representatives Maverick, Marcantonio, and Amlie did distinguished work in drawing up one of the best arguments on freedom of speech laid before Congress in recent times. Maverick and Amlie signed a strong minority report against the bill. But the committee shut its eyes to its real intent, pretended that it was needed to stop communist inroads in our fighting forces, and reported it out. The chambers of commerce and the patriotic societies now are exerting every influence to bring the bill to a vote, trusting that Congressmen who privately know it is dangerous will be afraid to come out openly against it. In this they may be mistaken, as the opposition to the bill is growing, and several other Congressmen, among them Representatives Celler and Duffy of New York and Healey of Massachusetts, have the courage to defend free speech and a free press as a heritage of the party of Jefferson. The President, when asked about the bill at a press conference "had not read it," meaning perhaps: "I don't intend to burn my fingers." Yet the President knows about it, knows there is no communist menace in this country, and no threat to the army and navy, and he knows, too, that the Bill of Rights is in grave danger. The country is being swept by a panic as though a war were in progress, yet only one national leader, Secretary Ickes, has dared to speak up for free speech. The President by a few well-chosen words could restore a sense of proportion to the country, and put an end to the spate of fascist legislation.

SENATOR JOSEPH T. ROBINSON, always an opponent of generous federal aid for public schools, is sponsor for a scheme authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to lend them $10,000,000 without specifying how this is to be distributed. The debts of the public schools now amount to more than three billion dollars, over half of it for back salaries. The late Senator Cutting proposed a $40,000,000 loan, which passed the Senate but was defeated in conference. But Senator Robinson, who voted against the Cutting proposal, is up for reelection in Arkansas, and the schools in his state are in a shocking condition. Under this bill Arkansas can get much more than its share of the appropriation, since the Senator (like Pat Harrison) is one of those Administration leaders who has to be taken care of. He had the bill heard by sub-committee in executive session with only two witnesses appearing, one of them from Arkansas. It was at once reported to the full committee, and then at once to the Senate. There Senator Wheeler offered an amendment providing equitable distribution of the money and permitting no state to receive more than 10 per cent of the total, an amendment which Robinson naturally opposes. As the amount provided is too small to be of much use to the schools it had better not pass at all, since it gives Congressmen the opportunity to say untruthfully that they have done something for the schools. But without the Wheeler amendment it would become still worse, a special kind of campaign fund for Senator Robinson.

THE CONSUMER—another name for Everyman—has little reason to thank the New Deal and Congress. At best he gets a little lip service. When real protection for him is suggested by officials of the AAA they are promptly dismissed. The pure-food-and-drug campaign of the Department of Agriculture is being constantly inhibited by special interests who know how to choke off good legislation. The late Mrs. Mary Rumsey, as head of the Consumers Division of the National Emergency Council, saw how consumers might be stimulated to take an interest in themselves, and the local councils she set up have been a useful beginning. But she had no genuine support, and since her death her organization has been like an anaemic orphan, with little money and few friends. Hers was pioneer work, as this country is far behind most democracies in its appreciation of the potentialities of consumers' cooperation. Though $300,000,000 in business was done by consumers' cooperatives last year, the sum could and should be multiplied ten times. Sweden, for instance, prefers to fight monopolies, not with laws, but simply by giving encouragement to cooperatives, a far more effective curb. We should like to see in this country a persistent, large-scale official support for consumers' cooperation in its every aspect. The Consumers Division of the Emergency Council should be extended and strengthened, and the public should be taught its own strength. We regret to hear that the consumers' division is to be transferred to the NRA, which is like giving it desk room in a mausoleum. Obviously the hope of its opponents is that there it can be killed off without scandal. Unless Washington is going to become exclusively the headquarters for producers, this transfer should be prevented.

NEW SHIPPING LEGISLATION at this session of Congress has been abandoned, according to high Administration officials. This means only that the scandalous Bland-Copeland bill will not be passed by the Senate after its narrow victory in the House. But as we have pointed out before, without any legislation the shipping ring can continue to shovel money out of the Treasury, and the President, if he tries to cancel the mail contracts, will run into prolonged litigation. There must be aggressive legislation. In January the Postmaster General told the President that mail contracts appeared to have been illegally and improvidently awarded, and "that decided changes must be made in the administration of the subsidy." In March the President asked Congress for a new shipping measure, ending mail contracts and other abuses. In June the Senate Investigating Committee urged "immediate, candid, and courageous Congressional action," to end "the sad, miserable, corrupting failure" of present shipping laws which have "resulted in a saturnalia of waste, inefficiency, unearned exorbitant salaries, and bonuses." Nine days later the House passed the Bland bill, which ignored four of the specific recommendations of the President. The next day the Senate withdrew the companion Copeland bill, while word was awaited from the White House. That word has never come. When the President, a Senate investigating committee, and the Postmaster General, concur in excoriating an existing practice in the strongest language, the public has a right to expect action. In this instance, the President must take the lead. If he fails to do so he will be condoning what he himself has condemned.

TEACHERS OF CIVICS will have to revise their account of American government to give more importance to the conference between members of the Senate and House on bills which pass the two bodies in different forms. The banking bill was passed by the Senate without a record vote, the opposition being unable to rally its forces because of a gentleman's agreement to alter the bill in conference. The only hope of defeating the Clark amendment, vitiating the pensions provisions of the social-security bill, is to delete it in conference. This is government by committee, due to the impracticability of government by houses of Congress. It demonstrates the growing awkwardness of the bi-cameral system. Since the Senate does not care to come to grips over a banking bill, and since this bill has passed the House in another form, the Senate chooses to take its defeat in conference. Similarly, the Clark amendment raises issues which members of the Senate do not care to face openly, so they avoid them by leaving the solution to the conference. This would represent a true working of the bi-cameral system only if the Senate were serving wider interests, as representing the states, and the House narrower ones. But this original purpose is now a fiction, and the two houses have the same general outlook. To a great extent they are duplications of service, without one chamber serving in any sense as a check on the other. The forthright way of passing laws would be to let them be examined first in public hearing, be debated publicly in a single chamber, and finally be voted on in public. The present system is a weakening of democracy, since it makes necessary a withdrawal from the public for trades and arrangements. Attitudes toward measures which are awkward to explain can be hidden, and in the end the conference report can be adopted by both houses without the public knowing precisely what happened.

WHEN THE GENERAL STRIKE broke out in Terre Haute, Indiana, on the morning of July 22, it came as a complete surprise to newspaper readers all over the country, although it involved 20,000 people and was the logical climax of a battle that had been in progress for many months over issues vitally affecting all workers. What is more, we are informed on excellent authority that the general strike came as a shock to many of the townspeople of Terre Haute itself, thanks to the silence of the local press concerning developments which finally led to a strike of about one-third of the city's population. The explanation is simple and all too usual. Terre Haute is dominated by a chamber of commerce made up of employers, including, no doubt, the owners of its newspapers. Terre Haute wants new enterprises which in turn want cheap labor and the open shop. Naturally the newspapers play down labor "disturbances." Only a complete stoppage in the town's activities and the declaration of martial law forced the story onto the wires and into the nation's newspapers. The workers at the Columbia Enameling and Stamping Company have been trying for more than a year to put into effect the collective-bargaining provision of the NRA. After a strike last summer, the company, having agreed not to discriminate against the strikers and to arbitrate points in dispute, proceeded to discriminate and refused even to discuss the issue of the closed shop. In March the workers struck again. Until June 15, pickets walked up and down peacefully before the closed plant. There were no disturbances. On that day the company sent seven extra guards to the plant, and a "riot" developed. Subsequently fifty-eight guards were imported from Chicago and sent to the plant. The labor unions, faced with what seemed to be deliberate provocation, threatened and then declared a general strike. It was an amazing demonstration of labor solidarity, but as usual it furnished an excuse for calling out the national guard, tear-gas flowed freely, and the strikers are now thrown back on the mercy of government conciliators. And it is more than possible that Terre Haute will once more recede into editorial silence, while three-legged chickens and gurgling quintuplets occupy the best newspaper boxes. What is news anyway?

THE STATE OF ALABAMA is rapidly forging ahead in the race for the most vicious anti-labor and anti-"red" legislation in the union. One of the most dangerous of its reactionary laws is the so-called Downs law, a Birmingham city ordinance, passed late in 1934. It provides a fine of $100 and/or six months' imprisonment for anyone who "shall print, publish, edit, issue, or knowingly circulate, sell, distribute, or publicly display any book, paper, document, or written or printed matter in any form containing or advocating, advising or teaching the doctrine that organized government should be overthrown by force, violence, or any unlawful means, or shall have in possession more than one copy of any such book, paper, document, or written or printed matter in any form." All convictions under this law have thus far carried the maximum sentence of fine and imprisonment, and the nature of the cases presented indicates clearly that possession of more than one copy of any book or other publication in sympathy with the radical movement is ipso facto evidence of guilt. The National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners has sent an investigating committee to Birmingham, with the special purposes of examining convictions under the Downs law and of testing it in the higher courts.

MOST OF THE BATTLES for the preservation of academic freedom have been fought in the larger colleges and universities, but last month a struggle took place in the Municipal University of Omaha so tragic in its consequences that its chief victim might well become the first real American martyr in the conflict between the vested interests and the free mind. Dr. William E. Sealock, president of the university, committed suicide after being summarily dismissed—while he was out of town on university business—for daring to uphold a set of principles which he expressed thus: "I am determined to defend the fundamental freedom of discussion in educational institutions as one of the most cherished rights in a democratic government, without which the high purpose of education would be lost." Four years before he had been called from his post of dean of Teachers' College of the University of Nebraska to head the University of Omaha. He turned out to be far better than the Board of Regents had hoped. He cleaned out the dead wood in the faculty and replaced it with educators so competent that his institution became one of the bright spots of the West. Some of the professors took a liberal stand on several public questions and one or two of them even expressed doubts about the public service of utility-holding companies. This aroused the ire of the president of the Board of Regents, J. E. Davidson, who is also president of the Nebraska Power Company. Dr. Sealock courageously stood by his men, with the result that he and his faculty were denounced as rank communists and atheists. The university was "investigated," but so little of a "dangerous" nature was discovered that even the local Hearst paper, the Omaha Bee-News, was dubious of the entire proceedings. Then the Regents took advantage of Dr. Sealock's aforementioned absence from the city, suddenly found him lacking in "the desired executive ability," and fired him. Dr. Sealock's subsequent efforts to obtain an explanation were fruitless, and out of desperation he took poison.

TWO RECENT DEMONSTRATIONS seem to bring the citizens' airplane or "flying flivver" nearer to actuality. There is no concealing the fact that progress has been slow for though flying is nearly as old as automobiling it is still almost as completely an expert's job as it was twenty-five years ago. In part that may be because the whole emphasis has been upon extending the limits of what the most highly qualified expert in the most elaborate plane can do rather than upon the development of a machine for everyday use. But whatever the cause, the fact remains that little has been done to popularize flying in the past thirty-two years. Eighteen months ago the Bureau of Air Commerce undertook to sponsor the development of a "flivver" required to be "fool proof," to attain a speed of 100 miles per hour, and to be manufacturable at a cost sufficiently low to permit a purchase price of $700. According to Eugene L. Vidal, director of the bureau, more progress would have been made if an aviation lobby opposed to anything which would make planes less costly had not tied up a proposed $900,000 PWA appropriation, but a machine manufactured by the Hammond Aircraft Company and demonstrated lately at Detroit is said to have met all the specifications except for its failure quite to reach the required speed. According to Mr. Vidal its absolute refusal to stall removes the cause of 70 per cent of the fatal accidents occurring to amateur flyers. The demonstrator simulated the most dangerous of all mishaps by stopping the motor fifty feet from the ground during a take off and permitted the plane to land itself. He also, imitating a frightened operator, drove it into the ground without levelling off for a landing. In both cases, not only he but also the plane remained unharmed. There seems little doubt that only high cost and the need for expert operation stand in the way of the large-scale development of a civilian airplane.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

"They'd Rather Live on Relief"

THERE is a growing propaganda to the effect that the unhappy millions in this country now living on relief are unwilling to take jobs. In part this is the new version of the old saw that anybody who really wants a job can get one. But it is also part of the offensive against a standard of living which, low as it is among many sections of our population, is still too high for employers who feel that the only way out of a depression is to tighten the other fellow's belt by cutting wages and lengthening hours.

Lieutenant General Robert Lee Bullard has asserted in the Hearst press, after a "nationwide survey of the relief situation" that "we have recognized in this country a new 'inalienable right'—the right of an individual to indefinite support at public expense and regardless of private employment available." "It indicates a breakdown," he continues, "in the primary characteristics of the American citizen—initiative, independence, self-reliance." Seventy-five per cent of those on relief, he concludes, are content to stay there.

Unfortunately such propaganda falls sweetly upon the ears of an Administration harried by the staggering cost of relief which shows no sign of abating for years to come; and the last two weeks have recorded an assault upon relief clients by both national and state governments that is calculated to yield a bumper crop of misery. On July 22 federal and state relief in South Dakota was stopped "until all farmers needing men to help with the harvest have been supplied with such help"; several other midwestern states adopted the same policy in somewhat less drastic form; and from Washington orders were issued to deny relief to anyone refusing employment.

We agree with General Bullard that living on relief is demoralizing—we agree so heartily that we look forward to the time when a collective economy will make the dole unnecessary. But it is clear that his "nationwide survey" was of the usual Hearst variety; and a few facts culled from local relief officials are enough to refute his libelous generalizations against millions of unemployed workers. He cites among others the example of the raspberry crop in Hammonton, New Jersey, part of which went to waste "because of lack of labor during the week in which a sales tax for support of the unemployed became effective." This in spite of the fact that the pay according to the growers was "about $2" a day, depending on the number of pints picked. But the testimony of Spurgeon Cross, director of the Atlantic County FERA, casts a somewhat different light on the situation. We quote from the New York Herald Tribune:

> Mr. Cross said that his office was ready to supply as much help as the growers needed but that the growers had been unwilling to pay the round-trip fare between Atlantic City and Hammonton, about eighty-five cents. Most of the pickers, he said, preferred to live at home, commuting each day. In past seasons pickers and their families have lived in shacks near the raspberry patches, five or six in a room, and have had to buy most of their own food. . . .

Aside from the red tape that must be cut to get back on the relief rolls once an unemployed person has taken a job, however temporary, we should find it difficult to reproach a worker who was either self-respecting (even though on relief) or moderately intelligent enough to refuse to take a job which might pay $2, if he were lucky, minus 85 cents for carfare. But $2 is far above even the official average wage for farm labor in the United States. According to data just issued by the Department of Agriculture, farm wages range from 70 cents a day in South Carolina to $2.55 in Massachusetts with an average of $1.41 for the whole country without board. As for working conditions and the factors which often reduce the day's wage let us examine the report of a relief official in the South who set out to discover just why people on relief had refused jobs. In this case it was the strawberry crop. For some reason there was little response to the demand for pickers, although the growers held out promises of transportation, food, and lodging, and $1.50 to $2 a day "clear money." We quote a few of the findings of the investigator.

> Transportation was indeed furnished, one way, to the fields. The dissatisfied, the cheated, and those who quit when the picking gave out, got back as best they could which in some cases meant walking thirty-five to forty miles empty-handed and empty-bellied. The good picker who could earn $1.50 to $2 per day "clear money" was not in evidence at any of the twenty-one farms surveyed. The standard rate was 1½ cents a quart of berries picked. Although two cents had been mentioned at the reemployment office as the rate offered on some farms, no defection upward from the norm was discoverable. . . . A grower's agent was quoted as saying that "a fair picker can pick between 100 and 150 quarts a day." At ten of the farms investigated the mean picking was forty to sixty quarts.

The "housing" promised by the growers consisted of old barns and shacks with as many as twenty people, old and young and of both sexes, crowded into a room of ordinary size. As for food its quality may be imagined—and often the pickers were cheated out of it. The report continues:

> The fancy promises of $1.50 to $2 a day "clear money" boiled down to exactly this on the first week's pay-off: twenty cents to one dollar for a work-week. The best exhibit of earning power was presented by a white family, father and mother and two children who had been shipped in by the relief authorities. The family of four netted $3.30 collectively for six days in the fields.

Finally we offer the testimony of a man who has been working in the harvest fields of Ohio for 15 cents an hour or $1.50 a day. He writes to The Nation as follows:

> The minimum wage paid for unskilled labor in the WRA is $44 for a month of 130 hours—32½ hours a week. Compare this with $36 for a month of 240 hours, about 60 hours a week, for making hay in the same locality. Lest anyone should say that the wages on relief work are too high, I quote a few prices in the village where I live while working in the harvest fields at $1.50 a day. No house here with a bathroom in it rents for less than $18 a month; most rents are $20 to $50 a month. Here are prices: 25 pounds of sugar $1.40; 1 loaf whole wheat bread $.11; 1 box matches, $.05; 2 small veal chops, $.15; 1 peck potatoes, $.29. Add to everything but bread a 3 per cent sales tax. How can a man support a family on $36 a month?

Moscow Offers an Olive Branch

BY progressive steps the USSR has been moving steadily into position as a world power, dealing with other powers on terms of equality through diplomatic measures of the accepted capitalistic variety aiming at its own security and political and economic advantage. Socialism within the Soviet Union, in the sense of the nation-wide development of state-owned industrial and agricultural enterprises, has grown by almost geometic progression. But international socialism, as directed from Moscow, has pari passu at every point in Russia's reorientation as a Great Power, moved into its eclipse. It is many years since the Foreign Office at Moscow issued its last magnificent theoretical denunciation of the imperialist tactics of the capitalist world. Chicherin's notes, once the joy and the terror of conventional diplomacy, were long ago replaced by the cautious jockeying-for-position of the typical foreign secretary. And with that change came the virtual extinction of the Communist International. The red-baiters of other lands might voice alarm over the menace of world revolution, but revolutionists knew that their international was sleeping if not dead—anesthetized by its leaders in Moscow. Loyal Stalinists, of course, defended the official Communist policy. The security of the socialist fatherland must come before all else; until that was finally established no other revolutionary effort could expect substantial support—not the death struggle of the workers in Germany, nor the valiant, hopeless stand of the revolutionists of Spain. With equal vehemence anti-Stalin revolutionary groups have opposed the "treason" of Moscow: its support of the League of Nations, its treaties with imperialist powers, its abandonment of the international program of revolutionary action. Stalin's government has remained scornfully unmoved, determined to build what defenses it could, no matter what the cost to world revolution, against the threat of attack from Japan on the east and from Germany on the west. Its diplomacy became the subtle instrument of national security instead of the mouthpiece of international communism.

The confusion which this policy spread among the revolutionary parties of the West cannot be exaggerated. Inevitably the movement, never united, degenerated still further into factional warfare. Attempts at united action against the common enemies—economic exploitation, imperialism, war, fascism—broke down in the face of the fratricidal bitterness generated on the left. In America, at least, nearly every united-front effort has been doomed by the expressed determination of the Communist Party to rule or ruin. For this reason the report of a new policy emanating from Moscow is of wide importance. The Communist International, meeting after an interval of six years, has promulgated a program of reconciliation with its enemies of the left, and has called for a united labor party of all groups in every country which oppose fascism. This is strategically a brilliant maneuver: it side-steps the world revolution, offers no threat to the non-fascist countries with which Russia has made agreements, and at the same time extends an olive branch to the left opposition groups which they may view with some suspicion but can hardly refuse. And if the policy proves successful, the USSR will have done more to strengthen its defenses than could be accomplished by a dozen mutual security pacts. But to recognize the self-interested motives behind the maneuver is by no means to oppose it or to minimize its importance.

The USSR is menaced by Nazi Germany; but all Europe and Asia and America are menaced by the economic and political barbarism that Nazi Germany exemplifies. In the political democracies of the West, the manifestations of fascism multiply wherever industrial tension offers an excuse for economic exploitation and political repression. Ironically enough, the revolutionary opponents of democracy are inevitably driven to its defense in order to keep intact any of the liberties which permit them to pursue their revolutionary ends. It may well be that the basic conflict of the next ten years will be not between capitalism and revolution but between fascism and democracy—a struggle in which the forces of revolution must support and win the support of all the friends of democracy, while the forces of capitalism will gradually, and often unwillingly, form an alliance with the cohorts of fascism.

We do not anticipate an immediate and happy reunion of the scattered hosts of freedom. The revolutionary lions and the liberal lambs will approach one another with gingerly steps and suspicious eyes and avoid the same bed as long as posible. But if they keep their attention fixed on the universal enemy, an honestly united front may emerge, based on the compelling logic of self-preservation. The hope of the world may depend upon the reality behind the pronouncement of the Third International at Moscow.

Germany's Heavy Burden

THE decisive weight of the Reichswehr in German affairs has once more been revealed in the sudden decision to call off the campaign of persecution of Jews, Catholics, and steel helmets. General Werner von Blomberg himself modified the conditions for entry into the army, so that half-Jews can be received, or to cite the German stipulation, men with not more than two complete non-Aryan grandparents. And Hitler's Bavarian holiday was invaded by Von Blomberg and General Göring to appraise the effect of recent events on foreign, especially British, opinion. Now the more rabid of Hitler's supporters have been put in leash. But the relaxation of terror is no sign that the fundamental economic strain in Germany is lessening.

A few days ago the New York Herald Tribune commented on the difficulty of establishing the true financial status of a dictatorship. Dr. Schacht demonstrated the truth of the statement not long ago. At the suggestion of several important financiers in the British capital, the London Economist had made an effort to discover the real state of Germany's finances. In the course of the inquiry its investigators made the amazing discovery that the Reich had a secret debt of twenty-five billion marks over and above its officially acknowledged foreign obligations. This was a charge that had to be answered, for Germany's ability to obtain foreign credit is her vulnerable point. The Economist, Dr. Schacht declared, had been misinformed. Germany's secret debt amounted to not more than twenty-two billion marks.

Conservative experts estimate that the Reich is carrying unfunded internal loans of from seven to nine billion dollars, the larger part in short-term obligations. Reich Finance Minister Krosigk-Schwerin admits that the government has drawn "many millions" out of the reserve funds of the insurance companies and the cash reserves of the nation's savings banks, in exchange for its I. O. U's. How large a total sum has been confiscated in this way was not made known. A government which lays its hands on the savings of a nation without tangible security in the shape of gold reserves or other assets is no better than the fraudulent banker who borrows the deposits of his customers on his personal note. It is known that the government has been operating for months with forced loans from financiers, traders, and industrialists, amounting to two thousand million marks. The great trusts were assessed to the tune of $250,000,000 to finance Schacht's dumping program, but persons who should know are convinced that the money has long since been used for military expenditures. Between August and October, they say, will come a new raid on the nation's private resources. It is generally admitted that Dr. Schacht has been guilty of financial juggling of a high order. His business transactions with the Gold Discount Bank, says the London Times, are anything but ethical. They violate the very fundamentals of honest business dealing.

In the field of private business the outlook is just as discouraging. Living costs have gone up 6 per cent in the last four months. The total wage has been increased enormously as the result of the boom in the munitions industries, but the average wage of the unskilled worker is 18 per cent lower than it was four months ago. The fact that these industries employ more than the ordinary ratio of skilled labor kept the average wage from falling below the actual figure of 8½ per cent. Meanwhile manufacturers, both large and small, are making a determined effort to force still more drastic wage reductions.

This ruthless wage policy has produced disaffection such as Germany has not known since the inception of the Third Reich. There are well authenticated reports of wage movements in the Saxon textile areas and in the industrial sections of central Germany. The government, of course, has denied the stories. But the greater immediate danger lies in the growing unrest among the small business men whom both the public and the government accuse of profiteering. Housewives are resorting to consumers' strikes, while the authorities decree protective arrest for the victims of its irresponsible economic measures, alienating the sympathies of those who were once the Third Reich's most faithful supporters.

There are unmistakable signs of disintegration in the National Socialist regime. With the exception of the enormous Nazi bureaucracy there is hardly a group or class in the nation that is satisfied with the present state of affairs. Militarism is taking its heavy toll. Every man, woman, and child in the country is paying ten marks ($4) per month for "national defense" and no amount of financial manipulation can conceal this intolerable burden.

Three Inches of Human Knowledge

THE Columbia University Press announces the publication of a one-volume encyclopedia, "compassing human knowledge in 5,000,000 words and three inches of shelf space." While we have not yet had the privilege of examining the volume the press release on its contents offers food for thought. President Nicholas Murray Butler is quoted in it as saying that "the contents are uncolored by the private judgment or opinion of individuals. . . . Facts are objectively presented and speak for themselves." If this is so, the Columbia Encyclopedia is unique in the world's literature, and will remain a literary curiosity long after its facts are out of date. But an examination of the announcement, devoted mostly to an enumeration of the amount of space given to various subjects, casts considerable doubt on President Butler's claim.

The longest biography in the encyclopedia is that of Julius Caesar, 2,800 words. If this seems to put the author of "all Gaul is divided into three parts" into an unduly prominent position, let us look further. Four other persons have biographies more than 1,500 words long. They are George Washington, Mary Queen of Scots, Lincoln, and Bismarck. Theodore Roosevelt gets 1,400 words and Bernard Shaw, 400; Napoleon, with 1,350, is only 200 ahead of Herbert Hoover—who, however, noses out his successor, the inventor of the New Deal, by 300. The German philosopher, Hegel, is allotted 1,380 words; Jesus Christ, however, rates only 1,200, 75 behind St. Paul. Mussolini, with 850, beats his rival dictator, Herr Hitler, by 100; Senator Hiram Johnson, with 400, is 50 ahead of Senator Borah. Raphael gets 1,450, but Michael Angelo only 900. Ralph Waldo Emerson is permitted 800; Marcel Proust draws but 300; Theodore Dreiser comes off badly with 170, but Sinclair Lewis, who made Main Street famous and coined a new word in "Babbitt," is at the bottom of the list with a paltry 150, only 20 ahead of Mary Pickford and not quite twice as many as Greta Garbo. Lenin manages to capture 1,050 words, but he trails former President Hoover by 50 at that, and he is 300 below Woodrow Wilson. Stalin, with 400, has twice as many as Edna St. Vincent Millay.

It may be, of course, that the words in some of the shorter articles are longer and more ponderous than in those which run to greater space. But it is hardly necessary to point out that, without even any conscious prejudice, the allocation of space to these subjects is not based on fact, as President Butler alleges, but on the exercise of "private judgment," if not of a single person then surely of the editorial board. The board also decided to include a "table of national parks and monuments," and one giving the "source, treatment, and symptoms of poisons." Dr. Clarke F. Ansley, editor-in-chief, is said to have conceived the idea of the one-volume encyclopedia "while raising horses as a hobby on a Michigan farm." The book, he declares, is designed to "give reliable elementary information in language as intelligible as that of a newspaper." This is, in all truth, a modest enough goal to aim at. Whether, in reaching it, credit will accrue to Columbia University remains to be seen.

Issues and Men

Government by Gangsters

WHAT has just occurred in Germany bears out anew the London Times's comment after Hitler's bloody purge of June 30, 1934, that for the first time in history a great government was being run by gangsters and with gangster methods. Adequately to picture what is happening in Berlin one must visualize, if one can, Al Capone and a Dillinger in charge of the city of Chicago and running it as they saw fit. This is no exaggeration. There is vastly more blood upon the head of Adolph Hitler than on all the gunmen in the United States put together—he murdered fully 1,254 in the "purge" of last year alone. Now he has ordered the renewal of the attacks upon the Jews, the Catholics, and the Stahlhelm, and may be counted on to carry on the war against the Protestant clergy.

Whom has Hitler just placed in charge of the Berlin police? A man of high character, sworn to uphold the law, to keep order, to protect all classes in the community? Not at all. He has installed a notorious Jew-baiter, Count Wolf von Helldorf, who was himself in 1930 sentenced to six months' in jail for instigating anti-Jewish riots and taking a leading part in them. If this is the proper course of action, then Mayor LaGuardia is entitled to go to the Tombs to pick his next chief of police. This is serving notice upon all the Brown Shirts and police in Berlin that they will be protected however much they may maltreat or torture the Jews, men or women—for defending a woman from Brown Shirts an American naval cadet has found himself in jail. Naturally the Nazis have turned around and declared that the responsibility for all this rests upon the Jews—that their "provocative attitude" gave rise to this righteous outburst of mob violence against them. Men and women living in terror of their lives for the last two and one-half years deliberately invited mob indignities and violence! That is what the rest of the world is asked to believe.

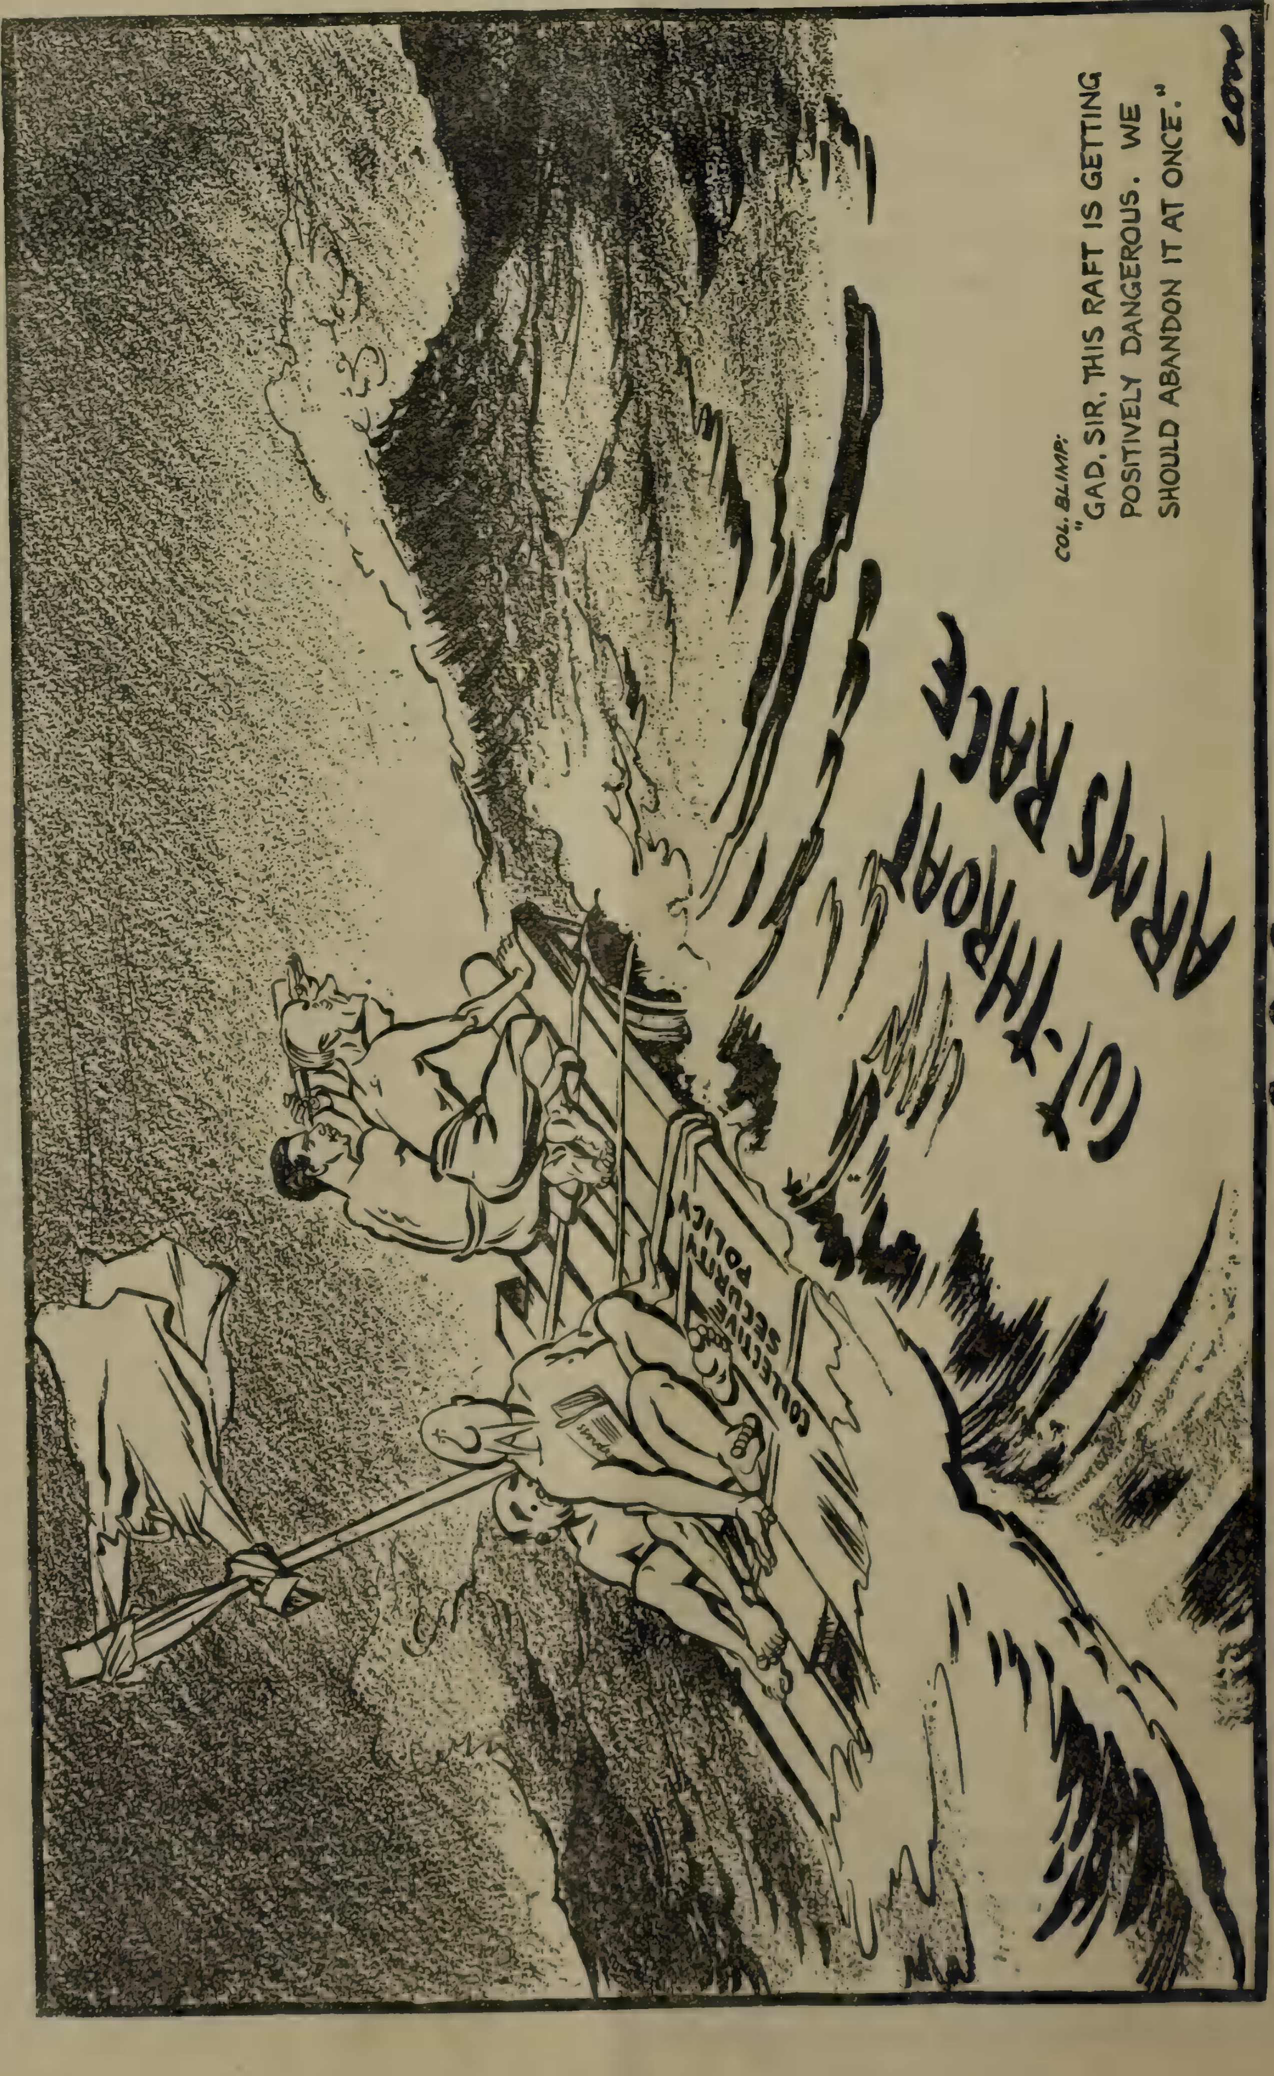
If that is characteristic of a certain German mentality, so is the wholesale admission by Hitler that Germany is not united under him, by his again declaring war upon the Catholics and the Stahlhelm. The Concordat with the Vatican, so praised as proof of Hitler's and Göring's statesmanship, has all but gone by the board, the Vatican making protest after protest against its violation, and Hitler in turn demanding that the clergy subordinate itself to his state and to his orders under penalty of immediate arrest. As for the Stahlhelm, that association of officers who served in the war, how many times have we not been told that it had been "gleichgeschaltet," that, especially in view of Hitler's rearming Germany, it was entirely in sympathy with the Nazis? Again and again we have had Hitler's assurance that the solidarity of Germany behind him was beyond question, and that all but a handful of malcontents were on his side. Now we know that that is far from the truth, and the fact is confirmed by a statement of Dr. Robert Ley, the Nazi dictator of labor, on July 22. There is "still a long road ahead," he said, before the last German "regardless of whether he be Protestant or Catholic" has been converted to Nazism, "only through which the German people can become eternal."

The way to bring that about of course is to beat up and imprison anyone who does not agree with you. That is the method that has notoriously succeeded during the world's history in converting people to one's beliefs. But of course the appointment of Count von Helldorf, and of Hans Kerrl, as Under Secretary of Church Affairs in the Reich Ministry of the Interior, is proof positive that the Nazi party itself is not unanimous. These men represent the radical wing and as such their appointment must be unpalatable to the more conservative side, and to those officials like Dr. Schacht, who know that every new outburst of intolerance and violence injures the German nation in every country outside of its borders. Finally, it is quite characteristic of Hitler that while these things are happening and all Germany, according to the dispatches before me, is in a state of tension and fear of another bloody purge, he himself has ducked and disappeared. He is reported on a yachting cruise in Norway, the significance of which will doubtless become clearer in the course of the next few days.

Profoundly grieved as I am at the renewed attacks upon the Jews, I rejoice heartily over these latest developments. They must open the eyes of those Americans who have just returned from Germany to tell us that all was harmony and union there; they must convince any open-minded person that the dictator has not yet had his way with all the German people; and they have certainly refreshed the memory of millions as to the gangster character of the Hitler government. Americans are thus reminded once more that because a dictator can make trains run on time, clean the streets, drive the beggars into hiding, and supply bread and circuses, it does not mean that there is either genuinely good government or happiness among the people. There is every evidence that in Germany as in Italy there is a steady sinking of the standard of living. The newspapers report the closing of one German factory after another. Is it surprising, therefore, that it has been decided to whip up the party loyalty by attacks upon the Jews and the Catholics? That is the oldest trick of the dictator. "When things are going badly with you, start something," runs the rule. Give your followers something to attack. If there is an enemy to concentrate upon at home, so much the better. If there is none, why there is always an Abyssinia available, there is always the sacred honor of the country to be avenged. Hitler's course is no different from the conventional one of the dictator. But when he attacks the Stahlhelm he plays with fire; it is closely allied with the Reichswehr and that organization, which can break Hitler overnight if it chooses, is well aware of what is going on.

Oswald Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW



CUT-THROAT ARMS RACE
COLLECTIVE SECURITY POLICY
LOW

COL. BLIMP: "GAD, SIR, THIS RAFT IS GETTING POSITIVELY DANGEROUS. WE SHOULD ABANDON IT AT ONCE."

S. O. S.

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press

LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Envoy Biddle, Faithless Trustee

By WILLIAM FRANCIS

WHEN Anthony J. Drexel Biddle, Jr., clubman, sportsman, and financier, sailed to take up his post as United States Minister to Norway, to which he had just been appointed, he carried the full confidence of James A. Farley, Frank C. Walker, and others high in Democratic Party councils who for a long time have felt that Mr. Biddle was eminently fitted to represent the American people in a diplomatic post.

Less implicit will be the faith reposed in the new envoy by the stockholders and creditors of the bankrupt Sonora Products Corporation, formerly known as the Acoustic Products Company, of which Mr. Biddle was a director. Their contention that Mr. Biddle and three of his associates in the Acoustic directorate betrayed their trust by appropriating a contract belonging to the company by diverting upwards of a million dollars in profits into their own pockets was upheld by Judge Swan in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in September, 1934. By this decision Mr. Biddle was held liable, jointly and severally with three of his fellow directors of Acoustic, to account for and reimburse the amount diverted.

Mr. Biddle was in Paris when the blow came, sojourning in the palatial Biddle hotel particulier in the Street of the Holy Fathers, but through his attorneys he twice applied to the United States Supreme Court for a review of the decision, which twice was denied him. Having exhausted every legal recourse, Mr. Biddle, using the latent diplomatic ability with which Messrs. Farley, Walker, et al., had long credited him, began negotiations upon his return to the United States in the spring of this year for a quiet, peaceful settlement of his million-dollar liability.

The creditors, knowing their debtor to be a member of the internationally wealthy and honorable Drexel-Biddle banking family, anticipated no difficulty. Further assurances as to Mr. Biddle's solvency lay in the fact that he had married successively into two of the greatest American fortunes, thus associating himself with the Duke tobacco and the Boyce Thompson mining millions.

Moreover at about this time there were intimations that Mr. Biddle's powerful political admirers were at last about to use the diplomatic talents which they knew him to possess. Some newspapers had him slated for a ministerial assignment to the Irish Free State; others for diplomatic service to Austria. In the salons of Paris, New York, Newport, and Washington the only question was whether Mr. Biddle was not to ornament an even more imposing capital than Dublin or Vienna. Wherever he went, "Tony" Biddle's friends knew he would do well and be a credit to his country.

All this looked rather cheerful to the attorneys representing the despoiled stockholders and creditors of bankrupt Sonora or Acoustic. It was patent that, after all, one couldn't be a minister plenipotentiary with a thing like this hanging over one's head. Under the circumstances what was a million dollars to the Boyce Thompson fortune? The creditors expected the settlement to be not only peaceful but prompt. But Mr. Biddle quickly disillusioned them, and before the matter finally was settled and signed he had suffered the indignity of being placed under a $100,000 bail bond. The whole trouble, Mr. Biddle said, was that he was not a rich man. On the contrary he represented himself as being entirely without assets. Nevertheless he could manage to offer $70,000 of which he could raise $25,000 in cash; for the balance he would give notes. He offered to prove his personal impecuniosity by submitting his finances to examination. Hearings which lasted for several days began in New York on April 24 before Harold P. Coffin, Referee in Bankruptcy, and the minutes make interesting reading in the light of Mr. Biddle's recent appointment.

Questioned by counsel for the trustee in bankruptcy for the Sonora concern, Mr. Biddle branded as false all accounts of his then-impending appointment to a diplomatic post. These persistent reports of his coming preferment, he insisted, were pure canards. But certain quiet rumors of Mr. Biddle's lavish contributions to Democratic Party funds were fully substantiated. Mr. Biddle confirmed the fact that, after the judgment had been found against him, he, in Paris, wrote and sent a check for $25,000 to Frank C. Walker, treasurer of the "Pre-Convention Roosevelt Campaign Deficit Fund." It was not made clear whether this fund had to do with the Roosevelt campaign of 1932 or the anticipated campaign of 1936.

At a subsequent session of the hearing Mr. Biddle, having "gone over his books," said he wished to add something to the record. He announced he had "discovered" another check made out to "Democratic Committee, George Earle for Governor." This check, also for $25,000, was to assist Mr. Earle in his campaign last fall for the governorship of Pennsylvania. Mr. Biddle said he had handed it to him in London as Mr. Earle was leaving for the boat that was to carry him back to America and victory in the Quaker State. On February 1, 1935, Mr. Biddle sent a check for $5,000 to James W. Gerard, former Ambassador to Germany and now chairman of the Finance Committee of the Democratic National Committee.

None other than Mr. Gerard himself represented Mr. Biddle in the negotiations preceding the final settlement and it was not necessary for the creditors' attorneys to point out to him that gifts made by his principal since the judgment were, under the law, recoverable for the creditors. Mr. Gerard required nothing to be pointed out. He offered, on behalf of his client, $160,000 cash in full settlement. This was accepted. The sum, while less than had been expected, did, as the attorneys for the creditors pointed out, represent more than the actual profits realized by Mr. Biddle in the deal, which were approximately $150,000. Mr. Gerard thought Mr. Biddle's offer a handsome one.

In a letter acknowledging receipt of the contribution of $5,000—which turned up at the hearing but as to the present whereabouts of which everyone seems a trifle uncertain—Mr. Gerard without doubt expressed even greater enthusiasm for Mr. Biddle's generosity to the Democratic Party. Nor was he the only party chieftain to express his gratitude. Mr. Farley dropped his work at the Post Office long enough to write a glowing tribute to Mr. Biddle's altruism and Frank C. Walker, already preoccupied with the grave problems which he soon was to assume as head of the President's almost-five-billion-dollar works-relief program, took time out to write Mr. Biddle that he would take the first opportunity to bring such largesse to the attention of the Chief Executive.

All these letters have found sanctuary since the hearing at which they were produced. They were not read into the record although a few phrases from them crept into it. But a cable to Mr. Biddle in Paris from Mr. Earle, then campaigning in Pennsylvania, which was read at the hearing, reveals great depths of party gratitude. It said:

> State and national leaders tremendously appreciate your great generosity just when most needed stop Your unselfish help in this and your present efforts and influence may cause powerful Sun-Telegraph published by Hearst, edited by Walmer Jacoby, to support us. These may easily be determining factors in our campaign stop We will not forget what you have done and are doing
>
> GEORGE

Creditors' counsel, by the following line of inquiry, attempted to find out precisely who it was that would not forget:

> Q. When Governor Earle, or Mr. Earle, said to you in his cable "we will not forget what you have done and are doing," do I read it correctly as referring to the fact that the state and national leaders mentioned earlier in the cable will not forget?
>
> A. I really couldn't tell you.
>
> Q. Will you take a look at that cable [handing paper] and see if that also is your understanding?
>
> A. I couldn't tell you what he means.
>
> Q. Do you think Mr. Earle was assuming prematurely the gubernatorial "we" or was he referring to the state and national leaders who are first mentioned in his cable?
>
> A. I don't know.

Mr. Biddle made it clear, however, that no matter whence it came, all this gratitude was misplaced. It should have gone to his wife for, while he sent the checks and accepted the touching acknowledgments of the recipients, it really was Mrs. Biddle who supplied the money and asked him to make the gifts in her name. In fact, he said, at the time the earliest contribution went forward, he was and long had been a victim of that chronic financial embarrassment from which he was suffering at the time of Judge Swan's decision. Mr. Biddle declared he had owed $1,115,779.66 to his first wife, the former Mary Duke, at the time of their separation in 1931. By last autumn he was already very substantially indebted to the present Mrs. Biddle, was without income-producing investments, and had no means of paying his living expenses except as procured through her. With the exception of his desk and chair all the furniture in his $7,000-a-year office was her property. But he still belonged to twenty-three of the most exclusive and costly clubs in Europe and America. He was in debt and in no position to make political contributions. They all came from Mrs. Biddle who had him send them in his name "because she wanted to have it appear that way."

> Q. And I put it to you that the reason you and Mrs. Biddle wanted it to appear that way was in connection with some proposed or possible appointment which would come to you in the service of the United States Government.
>
> A. No, sir. I believe she wanted me, as her husband, to appear to be making the donation; it was simply a matter of wishing me to act in her behalf.
>
> Q. Have you since September 28, 1934, made any further contribution or contributions to Mr. Walker—to the fund about which I am inquiring?
>
> A. Not I; if my wife did I don't know.
>
> Q. You would not know whether she did or did not?
>
> A. No. . . .
>
> Q. Was there any discussion with Mr. Farley at any time since September 28, 1934, with respect to your appointment in connection with any post in the United States Government?
>
> A. When there was an erroneous report in the newspapers that I was going to be sent to one of the countries of Europe which was absolutely unfounded, I just mentioned I had seen it in a paper in the country to which I was reported to be going. I simply said, "It just shows how they get things wrong." He just laughed.
>
> Q. That was a conversation you had with Mr. Farley?
>
> A. Or words to that effect.
>
> Q. When approximately was that conversation?
>
> A. In the last two or three months. It was shortly after we came back here because I had been sent some clippings that I was going to this particular country. I had not heard anything about it. I cabled over here and said: "Will you please find out what it is all about?" After a week he wired me back, "You need not worry. There is nothing in it."

Before signing the written transcript of his testimony some time later Mr. Biddle desired to add to or amend some of his statements relating to Earle, Walker, and Farley. Supplementing his testimony as to Governor Earle, he said: "Mr. Earle wrote us a letter which I do not now have concerning several personal matters and mentioning the Roosevelt pre-convention deficit and suggesting that we might want to help out as he felt that Roosevelt stood between us and revolution." Adding to his statement concerning conversations with Mr. Walker, Mr. Biddle said: "Mr. Walker has said to me that he hoped that some day I would go into the diplomatic service as he thought I was qualified for it."

Amending his testimony relating to Mr. Farley, Mr. Biddle made it clear that it was another friend and not Mr. Farley who wired, in response to his cable, telling him not to worry as there was "nothing to it." He remembered that Mr. Farley once had said to him: "I would like to see you have a post."

In Trustee's Exhibits Numbers 35 and 36, which were letters from Mr. Walker and Mr. Farley and which are not now on file in the referee's office, certain other letters from Democratic high places were referred to but neither Mr. Biddle nor his $7,500-a-year secretary had been able to find them.

The case which Judge Swan found against Mr. Biddle and three of his former associates involved what the court referred to as their dereliction as directors of the Acoustic Company. Judge Woolsey, of the United States District Court, before whom the original trial took place in June, 1932, absolved Biddle and his codefendants of the charge of conspiracy and disloyalty to their company. He found they had acted in good faith and exonerated them from any liability. The Court of Appeals, speaking through Judge Swan, affirmed Judge Woolsey's decision as to all of the defendants except Biddle, two other directors of Acoustic, and an agent who later became a director. Each of these he held to be jointly and severally liable to account for and reimburse the creditors for the amount diverted.

The case had to do with the appropriation by these men of certain contract rights owned by the Acoustic Company. Chartered in 1927 to deal in phonographs, radios, and similar apparatus, this concern, in 1928, desired to acquire rights to manufacture under basic patents in the radio field. The DeForest Radio Company, then in bankruptcy, possessed such rights and the Acoustic Company opened negotiations with W. R. Reynolds and Company, which controlled the DeForest situation under a contract by which it expected to purchase 600,000 shares of DeForest stock at fifty cents a share, lift the receivership, and reorganize the DeForest Company. Conducted in part by Mr. Biddle, these negotiations were successful in obtaining for Acoustic from Reynolds a contract whereby Acoustic would be allowed to purchase 200,000 DeForest shares for $100,000 cash, have four of the nine places on the reorganized DeForest board, and "handle the managing, operating, and selling" of DeForest products.

Acoustic accepted this contract and instructed its president, Percy L. Deutsch, to endeavor to obtain the $100,000 by which Acoustic might carry out its contractual obligations when the time came for payment. That was on April 9, 1928. A few days later Mr. Deutsch, who at the time owed Acoustic $125,000 on an overdue note secured by collateral, reported his inability to procure the necessary $100,000 for the company and announced that "several individuals were desirous of accepting said proposition on their own behalf" and were willing to extend to Acoustic the benefits contemplated by the acquisition of the stock. Six weeks later Mr. Biddle told Reynolds that Acoustic was not able to raise the money and asked if there were any objection to dealing directly with him and several of his fellow directors.

"Tony," said Mr. Reynolds, "as long as you are in it and handling it, if you prefer it that way, there is certainly no objection as far as I am concerned."

Both lower and higher courts absolved Mr. Reynolds of the charge of conspiracy and justified his action in selling the stock to Biddle and his group when informed that Acoustic could not take it up. Reynolds was not bound to protect Acoustic's rights; the directors of that company were.

Partial payment for the 200,000 shares was made on April 24 by personal checks drawn by Biddle, Deutsch, and Harris Hammond, the son of John Hays Hammond, and also a director of the Acoustic Company. The receipt for such payment was made out to Acoustic. On May 24, following the conversation between Biddle and Reynolds, the balance was paid and the shares issued to Biddle, Deutsch, Hammond, Victor C. Bell, another Acoustic director, and two other members of the Biddle syndicate.

Possessed of the shares, the syndicate, acting with Reynolds, proceeded, says the Court, "to create an active market for DeForest stock on the Curb Exchange," and "made large profits in selling their shares." The proceeding and the manner of its execution provides a classic example of stock-rigging technique. From something less than $2 a share DeForest was boosted to around $30. When the members of the Biddle syndicate, on May 24, took over their 200,000 shares on the Acoustic contract at fifty cents a share, the stock, in anticipation of the reorganization, was selling in the open market at from $11 to $13.75. By that time Mr. Biddle already had made money in DeForest and on the day he took over 50,000 shares from Acoustic at fifty cents each (that amount being his portion under the syndicate agreement) he was buying 3,000 more shares on the Curb at $12 each. The stock was manipulated over a period of eighteen months and shares which cost Mr. Biddle's syndicate a total of $52,875 realized for its members aggregate profits of $1,795,299. Then the stock languished, sinking to nothingness when, after years had passed, the company still had not produced a single radio.

The position of the creditors was that these profits rightfully belonged to the Acoustic Company inasmuch as the contract which made them possible was the property of the company and could have been taken up by it had an honest effort been made by the directors to enable it to do so.

Judge Swan, in his decision, declared that "no efforts appear to have been made after April 9 to raise for Acoustic the $100,000 required." Neither was there any attempt, he found, to collect the overdue Deutsch note or to realize on the collateral behind it. "Moreover," he adds, "Acoustic did have substantial banking accommodations on June 6 and if these had been made available a few weeks earlier it would have been able to perform its contract with Renyolds and Company."

Even had it not been able to do so there still would have been no justification for the appropriation of the contract by Mr. Biddle and his associates in the group, according to the Court. Judge Swan denied that such a circumstance ever gave directors of a company the right to appropriate company property. He said:

> If the directors are uncertain whether the corporation can make the necessary outlays, they need not embark it upon the venture; if they do, they may not substitute themselves for the corporation any place along the line and divert possible benefits into their own pockets.

This judicial censure of Mr. Biddle and his guilty associates was made in September of last year. It has been published in the official law reports and the records in the case have long been open to public inspection. Despite this fact, official Washington evidently has taken no cognizance of Mr. Biddle's illegal adventure. The fact that he was held by a federal court to have diverted to his own use property of which he was a trustee was no bar to his appointment by the President to a high diplomatic post. It was no bar to the confirmation of that appointment by the United States Senate. At the very outset of his career, the new Minister to Norway has achieved a notable diplomatic victory.

The New Machado in Cuba

By CARLETON BEALS

EIGHTEEN months ago, one balmy Cuban twilight in winter, Colonel Fulgencio Batista—then "the First Chief of the Revolution," now the dictator of Cuba—took me to the annual San Lázaro festival in El Rincón. The roads were filled with careening auto buses and jammed with folk on foot—a river of them, women in bright dresses, men in white—a strange conglomeration of races: Spanish, Negro, Chinese, West and East Indian. The air was filled with the long murmur of gabbling people, the reports of exploding rockets, the faint strains of distant music.

Some blocks away from the little church, we descended from the car and walked unguarded through the dense crowds. The first to recognize Batista was a one-legged peddler, who suddenly uttered a shriek of delight, hopped frantically toward us, spilling his tray of cigarettes, and threw his arms around him. "My Colonel!" he shouted in joyous excitement. Next, an aged Negress, her white hair in curl papers, flung her arms about him. Everybody surged in upon us, from beggars to well-dressed folk; all wished to embrace him, shake his hand, at least touch his sleeve. "Viva Batista!" echoed along the atrium. "At last we shall have justice!"

Batista arrived at the church portals disheveled, laughing, his black eyes shining. The priest hurried forward to greet him. Through a side exit we escaped to the San Lázaro leper hospital. The nuns came fluttering into the parlors with expressions of surprise and curiosity. Over the wine and cake, one of them, frankly enthusiastic for the new revolutionary Grau government, told how during the odious Machado regime she had smuggled propaganda under her skirts to the hospital inmates and had collected money to overthrow the tyranny.

A great throng of people waited for us at the hospital door. Batista's guard, now on hand to open a lane for us, unceremoniously pushed aside a poor guitarist and his little girl of about thirteen, who were singing coplas. Batista reprimanded them sharply. She was a pert little creature, beautiful despite her rags, and had a melodious voice. She improvised verses about Batista:

The man who smokes a big cigar . . .
He came to El Rincón
On the day of San Lázaro
Because he loves the poor. . . .

For fully twenty minutes Batista remained listening. Several times his aides reminded him it was late. Impatiently he motioned them to be silent. Perhaps he was thinking of his own struggle for success; how at about the age of this little girl, he had been cast, an orphan, out on the streets to earn his bread. All the way back during the hour and half ride to Havana, he was silent and became animated again only briefly before he left me at my hotel on the Plaza Central at nine-thirty.

Batista's rise to power has been meteoric. Twenty-five years ago he was a boy in school in an American Quaker missionary establishment in Oriente. A little over twenty years ago, he was an orphan of thirteen adrift in the wide world to struggle or starve. Fifteen years ago he was a day worker in the cane fields, receiving a mere pittance. He has worked at every type of menial labor on the island; port-worker, railway hand, tailor's assistant, mechanic, what not. Five years ago he was court-martial stenographer with the rank of sergeant. Until less than two years ago, he took orders in that capacity; today he gives orders to the whole country.

Batista is no longer the "First Chief of the Revolution," but more than ever he is the first chief of the army, head of the largest, best-equipped, best-paid military machine in the history of Cuba, with absolute power over every phase of Cuba's life. He is now the maker and breaker of presidents.

I have spent days and nights with him. I have seen him beside his cannon and in drawing-rooms; I have heard him harangue his soldiers in mess-halls and speak smiling meaningless formulae at diplomatic gatherings. By his side I have struggled through adoring mobs of people, and I have talked with him quietly in his home and office. With sub-machine guns, I have shot cocoanuts off trees with him. At 4 a. m. Christmas morning, 1933, he borrowed my fountain pen to sign the release of more than 300 political and military prisoners. I have been with him at jolly parties and once was present at Sans Souci when the society folk of Havana snubbed him and his wife by leaving en masse; and I saw the grim hate behind his smile, suaver than usual. Today, eighteen months later, those who took him to Sans Souci are in jail or in hiding and the good society folk are fawning at his feet.

One would have to travel to the Far East to find a similar combination of oily courtesy, intellectual keenness, insight into men, devious astuteness, ruthless purposefulness, and extreme cruelty. Recently I talked with him in his new castle-like residence in Camp Colombia on the outskirts of Havana. As he leaned back luxuriously in his leather-carved chair behind his desk in a room lined with finely bound unread books, while his glance roamed reminiscently out the open French window to the sunlight bathing his garden, I analyzed the features of this man who had come up from the dregs to impose his will and now seeks to surround himself with gentility.

He is a racial blend (not a mixture) of all that is Cuban—white, Negro, Indian, and Oriental. It is impossible to tell exactly where one race ends and the other begins, they are so completely fused. He has the stocky build, broad features, and high cheek-bones of the Indian. His black straight smooth hair gives him a hawk-like quality. His skin has the yellowish tinge of the Oriental; he has the flat nose and dextrous, white-palmed hands of the Negro; but the carriage and bearing of the white. His glance is unique. It has the naive but dominating boldness of the Nordic, the craftiness and sinuosity of the Oriental, the liquid gentleness of the Indian, and the soft fantasy and cringing servility of the Negro slave. Yet his glance is also complete in itself—unified—that of the perfect breed, of a man master of himself and others, with no warring inner complexes, no regrets, no compunctions. In all the varied situations in which I have seen him, he was always the same whatever his superficial manners—quick-witted, good-humored, exquisitely courteous but forceful, calm but decided, ready to act but never hasty, smooth never brusque.

One day at four-thirty Batista sent his car to bring me to Camp Colombia. This presidio is pleasantly situated on high ground with barracks and officers' homes surrounding an extensive grass quadrangle where now frequently Ambassador Jefferson Caffery and Batista go riding together. But in 1933 Batista was supporting the Grau San Martín government which Sumner Welles was bent on destroying and did destroy.

Batista took me over the camp and, in the enlisted men's club, showed me where the sergeants' conspiracy had been hatched that culminated in the coup d'etat of September 4, 1933, which overthrew Welles's puppet De Cespedes government, eliminated the Machado officers Welles had protected, and seated the Grau government in power.

On that occasion Batista assumed control without shedding a drop of blood. Two weeks earlier in the original overthrow of Machado, he had not moved or risked anything. Now he merely took advantage of subsequent uncertainties to insure, not to Cuba as a whole but to the army, the proper benefits. He was promptly hailed as "the Savior" of Cuba. I wrote an article about him then—and tore it up. I had a presentiment he would betray the hopes of Cuba.

Soon after the installation of the Grau government, I sat at Batista's right at a luncheon under the garden trees at the home of Sergio Carbó, a newspaperman and liberator, now hiding from his wrath. This was Batista's first relaxation from purely official duties during nearly four months of stress. He had worked on occasions twenty-eight hours at a stretch. But he revealed not the slightest signs of fatigue. During this period, he had formed a government and dislodged the former revolting Machado officers from the National Hotel, the first bombardment of a skyscraper in history; he had suppressed the Atarés Castle revolt, though all Havana police stations had been seized by the rebels and Camp Colombia and the palace were both bombarded by airplanes; he suppressed two serious rebellions in the interior and dislodged workers' soviets from hundreds of sugar estates, mines, and factories, in some cases after prolonged battle. He had to suppress conspiracy in his own forces. He acted as arbiter in many strikes, often sitting through all-night sessions. Besides multiple political duties he had to reorganize the whole army.

Batista has gotten where he has through no lack of energy, audacity, and ability. But the strain has at last told. When I saw him several months ago, he remarked, "I have been ill, seriously ill. The freshness is gone. When I wake in the mornings now, I can scarcely drag myself from bed." But he is a man whose will is still greater than any physical debility.

Despite the almost accidental aspect of the blow of September 4, Batista declared it had tremendous national significance as a continuation of Cuba's uncompleted struggle for independence. The Grau government, he averred, was the first government of truly Cuban origin in Cuba's history.

"We demand the right to run our own affairs, the right of every free nation. We are not communists, we are hardly socialists, we merely want to liberate Cuba from foreign control. We do not wish to frighten capital, we need capital."

"Cuba has had more American capital than any other country in the world except Canada," I remarked. "Yet it has brought only misery to your people."

"Yes, we must raise living standards," he replied. "That will also benefit the United States. Cuba was once one of America's best customers."

But Batista is no economist, no sociologist. He shows himself completely naive about modern social tendencies. Armored in the military psychology, despite his long years of poverty he is utterly vague about the manner in which the rights of the people, of which he constantly talks, are to be established and maintained. For a time he reveled in popular admiration. He seemed to like the common touch. He addressed great mass-meetings stretching from the palace clear to the harbor Malecón. But presently he called all this "dangerous demagogy." He drew into his shell. Now he talks only to the army and scarcely leaves Camp Colombia, and then, under heavy guard, only to visit Ambassador Caffery or give a machine-gun banquet in the National Hotel to American financial potentates. Such as these helped him to betray the Grau government, and his own efforts to become a popular leader were frozen. Having done nothing to gain further popular support, having betrayed what support he did have and the government he had sworn to uphold, having bowed completely to the behests of Welles and Caffery, he has ended by using his power to destroy all rights.

Batista's type, that of the Latin American caudillo or military chieftain, who leaps from the dregs to whip up a powerful personal and military following to conquer the state, has long commanded the curious attention of novelists and psychologists, but of few sociologists. The Batistas are a sociological phenomenon resulting from militarism, political corruption, race and cultural conflicts, feudal colonialism, imperialism. Depending for victory on desperate rebellion rather than prior mass organization, such ambitious types, however noble their expressed purposes, have invariably failed because the day after their success, not having the wit, ability, or patience to create mass following, they have found their only sure support in machine-guns. The gulf between literate and illiterate, between countryside and urban life, is so vast that popular leaders have usually soon been weaned away from dangerous alliances with the people they promised to help and promptly have become the petty tools of feudal aristocrats, foreign capitalists, and American pro-consuls, thus rapidly converting themselves into hated tyrants against whom new revolutions inevitably have been started. This is what has happened to Batista, except that owing to the gravity of the economic crisis in Cuba, he has forsaken his liberating role more quickly and ruthlessly than is customary.

If today he is idolized by much of the army, otherwise he is the most hated man in Cuba next to Caffery. The Mendieta government, resulting from his treachery, which was set up as a government acceptable to the United States if not to the Cuban people, is today the narrowest, most unpopular clique that has ever governed Cuba, narrower by far than that of Machado. Every political expression of Young Cuba has been routed, the leaders jailed, exiled, murdered.

Antonio Guiteras, the one truly noble figure in all these struggles, went down before Batista's machine-guns on the lonely Matanzas coast.

The Batista-Mendieta government, drained by mounting military costs, has moved on from arbitrary decree to more arbitrary decree, from brutality to greater brutality. Cuba is ruled by the firing squad, by drum-head courts-martial; it is estimated that more than 4,000 persons are crowded in ancient castle prisons, swept by epidemics. To be a member of any but a few pseudo-company unions is punishable by two years imprisonment; to strike is punishable by death. Education has gone by the boards. Over half the working population of the island has been unemployed for years. In March 500,000 persons, representing two-thirds of the population, swept into a general mass strike of protest, which was suppressed by force.

Batista still insists that he believes in democracy, but "vile politics" makes only dictatorship—good dictatorship—possible. And so he rides the storm from day to day, while Sumner Welles periodically brands American journalists who tell the truth as unprincipled and tells the American public (usually on the eve of some new scandal) that all is well in the cemetery known as Cuba.

Batista conceives himself as the strong man, the man of destiny. He is merely a symbol of betrayal, of the tragic weakness of the Cuban people, who are worse off than their forebears under Spanish rule, a symbol of the hypocrisy of Roosevelt's New Deal in Latin America.

The Busy Utility Companies

By FRED WOLTMAN

THE Associated Gas and Electric Company showed a genius for propaganda technique long before the Senate Lobby Investigating Committee caught it the other day destroying records of its fight against the "death sentence" in the holding-company bill.

The Federal Trade Commission's files contain a mass of provocative (and often amusing) private correspondence illustrating its methods. There was, for instance, the Dushore, Pennsylvania, editor who ran a boiler-plate editorial attacking former Governor Pinchot's anti-utility stand. Apparently he never edited it, for following the editorial he printed the informative line, "From Associated Gas and Electric system, Publicity Department, Johnstown, Pa."

Warren Partridge, management executive of Associated, wrote a sharp note to the Johnstown representative. "Will you please let me know why this note appears on this clipping? It appears to me to be rather questionable policy in view of the agitation against utility-company propaganda."

"This editorial," the explanation said, "was furnished to about sixty-three newspapers in our territory and this is the only one that published by whom furnished. This is the first time any of the papers have added to our news items or publications the fact that it was received from our company."

Instructions were given not to send any more editorials for the present.

Again, the Associated Gas and Electric's securities division published a bearish advertisement in Pennsylvania papers. The purpose, according to the commission's examiner, was to induce debenture holders to exchange their bonds for other securities, a frequent practice of Associated.

"Associated operating companies in New York State," it warned, "alone have had their rates reduced by $1,300,000 this year. Reduced rates mean reduced income. Demand for emergency rate reductions is widespread."

Forthwith, H. C. Hopson, directing genius of A.G.E., was notified that the Pennsylvania operating companies were worried by "the prominence given to the large amount of rate reduction in New York alone."

"The Pennsylvania operators believe that this statement will tend to spur on the efforts to reduce rates in Pennsylvania and perhaps have some effect upon the Public Service Commission itself when it is publicly stated that such a very large reduction has been made in one of the neighboring states."

"Please look into this," Mr. Hopson wrote Dr. Daniel Starch, his brother-in-law, former Harvard professor and head of Associated's advertising agency.

"We will be careful not to mention the large amount of rate reductions in New York State" in future Pennsylvania advertising, Dr. Starch was assured after he looked into it.

An inter-office memo from S. J. Magee, vice president, on proposed bills in the New York legislature, said:

> There are certain of these bills that to my mind are very bad and we should do all we can to prevent their passage. . . .
>
> In connection with IX this takes in our Long Island Water Corporation and Mr. Atkin, I think, has discussed this fully with you and the advisability of employing a local attorney to help in getting this bill killed.
>
> III is a very foolish bill, and I cannot conceive of it being passed. Inasmuch as it covers subway and elevated companies, no doubt they will see to it that this bill is defeated.
>
> VIII is a very foolish and unnecessary bill and we should do all we can to kill it. A bill of this kind has been in the legislature practically every year for many years and has never got anywhere.
>
> I do not think we are interested in X at all. XI is a bad bill but I assume the large railway operating companies will see that it gets nowhere.
>
> XII, putting omnibus companies under the Public Service Commission, seems to me would be a good bill. Mr. Stephens, who introduced it in the Assembly, lives in our Brewster area and I know him quite well.
>
> XIII, bringing water companies under the P. S. C., might not be so bad if we had a good commission but under the present one I feel we should oppose this bill.

J. H. Pardee, president of the Utility Management Corporation, Associated management affiliate, wrote Dr. Starch concerning a visit with Alexander Dow of the Detroit Edison Company:

> Mr. Dow told me that his letters carried in the press > of Detroit had an appreciable repressing effect on the press of Detroit and that the local papers in the surrounding territory rather rallied to his support. Russell of Rochester is putting out similar letters.

The files contain an article from World's Work by Philip Cabot, professor of public-utility management at Harvard, pointing out that few, if any industries have ever equalled the service given the consumer by the electric utilities. It bestows high praise on the holding company without which electricity would have been denied in all but large cities for a generation.

"For the next six months the red flag of Power," according to an editorial comment introducing the article, "will be waved before the eyes of 40,000,000 voters. The leading impartial authority here states the case as the record reveals it. On this record of actual achievement the power companies must be judged."

Two months before its publication, as an inter-office memorandum in the Federal Trade Commission files indicates, galley proofs of Professor Cabot's article were submitted to Dr. Starch and Mr. Hopson.

"Dr. Starch thought it was a very good article," the memorandum read. "But he was in doubt as to how it might be used."

Dr. Starch, the files show, has had a verbal working arrangement, but no written contracts, with Associated since 1923.

The files also contain the following news release from Associated Gas and Electric headquarters at 61 Broadway:

> It is believed that those who are interested in the public welfare will undoubtedly turn their attention before long to making certain that governmental authorities, instead of constantly pressing for rate reductions, will speed up their machinery for authorizing security issues so that the light-and-power industry, freed from unwarranted and generally unpopular attacks, will be able to go ahead and carry out plans for increased construction and development of its business with the direct resulting help to business in general and to the unemployment problem in particular.

Corruption, Sacred and Profane

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

Washington, July 29

THE woman pays. Dr. Amy N. Stannard, who knows psychiatry and nothing whatever about the Virgin Islands, now finds it her destiny to pay the price for peace in those islands by resigning from the Federal Parole Board to make way for Judge T. Webber Wilson. Dr. Stannard resigned in the midst of acclaim for her excellent services. No charge was or could be raised against her, other than that she is a woman. Attorney-General Cummings suggests that a woman is not suitable for parole work. Only 4.3 per cent of the prisoners eligible for parole are women, he says, and personal interviews have to be held with thousands of men. "A request for Dr. Stannard's resignation has been under consideration for a year," he added. But he did not finish that particular story. A year ago several Democrats looked longingly on Dr. Stannard's job and took steps to get it. The word came back to them that Dr. Stannard, as the only psychiatrist on the board, was indispensable. Now it is discovered that a woman should not hear certain kinds of evidence. That is to say, she is (or ought to be) embarrassed by such evidence and a man need not be. But Dr. Stannard is a psychiatrist and is no more embarrassed by such evidence than a male doctor is by childbirth. Embarrassment is not at issue in her removal, except in quite another form. Senator Pat Harrion would be embarrassed if a nice job were not found for his fellow-Mississippian and protege, ex-Congressman Wilson.

The "settlement" of the Virgin Islands quarrel thus proves to be worse than the quarrel. The President, quite the Solomon, undertook to end it by transferring both Governor Paul Pearson and Judge Wilson to other government work. He wrote almost identical letters to them, thanking them for their services, and stating that nothing had been brought out in the Senate inquiry to reflect on their integrity. (Evidence against the Judge had not yet been heard.) Probably it looked like a happy way out to the President. He can't afford to affront Pat Harrison, since one of his continuing problems in life is to stay on good terms with that rugged reactionary, and keep him mollified enough to sponsor Administration measures in the Senate which he really doesn't like. So Secretary Ickes creates a job for Governor Pearson in PWA housing and Attorney General Cummings looks about among the recipients of his personal patronage for a vacancy for Harrison's friend. He lights upon Dr. Stannard. He kicks her out and appoints Judge Wilson to her place. He may have sighed at the hardships of Providence, for he has boasted that politics do not play a role on the Federal Parole Board, and has criticized the state boards where it does. But if he sighed there is no public record of it. In a way it was a happy solution, since appointment to the parole board is not subject to confirmation by the Senate. That makes Judge Wilson secure in his job, no matter how much outcry is raised. He will be as secure as the Attorney General is deaf. The moral of the story (so far) is that a woman is not safe in the government service; not even if she has performed invaluable work of an expert nature not supplied by the men with whom she is working. A politically appointed judge who has made himself nationally ridiculous can be put in her place. And there is no democratic way to prevent this double miscarriage of justice.

But the Virgin Islands "settlement" turns out to be no settlement, not even at this egregious price. The President named Lawrence Cramer, governor of St. Croix, to succeed Governor Pearson. This is a good choice, for Cramer, a teacher of government for five years at Columbia, is the kind of man who in an orderly civil service might have reached St. Croix and been promoted to the governorship when a vacancy occurred. But at once Senator Tydings goes gunning for Cramer, whose appointment is subject to Senate confirmation. He does so with a most absurd inversion of common sense—by releasing to the press the fact that two persons once wrote a book on nudism and in a foreword expressed personal appreciation to Cramer. Now Cramer is no nudist; neither is Senator Tydings an Al Smith, with a minor phobia about nudism. He is a politician carrying on a feud with Secretary Ickes. The appointment of Cramer, since it is non-political, becomes a victory for Ickes, and Tydings wants the Interior Department to lose the Virgin Islands altogether. His idea of the perfect governor is an admiral. The President has stood by Ickes to the extent of appointing Cramer, so Tydings also is willing to fight the President. He is no New Dealer, this author of the sedition bill. The inquiry is not over, despite the "wisdom of Solomon." Tydings will draw up a bill of particulars, he is bound to create at least some political vacancies in the Virgin Islands for deserving Democrats to fill. And he intends to sweep away Cramer as well as Pearson.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

All this makes enough bad news for one week from the nation's capital. But it is only part of a disturbing record. The lobby investigation has now established that over a million dollars was spent by the utilities to fight the holding-company bill. This, too, is only a beginning. The committee became involved in the Patton case, one of those episodes in which witnesses were overcome by loss of memory. Congressman Patton, a rustic orator from Texas, came away from the hotel room of John W. Carpenter, president of the Texas Power and Light Company, with a small box wrapped in newspapers. Carpenter didn't recall anything about it. Again and again he failed to remember it. Then his memory was prompted and he recognized the parcel as a box of cigars given to Patton by his son. Patton voluntarily appeared before the committee with what purported to be the selfsame parcel, only it was two parcels, one box of cigars and some books. Nothing could have been staged more effectively to demonstrate absolute innocence. Patton, however, was succeeded on the stand by a man who he thought was an intimate friend, and the committee learned that Patton out of a salary of $3,100, in a few months had saved $3,000 to buy bonds. And this witness told of Patton's nephew saying of the contents of the box, "Hell, those weren't cigars." Patton came back to the stand, pale and upset. He explained that he had collected $300 for mileage, and had brought $600 in cash to Washington, and out of this he had lived. And there the matter rested over the week-end, the committee waiting to hear the nephew (who denied in an interview the statement attributed to him) and to study Congressman Patton's personal accounts. Whatever is revealed, the committee will get back soon to the main story of the utilities. For the episode of Congressman Brewster of Maine is more characteristic of the methods of the utilities than anything that happened between Mr. Carpenter and the Congressman from Texas. Congressman Brewster switched his vote on the death sentence because he was afraid that if he didn't he wouldn't be reelected. That is the general picture; the utilities can control local elections, hence they don't need to make a general practice of giving away small boxes wrapped in newspapers. The influence of the utilities in local politics, moreover, is like the influence of other businesses. The lobby investigation perhaps cannot spread to such dimensions as to show voters that it is at their own doors that they first give away their democratic powers, not in Washington.

The lobby inquiry was spectacular but not more so than the hearing of Frank E. Speicher by the House Military Affairs Committee, as to the activities of Joseph Silverman, in the matter of truck contracts with the army. The technique of a Senate inquiry is diffuse and confusing, and the evidence is hard to follow and sift. But here was a man who testified that he had been told by Silverman that "he had the Assistant Secretary of War's office in the bag —in his back pocket, and if he bent over it would pop out." Silverman had on his pay-roll Ralph T. O'Neil, former national commander of the American Legion, said Speicher; this was the way he controlled the office of the Assistant Secretary of War. Speicher is an inner-tube maker, who wanted to make a contract with Chevrolet. "Silverman told me," he testified, "that if I didn't go along with his idea of doing business he would give me a piece of my own throat [indicated by drawing a finger across his throat]. He meant he would cut my throat in the Assistant Secretary of War's office. He said, 'Close your hands, now open them. What have you got? Nothing. Well, that's what you'll get.'" And Speicher told of a conference with Frederick H. Payne, former Assistant Secretary of War, at the Mayfair Hotel where Payne told the General Motors' representative: "I know Joe [Silverman]—you'd better put him on the pay-roll. He can be of aid to you." It is unnecessary to go into the long story of the deal whereby Silverman was going to get General Motors a half-share of a $10,000,000 truck contract, and collect a 7½ per cent commission. General Motors pulled out and the deal fell through. What is important is the evidence about "fixings" in Washington, which parallels revelations before the munitions committee about destroyer and other naval contracts.

One wonders what effect such revelations will have on the general public. Only the briefest compressions get into the smaller newspapers, and probably few readers take the trouble to absorb and digest the longer accounts in the larger dailies. But the aroma of this evidence spreads and soon pervades the country. This can have good or harmful results, good if the public gathers its forces to protect itself; bad if it grows hopeless about politics, and condemns the whole Washington set-up as generally corrupt. Wherever democracy has fallen this aroma of corruption spread first, and made people believe that honest government was impossible under the democratic system. If there is no strong reform leadership, with the promise of thorough housecleaning, America too may lose faith in its institutions. But the President, if he is going to clean house, will have to use his broom in the offices of his own friends first of all. He should reinstate Dr. Stannard, rebuke Attorney General Cummings, disregard the political debts of Pat Harrison, and do battle with the patronage system headed by Jim Farley. The line between sacred and profane corruption is hard to draw. For the President to determine to clean the stables would take real courage, and he is a man who would rather get some results out of manipulating an evil system than destroy the system at a political loss. The danger is that one day everything he has achieved may be swept away along with the evils he has condoned, and even worse evils befall the country.

Correspondence

The Fargo Cases

To the Editors of The Nation:

As attorney in the Fargo cases for the Non-Partisan Labor Defense, the organization put in charge of these cases by the Fargo Drivers' Union, I want to correct certain points in Samuel Paul Puner's article on the Fargo cases (Gas Sunday, The Nation, July 3), one of which is about to be appealed to the Supreme Court of North Dakota.

Mr. Puner writes that all the ninety-five strikers arrested in the riot case were dismissed except those who picketed at the river. Mr. Puner must have misunderstood the statement made to him by the Non-Partisan Labor Defense, for three of those admittedly not present were convicted.

Your readers may be interested to know how a verdict of guilty was possible. In North Dakota the jury for a criminal case is selected from a venire of 200, who are hand-picked, 120 by the county commissioners and 80 by the city commissioners. Out of the venire of 200, a panel of 40 is drawn, from which the defense is permitted to select the 12 jurymen. As a result many who had been deputized during the strike and others connected with the employers turned up on the jury.

I believe Mr. Puner failed to point out the real importance of the cases. An appeal is being made because in North Dakota and throughout the Northwest there is a general conviction among workers, and also among the members of the Farmers' Non-Partisan League, that it must be decided once for all whether or not the Associated Industries is to be permitted to intervene in every strike and discourage unionization. The Fargo drivers have been on the picket line since January 22, 1935, and are determined to stay out until they win the right to organize. This is one of the longest strikes the Northwest has ever seen.

Money is urgently needed to carry the Fargo cases to victory. Contributions should be sent to the national office of the Non-Partisan Labor Defense, 22 East Seventeenth Street, New York.

Chicago, July 2 Francis Heisler

India's Poverty

To the Editors of The Nation:

India's present extreme poverty will be increased by changing the government to a federation. The plan voted by the British Parliament gives the people no real powers of self-rule, but it sets up complicated and costly machinery, including five Second Chambers in British India and many new salaried posts. Winston Churchill, who objects to giving India even a shadow of self-rule, made one sound argument against the new plan. He pointed out that it would involve a great increase of expense, and said that the Indian people could not at present bear a large increase of taxation.

In his book, "The Government of India," Ramsay MacDonald says of the tax: "The habit of the government has been to exact from the cultivator the uttermost farthing, over and above a standard of life that is far too low." Since that was written, the taxes have gone up and up; and now they are to be raised again.

The situation was explained by Miss Madeleine Slade, a British Admiral's daughter, who for the past nine years has been Gandhi's disciple. In an address in Boston she said:

When the British came, India was a country with immense wealth and a healthy peasantry. Of its 350,000,000 people, three-fourths are agricultural; but in India agriculture cannot be carried on during the whole year. The people need a subsidiary occupation to follow during the months when it is impossible to work in the fields. From time immemorial this occupation had been the making of cloth. India made all the cloth for its own wearing and sold large quantities abroad. What they gained by agriculture, added to what they earned by cloth-making, enabled the people to live in simple comfort.

In order to make of India a great market for British cloth, the British government deliberately destroyed India's own cloth-making industry. You can read in the history books how it was done. Since then the peasant cultivators who make up the bulk of the population have been unemployed during part of the year. They have grown poorer and poorer, until they are chronically half-starved, and have become so enfeebled that the average length of life has dropped to twenty-three and a half years. In India the average income is twopence a day; and to get even that average you have to include the incomes of all the millionaires. There is terrible child mortality. You have been told various fairy tales to account for this, but the great reason is poverty. There is an appalling contrast between India as she was and as she is; and the change has all come about in 150 years, under British rule. England's whole wealth and prosperity are built up on the blood of India.

I know whereof I speak. My father was the naval com-

PLANNED ECONOMY has brought
PLANNED SAFETY

THE extraordinary progress of the Soviet Union and the growing economic security in the lives of its 170,000,000 people are the natural outcome of planned economy. This planned economy, with its arrangement for automatic liquidation of obligations as they become due, has led naturally to planned safety for purchasers of those obligations.

SOVIET UNION 7% GOLD BONDS
incorporate this principle of planned safety, comprising a number of special safeguards. Investors are invited to write for full information.

Ask for Circular N-11

Soviet American Securities Corp.
30 Broad Street Tel. HAnover 2-5330 New York

The • Recommended by Physicians
SEX TECHNIQUE
IN MARRIAGE
By I. E. Hutton, M. D. •

"Dr. Ira Wile describes the book as a clear, succinct, non-emotional, authoritative and conservative exposition of the practical factors involved in making marriage successful on the sexual level. . . It is primarily concerned with the conduct of the honeymoon and with the technic of sexual performance."—Dr. Morris Fishbein. Price $2.00 (postage 15c extra)

EMERSON BOOKS, INC., 333 SIXTH AVENUE, NEW YORK CITY

mander-in-chief. We lived in Bombay in great pomp. I saw the enormously top-heavy Indian civil service, the most extravagant and costly in the world. I saw the Viceroy living like a mighty emperor. Since then, for nine years, I have lived among the poor and have seen the destitution of the starving peasants, by whom all that pomp and luxury must be paid for. I have known the inside of life in India—both sides of it.

Gandhi, by making it a patriotic fashion to wear homespun and setting the Indians to spin the yarn for it, which always finds a ready sale, has lifted many thousands of Indian families out of the lowest depths of poverty and enabled them to get a little more food. His present effort to revive some of the old village handicrafts is an extension of the same principle.

Boston, Mass., March 6 ALICE STONE BLACKWELL

Cotton Pickers on Strike

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The July Executive Committee meeting of the Share Croppers Union decided to call a strike of the cotton pickers in central Alabama in August for the following demands: $1 per 100 pounds for picking cotton, $1 a day for 10 hours work on the farm plus room and board for monthly help and plus 2 meals and transportation for temporary help. In order to spread this strike movement of the cotton pickers the Share Croppers Union has appealed to the Southern Tenant Farmers Union and the Alabama Farmers Union to unite in calling and conducting the strike.

The reader may wonder why it is necessary to strike for a measly one dollar a day and why the Negro and white farm workers, croppers, and tenants are willing to face lynch terror and persecution to carry through a strike. The answer lies in the poverty-stricken conditions of these toilers, unequaled perhaps in any other section of the United States. They slave from before sun-up until after sun-down, driven constantly by mean, gun-toting plantation bosses under a broiling sun at back-breaking toil for the magnificent sum of 35 to 60 cents a day. High prices under the AAA have made the problem of squeezing out a mere existence worse than ever. Landlord-controlled relief stations refuse relief to the majority of the workers and poor farmers, while others are forced off relief to accept jobs at the afore-mentioned wages.

In order to carry out this strike effectively a strike relief fund is very necessary. At the wages paid to the farm workers it is impossible to raise an adequate strike relief fund. Landlord-controlled relief stations refuse government relief to strikers. For these reasons we are appealing to all readers of The Nation to contribute to the Cotton Pickers Strike Relief Fund as generously as possible.

The Share Croppers Union conducted a cotton-choppers strike this spring, involving about 1,500 choppers, and succeeded in winning the $1 a day demand on about 35 plantations. During this strike a Negro I. L. D. organizer, J. W. Foster, was murdered by a gang of sheriffs and landlords in Dallas County, some twenty strikers were arrested and beaten, two white and one Negro union organizers were arrested and turned over to landlord gangs that "took them for a ride" and left them in the swamps brutally beaten. In spite of this terror the strikers went on to victory. In several places, when the strike was on the verge of success, the choppers were driven back to work through starvation. The relief fund was too small.

The strike will begin about the first week in August, depending on the ripening crop, and will spread to the various farming areas as bolls break into bloom. It will continue until the season is over. An accounting of the relief fund will be submitted for publication in The Nation upon request.

Montgomery, Ala., July 25 ALBERT JACKSON

This book tells Husbands and Wives what they would like to tell each other...

THE POWER TO LOVE explains for the first time, in simple straightforward language that every man and woman will understand, the reasons for, and the methods of overcoming, sexual incompetency.

Here is a book that was written to fill the answer that all other books evade. It is the result of years of practice, years of searching for the answer.

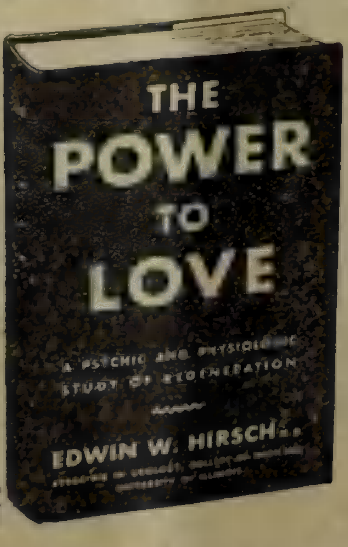
In its 362 pages a doctor and teacher, Dr. EDWIN W. HIRSCH, Associate in Urology, College of Medicine, University of Illinois, writes in the style of intimate interviews in the doctor's private office. It is frank, honest, clear. And there is no dodging the facts of life. The ideas and suggestions offered to the reader have all been developed from a specialized practice dealing with the problem in all its physical and psychical aspects. In the great laboratory of life these suggestions have worked.

Every aspect of the subject is discussed thoroughly. Dr. Hirsch gives detailed information concerning such vital topics as: the causes of sexual debility, the treatment of impotency, frigidity in women, premature ejaculation, sexual fear, the art of sexual technique, systems of sexual control, the power to love.

Nowhere in the literature of sexology can be found a book with so complete a fund of straightforward and practical information. In his preface Dr. Hirsch says: "Treatises have been presented which outline the conduct . . . in the sex act, but they serve no useful function for those who are unable to comply with the mandates. Man must not only be told what to do, but how it can be done." This Dr. Hirsch does in THE POWER TO LOVE.

It may be found at all bookstores or, if you wish, the publishers will be glad to send you a copy for 5 DAYS' EXAMINATION. It is not necessary to send money. Just clip the coupon and mail it today.

SEND NO MONEY



Burton Rascoe says, "It is the best book on sexual matters available in English." By Edwin W. Hirsch, M. D.

Assoc. in Urology: College of Medicine, Univ. of Illinois

SELECTED BOOKS CORP. N-7
3 West 56th St., New York, N. Y.

Send me at once a copy of THE POWER TO LOVE for 5 days' examination. When it arrives I will pay the postman $4.00 plus a few cents postage with the understanding that if I am not entirely satisfied I may return the book within 5 days and you will gladly refund the purchase price.

Name. . . . .

Address. . . . .

City & State. . . . .

Labor and Industry

Can Hotels Pay 18 Cents an Hour?

By ELINORE MOREHOUSE HERRICK

FOR the first time in its history the hotel industry, which somehow has always succeeded in escaping all regulation of working conditions, has been brought face to face with the New York State labor law via the minimum-wage bill passed in 1933. If we are to judge by the mute testimony of the statute books, the hotel industry has been served at Albany by an exceptionally effective lobby. For thirty years this industry has succeeded in blocking legislation that would "encroach upon the rights and liberties of American citizens." Despite its unusually advanced social legislation in other fields New York State has been unable to do more for workers in hotels than to require seats in elevators for the operator (if not found in the elevators they are certainly in the statute books) and limit hours of female operation to fifty-four a week. While women in factories are limited as to their hours of labor and may not work more than six days a week, in hotels "the sky is the limit" and the law permits women in hotel employment to work seven days a week. Restaurant workers, if they are women, must cease their labor at 10 p.m. So a noted restaurant proprietor in an upstate city maintains a part of his building as a hotel. That stratagem enables him to employ women workers unlimited hours in his restaurant which is the major part of his business.

The success of the hotel industry in defeating all adverse legislation is written into the record of amendments and exceptions to the New York labor law. Somewhere in every statute regulating working conditions in other industries there will be found the words: "This section shall not apply to hotels." When New Jersey passed a bill identical with the New York minimum-wage law, an amendment was written in specifically exempting hotels in deference to the Boardwalk interests of "the World's Greatest Playground." Of the sixteen states having minimum wage laws only California, North Dakota, Oregon, Washington, and Wisconsin have minimum wages for the hotel industry.

The NRA succeeded in bringing hotels under a code. That was their first experience with regulation. Many an employer had never charged his workers for uniforms, meals, and other deductions allowed under the NRA code. After the promulgation of the NRA codes for the restaurant and hotel industries, however, there was inaugurated a practice of deductions which lent itself to wide abuse. The allowable charges in the codes were 25 cents per meal and $2.50 per week's lodging. The New York Minimum Wage Board reports that "in some instances the food and accommodations supplied to workers are so unsavory and inadequate as to suggest that the purported deduction of charges is in fact a disguised form of wage-cutting. In other cases, employees maintain that they have been charged for meals that were not furnished and for lodgings that were not desired and were never used."

In the past the hotel men have lobbied quietly, but now the fight is open. Last May the New York Industrial Commissioner convened a special wage board to recommend minimum wages for women and minors in hotels and restaurants. The three representatives of the industry were Francis Gorman, manager of the Hotel Astor, vice-president of the New York State Hotel Association, George R. LeSauvage, assistant to the president of Frank G. Shattuck and Company (Schrafft's), and Charles A. Laube, president of the National Restaurant Association and director of the Buffalo Restaurant Association.

Their first move was to protest the Commissioner's choice of Miss Dorothy Kenyon as chairman of the wage board. She is an officer of the Consumers' League of New York, which has long fought for legislation protecting women workers in hotels. In the interest of harmony Miss Kenyon withdrew and Mr. Max Meyer, formerly chairman of the code authority for the millinery industry and member of the Industrial Council of the New York State Department of Labor, took her place.

After seven weeks of intensive deliberations and study of the 942 pages of statistical data gathered by the Minimum Wage Division of the state during the past winter, the wage board made these recommendations:

18 cents an hour to table-service waitresses
27 cents an hour to non-service food workers
30 cents an hour to lodging workers (chambermaids, etc.)
$10 a week to resident employees

Though the public and the labor representatives were unanimously in favor of this wage scale, all three employer members of the board refused to sign the report. The following week the press stated that the industry was going to campaign vigorously to prevent the adoption of these wages.

There is a widespread belief among those who have worked for labor laws in New York State that the hotel industry is making this fight not so much because of its inability to pay 18 cents an hour but because it is determined to defeat any kind of state regulation and regards the minimum wage as but an entering wedge to ultimate control of hours and other matters equally important to the well-being of the workers. The restaurant industry which similarly evaded regulation for many years finally became subject to the "night-work law" which limits hours to fifty-four a week and restricts them to the period between 6 a.m. and 10 p.m. When the present wage law was before the legislature in 1933 the restaurants, hoping to regain the lost ground, joined the fight against the bill.

On March 16, 1933, the New York World-Telegram carried a story of how the waitresses in the Schrafft stores (Mr. LeSauvage, assistant to the president of Schrafft's, is on the present wage board) had been required to write three letters each to Senator George R. Fearon, Republican leader, Speaker McGinnies, and Assemblyman Russell G. Dunmore, protesting the passage of the minimum-wage bill. Supervisors stood over them as they wrote with pen, ink, paper, and envelopes furnished them in their work places. The letters, unsealed, were turned over to the supervisors and then all mailed at the same time at the same postal station.

When interviewed by a reporter for the World-Telegram, Mr. John Shattuck, vice-president of the company, stated "we would be in favor of a minimum wage for women" and he insisted that the letter campaign must have been the work of one of the minor executives of the company and was not authorized by the company.

Despite Mr. Shattuck's statement in favor of a minimum wage Mr. LeSauvage now refuses to sign the wage board's report. Is it because 18 cents an hour and the other rates proposed are too high? Can the industry not afford to pay even 18 cents an hour?

The hotel and restaurant business ranks fourth in the list of industries employing women in the State of New York. The sum of $451,097,842 was spent for meals served in hotels, restaurants, drug stores, cafeterias, and lunch counters in this state in 1929, according to the United States Census. Granting that some of us "pulled in our belts" during the succeeding years, the food-service industry in New York in 1935 must still represent "important money," although current figures are not available.

The challenge the public must now meet is whether the 60,000 women and minors employed in hotels and restaurants in New York State are to remain forever without protection such as that granted to other workers throughout the state under our labor laws?

The Department of Labor's statistical study reveals that the median daily rates of women in hotels and restaurants is at present only $1.64. Over half the women earn less than 27 cents an hour. Weekly earnings of 8,875 women in restaurants reveal a median of $8.08. Wages of waitresses in hotels, taken separately, show a median of $5.29 a week, while the median weekly wage of chambermaids "living out" is $10.65. One-third of the waitresses in hotels and restaurants work a "split trick"—an economy device which forces women to remain away from home for long daily hours while they are on duty and paid for far shorter hours.

We the public are apt to delude ourselves with the notion that waitresses make "big money" in tips. During the Washington hearings on the hotel code the Deputy Administrator asked "Are not tips paid?" The industry spokesman replied: "They used to get tips but there are few tips paid these days." Eighty-nine per cent of the waitresses reporting to the New York Department of Labor say they get tips. The women in other branches are less favored for more than half of all those employed in hotels and restaurants get no tips. Waitresses average weekly tips of $6.90.

If you add $6.90 to the wages for the median work week of 43 hours at 18 cents the average waitress will receive a total of $14.64—bare subsistence for even the unmarried woman. But reports of the Federal Women's Bureau have shown that the vast majority of women workers, whether single or married, contribute to the support of others.

This wage of $14.64 is less than the $16 minimum wage decreed in California, but in California, the $16 wage is greatly decreased by arbitrary deductions which the law permits. A waitress in a large hotel in the midwest recently stated that she got 72 cents in her weekly pay envelope after all deductions had been made. At the code hearings a waitress testified that she was paid 50 cents a meal for four hours of work. She furnished and laundered her own uniform and paid her busboy. That cost her 50 cents. Her cash wage remaining was exactly nothing. This waitress "lived" on her tips.

The wages suggested by the New York wage board may not be considered adequate from the social standpoint. However, in recommending that no deductions from weekly earnings be allowed, the board has performed an invaluable service to the 60,000 women and has set an important precedent for the four states that have set wages for this industry. The board's report states:

> The system of deductions has led to unfair application by the unscrupulous. As was the practice prior to the codes, the cost of services to employees should be recognized as an element in the fixing of the hourly rates of cash pay, and no deductions from that rate should be countenanced, in order to end any possibility of extortion. . . . A heavy drain upon an employee's earnings is occasioned by charges or expenses for uniforms and other equipment. The style and quality of the equipment are usually prescribed by the employer; there is little standardization, changes in interior decoration may involve replacement by an employee of all equipment theretofore procured; shifts of employment may necessitate discarding old equipment in order to comply with the requirements of the new employer; time and money spent in maintaining the equipment are disproportionate to the benefits received by the employee. The furnishing, repair, and laundering or cleaning of uniforms are properly to be regarded as operating expenses of the industries. They should not be charged, either directly or indirectly, against employees.

While 18 cents an hour nevertheless will seem to many persons unconscionably low, elimination of all deductions will add materially to the cash wage now received. In the light of the practice of the industry throughout the country the New York wage board has given impetus to an important reform in this business.

Public hearings will be held by the Industrial Commissioner throughout the state, beginning August 5 in New York City. These will afford an opportunity to all groups to make known their views on the wage board's report. A state-wide committee of over one hundred social and civic organizations has been formed to present at these hearings the viewpoint of those who regard the suggested wages as only a small first step toward better conditions for the more than 60,000 women and minors in these industries. If the public has learned one lesson during the depression it is that the difference between wages and what it costs to live is paid by the public out of relief tax monies. Why should the hotel and restaurant industry be subsidized by public relief to its employees?

It is recognized that in the hotel and restaurant business some employers now meet and even exceed these recommended minimum standards. There is a larger number who, pleading poverty, say they can not meet such modest requirements. This is the ever recurrent argument in any effort to improve working conditions no matter what the industry. We cannot allow ourselves to be diverted from our main objective which must be to see a decent minimum pay established even at the cost of driving out of business those of the 19,000 establishments which can not meet what, in the mature and considered judgment of the wage board and the Industrial Commissioner, seems the lowest wage tolerable under modern conditions.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

"Every Man A Penny"

By HEYWOOD BROUN

"ANYBODY who won't work ought to be thrown off relief." Some of the many who make this remark do not really understand what they are saying. But others do only too well. The most serious threat to the so-called living standards of America comes from the harvest fields of the states which have decreed that those who do not sign up to reap and bind the grain shall be cast into outer darkness like the chaff which is destroyed.

And all this is done on the plea that here and there a labor shortage exists. Unfortunately figures seem to show that the cry of the boss farmers is largely exaggerated and that's a pity for if there is one thing this country needs desperately it is a labor shortage. In the fearful warfare of man against the machine which goes on in every land of private ownership even the most temporary sort of labor shortage is like a little armistice, a lull in the bombardment. But those who do not think sharply and those who do are proposing that the barrage must not be lifted even for a second. Of course even the harshest in council employ the phrase "physically able" but the test of ability is not likely to be rigid when the machines are calling for the reserves of man power. We will strew the fields with dead men if we say "Up and at 'em" to the broken armies of the idle. And in an even larger sense the talk of forced labor constitutes a tragic betrayal. If this system is to be followed the instant any slack comes in the labor supply it will work as a constant source of gravity to pull down all wages. The government will find itself in the position of operating a coolie employment agency.

I know what I'm talking about because I have seen this very thing work out in circumstances which were much smaller but still large enough to constitute a laboratory experiment. In the winter of 1930 I was associated with a free employment agency. With a somewhat pitiful optimism a group of us had come together to urge the creation of temporary jobs and since we campaigned through the newspapers we used a slogan. It turned out to be ironical. It was "'Give a Job Till June."

In justice to even the most naive of us, which may very well have been myself, we did not actually think that all suffering and privation would stop the instant summer came along. We did, I must confess, have some belief that the crisis in which the country found itself might prove to be temporary. Our organization got some jobs. We had on our lists of applicants some five or six thousand names. Out of these we managed to get a few days' work for approximately twelve hundred. Very rarely somebody was fitted into something of a semi-permanent nature. Our prize prodigy worked for almost five years. She was fired only a few months ago. And so although we didn't do much good it was not our intention to do any harm. Quite unwittingly we did. One branch of our service was maintained in a small office near the Little Church Around the Corner. The church had a breadline that winter and we were trying to snatch potentially useful workers out of that unlikely source. To this end we listed everybody who would come to our office and set down what his training had been and what his capacities might be. Very soon people began to help and in a fairly large way. "I'll take my whole crew from you," the owner of a lunch-room chain promised and kept his word. Men would drop around and say in a friendly way, "If you have any furniture polishers on your list, I can use ten or twelve."

I was beginning to be very excited about this seeming success of ours until one day the man in charge of the branch came around to see me. His name was Ross and he was studying economics. "I should have known it from the beginning," he told me, "but do you know precisely what you're doing with this Give a Job Till June campaign?"

"Well, whether you know it or not," Mr. Ross explained, "you're the head of a cut-rate labor agency. These people come around and say 'Have you got a furniture polisher'? But if I find them one they always offer him pay well below the scale. I don't think it's my right to refuse to tell anybody on our list when a job is offered but I must say the most courageous thing I've ever seen in my life is the action of those who refuse to join up at bargain rates. And they're not just thinking of themselves. They've said to me, 'Why if I took it at that pay I'd just be cutting the throat of everybody else on the job. I guess I'll starve a little longer.' But I don't think it's right for us to be tempting people like that."

And so we closed the office and ended the campaign. The thing was insidious. Nobody could approach abjectly unemployed people without thinking in terms of bargains. This was the basement store along the labor front. I hired a press agent for the Give a Job campaign. He got just about half of what the job rated. You see he was a newspaper man who happened to be hard up. I'm not blaming myself. I was spending other people's contributions and naturally we wanted to keep the overhead down but the whole thing was poisoned at the source by the fact that we paid our own employees less than a standard wage. And today I think relief workers ought to be adequately compensated. Once you start cutting it will go on all along the line.

Far from forcing men off relief into ill-paid temporary jobs the government ought to make it difficult to pry labor loose from its lists. It should welcome any labor shortage and sit tight until the pressure is sufficient to insure good pay before it consents to give an honorable discharge to any member of the army of the unemployed. Uncle Sam had to step in because the buying power of the masses had shrunk to panic proportions because of the wage cuts of the employers. I haven't got space to go into the old egg-and-chicken discussion. At any rate everybody agrees that without a proper widespread purchasing power our present economic set-up can't even stagger along. The government of municipality or state or nation is behaving in the most stupid way possible if it permits, much less orders, anybody to get off relief merely to walk around the block and then come home to roost again.

"Just Paddle 'em Down the Road!"

By RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Portland, July 17

OREGON was one of the first states to pass an anti-injunction law. It also has statutes insuring labor the right to picket. In recent weeks these acts of the legislature have been nullified by the effective collaboration of the executive and judicial branches of the governmen. To protect themselves against police "meddling," striking lumber workers at Forest Grove and Bridal Veil leased tracts of ground near the mills on which to make their headquarters. They felt this would buttress them against the charge of trespassing. However, they reckoned without the fact that so small a matter as legal procedure is of no concern to Governor Charles H. Martin, a retired major-general and the most bristling upholder of "law and order" in the history of the state. The governor ordered the sheriffs of Multnomah and Washington counties to arrest pickets, the law permitting picketing notwithstanding. As fast as one group of pickets was seized, another caught up the fallen banners. Finally 237 men had been arrested and the jails were full. No charges were lodged and even now suits are pending for false imprisonment. The workers' unwillingness to accept his illegal acts as final drove Martin into a rage. His anger was intensified when his legal advisors informed him there were no direct charges on which the men could be booked. "No more arrests," he bellowed, "Just paddle 'em down the road!"

The Oregon state police, thus ordered by the governor to commit mayhem, hauled the workers off land which they had leased, and which was legally their own, and prodded them down the highway. Witnesses later testified that the men were lolling lazily in the shade when these brutal seizures took place, and that there was no indication of any violence whatsoever. The pickets were compelled to jog nine miles in slightly more than an hour, with the police flailing them from behind. Automobiles paced the trotting column, and the troopers jumped on the running-boards when they became tired. However, the workers—many of them middle-aged and old men—were forced to run in the midday sun until several collapsed in the dust.

Some of the men thus manhandled and abused later required hospital care; others in court submitted their flagellated and bruised backs as evidence of the "paddling" activities of the governor's constabulary. The excuses given for this wholesale denial to the workers of the legal right to picket were of the flimsiest sort: A truck had been overturned by parties unknown twenty miles from one of the mills; lumber-owners charged pickets were planning to cut a power line (this later was modified to read telephone wire). None of these contentions was proved, but Governor Martin accepted them willingly as justification for official violence.

To decide the issue once and for all the workers applied for an injunction restraining peace officers from interference with men on the picket line. The opinion handed down by Circuit Judge Crawford was a masterpiece of circumvention: "Did the sheriff exercise reasonable discretion in stopping these picketing activities? In my opinion he did . . . because of local apprehension over the display of force by numbers and fears of disorder . . . perhaps no disorder would have resulted had the sheriff failed to act; on the other hand, much violence might have occurred."

Thus by judicial decision the Oregon laws prohibiting labor injunctions and permitting picketing have virtually been repealed. On the witness stand before Judge Crawford one of the sheriff's deputies said he had not known that the land on which the strikers were stationed was their own. Asked if this would have made any difference in his conduct, he replied "No." His reply prompted K. C. Tanner, labor attorney, to suggest that peace officers in Oregon had not only nullified the laws of the state but also the common law of England and the United States Constitution.

Governor Martin's willingness not only to cheer for the employers, but also to join their team, has united labor against him in Oregon. In a bristling address at a military cantonment in Washington, Martin openly boasted of having put those "fellows" in their places. It was reported that Martin flew into a rage at Portland because employers did not move in and immediately open the mills. Martin also was highly indignant when one mill-operator, H. B. Van Duzer, submitted an agreement which would have resulted in union control of his plant.

Van Duzer's fellow-employers charged him with selling out because of having political ambitions. Van Duzer's eminently fair offer put other employers definitely on the spot and they looked to the governor for further assistance. He did not fail them. Again assuming the function of the legislature, he proclaimed that only "regular employees" would be permitted to picket lumber mills; the attorney-general of the state joined in the glorious grab for law-making power by saying that picketing would be allowed only where there is a "dispute between employers and workers." Of course, sheriffs and state troopers will decide who are "regular employees" and where "disputes" exist.

The workers' opportunities for success in the lumber strike have been greatly jeopardized in the two states by the brutalities countenanced and even urged by Governor Martin of Oregon and Governor Clarence D. Martin of Washington. Both are chiefly concerned with breaking the strike at all costs. The lumber war is of more importance than meets the eye. For nearly a generation the vicious company-union domination of the old 4-Ls (Loyal Legion of Loggers and Lumbermen) has held down revolt against low wages, long hours, and perilous working conditions. Success in the current strike would break forever the hold of the 4-Ls.

The state convention of the Washington Federation of Labor last week condemned Clarence D. Martin as not being qualified to occupy the office he now holds. Numerous public groups in Oregon have demanded the recall of Charles H. Martin. It is possible that such moves may be instituted in both states. Kelley Loe, veteran labor writer, has pointed out that the strategy of the governor's supporters in Oregon has been to gain control of the Townsend old-age pension organization, a tremendously powerful factor in the state. Loe has charged that through the lavish expenditure of money secret supporters of the governor and his policies have annexed fifty or sixty thousand old people as a buffer against any real mass movement which might spring up.

Books and Films

Spivak, Star Reporter

America Faces the Barricades. By John L. Spivak. Covici-Friede. $2.50.

JACK SPIVAK was once a star reporter for Hearst and Macfadden newspapers. He is now a star reporter for the Daily Worker and the New Masses. In the past he practiced his craft to make a living. Like scores of other competent and instinctively decent journalists, he despised his employers and held his nose with one set of fingers while he typed with the other set. A good fellow and one of the ablest reporters in America, he was forced inevitably to choose between coming a prosperous, second-string Arthur Brisbane and a broke and more or less blacklisted radical free lance.

To his credit, he chose the second alternative, and the journalism produced after he turned his talents to the service of the radical cause is, of course, infinitely better than anything he ever did before. Both in quality and quantity, his contribution, from "Georgia Nigger" through much of his writing for the Daily Worker and the New Masses to the present book, commands a good deal of respect and admiration.

But Spivak, who had always fought with his low-lived capitalistic bosses, didn't get on any too well with the bosses of the Daily Worker. In the early days, at least, he was an "individualist," even something of a prima donna. Since he was getting paid little or nothing for his work, he felt, not unreasonably, that he ought at least to have the fun of writing a straight story and seeing it in print. I am betraying no confidence when I recall that he sometimes resisted the customary mayhem perpetrated upon the correspondence of "politically undeveloped" writers, just as he had howled when Hearst or Macfadden editors tried to make a monkey out of him.

Does Spivak still resist? I wonder, because "America Faces the Barricades" is not wholly a straight story. Three-quarters of it is straight and some of it, for example the opening Letter to the President, is Spivak at his best—a Macfadden sob story in reverse English, so cleanly and skilfully executed that it becomes not a sob story at all, but good literature as well as superb propaganda. Equally good is the rich, first-hand documentation of what business men and workers say, how they think and feel, the blind, half-timorous, half-violent ways in which they act; also the sensational expose of Nazi and native pre-fascist activities.

Spivak calls his book a "survey." It isn't—no one-man reporting trip could possibly be anything of the sort. The best of it represents a skilful sampling of the witches' brew being stirred in a score of hot spots around the country. The worst of it represents a misrepresentation of the facts with respect to two major labor struggles: the strike of the Toledo Auto-lite workers and the strike of the Minneapolis truck drivers in the spring and summer of 1934.

Spivak may have typed the passages in his book dealing with those strikes, but I am confident that his boss dictated them. His boss is the Communist Party of America, and Spivak is a loyal fellow traveler. I think he should have stated his position frankly, so that his readers might be prepared to see Spivak, when he steers into the cross currents of factional revolutionary politics, stop writing like a competent reporter and begin writing like a Communist Party functionary.

Beginning on page 270 Spivak devotes about four pages to the Toledo strike, which he describes as a rank-and-file revolt led by Communists. Was Spivak in Toledo? The militant leadership of the strike was exercised both directly and indirectly by members of the Workers Party, including A. J. Muste and Louis Budenz, Sam Pollack and Ted Selander, who led the picket lines. The role of the Communists in this strike was negligible as every informed person in Toledo—including the bosses and the capitalist newspapers—knows very well. But Spivak, a trained newspaperman, ignores and misrepresents the facts as blandly as did the Daily Worker and the New Masses. Writing of the Minneapolis strike, Spivak says:

> The leaders called themselves Communists. Actually, they are Trotzkyists. They were not the kind of labor leaders who would sell out to employers for a stated sum as other union leaders have done, but they had only a hazy notion of the function of a "labor" governor in a capitalist state, and consequently led their followers to a victory which was really a defeat.

He concludes his account with the following paragraph:

> The "labor" governor was faced with surrendering to labor and using the armed forces of the state to protect the workers or surrendering to capital and using the same forces to break the strike. He made the decision which today is inevitable and which marks the end of pretenses to "liberalism" in future labor wars.

The first passage quoted is obviously sectarian opinion and should have been stated as such, since Spivak is addressing a general audience. The second is historically untrue. Local 574 won a settlement substantially conforming to its demands. The wavering Farmer-Labor Governor, Olson, was under continuous pressure from the "counter-revolutionary" Trotzkyists, who had opposed from the first the bringing in of the troops. Aside from his personal sympathies, which were with the strikers rather than with the bosses, he was afraid to go beyond a certain point in using the troops for the realistic reason that he needed the Twin City labor vote in the fall election.

In questioning Spivak's facts I should warn the reader that while I am not a member of any party, or subject to any form of party discipline, my sympathies, in general, are with the Workers Party and I do not pretend to be immune to the temptations of partisanship. But I am confident that any impartial investigation would reveal the facts to be as I have stated them. Moreover, I regard it as a disservice to the radical movement to misrepresent facts and an even greater disservice to conceal the partisan point of view or party allegiance which influences a given job of reporting. That sort of writing leads not to revolution, but to endless muddle and recrimination. Whether it is done to the order of Hearst or the Communist Party, it remains hack-writing. In the army we used to sing:

> Forward march, one, two, three
> Make the world safe for democracee
> Un, deux, trois, quatre, what do you think of that?
> We tried to get away from that at home.

Well, I still don't believe Mrs. Spivak raised her son to be a hack writer.

James Rorty

Soviet Salvation

Sussman Sees It Through. A Reappraisal of the Jewish Position under the Soviets. By David Goldberg. Bloch Publishing Co. $2.

THIS is a sincere, sensitively written, and very naive attempt to show that the Jewish problem can be solved and is being solved in the U.S.S.R. The emotional background of Mr. Goldberg and his friends and informants can be easily established by saying that he is a Ukrainian. That background is forever recorded as a black page in man's history in

"The Pogroms in the Ukraine, 1917-20" published in 1927 by the Comité des Delegations juives. It came close to being a case like that of the Albigenses—the extermination by boundless cruelty and bestial torture of a people. Hence, as Mr. Goldberg admits, the Jewish bourgeoisie in the Ukraine was already pretty well "liquidated" and had only to undergo Marxist redemption by grasping "the stern reality of the Thesis." (The capital is Mr. Goldberg's.)

Well, they grasped it, especially the younger people. Why should they not have done so? They had been hounded and slaughtered like beasts. Now the Thesis (if they could bring themselves to accept it) offered physical freedom and security; it offered work and such bread as everyone had; it offered the older people—if they could gulp the Thesis and so rise out of the declassed classes—educational opportunities for their children. And what will not Jewish parents do for that? And of course, since intellectual oneness or integrity really is a Jewish aspiration, they sought truly to embrace the Thesis and with the blood of all the generations of Talmudists in their veins they had no trouble with a dialectical justification for accepting the goods that were offered them. How human and how inevitable and how blameless!

Then where, from a Jewish point of view (which is a symbol of a universal human one) is the hitch? The Russian situation repeats under other circumstances the process of the West-European emancipation. The ghettos were destroyed and civic rights were given to the Jews and a human status on condition that the Jews grasp "the stern reality of the Thesis" of the Prussian fatherland and the Austrian fatherland and all the other fatherlands for which in the century between they have lived and on a hundred fields of battle died. And what has it availed them? And now they are grasping the Thesis of the Russian fatherland, no, (I beg pardon) the Soviet fatherland, and they will de-Judaize themselves once more and live and die for it. And what will that in the long run avail them?

But how about the mass-settlements in the Crimea and Biro-Bidjan and the free use of the Yiddish language? I need only quote Mr. Goldberg: the U.S.S.R. "guarantees the integrity of every cultural form provided its content remains socialistic." What tragic muddleheadedness! Form and substance of a culture like those of a work of art are inextricably one. The anomalous position of the Jews in exile springs precisely from their living under laws and institutions not of their folk-creation but imposed from without; on earth they cannot consecrate; amid moral atmosphere of which the pressure was not unconsciously calculated by their instincts. "They need only accept the socialist content of the State," says Mr. Goldberg with inimitable simplicity of heart, "and be redeemed within it."

That is precisely what the Inquisition offered. But men cannot be redeemed from without nor permanently persuaded by pressure. Under the aspect of eternity Mecca and Moscow and Berlin are at one. The terrific practical and human difference between Berlin and Moscow is this: Berlin will not permit the Jews to be coordinated (gleichgeschaltet) but destroys them; Moscow sincerely desires them to be coordinated. And so the Jews of Russia are coordinating themselves. But coordination in Russia (red assimilation to a state-dictated Weltanschauung) is in essence no different from the coordinations which have preceded it from the days of Alexandria and Philo Judaeus on.

The Jewish problem can be solved only within a sincerely pluralistic state, a state that consciously renounces even the tendency to be totalitarian, or in the land of Israel and its contiguous territories. All else is another turn of the same old tragic wheel of recurrence and disaster.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Heredity and Disease

Heredity and Disease. By Otto Mohr. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.50.
The Chances of Morbid Inheritance. Edited by C. P. Blacker. William Wood and Company. $5.
Nature and Nuture. By Lancelot Hogben. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.75.
The Influence of Heredity on Disease. By L. S. Penrose. H. K. Lewis and Company. 5s.

A PERSON interested in the heredity of disease will raise a number of questions: Which diseases are inherited? What is the individual to do who has in his family an inheritable disease? What is society to do with an individual who has an inheritable disease?

The four books here under review give a well-rounded discussion of these questions and allow the reader a fair opinion of the present status of the whole problem. The book by Mohr is an excellent introductory work with a simple, well-written account of the basic biological facts of inheritance; "The Chances of Morbid Inheritance" is a summary volume presenting in brief detail the available data on heredity in a large number of diseases; the two books by Hogben and Penrose are critical studies which indicate the means of analyzing and evaluating genetical data as applied to human beings. There are in eugenic writings so many unattested opinions and assumptions, determined by racial, social and class prejudices that the greatest need is for a sane critical attitude. For this reason the two last-named volumes, though the smallest of the lot, are the most important.

"Heredity and Disease" gives a useful description of the chromosomes and the genes, the physical determinants of heredity. It also contains a very lucid analysis of the inter-action of the genes and environmental factors, an inter-relationship which must be clearly understood in all discussions of heredity. The book is written from a broad historical point of view and the discussions of the application of genetics to human problems, though brief, are sound.

The book edited by Blacker is written by men who for the most part are prominent as physicians rather than as students of heredity. Their contributions are valuable summaries of the scientific literature on heredity in various diseases but they are presented with little, if any, critical judgment. The reader must be warned not to accept, without further investigation, the conclusions so arbitrarily stated.

The outstanding example of the need for this cautious attitude is the chapter on the inheritance of mental disorders by Aubrey Lewis, which is replete with figures whose significance is not at all demonstrated by the evidence presented. The author believes that insanity is inherited, stating, for instance, that of the children of a schizophrenic parent, 8 to 10 per cent will themselves be schizophrenic, and that, among the children of a manic-depressive parent, a third will have the same disorder. These figures, somewhat startling because of the certainty with which they are expressed, are based upon studies which the author quotes. These studies, however, are not at all convincing and there is considerable other work (not mentioned by Dr. Lewis) which leads to a contrary conclusion. The mere statistical analysis of the incidence of a disease in a family offers no proof of its hereditary nature, and in the study of insanity, especially, so little is known of the effects of immediate and remote environmental factors that a dogmatic attitude is certainly unwarranted.

As Hogben says in "Nature and Nurture," "there is a danger of concealing assumptions which have no factual basis behind an impressive facade of flawless algebra." It is to this book and to the one by Penrose that the reader turns for the critical background so essential in any discussion on this subject.

Lancelot Hogben, who is Professor of Social Biology in the University of London, looks toward environmental means rather than eugenic ones for the immediate improvement of human difficulties. He says:

> The most formidable problems of civilization do not arise from limitations in the ability of men and women to command the resources of nature. They arise from imperfect coordination of human effort. Experiment alone can decide whether human ingenuity can discover forms of organization which will guarantee the continued development of our present civilization. If with its present endowments mankind lacks the capacity to do so, the application of genetic knowledge can only offer a very remote prospect of producing a race which will.

The small book by Penrose presents a well-balanced discussion of human genetics including a historical survey of the subject. It is especially valuable for the section on Modern Methods of Study in Human Genetics which gives in detail the statistical approach toward problems in heredity. Dr. Penrose too is very cautious in his conclusions as to what may be expected of eugenic measures.

The subject matter of these four volumes is of significance to lay readers as well as to physicians, eugenists, and sociologists. The personal problem involved in a case where inheritable disease or supposedly inheritable disease exists in a family is obvious and must be met by consultation with a competent advisor. More important to us as individuals in a society capable of Hitlerism, Imperial Valley strikes, gubernatorial proclamations condoning lynchings, and Hearst newspapers, is the need to arm ourselves with knowledge to face the barrage of eugenic blather emanating from half-baked pseudo-scientists some of whom hold professorships in world-famous universities. Already sterilization laws are being enacted on the advice of these prophets. The potential dangers of this type of legislation uncontrolled by sane scientific knowledge, are beyond imagination.

David Beres

Four Rebels

Four Independents. By Daniel Sargent. Sheed and Ward. $2.

THE four long essays which make up this book fall under no patent heading. Essentially they are studies in independence, done in an unusual combination of the critical and biographical techniques. Mr. Sargent has chosen four radically different men—Charles Péguy, Paul Claudel, Gerard Manley Hopkins, and Orestes Brownson—for his consideration. To be sure, three of these men are poets, but as poets they are poles apart. What the author has written of one of them, however, is true of all four: "No matter with what group he marched, he was always out of step. He could keep in step only with himself." These men insisted on being themselves, and defied the almost overpowering tendency of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries towards standardization of the individual. They had another thing in common, their Catholicism, for all four either returned to the faith in which they had been bred or were converted to it.

Mr. Sargent's discussion of Gerard Manley Hopkins is perhaps the most valuable part of the book. Hopkins becomes much more understandable when he is seen as a "nineteeth-century English Don Quixote" with a love for difficulties. Because he liked what was difficult, he became a Catholic, which was a hard thing for a member of Benjamin Jowett's Balliol to do. Shortly he became a Jesuit, and after his entrance into the order he was a better poet than he had been before, although the Society of Jesus, as the author points out, is scarcely a training-school for poets. Hopkins, as a young man, had an instinctive interest in nature of a mystical and contemplative type. His theological and philosophical studies helped to clarify this interest. In the writings of Duns Scotus, who had been at Oxford some five hundred years before him, Hopkins found a philosopher "who of all men most sways my spirits to peace." Somehow the doctrines of Scotus and St. Bonaventura clarified in the young Jesuit's brain his intuitive recognition that "The world is charged with the grandeur of God" and ". . . what is Earth's eye, tongue, or heart else, where Else, but in dear and dogged man?" And so he wrote poems which seemed to the staid Robert Bridges, already shocked by novelty of meter and diction, to be guilty of "some perversion of human feeling" and injured by "the naked encounter of sensualism and asceticism." Mr. Sargent makes all this understandable, as it has not been made before, and Hopkins, as an individual and as a poet, takes on flesh and blood: he is no longer merely a legendary revolutionary force in English poetry.

Of the other three essays, that on Paul Claudel has the greatest interest of subject. The one-time Ambassador of the French Republic to Washington is well known as a man of letters, although he is little read. Mr. Sargent depicts him as a disciple of Rimbaud, intent upon escape from the nineteenth-century mechanistic prison. But Claudel started writing poetry at the age when Rimbaud abandoned it and disappeared into East Africa. Claudel's East Africa has been his diplomatic career in New York, Boston, China, and Washington. In China he became free, exultant in independence, a Catholic rebel deserted by the rebels because he is a Catholic and by the Catholics because he is a rebel.

Charles Péguy was perhaps the most independent of these four men. He founded the sect of Péguyism, with himself as the sole Péguyist. At various times he was a revolutionary, a socialist, a Bergsonian, and finally a Catholic. His occupations were even more numerous: student, bookseller, editor, philosopher, poet, and soldier. He wrote gigantic epics. He was accused of having only one subject, Jeanne d'Arc, and he answered that he would write twenty-four "Jeanne d'Arcs." He found truth inexpressible and nothing that he had written satisfactory: so he repeated what he had to say in another way. Sometimes he reads like Gertrude Stein, but he was more of a poet than she. He achieved momentary recognition, won a prize, and was immediately forgotten. He was killed in the second month of the war.

Orestes Augustus Brownson, the only American in the group, was a philosopher. Necessarily he had to be himself. He rebelled against the "Standing Order" of Puritanism, and repudiated his inherited Congregationalism. He became a Unitarian minister in Boston, but was soon found too independent for his congregation. Then he became associated with the Brook Farm group. Finally, in 1844, he became a Catholic and was deemed dead by his associates. Yet until 1876, when he did die, he carried on a highly vigorous one-man campaign of clarification in his review, Brownson's Quarterly, with a complete contempt of public opinion. He won recognition abroad in distinguished quarters, and some at home, as perhaps the only American Catholic intellectual of his time. He was a contradiction in terms: a Yankee Catholic philosopher who wrote half a century before a native audience existed for him.

Mr. Sargent's sympathetic and often brilliant studies of these four men, who asserted their individuality and independence in a world that had grown unfriendly to personal freedom, make a valuable and absorbing book.

Mason Wade

Renaming Old Directions

Redirecting Education: Vol. I, The United States. Edited by Rexford G. Tugwell and Leon H. Keyserling. Columbia University Press. $3.

IF all the world were crooks, and the ideal of crookedness were enshrined in all its institutions, would you prepare a youth for citizenship by condemning thievery or by teaching him to steal? Would you ask him to work for a better world, or to get ahead by the standards of this one? There are many scrupulous people who might choose the more Machiavellian course as regards the individual. But the coöperative virtues form an important aspect of our equipment for survival as a race. And since "goodness" is fundamentally so close to social utility, when considering youth as a group (as educational theory must) even the toughest Realpolitik can lead to the conclusion that the young must be taught to reject the status quo. For in the end, a considerable percentage of "civic virtue" must be embodied in a society's methods of production and distribution if that society is to be workable—and there are times when people must endanger themselves as individuals to benefit themselves as members of a group.

Hence the predicament in which the proponents of the "new" education have always found themselves. They begin by noting that the economic system under which we live comes pretty close to organized crookedness—i.e., the systematic effort of individuals to draw more from the communal pile than they put into it. Yet educators are by trade a peaceful lot—and here enters Anomaly One: That even in a world highly militant, the educator may most easily set himself at peace with his fellows by subscribing to the rapacious values in authority and training his students to accept things as they are. To be sure, he need not deny the evidences of trouble all about him. He may parade some modicum of discontent with the present. It is even advisable that he call for a better future, if only his pleas do not imply a basic attack upon current institutions which, if preserved, would make this better future impossible. "Futurism" of this sort may be in exceptionally good repute, if the several complimentary tributes to the forward-looking uttered by the authors of "Redirecting Education" are evidence.

Unfortunately, it is quite reasonable that an educator's attempts to alter the social framework in any serious respect should be resisted. A society which believes in itself and its values will insist that its schools be used to perpetuate these values. A society of crooks which firmly believed in crookedness as a "way of life" would probably insist that its children be taught how to steal. And similarly a society built around the expropriative devices of capitalism will insist that the fundamentals of expropriation be taught and hallowed. In the natural order of events, education is a function of society. If we imagine an ideal world, for instance, we think of a just and stable economic structure, with a system of education designed for teaching youth how to maintain this justice and stability.

But in so far as a society is in disorder, and a group arises which questions the set of values in authority, we may expect a tendency to reverse the relationship between education and society. The dissident group wants to make education an instrument of social change. Or, in Dewey's terminology as cited by Tugwell, it wants to make society a function of education. It would make education evangelical or reformative, rather than conservative. To educate for socialism in a capitalist country, for instance, would be a schismatic, evolutionary, or revolutionary act, designed to make society a function of education. But to educate for socialism in a socialist country would be a conformist and conservative act, designed to make education a function of society.

The five authors represented in "Redirecting Education" have, on the surface at least, aligned themselves with the society-as-a-function-of-education view. In principle, they would equip people for The Scramble, not by teaching youth to be Perfect Scramblers, but by casting doubt upon the Scrambled system of values. Tugwell is particularly vocal on this score.

As symptomatology, the book is commendable. Tugwell offers much to substantiate his formula for America as "an individualism in people's heads finding various characteristic embodiments but always being forced to compromise with a developing collectivism" (in short, the doctrine of the "cultural lag"). In his chapters on Social Objectives in the American College Leon H. Keyserling indicates the essential difference between a truly integrated social structure and the smatterings of survey and outline which are now mistaken for it. Charles Woolsey Cole discusses some major problems of the historic method—and those who feel that we have solved everything by learning to think in terms of historical development would do well to consider his chapters. Ex-comptroller Joseph McGoldrick contributes a subdued jeremiad concerning our political disorders and their effect upon the teaching of Political Science in the College.

Perhaps the most important trait of this book is best revealed in the article by Thomas C. Blaisdell, Jr., on Economics and the College. For it is precisely here, in the most radical paper of the lot, that we see how intellectuals of this stamp can get themselves shunted off from criticism of the ailing economic structure into championship of the elaborate Hoover-Roosevelt projects for preserving private business at public expense. Blaisdell decides to lay foremost emphasis upon the fact of business cycles. In the same way, Tugwell had laid foremost emphasis upon the phenomena of individualism. By these slight shifts, one can discreetly evade the central problems of private ownership. One can get to talking encouragingly of such things as collectivism or social planning, and ease past the fact that he is proposing to leave the fundamentals of the business structure intact.

In recent years, we have seen many fantastic ways of proving that Mr. A is incipiently fascist for all his obvious love of human betterment. As the simplest rule of thumb I vote for the following test: A fascist is one who would integrate politics and production through the medium of business. And conversely, an anti-fascist is one who would integrate politics and production by the abolition of business. If this test is acceptable, I hold that all commercial abolitionists are entitled to distrust this book somewhat, and to suspect that the more vital means of propaganda will originate elsewhere.

KENNETH BURKE

Merrill Moore

Six Sides to a Man. By Merrill Moore. Harcourt Brace and Company. $2.

LOUIS UNTERMEYER tells us that Dr. Merrill Moore, a practicing physician, has written 25,000 sonnets, sometimes dictating them to his wife between appointments with his patients or with co-workers in the Boston Psychopathic Hospital. But what of it? Does Dr. Moore represent to Mr. Untermeyer the American poet who is truly a man of action? Obviously he is more the man of action than the poet. These fourteen-line poems are not, in the first place, sonnets. Their rhymes, their inner rhythms, their pauses are not those of the true sonnet at all. They are sonnets only in that they have fourteen lines with, usually, a break in emotion somewhere around the eighth line. Nor is there in these lines any of the fusion or intensity of true poetry. They are rather a kind of rapid-fire comment on life—original, sometimes startling, sometimes quite sensitive representations of people, actions, disease, emotions. If one disregards their claim to being poetry, one finds them very interesting. They stir the intellect and emotions, not as poetry does, through a perfect re-presentation of inner conflict and its solution, but as terse, human drama. The more nearly Dr. Moore approaches the method of poetry, that is, to objectify through imagery or through the perfect use of words within rhythm, the less successful he is. When he becomes "poetic" the result is definitely bad; then triteness of imagery and phrase and faultiness of rhythm are all too evident. When he merely tells a story or presents a character, he is original and exciting. Obviously he is a man of wide experience and quick perception, possessed of an excited, energetic mind. He is at his best when he reveals this mind to us bluntly and without effort.

EDA LOU WALTON

Shorter Notices

Place of Hawks. By August Derleth. Loring and Mussey. $2.50.

To read one of the four stories in this volume is to have read them all. Mr. Derleth has one theme, which almost amounts to an obsession: the neuroticism which for some writers seems to be an inevitable by-product of life in rural communities. If we are to believe him, to get back to nature is simply to get a step closer to the region of morbidity, decadence, and positive pathology. If there is very little difference between the stories, there is even less between the characters: the sane ones, who almost approach insanity in their unquestioning acceptance of the insanity of the others, are practically interchangeable; while the others are distinguished from them only by a species of insanity which is almost invariably the same in each. In three of the stories it takes the form of fantasy: the characters live in a world of ghosts or visions more real than the living people around them. In another, the young bride's madness expresses itself in a desire to kill—save for this interesting deviation there is nothing to set her apart from the rest of the psychopaths. Mr. Derleth lacks the intense objectivity which might have transformed these people into unforgettable monsters; on the other hand, he has none of the compassion which might have made them convincing and pitiable.

The Elaghin Affair. By Ivan Bunin. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

This new volume of Bunin's short stories does nothing to justify the award of the 1933 Nobel Prize. His was always a slight talent, but it has grown flimsier with the years. The present collection is practically meaningless. It shows no sense of character, no emotional force, no control of ideas. There has been, in almost every story, a ponderous attempt to create "atmosphere," to evoke the past, but even Bunin's nostalgia for the old regime has worn a little thin. It has always been alleged that Bunin is, if nothing else, a remarkable stylist. If one accepts this statement, one must blame a clumsy translator for the execrable, halting prose which fills this volume.

The King of the Great Clock Tower. By William Butler Yeats. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

This miscellany of Mr. Yeats's recent writings contains the one-act play from which it takes its title, six poems on Irish political topics, a group of poems of the supernatural, and prose commentaries on these pieces. In one of the latter the author, at the approach of seventy, expresses some concern that his powers may be waning. A reading of this volume makes such concern seem premature, even though nothing here is on a sufficiently ambitious scale to rank with his greatest works.

PUBLIC

The Nation

now announces for early publication...

THE CRISIS OF THE MIDDLE CLASS

Beginning next week The Nation presents a series of three timely articles under the title "The Crisis of the Middle Class." The articles will appear in consecutive issues. The author of the series is Lewis Corey whose books "The House of Morgan" and "The Decline of American Capitalism" have attained a wide sale. Mr. Corey's next book, bearing the same title as this series, will appear in September.

I. The Middle Class Under Capitalism

In this article Mr. Corey traces the history of the middle class and defines the middle class of today. He points out two crises: first, the old crisis of property among the surviving small enterprisers; and second, the new crisis of unemployment. As the problem of unemployment never before confronted the middle class none of the ancient ideals and forms of action offers a solution. Utterly confounded, the middle class gropes toward a change. Will it choose fascism or socialism?

II. The Middle Class Under Fascism

The author not only shows the plight of the middle class in outstanding fascist countries, but also explains what is likely to happen to the middle class in America if the present forerunners of fascism continue to gain supporters.

III. The Middle Class Under Socialism

The attitude of the Soviet Union toward the middle class serve as the basis of discussion for this article. Under socialism is the middle class more or less happy than under capitalism or fascism? Could the principles of socialism formulated by the Soviets succeed in the United States of America? Or is a severely altered version required? Mr. Corey answers these perplexing questions and many others in his discussion of this interesting subject.

DON'T MISS THIS ENLIGHTENING SERIES!

ORDER FORM

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York City

Enter my subscription for one year for $5. I will pay in thirty days.

OR......2 years for $8.

.........3 years for $11.

Name............................

Address ....

....

8–7–35

Films

"She"

ALTHOUGH we have the word of no less an authority than the psychologist Jung that the late Sir Rider Haggard's once very popular "She" is a much underrated work, full of the most profound racial symbolism and worthy of being mentioned with the great masterpices of European literature, the main impression left by the picture at the Radio City Music Hall is that Hollywood is reduced to pretty lean pickings in its continued effort to leave no dust undisturbed on the remaining shelves of nineteenth-century fiction. It will be no surprise if this last refined flight of the Victorian imagination is followed by a resuscitation of the complete works of Mrs. Humphrey Ward, Marie Corelli, and Hall Caine. And there is always Rudyard Kipling, who has, moreover, the advantage of being still alive enough to relay his senilities over the transatlantic cables. The real fact is that in its present desperate search for materials Hollywood does not intend to hesitate at trying to raise the dead.

This reflection is just possibly suggested by the theme of the Haggard classic, which, it will be recalled, is concerned with the attempt of a young man to bring back to England the secret of enduring life discovered by one of his ancestors five centuries ago. In the film the sinister kingdom of She-who-must-be-obeyed is for some reason transferred from the tropics to the arctic zone. Accompanied by a middle-aged scientist and a young girl whom he has rescued on the snow-covered plains of northern Muscovy, the modern Ponce de Leon penetrates into the very sanctuary of the queen who has reigned in terror over her subjects through the seven centuries of her immortal youth. As acted by Miss Helen Gahagan, with her Ethel Barrymore profile and fluttering voice, She is a cross between Lady Macbeth and a very modern lady of unassuaged passions pacing the floor of a Park Avenue apartment. For some centuries she has been awaiting the reincarnation of the young English adventurer whom she has killed out of jealousy of his young wife and now the same situation repeats itself when his descendant, spurning her inducements of eternal life, persists in his loyalty to the mortal beauty of Miss Helen Mack. The monotonous ordeal is brought to an end when Miss Gahagan takes her fire-bath of Life Everlasting only to emerge with a countenance reminiscent of rotogravure photographs of a certain New York billionaire of unconscionable antiquity. Mortality is restored to favor in the audience's mind in a closing scene in which the two lovers are to be seen warming themselves by the earthly fireside of their London home. If the main situation in the film seems to put a slight strain on the imagination, it is next to nothing in comparison with that created by the various settings. Not since "King Kong" has so much cardboard and canvas been sacrificed to the purposes of illusion with so little result as in the earlier sequences of falling glaciers and subterranean landscapes. As for the costumes and general décor of the kingdom of She, the effect is of a review-lecture in stage design from the early Egyptian to contemporary Harlem African. Miss Aline Bernstein has obviously taken great pains with her Greco-Egyptian court guards, but somehow these fail to harmonize with the half-naked savages who dance around the cauldron in the human sacrifice scene. The imagination is addled rather than stimulated by the cooperation of so many talents in the production of "She." It is to be feared that the picture will appeal to those for whom it was intended neither for its theme, which is irrecoverably lost in the setting, nor for its setting, which was lost somewhere between the pages of Rider Haggard's novel and a studio-lot in Hollywood.

WILLIAM TROY

Contributors to This Issue

WILLIAM FRANCIS is a magazine writer and former New York newspaperman.

CARLETON BEALS is the author of "The Crime of Cuba."

FRED WOLTMAN is a staff writer for the New York World-Telegram. In 1929 he was dismissed from the University of Pittsburgh in the so-called Liberal Club episode discussed in The Nation of July 24.

ELINORE MOREHOUSE HERRICK is New York Regional Director for the National Labor Relations Board.

RICHARD NEUBERGER, a law student at the University of Oregon, is making a special study of labor conditions in his state.

JAMES RORTY, author of "Our Master's Voice: Advertising," spent last winter in the West investigating social and economic conditions.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN is the author of "Expression in America" and "An Altar in the Fields."

DAVID BERES is a practicing physician in New York.

KENNETH BURKE, author of "Permanence and Change," is at work on a study of motivation.

☐ SCHOOLS ☐

Mohegan Modern School PROGRESSIVE LIBERTARIAN
Mohegan Colony, Crompond, N.Y.
NEAR PEEKSKILL
Kindergarten to Grade 8
Academics - Arts - Crafts - Sciences
Children can be placed in private homes at reasonable rates, under the supervision of the School Tuition $180

STUDY THIS FALL AT A WORKERS' SCHOOL IN THE OZARKS, THREE MONTHS FOR $50. Commonwealth College, Mena, Arkansas.

PERSONALS

IMITATORS OF CONTACTS COME AND GO, but CONTACTS, now in its eighth year, with 1,500 members, goes on. Send 3c stamp for unique plan connecting the mentally marooned. CONTACTS, Box 91, Station D. New York City.

THE NEW SCENE is prepared to accept a limited number of mature men and women to participate as actors in a new group created for those who demand intelligence with their theatre. Box 643, % The Nation.

VACATION time the perfect chance for self-acquaintance. My analysis always frank and stimulating. Send handwriting in form of letter. Analysis $2. Miss Florence Lyon, Box 261, Quincy, Mass.

For Resort advertising see Pages ii and iii

HERE IS A MESSENGER FOR YOU

Let THE NATION'S Classified columns serve as your messenger to the 38,000 subscribers who read these columns each week.

Rates: 62 cents a line (6 words). Minimum 3 lines.

5% discount for 3 insertions.
10% discount for 10 insertions.

•

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York City

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 14, 1935 No. 3658

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 169
EDITORIALS:
Is This Recovery? 172
What the Tax Bill Isn't 173
Cat's Eye View 173
CARTOON: "IT DIDN'T WORK, ADOLF!" By BURCK . . . 174
ISSUES AND MEN. OUR INEFFICIENT NAVY. By Oswald Garrison Villard 175
THE CRISIS OF THE MIDDLE CLASS. I. THE MIDDLE CLASS UNDER CAPITALISM. By Lewis Corey 176
FIRST MONTH OF DICTATOR LONG. By Arnold S. Fulton . . 179
HENRY MORGENTHAU AND HIS FRIENDS. By Paul W. Ward. 182
LOVE AND HOUSING. By M. M. 185
CORRESPONDENCE 185
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
Camden: Shipworkers on Strike. By Lawrence Rogin 188
Labor Static. By Heywood Broun 190
Peace Comes to the Fur Market. By David Scheyer 191
Labor Notes 192
BOOKS:
Footprints in Cement. By William Troy 193
Human Accents in Science. By William Gruen 193
The Life of Veblen. By H. B. Parkes 194
Religion in Mexico. By Robert Hammond Murray 195
Class Education. By Ernest Sutherland Bates 195
Shorter Notices 196
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 196

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING CHARLES ANGOFF
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of subscriber's address.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by the Nation, Inc.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

IN POSTPONING consideration of the Italo-Ethiopian dispute until September 4, the League Council has confessed its impotence in face of Mussolini's avowed policy of aggression. While the compromise resolution adopted on August 3 has been defended in some quarters as essential in order to prevent Italy from bolting the League, its concessions amount to virtual capitulation on every important issue. No attempt was made to halt the dispatch of Italian troops to Africa, nor was there any specific prohibition of the use of violence during the period of attempted conciliation. Arbitration is to be continued until September 1, but it was specifically ruled that the arbitrators were not to pass on the question of the ownership of the territory around Ualual—which is the basic cause of the dispute. Upon Mussolini's insistence it was decided that Ethiopia should have no part in the three-cornered discussions of the powers as to the ultimate fate of the African kingdom. Behind the scenes it is understood that Great Britain and France will not object to giving Italy definite concessions in Ethiopia, provided the whole matter can be adjusted without completely disrupting the existing machinery for collective security. After all, it is reasoned, Ethiopia is a backward country which can readily be sacrificed to preserve the peace of Europe. Whether Mussolini will be satisfied with such concessions as the powers are prepared to give, or whether he prefers to test his arms in actual struggle, remains to be seen. But if war comes, the acrimonious controversies which are now under way between the powers over the division of the spoils serve as a warning that the conflict is unlikely to be localized in Africa. If the United States is to avoid entanglement in that war, it is high time for it to face the issue realistically and decide upon a strong and consistent peace policy.

THE RAGE of the Japanese press against Vanity Fair for daring to suggest that their Emperor might not be a suitable recipient of the Noble Peace Prize would be entirely ludicrous if only an appreciable number of Japanese could be counted on to see the humor in the situation. But having an emperor is a serious business, and if the ruling class of a country desires to undergo the expense and worry of perpetuating this medieval institution it is obvious that it can ill-afford to have it lampooned in foreign magazines. While the Vanity Fair cartoon is innocuous enough compared to hundreds which have appeared dealing with Hitler, Ramsay MacDonald, and other political leaders, it carries with it a suggestion that after all an emperor is only a human being—an idea which if it were allowed to grow would spell the end of emperors. The peculiar sensitiveness of the Japanese on this subject at the moment is due to the struggle of the military-fascist clique to strengthen their position by eliminating as heretical all liberal or modern ideas regarding the origin of the Emperor's power. Following a bitter political controversy carried on for many months, the Japanese Cabinet has issued an official statement condemning the views of Dr. Tatsukichi Minobe, a noted constitutional authority who held the power of the government to be derived from the people, and asserting that "sovereignty absolutely lies with the Emperor"—the direct descendant of the Sun Goddess, Amaterasu-Omikami. It follows, therefore, that any Japanese who could see the humor in the Vanity Fair cartoon is a disloyal subject and is thereby automatically disqualified for public life.

IF WE were the managing editor of a New York newspaper we should consider the following item a piece of news: It was revealed on July 31 at a hearing of the Senate Lobby Investigating Committee under chairmanship of Senator Black that Basil O'Connor, former law partner of the President of the United States, received $25,000 from the Associated Gas and Electric Company during its fight against the Wheeler-Rayburn holding-company bill. We should consider this item of unusual news value by reason of the further fact that Basil O'Connor is the brother of John O'Connor, chairman of the House committee which is also investigating lobbies, particularly in connection with the utilities bill. Yet apparently neither the Times nor the Herald Tribune considered this story of sufficient interest to warrant its publication. The Post, with what seems to us a better sense of news, not only published the story but pointed out a few implications.

> John O'Connor has been under fire in connection with his attitude toward the holding-company legislation ever since it came up. First, as chairman of the Rules Committee, he defied the White House by reporting out a rule under which there could be no record vote on the controversial "death-sentence" provision of the bill. Then, on the teller vote on the death-sentence issue, he apparently ducked the chamber. . . . Representative O'Connor himself has refused to answer questions about his stand on the death sentence. And finally, he went out of his way to see that his Rules Committee, rather than a select committee, was authorized to investigate charges of coercion by both sides in the holding-company fight.

To complete the record of John O'Connor it remains to be said that on August 1 he voted against the "death sentence."

STATE-ENDOWED MUSIC on the largest scale ever attempted is about to make its debut in the United States. A work-relief project is now under way designed to give work to the more than 18,000 musicians who are unemployed. The musicians are to be classified according to the type of work they are most proficient in—dance music, orchestral music, band music, and so on. Ensembles formed in these groups will be allocated to every section of the country. Special attention will be given to the works of American composers. The latter have been cruelly neglected unless they had friends at court in the half-dozen or so major orchestras of the land. The head of the entire undertaking will be Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff, former conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, a musician of excellent taste, an accomplished conductor, and a critic of exceptional discernment. In addition he is a man of integrity who will not compromise his high artistic standards no matter what the cost. His appointment may well herald a musical renaissance in the United States.

THE GROUP representing the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners, which was mysteriously fired on several days ago while en route to Montgomery, Alabama, to urge Governor Bibb Graves to veto the Street anti-sedition bill, has had considerable success. Three of its members got themselves arrested in Birmingham for "possessing more than a single copy of subversive literature"—a crime under the local Downs law—but they were released by the chief of police who ruled that they had not violated the law, although sixty arrests and two convictions had previously resulted from the possession of similar or less inflammatory literature. The determination of the group to test the constitutionality of the law in the highest court of the state apparently put a wholesome fear into the hearts of the local magistrates. The group's general agitation for the preservation of civil liberties in Alabama probably influenced Governor Graves in his veto of the Street bill and his sensible statement that: "We have sufficient law to curb radicals on the statute books now. To enact further law is to reflect on our confidence in our judges to enforce existing law." We hope that Governor Talmadge of Georgia will show as much sense in considering the plea made by the group that he use his influence to repeal the abominable anti-insurrection law, enacted in 1861, under which Angelo Herndon was convicted and sentenced to eighteen to twenty years on the chain gang. Herndon is at present at liberty on $15,000 bail pending a hearing on his petition for a rehearing of his appeal in the United States Supreme Court in October.

THE SUPER-PATRIOT of San Simeon, William Randolph Hearst, is paying dearly for his recent friendliness for the race theories of Drs. Rosenberg and Goebbels. According to Media Records the Hearst press this June carried 607,496 fewer lines of advertising than it did a year ago, while "in all cities where Hearst has publications all papers gained 413,450 lines." His papers in Washington, San Francisco, Seattle, and Milwaukee, to be sure, show a gain in advertising lineage over last year, but that gain was more than wiped out by the decrease on his Chicago, New York, Boston, Albany, and Pittsburgh papers. The decrease was caused in large part, no doubt, by the withdrawal of a mass of department-store lineage. Most department stores in the United States are owned or managed by Jews, who have been offended by Hearst's thinly veiled pro-Hitler stand. Comparative circulation figures are not yet available, but a drop in advertising generally reflects a drop in the number of readers. Mr. Hearst's worries are apparently sizeable ones, as his advertisements in competing papers, defending his "Americanism" campaign, indicate.

AFTER NEARLY EIGHT MONTHS of consideration the British Parliament has passed the India bill and it has been given royal assent. Though attacked vigorously by the die-hard faction of the Conservatives as an abject surrender of the white man's burden, the bill actually represents a strengthening of British control in India. This is achieved through the inclusion of the Indian princes in the governing hierarchy, and the granting of the appearance of self-government without its substance. The strength of the Nationalist Party has been a continual menace to British rule, and the representation of that party in the national legislature—hedged in by effective safeguards—should make the task of British officialdom somewhat easier. Although the population of the Indian states is considerably less than 25 per cent of that of India as a whole, the princes are to have the right to nominate 40 per cent of the members of the Council of State and one-third of the Federal Assembly, while the caste Hindus—comprising a majority of the population—are given only 86 out of 250 seats in the Assembly, and these are to be elected indirectly by the provincial legislatures. Control of three of the most important functions of government—the issue of currency, determination of foreign policy, and considerations of national defense—are "reserved" exclusively for the British. And as if these safeguards were not sufficient to throttle Indian influence in the government of the country, the Governor-General is invested with a series of "discretionary" powers, including the right to veto all acts of the legislature and the promulgation of emergency decrees without the assent of the legislative branch of the government. Taken as a whole the bill is a crushing blow to the Indian moderates who had the temerity to believe the ruling class would voluntarily relinquish its power if the people showed themselves to be "reasonable."

THE SPECTACULAR TRIUMPH of President Cárdenas of Mexico over General Calles, long regarded as the iron man of the revolution, has been reinforced recently by a series of government victories in states where Calles's power had previously been unchallenged. In Tabasco where Calles's ally, Thomas Garrido y Canabal, together with the Standard Fruit Company, have long held undisputed sway, the old government has been forced out and a new one favorable to Cárdenas installed. While Garrido's economic hold on this remote and inaccessible state is undiminished, his bid for national power through the agency of his Red Shirts seems definitely to have been forestalled. Popular demonstrations against incumbent governors have also been staged in Tamaulipas and even in Sonora, home of Calles. Particularly significant, moreover, was the defeat of Plutarco Elias Calles, Jr. in his campaign for governor of the state of Nuevo Leon. The younger Calles had won his nomination in May by an overwheming majority and had the endorsement of the National Revolutionary Party. His defeat by Zuazua, a close friend of President Cárdenas, indicates that the popular belief that the new president will resume the revolutionary struggle has been unshaken by the reactionary make-up of the new cabinet and its semi-fascist scheme for uniting the landowning farmers in a government-controlled organization. The fact that the revolutionary spirit is still strong despite repeated betrayals from above suggests, however, that Cárdenas's day of triumph may be relatively short-lived.

IN HAMTRAMCK, a suburb of Detroit, half the butcher shops are closed as a result of a boycott by housewives who maintain that it is only the start of a "general strike against the high cost of living." Mrs. Mary Zuk, their militant spokesman, predicts that after the fight for lower meat prices has been won, they will go on to the other necessities of life. She also denies that the strike is communistic. That charge, she says, "is part of a ruse on the part of the butchers and meat packers to frighten timid people and split the ranks." The action committee has refused an offer of the butchers to sell existing stocks at reduced prices if the strikers would promise in return to pay prices "in line with wholesale meat costs," which would indicate that the action committee also knows a ruse when it sees one. Meanwhile Hamtramck is seeing plenty of action. Three women and a man were arrested in the course of an attempt by the strikers to pour kerosene on meat being unloaded at a packing plant; they were released shortly afterward when a crowd of 300 which gathered at the jail guaranteed their appearance in court; they were later convicted of disturbing the peace and put on three months probation. The Hamtramck Butchers and Grocers Association has announced that all butcher shops there will close for two weeks if the boycott continues "simply because there's no one to sell to." It is not surprising that the packers who consider the strike communistic are also convinced that the high prices which caused it are an act of God. "I suppose Providence is to blame for the drought and the government for the taxes," said Thomas W. Taliaferro, packing-company president. "There really isn't anything the packers and retailers can do about it." Knowing what we do about packers, we should like to see the books of Mr. Taliaferro and his brother packers before accepting his explanation. Apparently similar doubts are rampant in Detroit where a grand-jury investigation of meat prices is contemplated as a result of the direct methods of Mary Zuk and her fellow consumers.

WHITE-COLLAR RELIEF WORKERS in New York have organized to combat impending wage cuts. At a recent mass meeting 1,400 white-collar and professional workers elected a Provisional Committee for Project Organizations which has power to stop work on projects where wage cuts are threatened. Plans were also discussed for uniting forces with other organizations of unemployed and with the A. F. of L. in fighting against reductions which are bound to affect the employed as well as the jobless. This insistence by relief workers on maintaining their present wage scale, which is already low, as well as their demand for vacations with pay, will make work for those propagandists who stand ready at so much as a word to prove that people on relief are imposing on the public pocketbook. The truth is that thousands of trained workers in the professional fields, through projects for adult education and the vocational training of younger people, are contributing far more to the common good than they are taking out in the form of a meager living earned under a heavy cloud of uncertainty and worry for the future. They are, in other words, carrying on for a pittance socially useful functions which in a well-ordered society would earn for them generous support and recognition. The government, in the truest sense, owes them a living.

THE CASE OF CHARLES KRUMBEIN, now serving an eighteen-month sentence in the federal penitentiary at Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, for using a passport issued in the name of Albert E. Stewart, should interest all friends of the labor movement. Krumbein, who is a member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, pleaded guilty on January 28, 1935, to having used a fictitious name on his passport while traveling in the Orient in 1930. His sole reason for doing so was his fear that his record as a revolutionary labor leader might lay him open to persecution by the reactionary government in China. No one else used his passport, and he had no intention of committing an anti-social act, as the prosecution virtually admitted. The severity of the sentence imposed upon him by the court is in striking contrast to the suspended sentence given for a similar offense to Hearst's red-baiter, Robert Green, alias Thomas Walker, the notorious forger and violator of the Mann act. Equally shocking is the nature of the indictment against Krumbein. It charged him with violating the federal passport regulations seven times in China, though the nature of the offence was precisely the same in each case. Judge Henry W. Goddard of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York sent him to the penitentiary on one of the counts, and sentenced him to four years' probation on the others. The second sentence seems to have no justification save the desire of the government to hinder Krumbein's organizing activities in the labor movement, to which he has devoted himself for twenty-five years. He has served six months in the federal penitentiary, and is eligible for parole. His case is now before the Federal Parole Board, which, we hope, will release him.

Is This Recovery?

LEST our readers be too much diverted by the bright-colored balloons of early "recovery" now floating over the dark chasm of Wall Street, we wish to present a few figures from the August issue of Economic Notes, published by the Labor Research Association, an organization on the left which is so unkind as to use for its purposes statistics gathered on the right.

> Business Outlook: Downward movement has been in progress since March. . . . Present business level is described by Annalist as "below the worst levels seen up to the middle of 1931."
>
> Construction Industry: Moderate gains reported from extremely low previous level. Building construction as a whole is about 75 per cent of first six months of last year.
>
> Automobile production is now declining and lay-offs continuing. Business Week comments: "Motor manufacturers, intent on making 1936 a more profitable year, are bending every effort to reduce costs on new models. Minimum design changes will bring some savings. . . . Elimination of hour restrictions on labor will be another factor."
>
> Department store sales for first half of year have been higher than during the first six months of last year but due to higher prices actual volume of goods sold has been lower.
>
> Employment in May, 1935, was even lower than in May of last year. Real wages this year have been lower than in 1934.

At this point a balloon floats by.

> Bank Profits: "Current operating earnings of most big banks provide a fair margin over current dividend payments, yields are generous, and the price-earning ratio is low," says Poor's Investment Service, adding that the "long-term outlook" is excellent and "interest rates and consequently profits are certain to rise." It cites the Morgan-controlled Bankers Trust Company as especially well suited for investment.

But it only serves to intensify the ensuing darkness.

> "Prices of many basic agricultural products have risen to levels where consumption, as well as production, is being seriously curtailed," says Barron's. It adds that butter "is being replaced by the less expensive oleomargarine." Butter consumption in first four months of this year fell at least 13 per cent below corresponding period last year.
>
> Bread consumption for the first quarter of the year . . . was "between 5 and 10 per cent lower than for the same period of 1934 which was smaller than the consumption in the corresponding period of 1933." (Food Industries, June, 1935.)
>
> Milk (and cream) consumption in New York metropolitan area in 1932 dropped 62,320,000 quarts below 1931; in 1933 it dropped 37,360,000 quarts below 1932; in 1934 the drop was an additional 59,160,000 quarts below 1933. . . . Milk Research Council admits: "Experience indicates that so long as the buying power of the population of New York remains at a low level, there will be no appreciable increase in milk consumption."
>
> Chain grocery-store sales: Daily average sales in June in dollar volume were only 4 per cent higher than in June, last year. At same time retail food prices rose 11.1 per cent. So actually amount of food bought at these stores fell by over 6 per cent.
>
> Hogs: Further increases in retail meat prices are foreshadowed in latest report of United State Department of Agriculture, which states that hog slaughtering in next three months will be only approximately one-half of the total slaughtering in same period last year, and the smallest in more than 30 years. They expect "a very marked seasonal rise in hog prices" but add that "the relatively low level of consumer buying power" will greatly curtail consumption.

We have not the space, and scarcely the heart, to relay the bulletin's report on the plight of the farmers. A few details indicate the general trend: Gross farm income for 1934 is estimated at about $7,200,000,000, the "average" in that year having dropped to $800. Some 39 farmers out of every 1,000 in 1934 lost their farms. Farm-mortgage foreclosures in the first quarter of 1935, according to the Washington Post, increased 20.3 per cent over the last quarter of 1934 and 9.9 per cent over the first quarter of 1934. These are figures representing some 794 communities and covering over a fourth of the farm population. In 1934, 10 Nebraska families who kept records of their food consumption and expenditures, under the direction of the Extension Service of Department of Agriculture, lived on food worth only $207, including what they produced from the farm and what they bought in stores. Thus they subsisted on a diet below the $312 a year for food worked out by experts of the Department of Agriculture as a "restricted diet for emergency use." And these Nebraska families were admittedly above the average in living standards. Average per capita expenditures for health, dentist, and other personal expenses of 25 typical Oklahoma families carefully studied in 1934 were reduced from $11.36 in 1933 to $8.85.

We close this sad recital with a selection from the Bureau of Labor Statistics. "Retail prices of food declined one-tenth of 1 per cent during the two weeks ended July 16. . . . Food prices are, however, 10.7 per cent higher than one year ago and 16.1 per cent higher than for July 15, 1933."

The results, in human terms, of the economic contraction sketched above are revealed in such announcements as that of the New York Board of Education that 135,000 or 18 per cent of the city's school children are the victims of "serious malnutrition," of which the "full toll" with its threat of tuberculosis and other illnesses, will not be known until later. Or in such statements as that of Dr. Robert H. Bishop, director of University Hospitals in Ohio: "Children are showing the results of periods of poor nourishment in the diseases they now have. Diseases due to worry and privation which ordinarily attack later in life are occurring in middle age." Dr. Bishop further said that there is such a long list of patients waiting to be admitted that most of the hospitals could be filled overnight by those in need of free treatment.

We wish we could conclude with a few economic notes of hope, for the benefit of the 19,250,000 persons on relief (according to Administration figures). We can think of only one. The United States, in point of natural resources, potential foodstuffs, and industrial plant capacity, is one of the richest areas in the world.

PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

What the Tax Bill Isn't

THE minority of the House Ways and Means Committee asserted in its report that the Administration tax bill, just passed by the House of Representatives, was a "political gesture at social reform," not a revenue bill. It is just that. We differ from these indignant Republicans only in our belief that it is a gesture in the right direction. It does not promise any considerable increase in revenue; the $250,000,000-estimate of its sponsors is an insignificant sum in the present scale of government spending. Nor will it yield even this amount unless it is buttressed by an amendment ending the issuance of tax-exempt bonds. It does not redistribute wealth; if the total estimated amount to be extracted from big incomes, inheritances, gifts, and profits were actually distributed it would add about $2 to the wealth of each American. All the bill does, and this the President and his advisers must privately recognize, is to cast upon the minds of the people, politicians included, the shadow of coming events.

Income, inheritance, profits, and gift taxes can produce revenue. They can also, in some degree, redistribute wealth. England, whose budget-balancing ability so constantly excites the admiration of all right-wing opponents of the Administration, has an income-tax schedule which makes Mr. Roosevelt's proposals seem timidly reactionary. Senator La Follette recently stated that in 1934 the total revenue of Great Britain was $4,079,000,000 while its expenditures were $3,905,000,000. The United States collected in the same year $3,277,000,000 and its expenditures were $6,883,000,000. He concluded that "if we had the courage and the will to impose taxes similar to those that are now in force in Great Britain we would secure approximately $4,130,000,000 in addition to the revenue we are now collecting." The United States can and ultimately will have to raise by taxation amounts which at this stage would appear preposterous or terrifying to every businessman and to most politicians. But enough years of hardships inure people to the rigors of high taxation—even the rich who in time are driven to choose between the sacrifice of a substantial portion of their wealth and the ominous alternatives of inflation and ultimate economic collapse. This country is still in the free-and-easy stage of public finance. The government borrows, spends, and shoves its deficit into a convenient separate item for future payment. It is only beginning, with the half-hearted measure now in hand, to recognize that the future must be reckoned with and to hint which groups must expect to carry the ultimate load.

The weaknesses of the bill are under attack from left and right in the Senate. Any detailed consideration of its provisions in The Nation must wait upon its final form. But even at this writing it is safe to say that the efforts of Senators La Follette and Costigan and a few other intelligent critics on the left can hardly succeed in turning this feeble gesture into a strong bill for social taxation in the few remaining breathless weeks of the present session. Whatever its ultimate provisions the Administration's bill must remain litle more than a straw in the political wind—and a tribute to the demagogic potency of the Dictator of Louisiana.

Cat's Eye View

"THE great writers of Spain (like most great writers) completely neglected the sweeping historical events taking place about them." Thus Somerset Maugham in his recent book about Spain, and if the generalization is no more true than generalizations about literature usually are, it has at least its core of truth. It is not the large importance but the enduring poignancy of things which causes them to be remembered and in the writings which the world has agreed to cherish there are eternally enshrined an amazing number of pleasant trivialities:

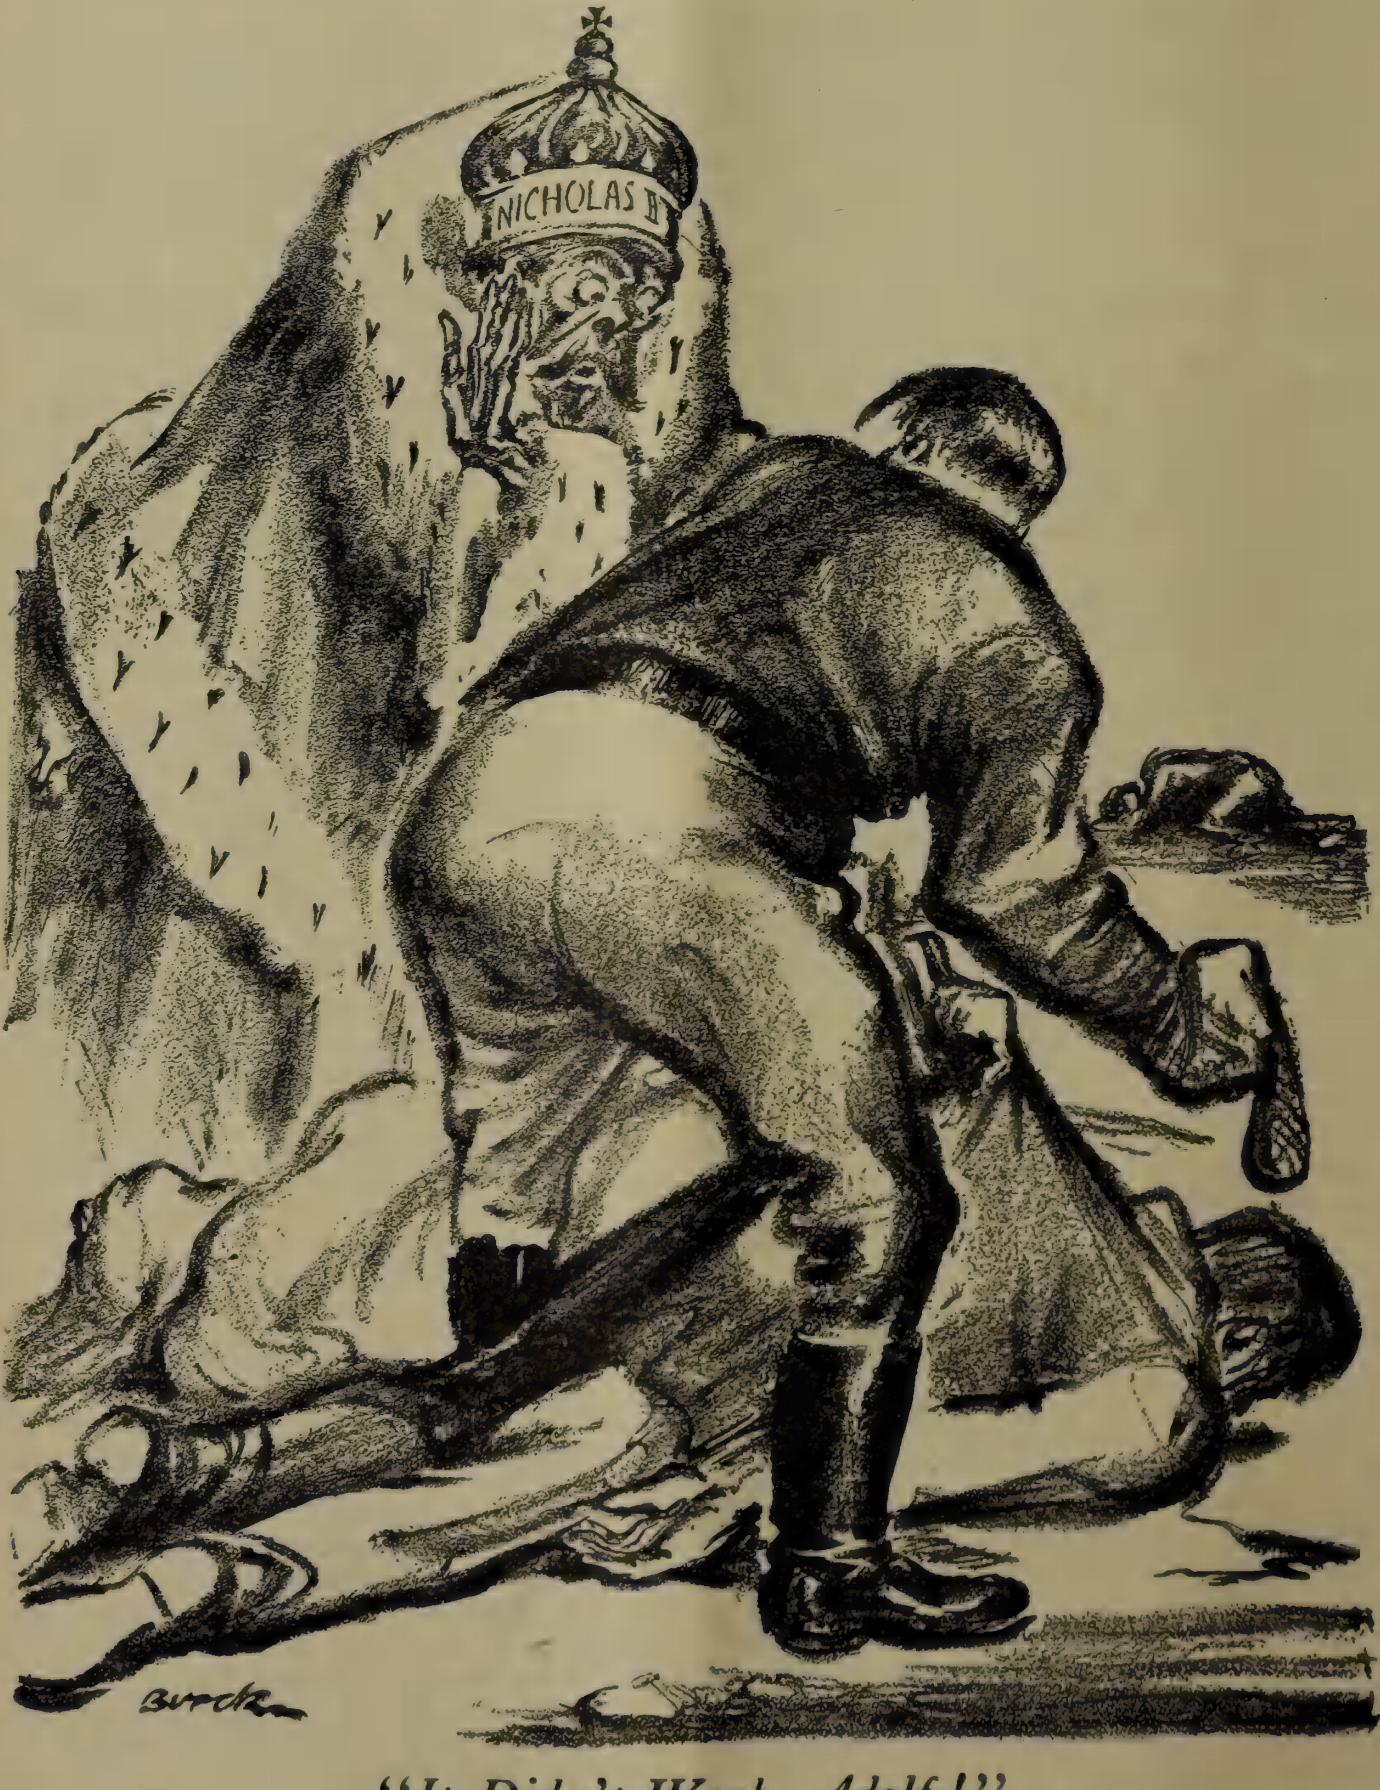
> Pretty! in amber to observe the forms
> Of hairs, or straws, or dirt, or grubs, or worms!
> The things, we know, are neither rich nor rare,
> But wonder how the devil they got there.

To see things steadily and to see them whole is a surer prescription for respectable mediocrity than it is for literary immortality, and the author of an unforgetable line is as like as not to be taking instead the cat's eye view. He may go to London to see the queen, but what he really remembers is the little mouse under the chair.

One reason why the great writer has so often seemed oblivious to "the sweeping historical events" probably is that such events are recorded and analyzed in works whose interest is not primarily literary, while the poet or novelist turns naturally to those intimate experiences which may seem below the dignity of history or philosophy, but which have more to do with determining the color and flavor of life than any sweeping historical event has. Certainly the literature of the past is not valued chiefly for the light which it throws upon either historical events or philosophical systems but rather for its record of what eluded both the historian's record and the philosopher's schematization. Chaucer's monk who swept the cat off the most comfortable chair before he sat down, has outlived the "important" social protest made by the anonymous author of "Piers Plowman," and no one could determine from internal evidence that the Reverend Mr. Collins made his famous proposal to Elizabeth Bennett during the period of the Napoleonic wars.

Indeed the very fact that an observation or a record is not intimately connected with a great event or a philosophical movement may increase its chance of immortality for the simple reason that great events lose their interest and systems their validity, while simple experiences repeat themselves indefinitely. The great historians of antiquity become merely dubious sources; even Gibbon needs correction; but when Ovid, instead of writing the history of his times, advises the gallant young man to brush the dust from the dress of his neighbor at the circus and—especially—when he adds, "if no dirt be there, then brush that none away," Ovid is writing for eternity.

The moral may not be that writers should struggle to be unimportant. It certainly is, however, that critics should be very chary indeed of dismissing works solely on the ground that they are neither ambitious nor important. Only scholars know that the seventeenth century in England was an age of epics. But everybody is familiar with at least a few of the poems written by a timidly amorous clergyman who got his inspiration from milkmaids.



NICHOLAS II
Burck

"It Didn't Work, Adolf!"

Issues and Men

Our Inefficient Navy

THE Vanguard Press has done a daring thing in publishing Dr. F. Russell Bichowsky's astounding book "Is the Navy Ready?" It is a wholesale attack upon the service, its mentality, its training, its readiness, its efficiency, its total lack of science in handling most of its problems and duties. I don't wonder that this book seems to have attracted very little attention in the press. It is a tract that every protagonist of a large navy, every believer in the doctrine of force in international affairs, must wish to have suppressed. Dr. Bichowsky is probably damned all day long, especially as an unpatriotic traitor who plays into the hands of the Japanese, the Germans, the British, and all our other potential enemies. He certainly will be read with the greatest of interest by foreign admiralties, and will undoubtedly cheer up the Japanese imperialists not a little. But in view of the fact that the American people are entitled to the truth about the navy upon which they are spending such vast sums, and because of the obvious belief in some Congressional circles that our safety depends upon the fleet, Dr. Bichowsky has warrant enough for publishing this volume.

What makes his offense additionally grave is the fact that all the way through he has reinforced his own opinions by citations from many officers—he was himself for seven years superintendent of a division of the Naval Research Laboratory, which brought him into contact with all classes of naval ships and naval equipment. It is a fact that officers like Admiral Fiske, the late Admiral Stephen Luce, and Admiral Sims, have spent their lives trying to improve some of the conditions which Dr. Bichowsky describes—with slight results. The "system" usually breaks any protestant, or the would-be reformer becomes so discouraged that after a while he accepts the inevitable. Few have the satisfaction that came to Admiral S. M. Robinson, for example, who in 1911, when a young lieutenant, advocated that alternating electric current alone should be used on navy ships—the same current almost universally in service in the United States. Not until more than twenty years later, after he had become Rear Admiral and Engineer-in-Chief of the Navy was the alternating current adopted, because he was able to order it put into use. In the main, Dr. Bichowsky gives a picture of a navy hopelessly inefficient, chiefly because it is without specialists along certain lines, because its education is faulty from Annapolis up, because social and political influence mean a great deal in an officer's career.

At Annapolis the teaching is bad because it is largely done by officers detailed to the academy without regard for their fitness as teachers. As at West Point, it is text-book teaching, and therefore just a question of memory. The cadets are not taught to think or to reason, and the service places no weight upon original intellectual effort. As for the naval Post-Graduate School, "the first half of it consists chiefly of freshman and sophomore college courses in physics, mathematics, chemistry, and engineering." Recently twenty picked officers were sent to the University of California to get the master's degree, but only five succeeded, although they were all graduates of the Post-Graduate School! Our officers, Dr. Bichowsky contends, are jacks-of-all-trades and masters of none. Especially does he dwell upon the fact that there is no gunnery school and that, while there are plenty of staff officers, they are narrow specialists and none of them are really trained to exercise high command in the sense of dealing with the major problems of strategy. He quotes Rear Admiral Greenslade as writing:

> In the matter of war plans, campaign plans, studies of logistic support of the fleet, and problems of that nature very little has ever been done by the staffs afloat. I have known but few officers who, in my opinion, steadily looked forward toward high command, made a real attempt to find out what it all meant, and moved at definite plans to improve the status of the fleet command.

Upon this Dr. Bichowsky's comment is: "Once the full import of this statement . . . is fully understood, it becomes more devastating in its implications than most things a pacifist would say. For it implies that the whole training system is a failure and that the navy is unprepared for war." That it is not prepared all along the line, is the author's contention—not in training or in ordnance or organization or mentality or in ships which he believes are far inferior to those of Japan and Germany. He declares that the vast new treaty-strength navy, for which huge contracts are now being let, will be antiquated the day it is launched. In other words he thinks the navy as it stands is a colossal humbug and a waste of the people's money without giving the slightest protection to the country. Under the sedition bill now pending in Congress and already voted by the Senate, Dr. Bichowsky and his publishers could be sent to jail for circulating literature likely to cause disaffection among the sailors. Will they not be upset when they read that the ships they serve on are under-engined, inadequately armored, and generally behind the times?

Dr. Bichowsky is equally strong in his criticism of the naval mind, its hopeless conservatism, its drift in the direction of aristocracy, its steady efforts toward aggrandisement, and its failure to take the right attitude toward the civilian world. As I have so often done, he points out the menace of the Washington naval lobby which so few Congressmen can resist. He shows that in picking civilian employees the naval officer who selects always makes sure that the man chosen is his mental inferior. Every editor and Congressman and Senator ought to be compelled to read this book. A Congressional inquiry would be the inevitable and most desirable result. But more than that it ought to strike a deadly blow at the fetich that our naval and military men are the only ones that we should listen to on matters of national defense and national policy.

Oswald Garrison Villard

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

The Crisis of the Middle Class

I. The Middle Class Under Capitalism

By LEWIS COREY

BEWILDERMENT and despair torment large groups of the middle class—those persons who are not wage-workers, big capitalists, or farmers. They had dreams, woven of the pre-1929 illusions of prosperity everlasting, of moving steadily upward in the social-economic scale. What, the middle class now asks, is the black magic that turned the dreams into a nightmare? The plight of the middle class is ominous. Racked by the depression, its economic and psychological condition alarmingly approaches that of the European middle class. Fuel is gathering for the fires of fascism.

Consider a few significant facts. In the three years 1930-32, 578,000, or one out of six, independent enterprisers in industry, trade, and the professions were destroyed as businessmen; more have since been destroyed, and the survivors are threatened by smaller markets and more savage competition. Millions of salaried employees and professional workers are unemployed; those still at work get smaller pay and are pursued by the fear of losing their jobs. The property losses of the middle class are immense. According to Robert R. Doane, the liquid wealth (cash, savings deposits, insurance, stocks, and bonds) of middle-class persons with incomes below $5,000 yearly, shrank from twenty-seven billion dollars in 1929 to four billion dollars in 1932, while their relative share of the liquid wealth of the country fell from 17 per cent to 4 per cent. Millions of middle-class persons, thrown into the depths with millions of wage-workers, are on relief: they must eat the salty bread of charity and eat their pride, too.

This plight has already attracted swarms of demagogues who play on the strings of traditional prejudices and outworn ideals. They speak as if the middle class were still composed of independent property owners and small enterprisers and as if capitalism were still "essentially" middle class. Yet neither is any longer true. For both the middle class and capitalism have been transformed by fundamental structural changes, which make the plight of the middle class an inner crisis of the utmost significance to our social future.

As an independent propertied class of small enterprisers, the middle class was identified with the earlier capitalism of small-scale industry, of economic individualism. It tried to maintain those conditions by a perpetual struggle against monopoly, from the trading companies of the sixteenth century to the modern trusts. The struggle, always unsuccessful and always renewed, made the middle class the most aggressive champion of democracy against the feudal lords and the authoritarian big bourgeoisie of merchants, financiers, and landlords. But democracy had a concrete meaning to the middle-class radicals: its only sanction, they insisted, was the liberty and equality of men owning independent means of livelihood. That meant the widest possible diffusion of small-property ownership, an aim underlying all the middle-class struggles. The English Puritans, especially the Levellers, were against the extremes of poverty and riches. The Jacobins leaned toward economic equalitarianism; Robespierre urged that incomes should not be much higher or lower than 3,000 francs yearly. Our own Jefferson envisaged a society "of men enjoying in ease and security the fruits of their own industry." The middle class waged war on monopoly in favor of a democracy of independent property owners, of small handicraft producers, small farmers, and small traders working for one another on measurably equal terms.

This ideal was most fully realized in the America of the 1820's and 1830's, because of the absence of feudalism, the free lands of the frontier regions, and an undeveloped industrial capitalism. At least 80 per cent of the people, excluding the slave South, were independent property owners, mainly small farmers; wage-workers were scarce and salaried employees and professional workers still scarcer. "No Americans," according to one chronicler, "intended to remain laborers in the sense of living all their lives dependent on wages."

But the middle class was identified with the capitalist relations of production for profit and the market; the rights of property include the right to amass big property and freedom of enterprise includes the freedom of big enterprisers to trample upon the smaller. Out of middle-class democracy arose forces destructive of democracy. The big bourgeoisie of merchants, financiers, and speculators became increasingly wealthy, while the factory system began to replace the handicraft shops. Hence a renewal, in the 1820's, of the democratic struggle against monopoly, against corporations and banks as the promoters of large-scale enterprise and concentration of property. The struggle waned with the onsweep of the industrial revolution, for while it destroyed handicraft producers it created new opportunities for small factory producers in the middle class. But the struggle against monopoly flared up again after the Civil War. Corporate enterprise increasingly replaced personal enterprise. Industrial capitalism and the new technology inexorably enlarged the scale of production, developing constantly more collective forms of economic activity. Competition began to destroy competition. The requirements of mounting capital limited the scope of small enterprise. Industrial concentration moved on to trustification and to monopoly rooted in basic economic conditions, not in legal privilege. Independent businessmen fought desperately against their doom. Their resistance often verged on civil war, as in the struggle against the Standard Oil Company. They resorted to statism, to government intervention in economic activity, formerly condemned by the middle class; to anti-trust legislation and state action to maintain free competition! It was the hopeless resistance of economic individualism to the natural force of collectivism. The middle class, rallying to populism, progressivism, and the "new freedom" of Woodrow Wilson, was decisively defeated.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
ame, Cal.

An aspect of the defeat was the transformation of class relations. Farmers became a minority class and wage-workers the majority; the rule of active industrialists was replaced by that of the financial oligarchy in the new set-up of monopoly capitalism. Independent enterprisers became a constantly smaller proportion of the middle class; they were numerically stationary after 1910, while the number of enterprisers in manufactures, construction, and mining decreased in eighteen years by 120,000, or one out of four, accompanied by a still larger relative shrinkage in their output.

But large-scale industry, which doomed the independent enterprisers, multiplied the numbers of dependent salaried employees; these formerly unimportant elements of the middle class now became its overwhelming majority. This transformation, everywhere characteristic of highly developed capitalism, appears most clearly in the composition of the American middle class. Including all elements formerly members of the class (whatever the change in their economic status) and setting the upper income limit at $10,000 yearly, the middle class in 1930 numbered 12,500,000, or 26 per cent of all persons gainfully occupied, compared with 28,500,000 wage-workers (excluding farm laborers working on home farms), 6,200,000 farmers, and 350,000 members of the big bourgeoisie with incomes of $10,000 and up. The middle class comprised the following groups:

Independent small enterprisers in manufactures, mining, construction, and transportation, including owners of very small corporations: 600,000.

Independent small enterprisers in trade, including all types of storekeepers: 1,500,000.

Independent small enterprisers in all other fields, including 500,000 professional workers independently employed: 1,200,000.

Professional workers, including intellectuals, lawyers, physicians, nurses, welfare workers, librarians, photographers, 1,000,000 teachers, and a duplication of independently employed professional workers indicated above: 2,500,000.

Managerial and supervisory employees in industry and trade, including minor corporation officers, managers, superintendents, foremen, overseers, and inspectors and the aforementioned professional workers and technicians: 1,500,000.

Technicians, including engineers, chemists, architects, and draftsmen: 450,000.

Clerical employees, including clerks, stenographers, typists, bookkeepers, and cashiers: 4,000,000.

Public service, including duplication of teachers, other professional workers, technicians, and clerical employees: 2,500,000.

All others, including traveling salesmen, canvassers, collectors, and all types of agents: 1,000,000.

The relative scarcity of independent enterprisers is most striking—only 3,300,000 in a middle class of 12,500,000: one out of four, compared with three out of four sixty years ago. They were a still smaller proportion, only 6.7 per cent, of all persons gainfully occupied. But that was in 1930. Many enterprisers have been ruined by the depression, 395,000 of them in the two years 1931-32. Today there are probably not more than 2,700,000 independent small enterprisers—a loss of three-quarters of a million in six years—not much over 5 per cent of the gainfully occupied, compared with 15 per cent sixty years ago.[*] The middle class is a small minority of the people and enterprisers are a still smaller minority of the class. Ours is decidedly not a nation of businessmen.

The minority of small enterprisers in the middle class is economically insignificant. The largest number of these enterprisers are the storekeepers, who have been favored by the multiplication of distributive services and the lag of concentration in their field. But they, too, are increasingly threatened by large-scale activity; the chain stores did over one-fifth of the total retail business in 1929, and the proportion is now much higher, for one reason because approximately 500,000 storekeepers have been wiped out by the depression. Increasingly more professional services are being organized in corporate and government enterprises, converting the majority of professionals into dependent salaried employees; in this field, too, opportunity no longer generously beckons to the man who would be independent. Most significant, not more than 10 per cent of manufactures, construction, transportation, and mining is in the hands of small producers. Independent personal enterprise survives miserably and precariously in the nooks and crannies of the economic world.

Independent enterprisers are doomed by mounting capital requirements, more savage competition, and the dominion of large-scale industry. They are doomed by the drive toward more efficient forms of economic activity. The significance of these forms is that they are increasingly collective and represent fundamental structural changes in capitalism: the replacement of personal with impersonal corporate enterprise, of economic individualism with collectivism. Identified with individualism, independent small enterprisers are thrust downward into the depths by the collectivism of the new economic set-up.

But collectivism, destroyer of the old middle class of enterprisers, is creator of the "new" middle class of salaried employees and professional workers. As the collective forms of corporate activity wiped out the owner-managers, and separated ownership from management by the multiplication of stockholders, directive functions were delegated to hired performers; this appears clearly in the 1,500,000 managerial and supervisory employees and in the millions of clerical employees who perform routine administrative tasks. Collectivism called into being other types of salaried employees. Large-scale industry needed constantly greater numbers of technicians; the number of engineers, metallurgists, and chemists increased, in the years from 1870 to 1930, eleven times as fast as did that of other gainfully occupied persons. The higher economic levels created by the mounting productive efficiency of collective industry made possible an immense increase in the number of professional workers.

This "new" middle class is essentially a class of salaried employees, as four-fifths of the professional workers are salaried dependents. Of the 12,500,000 members of the middle class in 1930, 9,200,000 were salaried employees.

---

[*] By adding the 3,500,000 farmers who in 1930 owned their farms, the total of independent enterprisers of all types becomes 6,200,000. But the farmer total is for 1930 and includes 650,000 farmers who were only part owners and many farmers who, because of heavy mortgages, were only nominal owners. Farmers were once part of the middle class, but now they are a separate problem: nearly half of them are propertyless and there is no class identity of interest between them and small capitalist producers, professional workers, and salaried employees.

They now number nearly 11,000,000. Add the wage-workers and up to 42,000,000 persons, or 80 per cent of the 52,000,000 gainfully occupied (including the unemployed!), are dependent on jobs for their means of livelihood: the exact opposite of the situation in the America of a century ago. Ours is decidedly a nation of dependent hired workers.

Salaried employees are mostly wholly propertyless. Probably 1,000,000 of them are stockholders, but the dividends of the majority are merely a small addition to income. Add these stockholders to the independent enterprisers: that makes only 3,700,000 persons, or 28 per cent of the middle class, who are owners of property (excluding savings deposits, insurance, and homes). It is unscrupulous demagogy to approach all groups of the middle class with a program based on the defense of property; why should the propertyless defend property?

The propertyless condition is general among the mass of the people. There are not more than 6,250,000 persons (including propertied farmers), or only 12 per cent of the gainfully occupied, whose livelihood is wholly or mainly involved with property ownership; it was 80 per cent a century ago. Apologists speak of stock ownership "broadening" the basis of capitalist property, but they forget that the relative decrease in independent enterprisers has been greater than the increase in stockholders. Property income has grown, but it concentrates in a shrinking class of capitalist magnates: 325,000 stockholders in 1929 owned 80 per cent of the stock. Middle-class democracy, whose ideal was the liberty and equality of men owning independent means of livelihood, is gone beyond recall.

Former crises of the middle class moved within the relations of property; the class fought to defend small property against large-scale enterprise. Today there are two crises in the middle class. One is another crisis of property among the surviving small enterprisers; they continue to fight against the inevitable. For the lower salaried employees and professionals in the "new" middle class, however, the crisis is one of employment as it is among the wage-workers. This is something new, and none of the old middle-class ideals and forms of action meets the problem.

The depression has sharpened the crises, not created them. Hence they would not be solved by a return of the old prosperity. The pre-1929 prosperity was slowly but inexorably wiping out the small enterprisers. Most of them had incomes below $3,000 yearly; the business of half the storekeepers, according to the Census of Distribution, was not enough to yield a comfortable living. The crisis of employment in the "new" middle class made its appearance. There was a significant slowing down in the increase of salaried employees. Supply outran the demand, because of the tremendous rise in high-school and college graduates and the shrinkage in employment opportunities. In addition, scientific management was rigorously applied to "white-collar" work; it is significant that, while 2 per cent of the wage-workers in manufactures were displaced from 1919 to 1929, the displacement of clerical and other lower salaried employees was nearly 10 per cent. The average yearly income among the masses of lower salaried employees was only $1,800, and a miserable $1,400 in the case of clerical employees. Most independent professional workers earned below $2,500. These conditions, even if a return to them were possible, are not much worth fighting for.

Nor can the middle class work out a common program to meet its crises. For it is not a class, but merely an aggregation of intermediate groups split by a fundamental disunity. The interests of propertied and propertyless elements are not identical. Small enterprisers and salaried employees clash economically, for they have nothing in common except the myth of belonging to the same class. The upper layer of managerial and supervisory employees must exploit the masses of lower salaried employees, precisely as they exploit the wage-workers. Nor are the professional workers united, as most of them are dependent salaried employees, often mercilessly exploited by their independent brethren. There is, moreover, an antagonism between the upper and the lower middle class. The former comprises not more than 2,000,000 members: the larger independent enterprisers, the higher managerial and supervisory employees, and the more successful independent professional workers. This antagonism cuts across functional lines. The property ownership of the middle class is concentrated in the upper middle class, which touches the lower layers of the big bourgeoisie and is wholly reactionary. Where, in this welter of discordant economic interests, is there any basis for fundamental unity of action? If the propertyless masses of lower salaried employees and professional workers are induced to act within the limits of the middle class, they are necessarily sacrificed to the interests of the dominant propertied elements.

Underlying these antagonisms is the clash of two very different economic systems in the middle class: the old class is identified with the individualism of small-scale industry, the "new" with the collectivism of large-scale industry. That makes any real unity impossible. But there is another aspect: the clash of new and old social orders, for collectivism represents the economic forms of socialism. A simple change in the relations of ownership can transform collectivism into socialism, and release the now repressed forces of production and consumption. The transformation conforms wholly to the interests of the "new" middle class of propertyless, dependent salaried employees and professionals; created by collectivism, they are liberated by its transformation.

But the dominant capitalist interests resist the transformation of collectivism, they mobilize all forces to prevent emergence of the new social order. This involves the crisis of capitalism, whose most obvious manifestation is want in the midst of plenty. Capitalism is unable to control the tremendous productive forces created by collectivism; it is unable to make plenty available to all because plenty is unprofitable. Collectivism, capable of liberating mankind, may become the destroyer of mankind. The results are economic decline and decay, new and more devastating wars, reaction against democracy and civilization itself.

And the middle class? Small enterprisers are destroyed more swiftly and ruthlessly. Permanent unemployment appears among salaried employees and professional workers. Tormented by aggravation of the crisis of capitalism, of which its own class crises are an expression, the middle class moves toward action. What shall the action be: fascism or the communist struggle for socialism?

[This is the first of three articles on the Crisis of the Middle Class. The second, The Middle Class Under Fascism, will appear next week. The third, The Middle Class Under Socialism, will appear in the issue of August 28.]

First Month of Dictator Long

By ARNOLD S. FULTON

IN JULY, 1935, United States Senator Huey Pierce Long, Jr., entered into a period of political power, buttressed by laws of his own dictation, such as no other political boss ever enjoyed in American history. On July 9, 1935, the sixth special session of the Louisiana legislature since July 14, 1934, adjourned after passing the last 25 of some 150 special-session laws, put through in less than a year, that abolished municipal self-government in Louisiana and enabled Huey Long to say with complete accuracy: "I am the state." Scores of those laws were enacted in record time without being read by a legislature of which Huey Long said publicly with a cynical guffaw: "It's the best legislature money can buy."

I hereby record the first month of Long's dictatorship.

July 8. Senator Long in a night speech over the radio from station WDSU, New Orleans, says it is practicable for the state of Louisiana to take over the city of New Orleans, and calls President Franklin Delano Roosevelt "a liar and a faker," daring the United States government to take any action against him for his attack on the President with the challenge: "Indict me for calling him a liar and a faker and I'll prove it on him."

July 9. After receiving several visits from political representatives of Senator Long in "secret conferences," two members of the New Orleans city commission council, A. Miles Pratt, finance commissioner, and Joseph P. Skelly, commissioner of public property, publicly bolt the Old Regular Democratic Party (the city political organization) which elected them and in public statements announce their alliance with Senator Long "because New Orleans needs political peace."

July 11. District Attorney Eugene Stanley of Orleans Parish (city of New Orleans), resigns rather than hold office as a figurehead. Senator Long's special-session laws had made it impossible for him to appoint an assistant district attorney, a clerk, stenographer, or telephone switchboard girl without the approval of Attorney General Gaston L. Porterie of Louisiana. Porterie is a Long man; he was expelled from the Louisiana Bar Association nearly two years ago for unethical conduct in following Senator Long's orders in political court cases. Senator Long's answer was to have a special-session law passed making the Louisiana Bar Association impotent and creating his own state bar association.

Senator Long, through Governor Oscar Kelly Allen of Louisiana, appoints a Long follower, Charles A. Byrne, New Orleans political lawyer, district attorney of New Orleans, with a full staff of Long followers. Byrne is the lawyer Long picked to defend 513 New Orleans election commissioners indicted for stuffing ballot boxes and falsifying election returns for the Long ticket of 1932 that placed John H. Overton, junior United States Senator from Louisiana, in his present seat. Stanley prosecuted the three test cases that went to trial and won convictions in all three. Long by special-session laws pulled the teeth from the law under which Stanley prosecuted. The cases were dropped.

July 12. Thirteen of seventeen New Orleans ward leaders of Old Regular Democrats hold caucus after several secret conferences with Senator Long and his political ambassadors, and publicly announce they have joined forces with Long. In heated caucus by thirteen-to-four vote they demand that Mayor T. Semmes Walmsley of New Orleans resign. He refuses in fiery speech, excoriating them for party treason. The bolting thirteen hold a conference with Senator Long at the Hotel Roosevelt, New Orleans, where by sworn testimony Senator Long enjoys use of a suite without pay. Long refers to them as "you birds." They remind him that his pre-bolt agreement was to refer to them as "gentlemen." They report Mayor Walmsley refuses to resign. Senator Long suggests they send ward workers on a New Orleans house-to-house canvas for signatures to petitions that Walmsley be ousted, and promises "when you present those petitions, I'll convene the Louisiana legislature in special session and they'll oust Mayor Walmsley in five minutes." The bolters offer a compromise suggestion for city mass meetings to get Walmsley ouster-petition signatures, saying Long's plan means too much work. He agrees to mass-meeting plan.

July 13. Dr. Frank R. Gomila, commissioner of public safety (fire, police), New Orleans city commission council, turns and runs when reporters and photographers see him entering Hotel Roosevelt for conference with Senator Long. Later Gomila announces he has joined forces with Long "because New Orleans needs political peace." This gives Senator Long a three-to-two majority on the New Orleans city commission council, or complete control of the city administration, since earlier, through special-session laws, and the political bolting of Police Superintendent George Reyer and Fire Chief John Evans, he gained control of the city police and fire departments. Only two remaining city political leaders anti-Long, but impotent in office, are Mayor Walmsley and Fred A. Earhart, commissioner of public utilities on city commission council. New Orleans populace christens the bolters "the seller-outers."

July 16. Senator Long, now in complete political command of the New Orleans city administration, tells newspaper reporters in an interview at Hotel Roosevelt: "We will not now nor hereafter assume the credit or blame for trying to run the government of New Orleans. The city authorities, handicapped as they are by Mayor Walmsley, will have that burden to carry."

The thirteen bolting Old Regular ward leaders reveal that Senator Long's ambassadors who induced them to bolt "led them to believe" Senator Long would see to it that city employees, with approximately three months' salary unpaid, would be paid to date, but they hadn't been able to get from Senator Long either any back pay or indication when they would get it. One says: "All he promised was to call us 'gentlemen' and he broke that promise the first time we got together."

Bolting ward leaders drop plans to oust Mayor Walmsley.

July 17. Louisiana state police (Bureau of Criminal Identification and Investigation) under Senator Long's absolute control, raid apartment at 831 St. Louis Street, New Orleans, home of Oscar R. Whilden, vice chairman of the state steering committee of the Louisiana Square Deal Association (anti-Long), and its leader in the First and Second Louisiana Congressional Districts (New Orleans and environs). They ransack the apartment, dumping the contents of drawers, taking and keeping a pistol found in a suitcase, searching for records of the Square Deal Association. The raid was made on warrant signed by Judge William J. O'Hara, criminal district court, New Orleans, Huey Long follower and son of Dr. Joseph O'Hara, president Louisiana State Board of Health and president Louisiana Democratic Association, Huey Long's political organization. Judge O'Hara admits he signed warrant for raid at request of Louisiana State Supervisor of Public Accounts, who is Alice Lee Grosjean, Huey Long's law-office stenographer who became his private secretary as governor and whom he made Secretary of State. But, said Judge O'Hara: "I do not remember to whom I gave the warrant."

July 18. PWA Administrator Harold L. Ickes in Washington publicly announces he has shut off all PWA projects in Louisiana until state legislature repeals special-sessions laws dictated by Senator Long which place every cent of PWA expenditures of federal funds under control of boards appointed by Senator Long, with penalty of fine and imprisonment for any federal representative who ignores the law. Ickes's decision bars Louisiana from receiving some $8,000,000 ear-marked for Louisiana projects.

New Orleans Sewage and Water Board bolts Old Regular organization after lengthy secret conferences with Senator Long's political ambassadors, and joins forces with Long. Creates office of personal director, salary $4,000 a year, with power to hire and fire all board employees, varying in number from 400 to 4,000 as needs develop. Elects to this office John E. Morrill, a Huey Long follower. Two more Old Regular ward leaders join Long, giving him fifteen-to-two majority in New Orleans Choctaw caucus.

July 19. Senator Long in Washington attacks President Roosevelt and his Administration in speech on Senate floor and by radio this night over National Broadcasting Company network. Excerpts from Senator Long's attacks: "The Administration of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt is the most high-handed and tyrannical system of government since Nero. . . . Louisiana will run her own state and her people will remain free. . . . We can get along financially without federal relief funds." [At that moment FERA funds were paying hitherto unpaid municipal employees.]

July 20. Senator Long by long-distance orders fires sixty-seven deputy sheriffs of the staff of Criminal Sheriff George E. Williams of Orleans Parish (city of New Orleans), many in service from fifteen to twenty-five years. Senator Long's tool for this job was Brigadier General Louis F. Guerre, Louisiana National Guard, appointed superintendent of the State Bureau of Criminal Identification and Investigation on Long's orders. Special-session laws require General Guerre to approve the appointment of every deputy sheriff in the state. General Guerre retains twenty-nine of Sheriff Williams's deputies who bolt to Senator Long's faction.

Sheriff Williams, his staff cut to a skeleton, announces he is unable to serve the criminal district courts of New Orleans, which courts, with crowded dockets, defer sessions because of shortage of deputy sheriffs.

July 21. Five anti-Long Louisiana members of Congress confer in St. Charles Hotel, New Orleans, with other anti-Long forces in the state, planning a "united-front campaign" against Senator Long.

July 22. Political control of New Orleans Dock Board police by Huey Long when governor, in 1928, is ancient public scandal in Louisiana. President of Dock Board is Seymour Weiss, also president Hotel Roosevelt, Long's New Orleans headquarters. Weiss is under United States grand-jury indictment with other Long leaders for income-tax evasions; due to go on trial this autumn. Dock Board police are notoriously political ward-heelers with no other requirements for office. Scandal flames anew today, when Francis D. Washington, twenty-one, of Nashville, Tennessee, student in the junior class, University of the South at Sewanee, Tennessee, visiting New Orleans to "get color for stories he is writing," rambles on wharves along waterfront and is shot in the back twice by Dock Board Policeman Michael Cancienne, ward-heeler in Long's New Orleans machine. Cancienne says student "attacked him" but fails to explain why both bullets hit Washington in the back.

July 23. A. N. Goldberg, drainage engineer, New Orleans Sewage and Water Board, close personal and political friend of Mayor Walmsley, is notified by letter from Personnel Director Morrill that he is discharged, effective July 31, "to promote greater efficiency in the board's work as well as to establish harmony." Goldberg in statement cites his record of efficiency as engineer, but he stays fired.

July 24. New Orleans wakes to find on every doorstep and in every mail box in city a printed circular signed "Huey P. Long, United States Senator," printed the day before and distributed, as always, by Huey Long's state jobholders in state trucks with state gasoline, during the night, proclaiming that Senator Long will do nothing to obtain overdue back pay for city employees while Mayor T. Semmes Walmsley, repeatedly called "Turkeyhead" Walmsley in the circular, remains in office.

Seeking for months to force the New Orleans Sewage and Water Board (with its 400 to 4,000 jobs, according to construction plans) to surrender to him and open its payrolls to his followers, Senator Long through his state attorney general tied up the board's funds with court litigation. The board surrendered to him. This day his former confidential secretary, George M. Wallace, now one of his state assistant attorneys general, appears in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana, asking Federal Judge Wayne G. Borah to dismiss the suit attacking the constitutionality of the board and dismiss the injunction granted in January, 1935, on Wallace's petition. Judge Borah grants the motion for dismissal, and lifts the injunction. Attorneys for both sides refuse to comment. Wallace is the young lawyer who drafted all Senator Long's special-session laws.

After Senator Long declares on the floor of the Senate that Louisiana "doesn't want federal relief" because "the world is crying for Lousiana state bonds," his chairman of the Louisiana State Highway Commission, A. P. Tugwell, forwards to the United States Bureau of Public Roads for approval Long's Louisiana plan for highways, bridges, and overpasses, requesting $6,103,896 of the Administration's $4,880,000,000 federal relief appropriation.

Judge W. Carruth Jones, East Baton Rouge District Court, rules unconstitutional the December, 1934, special-session law passed by the Louisiana legislature at Senator Long's dictation, authorizing Governor O. K. Allen to appoint thirteen additional parish police jurors so that Senator Long by a voting majority on that body obtained full political control over the parish and the city of Baton Rouge.

July 25. Huey Long's well-publicized "gin-fizz episode" takes place, in which Long gives recipe for Ramos gin fizz to various New York barkeepers, being obliged to drink several himself in the process, drink described by Long as invention of his "grandpappy, John D. Long," in 1852. Ramos gin fizz well known in New Orleans, actually invented by Henry C. Ramos, bartender in Imperial Cabinet Saloon. Julius Tyson Long, attorney, Shreveport, Louisiana, elder brother of Huey, highly indignant when told of "grandpappy's" invention of gin fizz, declares: "John D. Long, our grandfather, was a farmer, a religious man who never saw or made a Ramos gin fizz. . . . If Huey has to tell untrue yarns about his relatives, why doesn't he tell something creditable, like saying they won the battle of New Orleans or the Mexican war?"

July 26. United States Treasury Department at Washington announces appointment of Colonel Amos W. Woodcock as special aide to former Governor Dan Moody of Texas, special prosecutor of federal income-tax-evasion cases in Louisiana. Prominent members of the inner circle of Senator Long's political organization are now under indictment by United States grand jury for evasions of income tax totalling several hundred thousand dollars. They include Seymour Weiss, Abraham Lazard Shushan, and State Senator Jules G. Fisher. Weiss is president of the New Orleans Dock Board, and unofficial all-cash, no-records treasurer of Senator Long's political organization, who told United States Senate committee headed by the late Senator Robert Howell of Nebraska, "None of your business," when General Samuel Tilden Ansell, committee attorney, in hearing at New Orleans, February, 1933, questioned him about his financial transactions. Weiss is head of the Hotel Roosevelt Company, New Orleans, Huey Long's New Orleans headquarters, where Weiss testified under oath Long paid no rent for expensive suite; his occupancy was "good publicity." Ten years ago, Weiss, ex-shoe-store clerk, was manager of the Hotel Roosevelt barbershop. Shushan is president of the Orleans Levee Board, head of a wholesale dry-goods and notions firm, Shushan Brothers and Company, Inc., New Orleans, which enjoyed fat contracts with state institutions while Long was governor; contracts let without competitive bidding, according to sworn testimony. State Senator Jules G. Fisher, pro-Long political czar in Jefferson Parish, abutting New Orleans, enjoying wide-open gambling-house privileges, was one of fifteen senators (out of thirty-nine) who in 1928, after the lower house of the Louisiana legislature impeached the then Governor Long, signed a "Round Robin" stating that they "believed the impeachment proceedings unconstitutional, and therefore would not vote to oust Governor Long, no matter what the evidence." State Representative Joseph Fisher, nephew of State Senator Fisher, with Dan Moody prosecuting, was convicted and sentenced to eighteen months in federal penitentiary, Atlanta, Georgia, in April, 1935, first of these income-tax-evasion cases to go to trial.

July 28. Audit of official records of Louisiana state auditor reveals that as of June 30, 1935, the state of Louisiana has an overdraft of $225,738.12, instead of the "$4,000,000 surplus in the treasury" of which Senator Long boasted by radio in June. At that time he was negotiating politically with the New Orleans Old Regulars to join him. Dr. Joseph O'Hara, president of the Louisiana State Board of Health and of the Louisiana Democratic Association, Long's statewide political organization, told striking New Orleans garbage collectors: "If you or any other city employees with back pay due you will join Huey Long, he says you'll be paid within twenty-four hours. He says the state has $4,000,000 surplus in the treasury." Then fifteen of the seventeen Old Regular ward leaders threw the caucus to Senator Long, with heavy pressure behind them from city employees with three months' back pay overdue. They haven't been paid a cent of that back pay yet. Now that Senator Long controls the caucus, he has disclaimed responsibility for their back pay. They deserted their own organization for him and have nowhere to go.

July 29. State Civil Service Commission, appointed by Senator Long, starts study of lists of all city employees of New Orleans, with avowed intention of firing all who have not made political peace with Senator Long (which means promised openly to support him) and won the approval of the fifteen-to-two Long majority of ward leaders of the city caucus.

Sixteenth of the seventeen Old Regular Democratic Party (New Orleans Choctaw Club) ward leaders joined Huey Long forces, seventeenth resigns from Choctaw caucus, a successor pledged to Senator Long is elected, and now Senator Long controls the whole seventeen-man caucus, unanimously pledged to him.

July 30. Renewed pro-Long New Orleans police-department activity raiding all forms of gambling inside New Orleans city limits, leads to newspaper investigation of gambling situation in parishes of Jefferson and St. Bernard, both abutting city of New Orleans, both reached by city street cars. Jefferson Parish ruled by Sheriff Frank Clancy, pro-Long; St. Bernard Parish ruled by Dr. Louis A. Meraux, sheriff, pro-Long. Wide-open gambling in both parishes, literally on a twenty-four-hour-a-day basis, with day and night shifts, found by reporters. Horse-race betting, keno, roulette, crap-tables running full blast. Patrons openly reassured by gamblers: "Don't worry about raids. We're in right. Everything's O. K."

July 31. New Orleans city-commission-council majority of three to two which bolted to Senator Long held special session this afternoon and, with Finance Commissioner A. Miles Pratt taking the lead, introduced ordinances which will become laws within a week, and which strip Mayor T. Semmes Walmsley, anti-Long, of his last vestige of official power. All Mayor Walmsley can do now is use the title and draw the pay of mayor.

Francis Whiting Washington of Nashville, Tennessee, dies today of two bullet wounds in back inflicted by Michael Cancienne, patrolman of Senator Long's waterfront police force. Before dying, Washington said he had been sleeping on wharf, and was awakened when shots hit him.

Henry Morgenthau and His Friends

By PAUL W. WARD

WASHINGTON under Roosevelt is a political dude ranch. The bevy of nice people he has brought into the federal service as his chief contribution to American government are, in the main, just so many effete vacationists luxuriating in the trappings of officialdom and playing at the bruising sport of political line-riding, while a group of calloused and professional hands go about the business of actually running the hacienda in the Old Deal tradition.

For example, take the Roosevelt Administration's performance in the twin arroyos of banking and taxation. The men who gave the New Deal rancho its eclat have had only a boon-doggler's role in that show. Roosevelt has kept booted and spurred and prominently displayed on the verandah such dainty fellows as Morgenthau, Eccles, Oliphant, Magill, and the Professors Warren and Rogers, but out behind the barn he has been doing business as usual with such saddle-galled gentry as Jesse Jones, Joe Kennedy, "Little Dandy" O'Connor, Leo Crowley, Carter Glass, and a clique of Senators who have chewed the locoweed of money magic.

There seems to be general agreement in Washington that the title of "most loyal Cabinet member" belongs to "Henry the Morgue," as Roosevelt calls his Number 2 Cabinet officer. Morgenthau, who reciprocates by calling Roosevelt the "Boss," appears to have no fixed convictions on anything beyond a resolve to keep his department honest as well as efficient and to see that his White House master's every will be done. He is painfully humble when his own abilities are touched upon and goes out of his way to make it appear that he does not understand, for example, the monetary-stabilization operations his department handles, though he was a prime mover for dollar devaluation and was largely responsible for the New Deal enlistment of Dr. George F. Warren, the Cornell farm-management professor who invented Roosevelt's gold-purchase plan. At press conferences, where he unsuccessfully tries to hide his fear of newspaper men behind a juggler's smile, Morgenthau seldom hesitates to refer any technical question to his assistants and to deprecate his own grasp of the subject involved. Similarly, under questioning by Congressional committees with respect to pending legislation, the titular chieftain of New Deal finance begs off questions on policy as Presidential matters and evades inquiries as to details by suggesting that they be addressed to experts in the Treasury's employ. He has, as a result, reduced his role in public to that of a White House errand boy.

With one or two exceptions, "Henry the Morgue" has been meticulous in selecting his subordinates. He demands of them a loyalty to himself equal to that which he, in turn, shows to the President, but his chief requirement is that they be above suspicion of using their posts to their own financial gain. The fanatical emphasis he places on the primer type of honesty has forced him to limit his selections to men who are his personal friends or friends of personal friends. Furthermore, it erased by a roundabout process what chance there was of a bona fide New Deal tax program being espoused by the Treasury Department in its own right, and it also plunged Morgenthau into one of his early embarrassments.

Its blighting effect in the tax field showed itself in Morgenthau's selection of Roswell F. Magill as his taxation expert. Magill was snatched from his law professorship at Columbia University to take the Treasury post. No Tory, he nevertheless was sufficiently conservative in his views of tax questions to have served similarly as an expert under Secretary Mellon. Chiefly a lawyer, Magill has been engaged under Morgenthau principally in building traps for tax-dodgers and inventing plugs for holes in the tax laws rather than in devising the whole new system of taxes needed to supplant the present Old Deal holdover which places at least half the burden on consumption taxes. He fills a post which would have been occupied by Harold M. Groves, a Wisconsin liberal and Brandeis protegé with aggressive ideas on social taxation, had not Morgenthau, on taking office, countermanded the Groves appointment merely to make way for a man less a stranger to him.

The embarrassment to which Morgenthau subjected himself through his predilection for trusting only his friends or friends of his friends was partly the result of his own unfamiliarity with the awful mysteries of securities flotation. He was faced as soon as he donned the robes of office with a huge refunding operation and had to get help in a hurry. Accordingly, he enlisted a friend well versed in such matters—Earle Bailie, a partner in J. W. Seligman and Company. Immediately, growls began to rumble in the chests of Senators who recalled that Bailie's firm had floated in this country a series of Peruvian loans which had gone sour on investors' hands and that in the process the firm had handed young Legúia, son of Peru's President, a pourboire of $450,000. They also recalled that Bailie had been active in Wall Street's fight against the securities act, and they prepared to wreck vengeance therefor on the new Secretary with the result that, on the day Morgenthau's name came up for Senate confirmation, Mr. Bailie's resignation was announced.

His place has since been taken by T. Jefferson Coolidge, an ultra-Bostonian individual who by right of family rather than conquest has sat on the boards of most of the distinctive New England financial and industrial establishments such as the First National Bank of Boston, the Old Colony Trust Company, the Boston and Maine Railroad, and the Hamilton Woolen Company, to mention only a few. As Undersecretary, he is the Treasury's fiscal expert and efficiently fills Roosevelt's need for a man in that department who knows his way around Wall Street and yet is not a denizen of that thoroughfare.

Morgenthau would sleep better were he able to prune the political appointees out of the Internal Revenue Service, but Jim Farley got there ahead of him and is standing his ground, bowing only to Morgenthau's insistence that there be no more misuse of this tax-collecting agency as a soliciting machine for campaign contributions such as came to light at its Detroit office soon after Morgenthau became Secretary. Morgenthau also has been inclined to look with suspicion upon the banker and former Democratic Congressman from Kansas, Guy Tresilian Helvering, who is Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but that is all the good it does him, and he solaces himself by watching that young-lawyer-in-search-of-a-reputation, Robert H. Jackson, slash his way past Mellon's legal bodyguard, Frank J. Hogan, in an attempt to convict Andy of tax-dodging before a Board of Tax Appeals made up largely of Mellon appointees. Jackson is the Treasury's assistant general counsel assigned to the Internal Revenue Bureau.

Its general counsel is Herman Oliphant, who had been cast adrift when the Johns Hopkins Institute of Law was closed out for lack of funds. Before enlisting in that ill-fated scholastic venture, Oliphant had been a professor of law at the University of Chicago. He is one of Morgenthau's friend-of-a-friend appointees, having been recommended to the Secretary by a lawyer friend, Edward S. Greenbaum, when Morgenthau, before joining the Treasury, was seeking a solicitor for the Farm Credit Administration, which he headed from May, 1933, until Roosevelt promoted him to the post of Undersecretary to Woodin. Morgenthau brought Oliphant with him from the FCA to the Treasury.

There is another major figure in the Treasury Department who must be mentioned, for his presence there is both an anomaly and a partial explanation of the New Deal's dilatory course in the field of banking legislation. He is James Francis Thaddeus O'Connor who, as Comptroller of the Currency, has supervision over all the national banks. Small, plump, dandified, and perfumed, though otherwise bookkeeperish in appearance, he popularly is regarded as a McAdoo protegé, though the former Secretary of the Treasury and junior Senator from California privately disclaims him. They were law partners from 1925 to 1930. The only thing that fits O'Connor for a New Deal role is his egotism. He boasts of his non-New Dealish past, including the fact that as a member of the North Dakota legislature from 1915 to 1917 he fought what he calls the "state-socialist" constitution of the Non-Partisan League. He also boasts of his legal prowess, exhibiting in proof thereof a check for a vast sum which he says he once received as a fee. After running unsuccessfully as a fusion candidate for the North Dakota governorship in 1920 and for the United States Senate two years later, he moved to California where he was unable to gain a substantial political foothold until 1932. In that campaign year, young Jimmie Roosevelt visited California and O'Connor seized the opportunity to win his way into the Roosevelt graces. He attached himself to Jimmie and in that way rode into the New Deal, bringing with him his own press agent, Kenneth Hayes, who had been financial editor of the San Francisco Examiner.

O'Connor has run his office strictly in the Old Deal tradition. In fact, the actual running of it is entirely in the hands of Old Guardsmen. His chief deputy is Frank G. Awalt, who was Acting Comptroller from September, 1932, when Hoover still ruled the White House, till May, 1933, when O'Connor was named Comptroller by Roosevelt. His second deputy, Gibbs Lyons, also is an Old Dealer. The Old Guard influence, however, has not been so debilitating as might be expected, for the veterans still tremble over memories of the Hoover era and the banking crisis to which it led. In consequence, with O'Connor's support, they have insisted on enforcing the national banking laws to the letter. This has led, in turn, to a running fight between O'Connor, on one side, and, on the other, Jesse H. Jones, RFC chairman, the aforementioned Crowley, and Morgenthau, all three of whom adhere to the belief that a little laxity in bank examinations would bring about a flood of loans and, perforce, something vaguely referred to as prosperity.

O'Connor has been able to stay in the saddle chiefly through the help of Farley, tendered in appreciation of the generous manner in which the Comptroller has let the Postmaster General select receivers for defunct national banks. Farley, you may be sure, has selected Democrats who are not only deserving but appreciative; receivers' fees are big and secret. The number of receivers also is big. Approximately 1,500 national banks were in receivership or in process of reorganization under federal conservators when O'Connor made his last report. One of the receiverships went to O'Connor's brother, William, at Grand Forks, North Dakota. Through Farley's good offices, he managed to place another brother, Thomas, in the Internal Revenue Department as an examiner at Jackson, Michigan.

Michigan, which has more closed banks per square foot than any other state, naturally has been a fertile field for receivership appointments. Farley has had happy pickings there, letting Horatio J. Abbott, a former Ann Harbor postmaster and small-town financier who is Democratic national committeeman for Michigan, select the list of candidates from which Farley makes the choices that O'Connor approves. Farley had Abbott made Collector of Internal Revenue at Detroit but Abbott didn't last long in the job; his staff immediately had set about shaking down manufacturers for campaign contributions, and Morgenthau forced him to resign. Abbott continues, however, to be the accredited Democratic patronage dispenser for Michigan.

Morgenthau, who is nine years younger than Roosevelt, wanted to be his Secretary of Agriculture. He was, in fact, considered for the job and rejected as too Eastern and too Judaic. Bernard M. Baruch similarly was considered and rejected. For that matter, the only reason Woodin got the Treasury secretaryship—which Frankfurter could have had and Cordell Hull nearly got—was that he happened to fit well with the world of industry and finance without being covered with its barnacles. In addition, he was virtually the only big-business man whose enthusiasm for Roosevelt was not suspect. Roosevelt and Morgenthau, son of Wilson's Ambassador to Turkey, had been friends since 1914 when "Henry the Morgue" bought a 1,400-acre farm and went into the business of raising apples in Dutchess County, fifteen miles from the Roosevelt estate at Hyde Park.

A good administrator, Morgenthau has the Treasury Department running efficiently, if unimaginatively. He is particularly interested in his tax-collecting division, fired by a determination to enforce the tax laws to the hilt and see that no violator escapes. In that connection, he has obtained a grant from the four-billion-dollar work-relief fund to finance a check of income-tax returns on incomes under $25,000; these have gone unchecked in the past. The Administration's monetary manipulations fascinate him much as would the Illusion of Sawing a Woman in Half. On the other hand, the attacks of the budget balancers terrify him and drive him into demonstrations such as his nation-wide speech in 1934 to the effect that, despite all its spending and borrowing, the government was money ahead because of the gold profit. He professes satisfaction with the results of the Warren plan, though the "Boss" has ceased to make such professions, but he sulks when pressed for an explanation of the Administration's inexplicable operations in silver.

Part of his terror in the face of the budget balancers' assaults springs from fear that his refinancing operations are menaced thereby. Cautiously, he has been refunding millions in federal securities at unprecedentedly low interest rates and his record on this point, though vitiated somewhat by the helpless position of the bankers who must deal with him, is one deserving of praise. It is, in fact, his most tangible accomplishment and to keep the way clear for improvements on it, he has done two things that must be marked down against him. He has persuaded the Congress to boost the original tax rates in the Administration's social-security program so as to make its old-age-pensions plan a device which is completely self-sustaining, which makes savings compulsory, and which is therefore anti-social. Similarly, he has argued before Congressional committees for treatment of the tax instrument as a purely fiscal and budget-balancing, rather than social, device. In the first of these two arguments he is known to have had the backing of Roosevelt. It is unlikely that Morgenthau would have advanced the second without approval from the "Boss," though it ran counter to Roosevelt's own tax message.

It was Morgenthau who invited Marriner Stoddard Eccles to Washington, although Tugwell is the Administration stalwart who actually discovered Eccles, and such is the humility of the Treasury head that he does not mind being overshadowed in increasing degree by the new Lochinvar of American finance. Eccles, who came to Washington as a special assistant to Morgenthau and in the fall of 1934 was made Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, is ranked as a radical merely because he is a banker. In truth, he is a conservative who, despite vast wealth and great vested interests, has an inquiring mind and does not regard the present system as pluperfect merely because it has given him power and riches. Like a religious scientist, his intellectual inquiries, however, are limited in scope by certain basic superstitions. His radicalism is restricted to two things: a belief that the gold standard was not written on the reverse of the tablets from Sinai and a conviction that the way to smooth out the business curve is for the government to tax low and spend freely during depression periods and, during boom times, tighten the pursestrings and tax copiously. Capitalism is not menaced by his intentions.

The press pictures Eccles as a foe of his own class, but his own class has no such ideas. "He talks loose but he banks hard," a former banking associate, a Tory, recently said of him. Similarly, a group of Maryland bankers, horrified by the press's picture of the new Federal Reserve Board Governor, were completely reassured after listening to him for a few minutes at a private dinner that Howard Bruce, the Democratic national committeeman for their state, gave in Eccles's honor soon after his ascension. The banking bill which he has sponsored has brought powerful banking interests on his neck, thereby adding to the picture of Eccles as a bankers' enemy, but in reality the controversy is a sectional one in which Wall Street's moneychangers are arrayed against the bankers of the hinterland. Though the bill's central provisions have been presented as a gallant attempt to transfer the control of the nation's credit structure from New York to Washington where it belongs, its chief effect would be to free the West from the banking domination of the East.

The limitations of Eccles's liberalism are made further manifest in this connection by two notations. He is opposed to actual governmental control of the nation's credit machinery through public ownership of the Federal Reserve banks, and he has begun to hedge on his bill in the face of Senatorial opposition by attempting to minimize the importance of Senate amendments to the measure, though those amendments tighten instead of erasing banker control of the reserve system.

Eccles caught the attention of the New Dealers by his testimony before the Senate Finance Committee in February, 1933, when this pallid young Mormon from Utah—who continued to rate himself a Republican after he entered the Treasury—advocated a depression counter-offensive in the form of liberal federal spending for public works and relief. Eccles had got his ideas from those twin exponents of the Keynes school, Dr. William Trufant Foster, of Boston, the professor of English who became director of the Pollak Foundation for Economic Research, and Waddill Catchings, manufacturer, financier, and joint author with Foster of some five books on money, profits, and other phenomena of our industrial economy. Eccles brought to his study of the Foster-Catchings books the open mind of a notoriously tight-fisted man and a vast empirical knowledge of the world of business and finance. Except for two years dutifully spent as a Mormon missionary in Scotland, his life until he came to Washington had been devoted to managing and enlarging the estate his father left. At the time he received the New Deal call, he was president of two banks, two lumber companies, a hotel company, a construction concern, a securities firm, and one country club. He also was vice-president and treasurer of a sugar corporation and a director of coal, lumber, insurance, canned-milk, railroad, and power companies.

These roots, these success badges that Eccles has, are a great solace and comfort to Roosevelt, who is drawn by the comparative novelty of Eccles's ideas and derives confidence from the fact that their source is adequate proof of their essential harmlessness. For Eccles, there is some disadvantage in that, as developments in connection with his banking bill have shown. Roosevelt's feeling that any of Eccles's ideas must be essentially harmless has made it easy for him, under opposition pressure, to conclude that the most controversial phases of the bill also are essentially unimportant, and Eccles, passionately devoted to his brain child, has been deprived as a result of the unswerving White House backing he had expected for the measure. The Joneses, Kennedys, Crowleys, and other exponents of the politico-economic status quo ante have outweighed him. Not that it matters much.

Love and Housing

By M. M.

ONE of the questions the first Comintern convention in seven years failed to take up is that of love and housing, which has reached alarming proportions in Moscow. I know what the excuse will be: it will be maintained that the Communist International has no connection with the Soviet government, and therefore does not know what is going on in Russia and is powerless to stop it. This is all very well in the matter of propaganda. Everybody knows that if the Soviet government admits that its Right hand so much as suspects what its Left hand is doing it will get a swift and ignominious kick from all its capitalist playmates. But love and housing in Moscow is something else again—with the easy divorce laws it is something else again and again and again—and it is an issue which the Communist International must face if it does not wish to lose the backing of every revolutionist in Greenwich Village, Montparnasse, Telegraph Hill, and the Island of Bali.

Lest anyone doubt how desperate conditions are in Moscow I quote from a letter which has just reached me. It was smuggled through the Soviet mails and out of the country by the ingenious device of concealing it in an envelope, addressing it plainly, and affixing a fifteen-kopek stamp. It reads in part as follows:

> As I told you, I'm married. It happened very much à la Moscow. We saw each other every day and had lots of fun but we knew we were sure of one thing: we didn't want to live together, particularly in one room. Then J. in moving from where he'd been staying to better quarters ran into difficulties. He couldn't get into the new place which was still occupied, and they wouldn't take him back in the old. He asked if I'd give him a flop for four days, moved in, and went to bed while I went to make a duty call. I returned at 10:30. There sat my landlady having a good old-fashioned case of Russian jitters.
>
> "He can't sleep there," she said. "Suppose there might be a robbery in the house and maybe the militia would look in here and find an unregistered man. We'd all be evicted."
>
> If you've never seen a Russian blench and quake at the thought of the local constabulary, you don't know what abject and superstitious dread is. Well, I kicked J. into his clothes and we shivered out into the night air, still thin and chill although it was June. We looked high and low for a room, but none was to be had, so we finally did what we should have done at first: went to the militia ourselves and explained. A very nice desk-sergeant said it was O.K. and even wrote a note to the landlady requesting her to allow Citizeness L. to extend to Citizen J. the privileges of her bed for four days. And it worked out so well that we decided we'd register together.

For obvious reasons the name of the writer is withheld. (For equally obvious reasons I have deleted a few tell-tale phrases.) But enough has been quoted to reveal the conditions that exist in Moscow under the very noses of the Comintern and of Harold Denny, not to mention William Bullitt, President Kalenin, and the Commissariat of Light Industry. In this case love won out over housing, at least for the moment, but a Hearst reporter may easily picture how economics in the guise of housing stifles love in the land of the Bolsheviks, who promised to abolish economics, didn't they?

Take the case of a young man who fell in love with a woman not his wife. It was simple enough to divorce his spouse, but getting rid of her was another matter. She was entitled—and it was so registered—to one-half of the apartment they occupied, and she refused to yield her half to the new wife. It was a long and bitter battle which officially ended when the husband secretly exchanged his half of the apartment for the room of an obliging friend. We can only imagine what happened when the divorced wife met the obliging friend doing whatever in Russia corresponds to taking in the morning paper; it will probably remain forever a secret of the dreaded OGPU, whose sinister role in such situations is amply indicated in the letter quoted.

I could go on to tell another story of love in Moscow which would set my readers by the ears if I could only remember it. It begins with a young woman who finally succeeded in getting a large and very desirable room. It ends much later with the transfer of the room, with best wishes, to the new wife of the husband of the young woman, who had another room in mind. What happened in the intervening years is a tale of bureaucratic intrigue and documents in triplicate which I could never hope to untangle without a good sharp piataletka. Unfortunately such is the regimentation in Soviet Russia that one is forbidden to have sharp weapons unless one is a Caucasian in national costume. And since I would rather have free speech than be a Caucasion any day, the horrible details of this story also will have to remain with the dreaded OGPU whether they want them or not.

In any case I think I have made it clear that the Communist International must face the question of love in one room; whether, in other words, love can be established in one room or must be carried on simultaneously in every room in the house. Until it has solved this problem it cannot, with conscience, keep as its slogan: Workers of the World, Unite.

Correspondence

The Gentleman from New York

To the Editors of The Nation:

On reading Mr. Villard's review of the recent life of Roscoe Conkling, in your issue of June 26, I wondered a little that he, of all men, had not managed to bring in some reference to a little incident which has caused some of us to nurse a soft spot in our hearts for the Gentleman from New York. I mean the dramatic moment when Bruce, the Negro Senator from Mississippi, was due to take the oath. Custom required, of course, that a new Senator be escorted to the President's desk by his colleague, but the white Senator from Mississippi refused this courtesy. As Mr. Bruce started down the aisle alone, Mr. Conkling jumped from his seat and accompanied him.

What this meant to Mr. Bruce can be seen by the fact that his son, and his son, Harvard graduates both, bear the name of Roscoe Conkling.

Petersham, Mass., July 2 Leslie W. Hopkinson

In Defense of the Forward

To the Editors of The Nation:

Your editorial comment on the occasion of Abraham Cahan's seventy-fifth birthday seemed to me as unfair as it was ungracious. It certainly gave no discerning estimate of a man who has stamped his character on Yiddish journalism the world over and on Jewish immigrant life in America especially.

I hope that my connection as a member of the editorial staff of the Jewish Daily Forward will not destroy me as a witness, but I read Mr. Cahan's paper as closely as your editorial writer, I believe. I also read the opposition with a fair degree of attention and I even manage a few English dailies, including the New York Daily Mirror. To say that the features of the Forward are of the caliber of the Mirror is a libel on one or the other of the papers and possibly on both, for there is no comparison. To be sure, the Forward publishes serial thrillers as it publishes many other features. Yet to represent these thrillers as the body of the Forward instead of its light relief is to demonstrate an ignorance of the paper as well as of the editorial craft.

It is difficult to present the evidence to one who does not read Yiddish, and I shall impose on your courtesy for only a very sketchy attempt. The leading lights of Jewish literature today are Sholem Ash, Abraham Reisin, Z. Shneier, and I. J. Singer. All of them are staff members of the Forward and their contributions form daily features of the paper. The work of some of these authors is familiar to many readers of English. Thus the novel "Three Cities" by Sholem Ash, praised so highly by The Nation itself, appeared first and in the original language in the Forward. All of this author's work is published first in the Forward, if that is any testimony of the paper's standards. "Yoshe Kalb," by I. J. Singer, which delighted so many gentile theater patrons, originated as a serial novel in the Forward. Another novel by the same author, "The Brothers Ashkenazi," has just concluded its serial publication with us, and many regard it an even greater masterpiece than "Yoshe Kalb." The short fiction that the Forward prints daily is incomparably the finest of its sort. What the magazine Story attempts in the English field the Forward, under Mr. Cahan, has been doing ever since its inception.

The standards set for its serious fiction are equally as high for the other reading matter of the Forward. Among our regular correspondents are men of recognized authority in the Jewish and Socialist world. To mention only three, there are Jacob Leschinsky, who was the first, I believe, to be jailed and deported by the Nazi regime; Karl Kautsky and R. Abramowitz, the latter a member of the Executive of the Socialist and Labor International. In addition the Forward publishes regular contributions from a half dozen German exiles of world renown, usually under assumed names for obvious reasons. Labor news gets complete coverage in the Forward, an entire page and often more being devoted to it daily.

No one runs as detailed and as essentially faithful reports of developments in Russia as does the Forward. The Nation may disagree with its point of view which is that of the Socialists, defending the principles of democracy and opposing dictatorship and tyranny under whatever label and color. But then the Forward deplores The Nation's attitude of condoning the Russian dictatorship. This is no reflection on editorial capacity, I hope, in either respect. However, the Forward carried complete reports of the famine in the Ukraine long before The Nation's correspondents found fit to mention the matter even by indirection, and this, I suppose, is a qualification of editorial capacity.

As for other news, one should remember that the Forward is a paper of national circulation and its articles and features are its main attraction rather than the news columns. Even so its news is relatively no more skimpy than that of the New York World-Telegram, for example. There is always a good digest of the important and significant events with a nod now and then to matters of lighter vein.

They say this of Mr. Cahan: "He is the editor of every Jewish newspaper." He does not direct them physically, of course. But many Jewish papers lift Forward material bodily, while its immediate competitors copy its every feature, including the serial thrillers, with flattering persistence. Perhaps one ought to abide by their judgment of Mr. Cahan's editorial qualifications rather than by that of your editorial writer.

New York City, July 15 J. C. Rich

Not Among Those Fired

To the Editors of The Nation:

Unfortunately I cannot claim the honor of being among those dropped from the University of Pittsburgh staff, as suggested by Rose Stein in her most revealing article, Academic Cossacks in Pittsburgh, in The Nation of July 24.

Academic freedom in that institution has, to be sure, been precarious for those holding convictions at odds with the Mellon dynasty. I had my troubles with the administration. The fact is, however, that I refused the usual annual renewal of my contract in order to accept an appointment in another institution.

Amherst, Mass., July 26 Colston E. Warne

Home News from Abroad

To the Editors of The Nation:

As a subscriber to The Nation I want to commend your unprejudiced and unbiased stand on the very important policies before the country today. Your article in the issue of July 17, Tacoma: Timber and Tear Gas, gives more authentic news on our local strike than the daily papers of the city.

Tacoma, Wash., July 19 W. U. Nichol

A Southern Textile Union

To the Editors of The Nation:

A southern branch of the Committee to Support Southern Textile Organization has recently been formed in North Carolina, with Professor E. E. Ericson of the University of North Carolina as chairman. The southern committee includes among its active members, such prominent persons as L. E. Austin of the Carolina Times, Dr. Carl Borgman, Dr. Arnold Williams, as well as many professional people, trade unionists, and textile workers. The composition of this committee indicates that the professional and white-collar class in the South—in the very heart of the textile areas—is rapidly allying itself with the working class.

The Committee to Support Southern Textile Organization supports rank-and-file organizers in the southern textile field and publicizes the living and working conditions under which the southern textile millhand lives. The committee has grown in one year from an active membership of three to an active membership of forty. Surely, there are hundreds of your readers in cities all over the country who feel it imperative to support these struggles in the South. More branches, like the recently organized southern branch of the committee, must be formed to insure the success of the fight for a rank-and-file-controlled United Textile Workers Union in the South. For information, write to 304 West Fifty-eighth Street.

New York City, July 20 JOHN BERMAN,
Executive Secretary

A Correction from Rabbi Heller

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

May I call attention to a serious error in an editorial paragraph appearing in the July 17 Nation, relating to the attitude of Christian and Jewish religious bodies toward war?

At the discussion in Chicago I did two things. I objected to the original resolution on the ground that it was poorly drawn, and that its statement that war is "a denial of all for which religion stands" is unfortunately not true historically of Judaism, which for many centuries, from the Bible onward, santioned certain kinds of war. In contrast with this I was among those who drew up a resolution which attempts to show that there is little distinction between aggressive and defensive warfare in our Western world, that the time has come to change our religious principle, and henceforth to ask all members of our faith, and to appeal to all other religious bodies to join with us, to refuse to bear arms.

You will concede that this is far different from the picture your editorial gives. This resolution is to be considered by the Central Conference of American Rabbis at its next convention.

Cincinnati, July 15 JAMES G. HELLER

The American Approach

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In the interests of accuracy, I wish to correct an erroneous impression, which is rather widespread, that I am affiliated with the Workers' Party of the United States. Such an impression has naturally arisen from my past association with the American Workers' Party, in your columns and elsewhere. For years I have stood for "the American Approach," involvboth a use of American revolutionary traditions and an appreciation of the super-mechanized background of this country, and also logically for a realistic and sympathetic attitude toward the Soviet Union. I continue to hold those views.

Brooklyn, N. Y., July 9 LOUIS F. BUDENZ

Registering for Peace

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Your pacifist readers may be interested in the new program of Peace Patriots, which includes registering with the County Clerk of New York, for a fee of twenty-five cents, the names of American-born citizens who wish to express their opposition as conscientious objectors to all wars.

New York City, July 10 WILLIAM FLOYD

In an Early Issue

The Elks Save America

By A. B. Magil

Tax Ground Values

—and Un-Tax Industry

WHY do you get such low interest when you put your savings into the bank?

WHY does it daily grow more difficult to find safe places for investment, for your family, for your old age?

WHY does our whole economic system squeeze productive capital between inflated ground values and heavy taxes?

If you want to know why, read LOUIS WALLIS' new book of dynamic economic challenge—

SAFEGUARD PRODUCTIVE CAPITAL

At bookstores—75¢

DOUBLEDAY, DORAN—Garden City, N. Y.

☐ LECTURES ☐

COMING EVENTS . . . . . ECONOMIC

UPTON SINCLAIR

Lecture and Debate Engagements Available
Transcontinental Tour October to December

MANAGEMENT ERNEST BRIGGS, Inc.
712B Times Bldg. New York

Coming Soon

Britain Tightens Control in India
By T. A. Bisson

Is the Endowment Policy a Good Investment?
by Murray Levine

Moscow Frowns on Abortions
by Louis Fischer

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIB.

Labor and Industry

Camden: Shipworkers on Strike

By LAWRENCE ROGIN

EVERY week-day morning since May 13, more than 2,000 strikers at the New York Shipbuilding Company in Camden, New Jersey, have marched four abreast in a picket line that extends for at least a quarter of a mile. The men are members of the Camden local, Number 1, of the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America, an independent union not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. This local is one of the most promising unions that grew up in the NRA period, one that has been able to make headway in a notorious anti-union industry, closed to unionism since the war. If it wins this strike, it will have brought to terms the second largest shipyard in the country and gained a permanent foothold in the industry. This is the issue that vitalizes the strike of 4,600 men, 96 per cent of whom belong to the union. To the leaders and many of the men, keeping the union is more important than the disputes over hours and wages that are also involved. For they know that once the union is established, these things will come later.

In a seven-week strike a year ago, the union won recognition and pay increases. As a result the company also recognizes that the problem is whether or not the open shop will prevail in the industry. Union leaders feel sure that the National Council of American Shipbuilders, dominated by the anti-union Bethlehem Steel Corporation, is making a test case of the Camden strike.

For ten weeks after the start of the strike the picket line had no occasion to prove its strength. Then, on July 23, the company made an effort to start production. The 2,000 pickets usually on the line were joined by the rest of the strikers and many sympathizers, and the plant remained closed. Two days later the company gave up its effort to open the yard. A few cars were overturned and there was some booing and cat-calling, but the violence was not sufficient to justify the company's charges of intimidation. Since that time the strike has received nation-wide attention as the result of an investigation into the company's activities by a sub-committee of the Committee on Labor of the House of Representatives, acting on a motion by Representative E. A. Kenney, (Democrat, New Jersey) to investigate the labor practices of shipbuilders. Kenney and other Congressmen are urging that the United States Navy Department cancel contracts amounting to $50,000,000, which are tied up by the strike, if it is proved that the company is at fault. President Roosevelt intervened, saying that it was time for the strike to be settled. The president of the company announced that it would not make an offer on the new naval building program for which bids will be opened on August 7. This move was made to counter a demand by the union that the Navy Department refuse to make contracts with the New York Shipbuilding Company so long as the strike continues.

Most of these developments are favorable to the strikers; in addition they have received unexpected aid from American Federation of Labor sources. A check for $2,500 has been sent for the relief fund by the United Mine Workers of America, and arrangements have been made to have John P. Frey, secretary of the Metal Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor, talk at a strike meeting.

The union was started somewhat less than two years ago in Camden; it now claims 10,000 members in eleven of the largest private shipyards on both the East and West coasts. While almost half of these are in the Camden yard, there are strong nuclei in the other two of the "Big Three" yards, the Newport News Shipbuilding Company, in Virginia, and the Fore River yard of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation at Quincy, Massachusetts. Leaders assert that the industrial union is the only potent force among the shipyard workers in the private yards. During the World War the American Federation of Labor succeeded in building strong unions in the yards, but these were destroyed in a series of strikes that lasted until 1923, and in recent years the A. F. of L. with its craft policies has made no headway.

Organization of the West Coast locals of the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers came about in a peculiar manner. In 1934, there appeared in Liberty magazine an article by Matthew Woll attacking the Communists in the labor movement and mentioning the name of John Green, then president of the Camden union, as one of the leaders of a strike which the writer thought was called by the Marine Workers Industrial Union, a Communist-controlled union. While the names of the unions were confused, that did not seem to bother a group of workers in a San Francisco shipyard, who promptly wrote to John Green asking to affiliate with the union that had been successful in defeating the New York Shipbuilding Company. This same San Francisco group was instrumental in bringing into the union locals in three other shipyards on the Pacific Coast, one of these a former federal union in the A. F. of L.

Green, a short, slight Scotchman, tinsmith by trade, who is now president of the national organization and executive secretary of the Camden local, was the driving force behind the 1934 strike, and is still the most popular and most effective man in the union. He and Phillip Van Gelder, formerly an organizer for the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, now national executive secretary for the shipyard workers, have carried on most of the organization work outside of Camden. Both are active Socialists. Recently Charles Purkis, a pipefitter, has been taken from the yard to become national organizer.

The present strike started on May 13 when the company categorically turned down the union's demands for a 15 per cent increase in wages, elimination of the piece-work and bonus systems, and a preferential shop. The first demand also involved a decrease in the number of wage rates from 12 to 3, in order to guarantee equal pay for similar types of work. On May 9, two days before the expiration of the old agreement, C. F. Metten, president, and C. M.

Kaltwasser, executive vice president of the company, countered with proposals which would have abolished the gains made in the strike of the year before, stipulated that the union was no longer the sole collective-bargaining agency of the men, and required that all grievances be handled individually by the men involved.

In its argument against the preferential shop, the company was fortified by the ruling of a deputy administrator of the shipbuilding code, who said that such a provision would be illegal under the NIRA. This ruling stood for only a short time before it was overthrown by the National Industrial Recovery Board, at the insistence of Sidney Hillman, president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America and a member of the board. The company also suggested arbitration of disputed questions by the industrial relations committee of the shipbuilding industry, which consisted of three representatives of the employers and three of American Federation of Labor unions, none of which were friendly to the independent union.

Naturally the union could not agree to any of these proposals. The negotiations committee suggested that the existing contract be renewed with a few slight modifications. This the company refused as it did the union's subsequent proposal that the existing contract be renewed and the modifications desired by the union be arbitrated by the National Labor Board or the United States Department of Labor.

Supporting its position that the company could afford the wage increase, the union pointed to the statement of Senator Gerald P. Nye that the company would make a $3,000,000 profit on the cruisers now under construction, and a profit of $10,000,000 on contracts for navy work it has recently received; to the report of former president Clinton Bardo who, on retiring nine months ago, stated that during the seven preceding years the company had made a net profit of $6,075,607.70; and to the fact that wages in the Philadelphia Navy yard, just across the river from Camden, average 25 per cent higher than those in the Camden yard. The company claims that it has lost more than $500,000 during the past year as a result of the agreement following the 1934 strike.

Faced with the alternative of striking or giving up their union 4,600 workers left their jobs and have remained out solidly to this day. Besides the mass picketing every morning, the union keeps a twenty-four-hour watch on the yard, on both the land and river gates. Mass meetings are held every morning, addressed by members of the negotiating committee and prominent labor leaders. These mass meetings are preceded by a prayer meeting led by a striker who is a lay preacher. A quartet provides music and there is mass singing of religious, popular, and labor songs.

A commissary has been set up, which turns out 1,900 meals a day at all hours of the day and night. Money and food for relief are "chiseled" from sympathetic townspeople who seem to be behind the strike. More than $600 weekly is being raised by contributions from other trade unions, the largest regular contributor being an independent union in the Radio-Victor factory. While the shipyard union is not in the good graces of the A. F. of L. unions in the shipbuilding industry, locals of twenty American Federation of Labor unions are regularly giving aid to the strike.

From the start the company has asserted that the strike was forced by a radical minority, and that the workers wanted to stay at work. Four distinct efforts were made to divide the ranks. The first was in the form of a poll taken on the backs of the last pay-checks sent out. The men were asked to vote "yes" or "no" on the proposal of going back to work on the company's terms. Countering this obvious attempt to set up a blacklist, the union, at the suggestion of its attorney, M. H. Goldstein of Philadelphia, urged all its members to vote "yes" and thus destroyed the value of the poll to the company.

Major Henry F. Holthusen of New York, a former United States assistant attorney general under Harlan Stone, who was said to have had experience settling shipyard strikes during and shortly after the war, was then called in by the company. His first move was to hire a few score college students and unemployed to conduct an "impartial" survey to find out the sentiment of the strikers. Getting wind of this, the union planted Van Gelder among the investigators and got them to come to the union hall, where they were fed and told the strikers' story before going out to investigate. Most of them gave up the job, saying that they had been misled, and the survey fizzled. "The Major," as he is known to the strikers, then tried to take a post-card poll, but with no more success.

As a final effort he convinced the county officials of the American Legion that they should take a vote. Protests by the strikers, American Legion posts, and other veterans' organizations quickly convinced the Legion officials that they had made a mistake, and they somewhat awkwardly backed down.

Full-page advertisements reprinting excerpts from alleged letters by shipyard workers have been inserted by the company in the local paper and mailed to all strikers. But none of these methods has broken down the morale of the workers. The union has replied to all the company's claims of intimidation by pointing to the size of its picket lines, and to the fact that the strike had been completely peaceful until the company tried to open the gates. Reflecting the attitude of the townspeople, the police have made little effort to interfere with the strikers' activities.

While Mayor Frederick Von Nieda has seemed friendly thus far, it was his suggestion that the strikers report for work without any agreement, and have all questions arbitrated by the National Labor Board, which led the company to open its gates. Company officials also used this suggestion as an excuse to turn down a proposal by Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins that the yard re-open under the terms of the 1934 agreement and then arbitrate the differences. In their reply to Miss Perkins, President Metten wrote, "I believe that if you study the shipbuilding industry you will see the impossibility of substituting arbitration for management in the yard. It leaves the decision of all important questions to a committee presided over by a neutral person who may not understand shipbuilding." Company officials have asserted that the company must have the same authority in the shipyard as a captain does on board ship.

The Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers is fighting a winning fight against what must have seemed at first to be insurmountable odds. If it is successful, credit should go to a young, alert leadership backed up by a militant rank and file, organized so that there are no craft lines to break up the united bargaining power of the workers.

Labor Static

By HEYWOOD BROUN

IN the field of radio, organization has made very little progress. It seems surprising to learn that there has been almost no effort made to organize station announcers. There is just as much reason for these men and women to come together as there is among reporters or actors or teachers. Of course a great many of the broadcasters are members of Actors' Equity or of the vaudeville union or the musicians' union. But I have in mind not so much the stars of the big programs as the announcers themselves. On the whole the work is underpaid and the job is one of long hours and terrific nervous strain.

The names of a few of the best-known announcers come readily to mind. Many of these men work on the side for news reels or become an integral part of some commercial broadcast or another. When they grow famous enough they may serve as stooges for the illustrious comedians of the air and draw extra compensation from the commercial sponsors. But the run-of-the-mine announcer is a man on whom very heavy demands are made. His voice must be that of a well-educated man and his enunciation above reproach. Even in the best regulated studio things do go wrong upon occasion and in that event the announcer is responsible for seeing that a stand-by orchestra or pianist swings into action or he may have to ad lib on his own account. In short he has to be the sort of person who can talk readily of Brahms for half an hour if a sudden shower extinguishes an outdoor concert.

Not only minutes but split seconds are important in the big studios. The announcer must be able to distinguish between a ten-second sign-off and one lasting a full eleven. He is ground on the rack of the stop-watch through long hours every day. Perhaps the failure of radio men to organize may be partly attributed to the very exacting nature of their work and the hours which make it extremely difficult to find a time at which all the prospective members of a guild or union could be gathered together.

In the beginning, at any rate, leadership might effectively come from some one of the very well-known performers such as Alexander Woollcott, Ed Hill, or Hans Van Kaltenborn. I suggest to any one of this trio that they are actually under an ethical obligation to help their fellow workers to better conditions. Undoubtedly the psychology which is likely to be encountered will be much like that which prevailed in newspapers at the beginning. The radio owners will raise the issue of "the freedom of the air" and the more successful announcers will broadcast the fact that they are doing very well as rugged individualists and see nothing which they could personally gain by organization. It will also be said that an announcer must have initiative and that any kind of a guild or union would lead to a regimentation of radio which would be a fatal thing. Fortunately one argument can hardly be brought up. I doubt whether any proprietor will say that time cannot possibly be made a factor in the life of an announcer.

Of course, a radio guild should not be limited to the men who work directly for the chains or individual stations. It seems to me that eligibility should be extended to any unorganized folk who talk or play or sing into the microphone. To be sure, arrangements would have to be made to handle the situation of those already unionized, like the musicians or the actors. It has seemed to me for some time that all persons engaged in the business of furnishing public opinion with its daily bread should come together in some sort of confederation. Into such a group would fall logically newspaper men and women, clergymen, authors, screen writers, teachers, and broadcasters of every kind. Such a confederation might be a powerful influence against war. After a war is over it is easy enough to point out that some very small group in control of power used the stage, the screen, the air, the magazines, and the press for its own ends. And many of the persons who served the will of the little back-room group wrote or talked their hearts out for the holy war quite unaware of the fact that they were being used. They didn't know it was loaded.

Obviously the men and women who make public opinion (whether that is their intention or not) fall into very many camps. Any sort of confederation would have to be on the widest possible front. A belief in the dissemination of the truth should be enough for a common meeting-ground. At the very least these various groups could send representatives to an annual convention and ascertain to just what extent they were proceeding under their own steam and in what ways they were being played as pawns by invisible hands. Radio, of course, would be one of the most vital cogs in any such set-up. Increasingly the radio becomes the most powerful propaganda weapon of them all. At the moment many of the chains and stations are on their good behavior and making a pretense of impartiality. It may even be so that a radical leader (not including the Communists) can find time on the air a little more readily than he can find it in the press. To some extent Norman Thomas has become radio's pet radical and whenever any charge of discrimination is made against N. B. C. the officials are fond of pointing out the opportunities they have given to America's Socialist leader. And I am not citing this in criticism of Mr. Thomas. He would be foolish not to avail himself of the air when he can get it and he is an able broadcaster.

But I do suggest that radio is less free than it pretends to be. It is just as dependent on advertising revenue as are the newspapers. Columbia has done some good work in clearing out a number of questionable accounts. Radio has made a beginning of cleaning its own house but not without resort to the time-honored practice of sweeping the dirt under the carpet. The air fought the Tugwell bill even more ferociously than did the American press.

Naturally I am not suggesting that radio announcers should organize and immediately take over the industry. But I see no reason why a well-organized group of broadcasters could not make a considerable contribution to the raising of standards and helping to preserve radio ethics. And, of course, the first step in the raising of standards should always be in shortening hours and increasing pay.

Peace Comes to the Fur Market

By DAVID SCHEYER

TEN years of civil war in New York's fur market ended on June 12 when the "left-wing" Fur Workers Industrial Union signed its own death warrant and asked its members to join the New York Joint Council of the International Fur Workers Union, the American Federation of Labor affiliate.

Not even on the dark and bloody ground of Southern Illinois where Progressive and United miners slaughter each other at the pit mouths has dual unionism so blasted the standards of labor as in the fur market. Working conditions and wages for the furriers were cut to the bone as the manufacturers and contractors took full advantage of the strife. Vicious fights on the picket lines, in the shops, and on the streets were a daily occurrence. Few weeks passed when workers, slashed with the knives of their trade or trampled by the boots of rival unionists, did not fill the emergency wards and the night courts. And, ultimately, the majority of the furriers, disgusted with the inability of either union to control the industry, intimidated by the battle and uncertain of the issues, refused to give support or loyalty to either side.

Three forces have played varying roles in the furriers' unions. First in point of time was the leadership of the International Fur Workers Union, headed, until his death, by the reactionary Kaufman with the support of the right-wing Socialists. In opposition to Kaufman and his clique were the Communists and their followers in the fur market. With Aaron Gross as the brains and Ben Gold as the voice, the Communists won control of the New York Joint Council of the A. F. of L. union. From 1925 to 1927 the Furriers' Union was an arena of armed truce, characterized by the "border incidents" that usually occur in armed truces. In 1927 at a hastily organized but carefully packed conference in Washington, Kaufman expelled all the left-wing leaders of the Joint Council.

The fur workers of New York followed their chiefs into exile. For a year they fought for the reunification of the union. Then with the adoption by the Communist International of a new policy of building independent, "red," dual unions, the Fur Department of the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union was created, later to become the Fur Workers Industrial Union, and still later, the International Independent Fur Workers Industrial Union. Here for the sake of simplicity it is called the Industrial Union.

The third factor rose in 1929 when the Communist Party split and the followers of Jay Lovestone were expelled. Aaron Gross and many of the leaders of the Industrial Union were among those who went with Lovestone. So the Industrial Union was rent by an internal fight between the "pros" and the "antis"—between the Lovestone group who argued for reaffiliation with the A. F. of L., and the official Communists who spoke for simon-pure revolutionary unionism. Opposition leaders were removed, members suffered fines and discrimination, protests in membership meetings were stifled by main force. In 1930 Aaron Gross was finally ousted; a year later he died from lingering injuries received at the hands of the right-wing gangsters in a 1927 strike.

Through all these lean years the International Fur Workers hung on the fringes of the industry, little more than a pale ghost, its only liquid asset an American Federation of Labor charter. With an empty treasury and an uninspired leadership it lingered on with a few hundred members. But the Industrial Union was far from controlling the market. Its strength fluctuated, and though its membership statistics were never reliable, it is certain that until a month or so ago both unions combined did not represent more than 4,000 of the 10,000 furriers in New York. Under these conditions the sweat-shops throve. The number of units in the industry rose from 600 to 3,000, representing an atomization of the fur trade into fly-by-night shops with whom no agreements were possible or enforceable. The thirty-five-hour week was stretched almost limitlessly by allowances for "overtime," wage standards stood only on paper. And through this industrial desolation ran the blood of the furriers, shed in fratricidal and suicidal inter-union warfare.

The NRA meant very little in this industry. Neither of the unions received more than a partial blessing from the labor boards and code authorities. Provisions for minimum wages and maximum hours were unenforced because the two unions were far too busy slugging each other to patrol the shops. During the last two years the Communist Opposition (Lovestone group) has formed the progressive wing of the American Federation of Labor union, fighting for militancy and unity within the union. Needless to say it has been the chief target of the vituperation of the Industrial Union—and Ben Gold is a master of invective in Yiddish and in English.

Then the Communist International turned again and with it turned all the obedient little "red" unions. The Furriers Industrial Union was the only one in this country that had more than a paper membership, hence its leaders were very reluctant to liquidate it. They made insistent overtures to the A. F. of L., proposing amalgamation of the two unions, offering a fifty-fifty break on officers, demanding the acceptance of dues books from the Industrial Union by the A. F. of L., bringing at the same time a renewed reign of terror to the market. Finally this game, with the furworkers as its pawns, ended. At its Toronto convention held in May the International Fur Workers set up a unity committee to negotiate. This committee made a flat offer to the Industrial Union: "Dissolve your union. We will accept all your members—including those originally expelled. We will have elections within forty days."

It was accepted. The Fur Workers Industrial Union vanished. This was not specifically a "United Front" agreement as it has been labeled. The Industrial Union was liquidated as an organization, and its members were told to join the International. Two thousand workers joined the A. F. of L. union in three days—most of them from the Industrial Union, but many hitherto unorganized furriers emerging from their cyclone cellars now that the shooting was over. Exactly how many of them came from the "red" union can only be told when the elections are held. Ben Gold has an even chance of becoming the leader of the A. F. of L. union unless—

The "unless" is the blast directed against the merger by the A. F. of L. through Matthew Woll. Woll has seized the opportunity to call for a pogrom against Communists not only in the furriers union, but throughout the labor movement. Probably he will be ignored as Green's similar call was ignored last summer. Certainly Lucchi, the International president, and the leadership of the union have lived up to the unity committee's agreement with the Industrial Union. But Woll's outburst may not have been in vain. Quite possibly the official Communists themselves, whose orientation is toward work within the A. F. of L., will take the hint and lie low for the time being, refraining from seizing the union even if they can.

The other Jewish needle-trade unions in New York and particularly the International Ladies Garment Workers Union have long stood in the relation of big brother to the International Fur Workers. Before and during the Toronto convention amalgamation of the Fur Workers with the ILGWU was discussed as a logical step. Thus Woll tried to give teeth to his anti-red statement by making the leaders of the needle trades party to it. But the teeth were pulled when David Dubinsky, ILGWU president, said in a public statement (in the diplomatic language used by one vice-president of the A. F. of L. in speaking of another vice-president) in effect: "Mr. Woll is a so-and-so liar."

Meanwhile amalgamation of the two unions has ended the fur manufacturer's long holiday. The furriers are fighting again, but now they fight for better conditions in the industry, better pay and enforcement of hour agreements —Stalinites, Lovestoneites, and Socialists together. Scores of shops have been signed up since peace was made, thousands of furriers have received pay increases. Unity has been the furriers' answer to the voiding of the NRA. If unity endures, if blunders from the left and attacks from the right do not destroy it, they will gain more than the most ardent adherent of NRA ever imagined.

Labor Notes

Huey Long and Labor

THERE has been much talk but little documentation of Huey Long's services to labor in Louisiana. Labor throughout the country should therefore be interested in the opinion of George E. Wallace, second vice-president of the Louisiana State Federation of Labor—and in what happened to him for expressing it. In July Mr. Wallace, who has been a union man for twenty-three years, wrote an open letter to E. H. Williams, president of the federation, calling Huey Long the common enemy of organized labor in Louisiana and listing specific reasons for the charge. Under Long, wrote Wallace, "wages in the state have declined, hours have been lengthened, and the condition of the workers has grown steadily worse." He went on to point out that workers on construction jobs were paid far below the prevailing wage scale; that Long prevented passage of a state law giving labor the right to organize and bargain collectively; that his legislature defeated the eight-hour bill for women and the child-labor amendment. "During his regime," read the unmincing letter of Mr. Wallace, "not a single measure of a social character was passed." And he pointed out to his superior that the Federation "has a wonderful opportunity at the coming election in January to render a real service to the state."

Less than two weeks after his open criticism of Senator Long, Mr. Wallace was fired from his job as a barber at the Hotel Bentley in Alexandria, Louisiana, because its manager feared a boycott and other reprisals by Long's henchmen. Mr. Long, according to the Federated Press, was "enthusiastic" when he heard the news and predicted that Wallace would soon be thrown out of the barber's union and out of the state federation. He failed to state whether Wallace would still be allowed to live in Louisiana. As usual Long's answer to the charges brought against him were profane but not specific. "Labor," he said, with assorted oaths, "won't stand for a man like that." So far it is not recorded whether Mr. Williams, president of the Louisiana Federation of Labor, answered Mr. Wallace's letter, and Long claims that the A. F. of L. and the state federation have given him a "100-per-cent record." It would be an excellent time for the A. F. of L., both state and local, to make it clear that labor will not stand for a man like Long. But that may hardly be expected from the A. F. of L. bureaucracy whose political tradition, judging from its past record, might almost be described as punishing labor's friends and rewarding its enemies.

Closed Shop

THE New York Post has signed a closed-shop contract with the American Newspaper Guild. Besides the closed shop, the contract establishes the check-off, a five-day, forty-hour week, one week's vacation with pay each year, with two weeks after one year's service. Minimum wages are left for further arbitration. There is also a provision for dismissal notice, and for a grievance committee. The Post is the first metropolitan daily to sign a contract with the Guild.

Contributors to This Issue

JACOB BURCK is a radical cartoonist whose collection of drawings, "Hunger and Revolt," was published this year.

LEWIS COREY is author of "The Decline of American Capitalism" (1934). His new book, "The Crisis of the Middle Class," will appear early in September.

ARNOLD S. FULTON is the pseudonym of a Louisiana newspaperman.

LAWRENCE ROGIN is an instructor in labor journalism at Brookwood Labor College.

DAVID SCHEYER is a labor journalist in New York.

WILLIAM GRUEN is in the department of philosophy at Washington Square College, New York University.

H. B. PARKES is a member of the history department at Washington Square College.

ROBERT HAMMOND MURRAY has lived in Mexico for many years. He has contributed articles on Mexican affairs to The Nation and other magazines.

ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES, former professor of English and philosophy, is the author of "This Land of Liberty," and co-author of "Mary Baker Eddy—The Truth and the Tradition."

Books

Footprints in Cement

Lucy Gayheart. By Willa Cather. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

YEARS after the heroine of this novel has been found entrapped by a tree stump beneath the icy waters of a Middle Western river, her former admirer, now sole owner of the old Gayheart place at the end of town, gives instructions to one of his retainers: "Those marks there in the cement were made by Gayheart's daughter Lucy, when she was a little girl. I'll just ask you that nothing happens to those two slabs of walk—in my time, at least." Such a sentiment of the past, with its special commingling of the sacred and the commonplace, is actually all that Miss Cather's new work, despite its elaborate preparation of character and background, finally manages to communicate. The book has been only another and less memorable rendition of the theme that has occupied this novelist from the beginning. Like the heroines of "The Song of the Lark," "O Pioneers," and "A Lost Lady," Lucy Gayheart is one of those exquisite "sports" that were thrown up at the close of the period of pioneer expansion in the West. She is too lovely, too intelligent, too responsive to the call of what is rhetorically designated as life to be content with anything which that period had to offer. Unlike Marian Forrester, however, she is unable to compromise, and that is the pathos of her situation. For a few hours she has known dangerous release in the arms of an aging and unhappy baritone in a dimly lighted studio in the Fine Arts building in Chicago. After such a taste of abandonment, with all that it holds of music and continental passion and romantic sorrow, the daily bread of Harry Gordon's too well-disciplined affections loses all its savor for her. After such a revelation, as a matter of fact, there can be no future for either Lucy or the book. Miss Cather would be hard put to it to dispose of such a character as Clement Sebastian elsewhere than in the picturesque depths of Lake Como. And Lucy Gayheart has made a choice which leaves her only the life-in-death of continued existence in the Platte valley. For Harry Gordon and the reader there can be only the perennial, if somewhat unsatisfactory, consolation of the footprints in the cement.

The outline of Miss Cather's story as given is of course reducible to something that one has already seen many times and will see again in the Hollywood cinema. But to complain of its hackneyed simplicity is not to take account in this book of that other element of the novel form for which Miss Cather has been considered especially notable. The following is offered as a fair example of the style that is used to indicate or render subjective states on the part of the characters:

> She had never loved the city so much; the city which gave one the freedom to spend one's youth as one pleased, to have one's secret, to choose one's master and serve him in one's own way. Yesterday's rain had left a bitter, springlike smell in the air; the vehemence that beat against her in the street and hummed above her had something a little wistful in it tonight, like a plaintive hand-organ tune. All the lovely things in the shop windows, the furs and jewels, roses and orchids, seemed to belong to her as she passed them. Not to have wrapped up and sent home certainly; where would she put them? But they were hers to live among.

That this is not the best writing that has come to us from the author of "My Antonia" and "A Lost Lady" is as evident from the sentimentally relaxed rhythms as from the stereotyped imagery. What it reveals even more profoundly than the naively romantic pattern of her newest book is how completely this writer now permits the élans of her sensibility to conquer over her intelligence. Where a Flaubert, troubled by much the same conflict between imagination and conscience, was able at the end to attain to the high detachment of "L'Education Sentimentale," Miss Cather surrenders to the temptation of facile sentimentalism which has been her greatest temptation from the beginning. For those who had hoped that the archeological holiday of her last two novels might be followed by a return to the clearly envisaged experience of her earlier books about the West, this most recent novel can only be a source of grave discouragement. WILLIAM TROY

Human Accents in Science

Science and the Human Temperament. By Erwin Schrödinger. W. W. Norton. $3.50.

IT has been claimed that art, unlike science, exercises an autonomy in its subject matter. The function of art, it is said, is to create order; the function of science is to discover it. While experience furnishes the elements of both art and science, the directive principles which guide experience in these two enterprises are said to be radically different. Experience in art is seen as a vehicle of human values and in science as clues to matters of fact.

A considerable part of Schrödinger's rather desultory book is devoted to mitigating this contrast between art and science. In an essay entitled Is Science a Fashion of the Times? he elaborates the well-known fact that the development of science has been determined to a large extent by extra-scientific factors. For example, he notes that the direction of scientific research and the general character of the hypotheses advanced bear close relations to the dominant world-outlook of the age. These relations are of profound significance for the methodology of science and they suggest a similarity between art and science more trenchant than that which Schrödinger aims to disclose. Professor Schrödinger is rather preoccupied with the arbitrariness, variability, and what he would call the subjecttivity of art, and he attempts to exhibit similar traits in science. In this attempt he is largely successful, but it seems to the present reviewer that Schrödinger misses the deeper significance of his acute analogies.

This significance lies not in the view of science as a kind of play whose form varies with the "fashions" of the times, but in the fact that science as well as art is an attempt to organize experience. And just as we find profound satisfaction when we can identify the structure and meaning of the work of art—a human creation—with a non-human natural order, so in science we derive satisfaction when scientific theories—the products of human genius—can be seen to express not only the organization of fragmentary human experience but also the structure of a non-human nature. The universe both as depicted in science and as expressed in art is man-made, but in both it is made of elements of experience which, because they are human, are also natural. Thus the order of human experience when informed by adequate insight can become also an order of nature. But because experience is never exhaustive and because the natural scene of that experience changes, no view of nature either in art or in science can be final. It is in this tentative character of science and the continual need for reconstruction of scientific theory that Schrödinger sees the dependence of science on human temperament.

What he calls "human temperament," however, turns out to be the gamut of dominant concepts of any age. These are not, as Schrödinger regards them, subjective determinants of science, but objective instrumentalities which the scientist employs in his theories just as he might use the technical facilities of his age in his experiments.

Less than half of the essays and lectures collected in this volume deal with the title theme. The rest are of a more technical character and center around the conflict between the deterministic and the a-causal views of the laws of nature. Implicit in Schrödinger's treatment of this subject is the valuable suggestion that the principle of indeterminacy—which is the theoretical basis of the a-causal view of nature—is an extension of the ideal of discontinuity. All measurement is discontinuous, but until Heisenberg developed the principle of indeterminacy it was believed that the only limits of refinement in measurement were the degree of tchnological refinement of our instruments. The principle of indeterminacy may be viewed as a principle of the atomicity of measurement. Not only the process of nature, but measurements—the processes whereby we come to know nature—are limited by irreducible units. The realm which lies beyond these limits is forever closed to human knowledge not because what is to be known in that realm transcends our capacities, but because in that realm there is nothing to know.

Closer students of the book should be on guard against such typographical errors as that which appears on page 57 where wrong exponents give an utterly false conception of an important equation. WILLIAM GRUEN

The Life of Veblen

Thorstein Veblen and His America. By Joseph Dorfman. The Viking Press. $3.75.

DURING his lifetime Thorstein Veblen was little known outside a small circle of friends and disciples. Until his fiftieth year he taught at the University of Chicago on a salary which never exceeded a thousand dollars. Subsequently he spent three years at Stanford, from which he was forced to resign as the result of a matrimonial scandal, and six years in the business school of the University of Missouri. He died, almost forgotton, three months before the Wall Street crash. During the six years which have elapsed since that event his books have, for the first time, begun to win popular recognition.

Thanks to Mr. Dorfman, we can now discover what kind of man Veblen was, how his ideas developed, and what was his relation to the intellectual life of his time. Mr. Dorfman has spent several years on this biography, and he tells us everything about Veblen's life which we need to know. It is not easy reading, any more than are Veblen's own books; it is packed too tightly with analyses of Veblen's ideas and with quotations from the writings of his contemporaries, and the material has not been sufficiently digested. But it is worth the effort involved, both as a portrait of one of the most eccentric characters who has ever adorned an American college campus and as a complete survey of the work of the most penetrating and realistic of American sociologists.

Veblen approached modern society with the detachment of an anthropologist studying a tribe of cannibals. His roots, as far as he had any, were in the agrarian radicalism of Minnesota, and the society which he studied was the society dominated by the trusts and the finance capitalism of the House of Morgan. During a period when almost every economist in America did obeisance to the "captains of industry" and devoted himself to proving that the laws of capitalist economics were the laws of God, Veblen was baring the criminal absurdities of the system with an insight which only Karl Marx has ever excelled. The basis of all his thinking was his distinction between industry and business. By industry he meant the actual productive apparatus, developed by the technicians and operated by the workers. These groups had little interest in or capacity for money-making; they were dominated by the instinct for workmanship, which was closely allied with those instincts making for the preservation of the race. Business, on the other hand, was a series of wasteful and more or less fraudulent devices by which the wealth created by the "underlying population" was diverted into the pockets of the capitalist class. The "absentee owners" who lived by the exploitation of industry resembled the feudal aristocracy and the other ruling classes of earlier times. Like the feudal lords, they were aggressive, "prehensile," and useless; like the feudal lords, they made use of religion and of other methods of propaganda to convince the classes who supported them that they deserved their privileged position; and, as Veblen demonstrated in the best-known of his books, the basis of most of their aesthetic and moral evaluations was their desire to show that they were exempt from the obligation to perform any useful labor. The class system of capitalism must eventually, Veblen believed, collapse as other class systems had done. As capitalization increased, as the interest charges which industry must pay grew larger and the consuming power of the workers grew smaller, as production was artificially restricted and prices raised in order that goods might be sold at a profit, the "absentee owners" would become a burden too heavy for society to carry. Even in normal times business could avoid depression only by "sabotage," by refusing to use the productive apparatus at anything like its full capacity and by colossal waste. Either the "underlying population" must take matters into their own hands and insist that industry be run for use instead of for profit, or the human race would be carried back, through militarism and feudalism, into the dark ages.

Veblen differed from Marx chiefly in the terms in which he formulated his hope of salvation. Marx looked mainly to the self-interest of the working classes, who would be organized by large-scale industry and who would be forced to become aware of their position by their increasing misery during the period of capitalist decline. Veblen had little confidence that the working class would ever acquire sufficient intelligence; all history, he felt, proved how easily the "underlying population" could be deceived by the ruling class. The main trouble, in his opinion, was that human ideas lagged so far behind economic realities; men lived in an age of technology, but they still thought in terms of medieval animism. A sane economic order would be achieved, if at all, when the human mind had become adapted to its new environment. The class which might most reasonably be expected to become contemporary in their thinking were the engineers, who were also the one class which, in modern society, was indispensable; and it was to them that Veblen looked for salvation. After the war he drafted a "memorandum for a Practicable Soviet of Technicians," in which he suggested that this class through a unanimous strike, could revolutionize society.

Confidence in the technicians is the distinctive characteristic of Veblenism as a separate school of thought. It is to be found, for example, in the technocrats, in Stuart Chase, and in George Soule, all of whom, with varying competency, are diluted Veblen; it is to be found in some of the economists attached to the New Deal. Undoubtedly a technicians' revolution would be considerably more painless and less destructive than a proletarian revolution; but, although one cannot before the event prove it to be wholly impossible, one can at least affirm that it is very improbable. Veblen himself was an excessively detached and unemotional person, and the chief deficiency in his social analysis was that he emphasized so exclusively the stupidity of the capitalist system. A technicians' revolution would be a revolution motivated not by the material necessities of those who organized it but by their instinct for workmanship, their dislike for waste and sabotage. Unfortunately, as Veblen himself realized in his more pessimistic moments, one cannot trust human beings to be intelligent; one cannot expect the "absentee owners" to agree without a struggle that they are an anachronism, nor will a mere demonstration that capitalism is absurd be enough to overthrow it. The driving force which is needed to effect revolutionary changes must be supplied by more elemental and forceful emotions, such as are to be found not among the salaried middle class but among the workers.

Veblen without Marx is apt, therefore, to result in a rather futile liberalism. Read in conjunction with Marx, however, he remains a singularly wise and far-seeing thinker. For American readers, in fact, who are more familiar with American finance capitalism and with American modes of thought than they are with the earlier European capitalism and with the European philosophies with which Marx was concerned, Veblen's books are probably the most congenial introduction to the revolutionary attitude. H. B. PARKES

Religion in Mexico

Chaos in Mexico. By Charles S. Macfarland. Harper and Brothers. $2.

WHEN Dr. Macfarland was collecting factual material in Mexico for his book, he succeeded, after considerable difficulty, in inducing "four factory or other manual workers" to tell him what the workers—the majority of Mexicans—thought about the church and the revolution's opposition to it. "From one after the other of them, he records, "I received the same reactions, although in some instances their emphases were different."

> Workers have no confidence in a state whose officials build palaces for their mistresses while the government itself proclaims the principles of communism. . . . Multitudes of workers see all this, but at the present time they do not dare resist, because the government . . . is in absolute control. Such workers sympathize with the church, often perhaps solely because they find the church in the same fix with themselves. . . . One of them said with a good deal of earnestness: "The church did give us some freedom. The church did teach us some high principles of morality. The church . . . was interested in us as human beings."
>
> When I put the direct questions to each of these men, Do you want the church put out of existence? Do you want Mexico to be an irreligious or an unreligious nation? Do you want religion entirely ruled out of teaching and education? the answers in each case were a ringing "No!"

These workmen unquestionably voiced the majority sentiment of their class, whether industrial toilers, craftsmen, or peasants. Their testimony disposes completely of the contention of government leaders that the revolution's anti-church and anti-religious crusade is demanded, hailed, and supported by the masses as a necessary means to their social and economic progress. It also indicates, in part at least, why the masses have declined to divorce themselves from the bosom of a church "which was interested in us as human beings" and to take refuge spiritually in the cold, impersonal, rationalistic, godless breast offered them by a political regime and philosophy by which, as one of the workers told Dr. Macfarland, they "have simply been enslaved." Mexican workers, like all others, respond to institutions that are more or less interested in them "as human beings," not solely as pawns upon a political chessboard.

Dr. Macfarland recently came away from Mexico with ample material of substantial and fundamental quality. This he compressed into a modest-sized book, in which there is scarcely a superfluous sentence. It is an invaluable and indispensable source document for those who require guidance amid the passionately asserted and interminable complications that beset one's path in a serious effort to arrive at a reasonably solid, correct, and practical basis for personal and independent judgment of the church question in Mexico. No one could strive to hold the scales more evenly than the author. Manifestly his Protestantism was not permitted to warp or bias his work or his writing. His industry as a fact-seeker is established by the extent of his stay and travels in Mexico and by the multitude of persons whom he interrogated.

But his judicial and temperate attitude does not prevent him from making the unequivocal statement in his conclusions that "the state is suppressing religious liberty" and that for Mexican officials to "reiterate denials is as disingenuous as it is inept." He presents evidence that the state "is anti-religious, rather than simply anti-clerical and anti-church."

Some partisans will seize upon as material for debate Dr. Macfarland's statement that "the government of Mexico, with all of its weaknesses, is undoubtedly far more earnest in its desire for social reform than its critics admit. The Roman church in Mexico, while in some ways still far from the realization of Christian ideals, has done more for the people of Mexico than the state will allow." On the whole, by drastic elimination of lengthy and confusing non-essentials the author has succeeded in supplying the necessary background for the reader's approach to the subject. ROBERT HAMMOND MURRAY

Class Education

The Social Ideas of American Educators. By Merle Curti. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

"THE Social Ideas of American Educators" by Professor Curti of Smith College is a book of much wider significance than its modest title implies. In its first part, dealing with conditions prior to the Civil War, it is virtually a brief and very trenchant history of American education up to that time; in its second and longer part, though this is mainly concerned with particular educational leaders, these themselves are shown to have conformed in their ideas and practice, for the most part, to the pattern of American education established at the outset. This pattern, as it was in the beginning, is now, and apparently ever shall be so long as the present order of society endures, is summed up by the author as "class education."

In New England, and in the rest of the colonies as well, colleges and Latin schools were created under the tutelage of the clergy as the best possible defense of state, church, and accumulated wealth, it being the accepted view, in the words of one of the educators of the day, that "commerce and riches depend on virtue and liberty, which again depend on knowledge and religion." Common schools were introduced to give a rudimentary instruction to the children of the poor, but the higher branches were open only to the well-to-do and the socially privileged. When free public schools came eventually in the wake of Jeffersonian and Jacksonian democracy, their chief proponents, Horace Mann and Henry Barnard, argued for them precisely on the ground that they would indoctrinate the masses with the duty of being contented in their lowlier lot, Barnard going so far as to insert a capitalist catechism such as this in his textbook, "Object Lessons":

Q. Suppose a capitalist in employing his capital makes large profits, would that harm the working man?

A. No. There would be more capital to pay wages.

Q. Are you sorry, then, that capitalists should have great profits?

A. Glad.

In the second part of his volume Professor Curti follows the method of case histories, giving brilliant biographical analyses of, among others, Booker T. Washington, whose highest ambition for the Negroes was to enable them to attain the position of white wage-slaves; the right-wing Hegelian, William T. Harris, who showed that "true individualism could be realized only by subordinating the individual to existing institutions"; the Catholic, Bishop Spalding, the gist of whose high-minded teaching was to minimize the importance of economic considerations for the workers; the "romantic individualist," G. Stanley Hall, with his extension of laissez faire to every field; William James, who praised habit as the preserver of class distinctions: all advocates of class interest while considering themselves "disinterested seekers after knowledge."

Professor Curti does not forget such rebels as Francis Wayland Parker, John Dewey (his chapter on Dewey is strangely unappreciative), and George S. Counts, whose efforts to change the goal of education from private profit to that of social welfare are duly recounted. One is left with the impression, however, in spite of a rather empty reconciliatory chapter in conclusion, that education will on the whole remain an agent of the ruling class. ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES

Shorter Notices

Asylum. By William C. Seabrook. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

Mr. Seabrook got so tired of drinking too much that he had himself committed to a sanitorium which somewhat unwillingly accepts alcoholics. Being a journalist with a penchant for the macabre, he naturally used his adventure as copy and the result is a remarkably lively and entertaining account both of his own case and of life in a well-known, easily recognizable institution for the treatment of mental disorders. Mr. Seabrook thinks that he took to drink because he would not face his inability to write quite as well as he wanted to and he has great respect for the methods of this particular sanitarium; but the book is interesting chiefly for its vivid picture of existence on the Magic Mountain provided for those not quite capable of facing life in the everyday world. The institution in question does not take cases recognized as incurable and restraint is reduced to the necessary minimum. Its inmates are treated less as dangerous characters than as naughty children and the general effect is that of something halfway between a country club and a very modern kindergarten. Mr. Seabrook writes with enormous gusto and just the right touch of ghastly humor.

Only the Fear. By Lenore G. Marshall. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

The theme of this first novel demands a more rational, shrewder presentation than Lenore Marshall has been able to devise for it. Her heroine, Gabriele Kirk, is a sexually immature young matron, whose complacent acceptance of her husband's embraces in no way interfered with a mental, rhapsodical love affair with a childhood dream-lover whom she called Ivan. The discovery of her husband's one casual infidelity unsettles the precarious balance of her double-edged life. In an amour with a rakish young doctor, she tries to recreate the Ivan romance, and, as her emotions pour into this fantasy, reality grows dim and insanity threatens. By what can only be described as an act of God, she is saved, brought back alive into the everyday world, and the ending is happy. Such a situation as this clearly cries out for clinical treatment; Lenore Marshall douses it with romance. Where one might expect detachment, analysis, scientific knowledge, even, perhaps, wit, Mrs. Marshall's story pours forth in a geyser of unreasoning emotion. The effect is undignified, somewhat silly. Unable to evaluate her own characters, herself caught in the tangle of their problems, the author seems as juvenile as her deluded heroine. When one adds to this lack of discrimination, an atrocious ear for dialogue, which allows Connecticut intellectuals to mouth the platitudes of half-educated adolescents, one must conclude that delicate sensibilities cannot, by themselves, turn an interesting case-history into a good novel.

Hedwig. By Vance Randolph. The Vanguard Press. $2.

By the simple device of permitting his heroine to tell her own story, in her own illiterate and honest way, Mr. Randolph manages to bring her vividly before us. It is the story of a simple-minded nature at the mercy of brute trickery; almost every man she meets, from her loutish husband down, takes advantage of Hedwig whose capacity for suffering seems to be equaled only by her inability to defend herself against it. Of the few men who are moderately kind to her, one is a gentle imbecile who finally shoots himself; another leaves her to go back to his wife; while the third is obviously not of her world and unable to stay for any length of time within it: the very sensibilities which cause him to treat her with an unaccustomed amount of consideration are those which eventually send him away. To their final parting, on which the book ends, Hedwig agrees with the same show of dull, animal-like forbearance which is her natural response to every situation. Mr. Randolph has both honesty and intelligence; he knows his characters, and he presents them with a certain degree of truth. Unfortunately—for he has chosen a subject which demands the utmost in artistic treatment—he lacks any kind of artistic sense. It is possible, for a time, to believe in Hedwig; but her appeal is limited rather than universal, her sufferings never excite more than a casual sympathy—more often than not, they are downright repulsive. One closes the book with a sense of relief, which is on no account to be confused with the kind of relief that follows an effect of terror and pity.

The Letters of Theodore Dwight Weld, Angelina Grimké Weld, and Sarah Grimké, 1822-1844. Edited by Gilbert H. Barnes and Dwight L. Dumond. D. Appleton and Company. Two Volumes. $10.

The American Historical Association has published two volumes of the Letters of Theodore Dwight Weld, his wife Angelina Grimké Weld, and Sarah Grimké, during the years 1822-1844. Theodore Weld was one of the less well-known leaders of the Abolition movement whom William Lloyd Garrison once described as "The lion-hearted, invincible Weld" (November 27, 1835). But his own modesty and dislike of leadership and responsibility kept him in the background. His wife and her sister were remarkable women, daughters of a Chief Justice of South Carolina, who were so horrified by slavery as they saw it at close range that they left South Carolina to join the ranks of the anti-slavery forces in the North. These letters are a substantial contribution to the history of the anti-slavery movement. It seems rather a pity, however, that one of the editors should have revived in the introduction the old controversy as to how much the Garrisonian Abolitionists and how much others accomplished. Here William Lloyd Garrison is written down, and the editors declare that Theodore Weld, the comparatively unknown, was "the greatest individual factor" in the triumph of the Abolition movement. Thus is history being rewritten! Just as in the past the laurels have been variously awarded to Wendell Phillips, James G. Burney, Gerrit Smith, John Quincy Adams, and various others.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 21, 1935 No. 3659

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 197

EDITORIALS:

The Tax Bill and the Tories 200
Boycott the Olympics! 201
The WPA Strike 201
A Warning to Roosevelt 202
ISSUES AND MEN. THE RAILROADS BEGIN TO PROGRESS.
By Oswald Garrison Villard 203
CARTOON: ON THE THRONE OF JUSTICE. By LOW . . . 204
THE ELKS SAVE AMERICA. By A. B. Magil 205
THE CRISIS OF THE MIDDLE CLASS. II. THE MIDDLE CLASS UNDER FASCISM. By Lewis Corey 207
BRITAIN TIGHTENS CONTROL IN INDIA. By T. A. Bisson 210
MOSCOW FROWNS ON ABORTIONS. By Louis Fischer . . . 212
RHODE ISLAND PROVES NOTHING. By Vernon C. Norton . 214
CORRESPONDENCE 215

LABOR AND INDUSTRY:

The Nation Index of Labor Welfare 216
The Pullman Porters Win. By Edward Berman 217
Not the Type. By Heywood Broun 218

BOOKS:

Young Gloom. By Mary McCarthy 220
Life of a Zero. By Charles Angoff 220
A Gentleman and His Personality. By Anita Brenner 221
Hermaphrodite. By Alice Beal Parsons 221
Professor Read's Thesis. By E. M. Benson 222
Prince Mirsky's Observations. By H. B. Parkes 222
Shorter Notices 224
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 224

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING CHARLES ANGOFF
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional. THREE WEEKS' NOTICE AND THE OLD ADDRESS AS WELL AS THE NEW ARE REQUIRED FOR CHANGE OF SUBSCRIBER'S ADDRESS.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by the Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

THE LAST-MINUTE reversal of the Senate Finance Committee, eliminating the proposed higher surtax rates on incomes of less than $1,000,000 and striking out the amendment reducing personal income-tax exemptions, destroys all hope that the pending tax bill might be converted into a genuine social measure. Reduction of the exemption, though it was criticized as a tax on the poor, would have had the effect of increasing taxation on the moderately well-to-do, who heretofore have failed to bear their share of the burden. Since even in 1929 three families out of five in the United States had incomes below $2,000, it is evident that the tax would have fallen on a favored few. If the amendment had been retained, a family of five with an earned income of $3,500 would still have paid no tax, while a family of six with an income of $5,000 would have paid only $36. Even more commendable was the proposal to start the surtax on a net income of $3,000 instead of $4,000, thus steepening the slope of the graduated tax. The rejection of the principle of the inheritance tax in favor of an increased levy on estates, on the other hand, is definitely reactionary and implies a solicitude for future heirs of great wealth which is wholly without social justification. In view of the fundamental conflict in principle between the proposals drawn up by the two houses, it is especially regrettable that Congress is determined to rush the bill through by August 24, the date now set for adjournment. Given time and strong Administration leadership, a sound system of taxation might have been evolved in place of the halfway measure recently adopted by the House of Representatives.

AT FIRST SIGHT the report of the national income for 1934 just issued by the Department of Commerce makes encouraging reading. National income paid out—as contrasted with national income produced—showed an increase of $5,000,000 over 1933 and $1,500,000 over 1932, a rise of 11 per cent in twelve months. The percentage of income paid for labor, including salaries, was slightly higher than in 1929, and considerably above the early years of the depression. But a somewhat closer examination is in order lest the Democratic Party be tempted to use these figures as proof of the success of the New Deal. It will be found, for example, that aggregate wages and salaries in all industries increased from $29,545,000,000 in 1932 to $30,815,000,000, in 1935—an advance of 4 per cent. During this same period, however, the cost of living in the United States, according to the most conservative estimate, rose 3 per cent, leaving a net gain to the working class of 1 per cent over the last days of the Hoover Administration. If allowance were made for the 1.6 per cent growth in population in the interval, the relative position of labor would be found to be slightly worse than in 1932, and the resulting figure would be almost identical with The Nation Index of Labor Welfare published elsewhere in this issue. If we compare the 1934 figures with those of 1929, the picture is even more distressing. Labor income has dropped 37 per cent as against a 20 per cent decline in the cost of living, while the population has increased 4 per cent. We suggest that both Democrats and Republicans look elsewhere for their campaign arguments.

IN HIS memorable speech of acceptance as Chancellor of Germany Hitler promised that unemployment in the Reich would be liquidated in four years. "Give me four years," he shouted, "and crucify me if by that time I have not lifted the nation out of its present deplorable condition." That was in 1933. January, 1937, is drawing uncomfortably close and Goebbels's propaganda factory is working overtime to prove that Hitler's words were not all wind. Thus the Berlin correspondent of the New York Times cabled the other day that the number of registered unemployed in the Reich has been decreased from 6,013,000 in January, 1933, to 1,754,000 on July 31, 1935. The Times correspondent reminds his readers of Hitler's four-year promise and quotes a statement recently made by Dr. Ley, chief of the German Labor Front, that the Führer's prediction will be fulfilled by the end of 1935. What are the facts? In 1934 the Nazi authorities struck 900,000 workers from the unemployed registers as "unemployable," and classified them as dole receivers instead. The Times correspondent himself reports that another half-million is to be similarly lopped off the lists this year. Approximately 900,000 women were ousted from their jobs as the result of Nazi propaganda against women in industry; their places were taken by former unemployed. Of these women, almost 400,000 married with the help of the dowry paid by the state. About 600,000 men entered the Reichswehr and the labor camps, while some 300,000 city workers were sent to the country by the famous Arbeitsdienst, where they are exploited unmercifully for the bounteous sum of fifty pfennigs a day. The expansion of the war and munitions industries, together with seasonal changes, accounts for the rest. That is the real story of reconstruction under Hitler, told without benefit of censor or Propaganda Ministry.

THE EXPECTED RESISTANCE to Premier Laval's deflationary program almost developed into an open revolutionary movement. Strikers in the naval arsenals at Brest, Toulon, Cherbourg, and Lorient paraded under red flags singing the "Internationale." Severe fighting between the police and strikers at Brest and Toulon led to the death of at least eight persons and the wounding of several hundred. A walkout on the French Line which tied up service for more than forty-eight hours was only settled after officials of the line had agreed to provide more work in order to maintain existing wages. While peace was eventually restored in all the disturbed centers by dint of minor concessions and compromises, the widespread resentment against the government's economy measures has not been appeased. Since the cost of living in Paris is only 3 per cent less than in 1926 after four years of severe deflation, no one seriously expects Laval to be successful in reducing it 10 per cent by means of a governmental edict. The rioting is ascribed to the influence of "professional agitators, hoodlums, and Communists," but the spontaneity and severity of the protest should serve to warn Laval of the fate of the man who sought to save Germany by "emergency decrees."

IN DENMARK fascism has recently waged and lost its first important battle. Under cover of an appeal for help sent by distressed farmers to the King, the Agrarian Association, known as the L. S., a group composed mainly of landowners and junkers, made an impudent attempt to force Christian X into an unconstitutional action against the Stauning government. To this end a "farmers' march" on Copenhagen was arranged for July 29. The leaders of the L. S. arrived in more than a thousand private cars, and 30,000 farmers and small tenants were brought to Copenhagen by ship and train to provide an impressive background at Amalienborg Palace for the King's reception of a deputation from the association. The political purpose of the "march," underlying its vaguely formulated economic grievances, was to drive a wedge between the sovereign and the government. King Christian's answer to the L. S. delegates was of impressive curtness: "I do not wish to refuse this deputation admittance, though the address it carries contains statements and claims on which I feel unable to express myself. As a constitutional king, I can only consider the people's lawfully elected representatives, so that I must ask the deputation to apply to the Prime Minister. . . ." Herr Stauning was present at the reception although the deputation had tried to keep him away. The royal speech was in fact Herr Stauning's own crushing retort to the agitators. That this was understood and resented was indicated by the clamorous demonstration against him which broke loose when Knud Bach, leader of the L. S. movement, came out to announce the results of the reception through the microphone. A feature of the "march" was the conspicuous presence of a Nazi wing, headed by Count Knuth, who is the right arm of Dr. Clausen, founder and chief of the Danish National Socialist Party.

THE COMMITTEE on academic freedom of the American Civil Liberties Union presents a disturbing report on the spread of loyalty-oath laws for teachers. In 1931 only six states had such laws, but since then fourteen more have passed them. The drive for these bills is increasing in vigor largely as a result of the agitation of the Hearst papers and the "allegedly patriotic societies," such as the Daughters of the American Revolution, the American Legion, the Elks, and the chambers of commerce. The bills are part of a program to hamper the expression of all nonconformist opinion in the schools, the colleges, and the press. The "patriotic" virus has entered even the federal courts, as the Krumbein case, commented upon in The Nation last week, amply shows.

IN SHARP AND HAPPY CONTRAST to this new development of "Americanism" is the anti-race-discrimination bill recently signed by Governor Earle of Pennsylvania. The law states specifically that there shall be no discrimination "because of race, creed, or color" in these places: inns, taverns, roadhouses, hotels, restaurants, buffets, saloons, bar-rooms, ice-cream parlors, confectionaries, soda fountains, drugstores, dispensaries, clinics, hospitals, bathhouses, theaters, motion-picture houses, airdromes, roof gardens, music halls, race courses, skating rinks, amusement and recreation parks, fairs, bowling alleys, gymnasiums, shooting galleries, billiard and pool parlors, public libraries, kindergartens, primary and secondary schools, high schools, academies, colleges and universities, garages, and all public conveyances. The bill is plainly in line with the best traditions of our history, but it is reported that the hotel men of Pennsylvania plan to attack its constitutionality.

THE CHURCHMAN, liberal Episcopal weekly, was a pioneer in the movement against indecent films. Its fight has been waged with vigor and intelligence—not prudery. It has steadily opposed censorship and directed its attack at the economic roots of the movie industry in the office of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors and their czar, Will Hays. In the course of an article on the tyranny exercised by the "motion-picture trust" over exhibitors, it was stated that "Will H. Hays, Adolph Zukor, Gabriel Hess, Charles C. Pettijohn, and numbers of other individuals and film producers have been indicted in the Province of Ontario for conspiring to prevent competition in that portion of Canada." The statement, taken from Harrison's Reports, was inaccurate and the Churchman immediately published an apology and retraction. But Mr. Hess, general attorney of Mr. Hays's office, sued, and the suit has been pressed through one court after another until in June of this year the Supreme Court in New York awarded a verdict of $10,000 punitive damages and $200 compensatory damages against the Churchman and the Reverend Guy Emery Shipler, its editor. The refusal of the plaintiff to accept the Churchman's retraction reveals an unrelenting enmity on the part of the Hays office that must be gratifying to Mr. Shipler. But it is an expensive form of tribute. Unless the decision is reversed, the Churchman must raise $10,200—a large sum for a liberal weekly. For a time it was doubtful whether the Churchman could survive the verdict, but the religious press of the country rallied to the defense and has opened its columns to appeals for funds. Opinion may vary as to the responsibility of the movies for juvenile delinquency, but no such doubt should cloud anyone's belief that a journal of unquestioned integrity and courage should be saved from extinction at the hands of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors.

APPARENTLY UNAWARE of the beneficent effects of Japanese "law and order," Manchurian bandits have indulged in a series of outbreaks unprecedented for daring and savagery. The attacks are particularly significant not only as evidence of Japan's utter inability to subjugate the major portion of the countryside but as an indication of the growing severity of the region's economic crisis. In this both nature and the Japanese appear to have taken a hand. An official report of the South Manchuria Railway estimates that crops will be 40 per cent below normal this season and indicates a serious drop in the supply of livestock. Add to this increased taxes and the economic ravages of a government-sponsored drug trade, and it is scarcely surprising that thousands are being forced into brigandage. While there is doubtless an element of truth in the Japanese charge that Chinese patriotic organizations have furnished arms and ammunition to certain bands of outlaws, police records show a substantial part of the contraband to have been furnished by Japanese smugglers. The bright side of the picture is that Japan is unlikely to attack the Soviet Union as long as Manchuria remains in turmoil.

THE SECOND REPORT of Mayor LaGuardia's committee investigating the Harlem riot of March 19 deals almost entirely with the police situation. It was made by a subcommittee headed by Arthur Garfield Hays. The committee found that the outburst was not a race riot, that it was "spontaneous and unpremeditated," and that it "was the result of a highly emotional situation among the colored people of Harlem due in large part to the nervous strain of years of unemployment and insecurity." Further, the charge that the riot was instigated by Communists was found to be untrue, "though they sought to profit by it." The committee is especially severe in its comment upon the Harlem police, saying, "It is a grave state of affairs when the inhabitants of a large section of the city have come to look upon the men in police uniforms as lawless oppressors who stop at no brutality or at the taking of human life." The report lists several instances of police brutality in Harlem, stressing the case of Thomas Aiken, who was accidentally pulled out of a line waiting for relief food and so severely beaten by the police that one of his eyes had to be removed. It continues: "It is indefensibly bad police work when two armed police officers cannot arrest an unarmed man in broad daylight in a public building without beating him up and gouging out an eye." The committee recommends the prompt prosecution of the offenders in all cases of police brutality and also the formation of a committee made up of Harlem residents of both races to whom instances of such behavior might be reported.

THE CRADLE OF LIBERTY is lurching badly. Clifford Odets's play, "Waiting for Lefty," which has come to be a device for testing the degree of free speech allowed in American communities, has been denied the privileges of the Town Hall in Provincetown, Massachusetts; the selectmen of the same town had previously denied the use of the hall for an anti-war meeting because they suspected that the Communists were promoting the affair. So far 700 names have been signed to a petition protesting against these suppressions and one of the summer residents has suggested that if the selectmen are consistent they should tear down the tablet in the Town Hall commemorating the Mayflower compact which was drawn up in Provincetown harbor in 1620 by forty-one men who had fled the Old World to seek freedom in the New. Needless to say, the Board of Trade indorsed the action of the selectmen, who allowed as how Cape Cod is too conservative for "reds and agitators." (They also threatened to punish the 700 petitioners by publishing their names in the newspapers, which would indicate that Cape Cod is cut off from the realities of American life in more ways than one.) Like many another set of local authorities, the selectmen of Provincetown are determined to protect the cradle of American liberty from reds and agitators even if they have to throw out cradle, baby, and all. In the face of this tendency we are glad to hear that the Town Counsel of Plymouth, Massachusetts, has ruled that the Rock is the property of all American citizens. The issue is somewhat clouded, however, by the fact that the ruling was handed down in behalf of the owner of a tourist home who contended that he had a right to solicit customers in the vicinity of the famous relic. We shall feel more reassured when we hear of a production of "Waiting for Lefty" at Plymouth Rock.

WE AGREE in general with Lawrence Cramer, the new governor of the Virgin Islands, that you can't solve the problems of the world by taking your clothes off. But while we do not believe that you can solve all of the problems by taking all of your clothes off all of the time, we do believe that you can solve some of the problems by taking some of your clothes off some of the time. And we are glad that Magistrate Hulan Capshaw of Jefferson Market Court in New York City agrees with us. We refer to the case of David Alper, of the Bronx, who attempted to solve the problem of heat in New York by taking off his coat and got arrested for entering the Fashion Center Building in his shirtsleeves. This was not the charge brought against him; it never is. Mr. Alper was arrested for disorderly conduct, but we do not have to consult the American Civil Liberties Union or the I. L. D. to know that he was really arrested because of his opinions. He dared to disagree with the owners of the Fashion Center Building, who think men ought to wear coats. Magistrate Capshaw upheld the freedom of dress in a decision that will bear quotation—it could also stand a little punctuation and editing. "The custom in hot weather in New York City," he said, "has been so prevalent of men going around without coats that we have come to its acceptance as a common and proper method of dress."

The Tax Bill and the Tories

NO measure proposed by the Roosevelt Administration has been subjected to a more bitter attack from the right than the tax bill. The opening gun was fired on the day the Senate took up consideration of the bill by Dr. Benjamin M. Anderson, economist of the Chase National Bank, known as a diehard proponent of laissez faire. Two days later, representatives of the United States Chamber of Commerce echoed Dr. Anderson's criticisms before the Senate Finance Committee. Largely as a result of this criticism the inheritance tax provided in the House bill has been replaced in the Senate committee by an increased estate levy which does not fall so heavily on the ultra-wealthy, and the point at which the increased surtaxes on incomes are to begin has been raised from $50,000 to $1,000,000.

While a large part of the opposition to the Administration's tax program may be dismissed as a frantic effort on the part of a few wealthy individuals to escape the burden of taxation, certain of the objections presented by the orthodox economists are at least worthy of serious consideration. Boiled down to essentials the conservative's case against the House bill rests on the following four points: (1) that the principle of a graduated corporation tax based on the size of the company attacks the very foundations of industrial efficiency; (2) that the collection of the inheritance taxes will necessitate the forced liquidation of many great estates with detrimental effect on important business enterprises; (3) that increased taxation will strike a blow at initiative and enterprise, and eliminate an important source of business capital; and (4) that the proposed rates are so high as to be confiscatory.

On the first point the criticisms of economists and business men are essentially sound. There is no justification for a tax on bigness as such, and the attempt to impose such a levy is uncomfortably reminiscent of Nazi economics. Protection against profiteering and monopoly, in so far as it can be achieved through taxation, can best be provided by radically stepping up the excess-profits tax. Abandonment of this particular section of the tax bill would involve no violation of the principles of social taxation and would make very little difference as far as the amount of revenue is concerned.

In picturing the dangers of the forced liquidation of great estates, the tory interests played up the theoretical effect of the House bill on the Ford properties. Senator Vandenberg declared, for example, that the proposed inheritance tax, on top of existing estate duties, would take approximately $27,000,000 of Henry Ford's $300,000,000 interest in the Ford Motor Company. To pay this levy it would be necessary, he contends, either to turn the company over to the government (heaven forbid!) or to sell shares on the market, in which case the ownership and control would fall into the hands of Wall Street. The sudden forced liquidation of this company, it is further argued, not only would cause a huge loss to the estate but would endanger the efficient operation of one of America's largest industries. In response to this charge Robert H. Jackson, counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, pointed out that Edsel Ford, the probable recipient of the estate, already owns 41½ per cent of the stock of the Ford Motor Company, and that this share—worth approximately $250,000,000—would not be touched by the proposed legislation. Thus at most Edsel Ford would part with approximately one-half of the tremendous fortune that is his by virtue of being the son of one of the pioneers of the automobile industry; and his control over the policies of the company would probably not be endangered. Family ownership of a great industrial enterprise, moreover, is admittedly an anachronism. Henry Ford will probably go down in history as the last great entrepreneur of the type glorified by the classical economists. Even in the case of the Standard Oil Company, where family interests are unusually large, the Rockefeller holdings are greatly outweighed by those of others. The Senate bill seems to be designed primarily to aid the impoverished Fords.

Just how much the forced liquidation of a large estate would depress the real-estate and security markets depends, of course, on the general economic outlook at the time of liquidation. But under no circumstances would there be destruction of real wealth. Factories, bridges, and machinery would remain, though their ownership might change. At worst such a loss would have the effect of an additional tax falling upon those who are fully able to bear it. Tales of widows and orphans being left to face the world penniless because of the combined effect of heavy taxes and depreciated values are told with a deliberate intent to deceive. In the House bill no taxes at all are levied on the first $50,000, while the combined federal estate tax, state impost, and proposed inheritance levy on the first $200,000 is less than $37,500. Even inheritances of this size are, we believe, against the best interests of society.

In declaring that increased taxation will tend to check economic progress in the United States, conservative economists have assumed that the savings of wealthy men are automatically transformed into capital goods and thus increase the productive power of the country. Recent investigations made by the Brookings Institution have revealed, however, that under modern conditions there is very little connection between savings and investment, and that the tendency of the wealthy to oversave is responsible for the present maladjustment in our economic structure. If this conclusion be accurate, recovery and economic stability are dependent on the breaking up of great fortunes and the redistribution of wealth in such a way as to assure the maintenance of a steady flow of purchasing power to the great masses of the population. The Administration's program is at best but a feeble step in this direction.

Regarding the cry of confiscation little need be said. All taxation is in a sense confiscatory. The only choice before us, as Mr. Jackson pointed out, is which economic group shall pay the cost of the depression. With sales taxes in force in a large number of states and with the so-called nuisance taxes growing, we can be assured that the masses will continue to bear the largest share of the burden of taxation. The immediate issue is whether the wealthy groups can be compelled against their will to assume at least a part of this burden.

Boycott the Olympics!

WE can imagine no more effective method of expressing popular disapproval of Nazi Schrecklichkeit than a widespread boycott of the Olympic games at Berlin. Most boycotts have a way of showering their effects upon the just and unjust alike. But a boycott of the Olympics would hurt only the Nazis and their loyal followers; it would injure no Jew or Catholic or "uncoordinated" Protestant. And it would constitute a reproof which would echo throughout the world and even penetrate the sound-proofed barricade of the Nazi censorship.

It would be too much to expect the International Olympic Committee spontaneously to cancel the arrangements to hold the games in Berlin. Indeed, the various national committees will doubtless refuse, as Avery Brundage, chairman of the American committee, has already done, to withdraw their teams unless they are forced to by overwhelming pressure. But sentiment for such a move is growing as the true situation in the Third Reich becomes more widely understood. Already the Commonweal, leading Catholic weekly, has called upon all Catholic athletes to refuse to compete in the games if they are held at Berlin. The Christian Century, a liberal Protestant organ, has demanded that the games be held in some other country. Great mass-meetings in Boston and New York have unanimously adopted resolutions urging the Amateur Athletic Union to refuse to certify its athletes for participation in the Olympics. Various prominent individuals, such as Jeremiah T. Mahoney, head of the A. A. U. and member of the American Olympic Committee, have taken the same attitude. But so far Mr. Brundage stands pat, choosing to accept without scrutiny the German position that in the selection of its team neither race nor creed nor color has had any weight. Hans von Tschammer und Osten, Nazi sport dictator, is quoted in the New York Times of August 12 as saying: "Every athlete in Germany has an opportunity for training. Those who had the best records were selected for our team. Jewish students have a special training camp at Ettlingen where they enjoy all privileges." That is the official claim. The facts that lie behind it are different, and are detailed in a long dispatch to the Times by Frederick T. Birchall, printed in the column next to the statement quoted above. The German team in the Olympiad, says Mr. Birchall, will be a "political" team, entirely under Nazi control and probably wholly Nazi in complexion. Theoretically, anyone, even a Jew, might be a member. In practice this is wholly unlikely unless a Jew is included as a matter of expediency. Mr. Birchall cites the case of Greta Bergmann, one of the few first-rank Jewish athletes remaining in Germany. Miss Bergmann was excluded from a national contest held in preparation for the Olympics "not because she was Jewish but because she was not a member of the coordinated German Light Athletic Association," in charge of the meet. "Nor could she be a member because of her ancestry." As for the special Jewish training camp, a joker lurks in the bushes there, too. It was a segregated camp opened to certain limited groups of Jewish athletes—war veterans and some students—for a training period of three weeks, which period "matched the ratio borne by the number of Jews in Germany to the total German population." The further psychological factors hampering the development of Jewish athletes are too obvious to detail.

Recent repressive acts have weighed almost as heavily on the Catholics and on certain Protestant groups as on the Jews—but with an important difference. The Catholic and Protestant youth societies have either been disbanded or forced to give up their sport activities. But their members may join the Nazi sport organizations if they choose. In Bavaria, it is said, most of the young Catholic athletes have become thus "coordinated." But where the feeling runs high many thousands of boys have refused to yield and are consequently shut out of all opportunity for athletic training.

The simple truth is that, despite official protestations, sport is no more free in Germany than are speech and political activity. Interested groups of Americans should bend every effort to draw our teams out of the games. A boycott of the Olympics would touch the Nazi government in two very tender spots—its prestige and its pocket-book.

The WPA Strike

AMERICAN labor is being sold down the river again by the gentleman in the White House, who is smiling but firm as he makes it clear that skilled workers can take half their usual wage rate or go hungry. Meanwhile his head overseer, General Johnson, has told the workers, with all the gusto of a man-eating shark, that it won't hurt much, that they are misguided children, that the Communists are trying to seduce the American Federation of Labor, that he himself is one of the greatest champions of labor's rights, that their families will starve if they don't take a cut in wage rates, and that it will have no effect on wages in general. He also intimated that he had been sent to New York because the Administration anticipated the present strike situation.

There is no doubt, of course, that the government can break any strike of relief workers that is likely to develop. The Administration could be defeated only by a resistance so widespread and solid as to make it politically advisable for it to yield. The fact that the new attack on living standards is centered on the wage rates of the aristocracy of labor, the building-trades workers, means that the American Federation of Labor bureaucracy is hit literally where it lives. For that reason it might be expected to put up the fight of its life in an attempt not only to preserve the rates of its skilled members but also establish its leadership over labor as a whole, both organized and unorganized, both employed and unemployed. But William Green from his deck chair in Atlantic City promptly disowned the WPA strike. "These conditions," he said, "rest entirely in the hands of the various international unions. Each of the internationals must handle their troubles themselves. Each has full authority to deal with all matters of wages and hours where their members are affected. The executive council of the federation has no authority to take any action." He later issued a statement in which he predicted the WPA strike would spread, deplored such strikes, and recommended that to avoid them all WPA building projects be transferred to the PWA, which maintains the prevailing wage. "We told Congress," said Mr. Green when the strike began, "just what would happen if they failed to insert the clause calling for prevailing wage scales. . . . All this trouble has taken place just as we predicted it would." He might have added that the Administration proceeded with its "security" wage, safe in the knowledge that it need expect no "trouble" from the A. F. of L. leadership. On the contrary it can always count on support from such deck-chair labor leaders as Major George L. Berry of the pressmen's union, who told reporters that he regarded General Johnson's position as sound and added, "I have confidence in the building-trades workers' ability to realize the importance of maintaining at this time the greatest possible degree of tranquillity."

In New York George Meany, president of the State Federation of Labor, who has so far been the principal and most aggressive spokesman of the strikers, maintains that the strike will tie up all WPA work in the city because building-trades workers "are just not going to work for a wage scale that would break down standards we have worked fifty years to build up." Yet both he and Joseph P. Ryan, president of the Central Trades and Labor Council but much better known for his sabotage of the San Francisco strike, showed little enthusiasm for cooperation with groups who wish to join with the A. F. of L. unions in combating the "security" wage. Mr. Ryan, like General Johnson, is more afraid of the Communist influence, alleged to be strong in those groups, than of a new wage scale. Fortunately the strike committee headed by Thomas Murray is less fearful and has arrived at a working agreement with some though not all of these groups.

As we write, it is impossible to judge the extent of the strike and the direction it will take. But one thing has become clear. Mr. Roosevelt, whether he wishes it or not, has emerged as the leader in the attack on living standards—the discredited device of capitalism for getting out of a depression—and he is prepared to enforce his "security" wage even if he has to fill the place of the strikers, whom he naturally prefers to call "men who returned to their homes," with strike-breakers recruited from the relief rolls.

A Warning to Roosevelt

NO one should be deluded by the delirious Republican cheers over the Rhode Island Congressional election or by the New York Herald Tribune's announcement that it is "the beginning of the end." As the analysis of the election we print on another page shows, various motives entered into the result and those who were supposed to be battling for the New Deal showed only a dubious loyalty to it—if that. The Republicans who are now so jubilant had better recall the fact that they have neither a candidate nor an alternative platform; that shrieking that the Constitution is endangered and that Mr. Roosevelt has broken his campaign pledges—what President has not?—will not by itself defeat him.

Yet we would not deny that there was a profound warning to the President in the Rhode Island vote. The loss of a seat by 13,000 which was captured by 21,000 only nine months ago cannot be attributed wholly to local causes. Nor can it be denied that in the East at least there is a marked drift away from the President, especially among those who have come to believe that his policies are endangering the nation's welfare instead of aiding it. The growing labor unrest cannot but affect unfavorably the party in power. Labor is sore, and with reason. It was promised a revolutionary change in its status by the NRA, only to have the benefits denied in practice. The tide of Mr. Roosevelt's popularity has receded amazingly since his overwhelming success at the polls nine months ago, quite sufficiently to give an excuse for the often-repeated saying that "the President seems to have a rare talent for snatching defeat out of victory."

How much farther it will recede in the coming fifteen months before the election depends in largest degree upon the President himself. He should personally take to heart the warning conveyed by the Rhode Island vote. It may well be, as he assured the press, that he did not know of the election until he read the results in the newspapers. But that should not keep him from pondering long and deeply over the figures, or from asking others than his immediate, and necessarily sycophantic, entourage just how he and his Administration stand before the public. Especially should he inquire among those liberals who, however great their misgivings, endeavor to give full support to the really progressive steps taken by the New Dealers.

Were we asked to offer advice, we should beg him to eschew politics. No man ever had less excuse for playing the political game than he after his unparalleled triumph of last November. That was an unprecedented vote of confidence. Yet he went on in the same old way. The Postmaster General continued to function as national chairman of the Democratic Party and as state chairman in New York. Patronage was still withheld or awarded with a view to political pressure—we have just seen the incredible appointment as Minister to Norway of a man stamped by an American court as a faithless trustee of other people's money. We should point out to him that his whole Administration is rightly criticized and seriously endangered because of his refusal to state his real objective, to chart his course not only so that he who runs may read but so that his own subordinates may know that his direction will not be changed to suit every shifting political wind.

To put it in a few words—the details would fill pages—the President is failing because of his habitual policy of compromise. He is failing because he is true neither to the best that is in himself nor to his own program. He need not be dismayed by charges that he has gone socialist and communist, but he may well be alarmed by the frequent administrative disorganization and inefficiency in Washington, which, again, are largely to be explained by his own failure to steer a straight course. As for Congress, the President need not berate that body or charge it too strongly with disregard of his wishes. No Congress ever had more asked of it, or gave more, unless it were his first. But any Congress might well be expected to revolt when the President puts out casual feelers, like his recent tax proposals, and then suddenly makes up his mind and demands their approval overnight. These, as well as the absence of economic recovery, are some of the reasons which are leading so many voters to say: "Well, the President has had his chance and has not saved us after all."

Burlingame Public Library

Issues and Men

The Railroads Begin to Progress

It is good news that the leading railroads have not been able to agree on a united opposition to the proposed reduction in Eastern passenger fares and that these changes may be forced through by the Interstate Commerce Commission in advance of any hearings on the proposal, which is in fact a plan suggested by the Baltimore and Ohio. The New York Central and the Pennsylvania have also seen the handwriting on the wall and are ready for fare reductions, but feel that they should not be as great as those suggested by Irving L. Koch, an examiner for the commission, whose report to his superiors started the ball rolling. Mr. Koch urges a three-cent rate for Pullman travel and a two-cent rate for coach transportation, with a return-trip rate, suggested by the Baltimore and Ohio of 2.5 cents a mile for Pullman passengers and 1.8 cents for coach passengers. At last! It has been perfectly obvious for a long time that there was only one way in which the railroads could hope to win back some of the business lost to the private motor and the bus, namely, by reducing fares and radically improving the service. With the aid of the federal government they have been able to build new, fast, streamlined trains with remarkable results. More than that, faced with this competition among trains, they have found they could greatly speed up old-fashioned trains to compete with the new fliers. After seventy years these representatives of American enterprise and of the efficiency of private capitalistic management have even discovered that there are ways of improving the historic day-coach, which they have continued to build in one pattern as if ingenuity in this field were utterly exhausted.

That the outlook for them is gloomy enough admits of no doubt. There have been more railroad bankruptcies during this crisis than in any other in our history. Ever since last fall earnings have begun to go down again. The reports of Class 1 railroads for June show that they suffered a net loss of $3,400,000 as against a net gain of $5,869,000 in June, 1934. Their net loss for the first half of this year will probably be no less than $60,000,000 as against a $24,853,000 loss a year ago. The only encouraging thing is that two years ago the net loss was $101,204,000. Obviously the railroads continue to be a great stumbling-block to national recovery. Employment is just one-half of what it was in 1920 and the reduction in employees since 1929 has been no less than 600,000 men, leaving the total number employed at only 1,000,000. Joseph B. Eastman, the Coordinator of Railroads, has just reported, moreover, that 150,000 railroad workers are working for a basic pay of less than 35 cents an hour while some 17,000 men, whose cases were studied, are receiving only 20 cents an hour. Mr. Eastman also reports that a substantial number of employees are working twelve hours a day seven days a week—an intolerable state of affairs. Something radical must be done; yet the railroads have hesitated to move although their chief competitors, the auto and truck manufacturers, have steadily sought to meet the depression by producing better cars at much lower prices. The railway men have usually been concerned only to take off as many trains and abandon as many branch lines as possible, to lay off as many employees as they could and then to make the welkin ring with their complaints of government competition with their business and the refusal of Congress to regulate their competitors on land and water. Here, it is true, they have a substantial grievance, for Congress has not yet passed the bill, urged both by the President and Mr. Eastman, for the regulation of trucks, buses, and river and coastwise steamships.

While it must be perfectly plain to the unbiased that eventually government ownership of all the railroads is absolutely inevitable—Senator Wheeler has introduced an excellent bill in the Senate to bring it about—the results of the new methods are well worth the most careful study. Wherever trains have been speeded up, the financial outcome has been most striking. Thus, the Alton reports an increase of 25 per cent in passenger travel as a result of the 5½ hour trains between Chicago and St. Louis with no loss in night travel. Its competitors, the Wabash, the Chicago and Eastern Illinois, and the Illinois Central, all report increased traffic, the Wabash and the Eastern Illinois each winning no less than 60 per cent increase in June over May when the fast schedules were not yet in force. For the first twenty-five days in June the new streamlined Zephyr trains on the Burlington, which make four daily trips between St. Paul and Minneapolis and Chicago, carried between 310 and 325 passengers a day out of a total capacity of 352, and business between these cities as a whole showed an increase of 64 per cent in north-bound and 56 per cent in south-bound traffic. The Hiawatha of the Milwaukee road, which competes with the Zephyrs between Chicago and the Twin Cities, is an old-fashioned train, but it has had a remarkable success. Instead of using five cars it has to run seven and in June carried an average of 552 passengers on its round trip. One day it carried 500 passengers on its north-bound run and 408 on its south-bound trip. Business in the second half of the month was 23 per cent greater than in the first half. The Hiawatha is reported to run between 90 and 100 miles an hour for a good part of the trip. It is interesting to note that the roadbeds have everywhere proved adequate to the new speeds, but the swaying of the trains still needs the attention of the engineers.

There remains the question of railroad reorganization. Here everything is still in flux, and the Senate on May 20 last passed a resolution calling for a thorough investigation of the status of the railroads. That we shall get a great deal of additional knowledge and light upon the question of reorganization and regrouping of the roads admits of no doubt. But the main outlines of the problem are as clear as is the eventual solution.

Oswald Garrison Villard

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

A Cartoon by LOW

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND ORDER
SEE NO ABYSSINIA
HEAR NO ABYSSINIA
SPEA NO ABYSSI
LOW

ON THE THRONE OF JUSTICE.

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press

Burlingame Public Library Burlingame, Cal.

The Elks Save America

By A. B. MAGIL

WHEN Michael F. Shannon, Grand Exalted Ruler of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, turned over the reins of office to his successor, Justice James T. Hallinan, of the New York State Supreme Court, at the organization's annual Grand Lodge convention held July 15-18 in Columbus, Ohio, he brought to a close an administration that marked the emergence of the Elks from a mere fraternal order into an active factor in the political life of the country.

It was on July 17, 1934, in his acceptance speech at the last convention in Kansas City, that Mr. Shannon launched his "Pro-America" campaign. "Scattered throughout every section of the land," he told his brother Elks, "are groups who regard themselves as members of combat forces, prepared and anxious for the ultimate of violence, a violence which they hope to bring about by mob excitation. To the harangue of the gutter Communists has been added the voices of teachers in schools and high schools and colleges—a small percentage of the whole, but great in the aggregate and constituting the most vicious influence in American life today."

Mr. Shannon cited startling facts concerning the ramifications of the red network and, as a shiver ran through his audience, announced: "We are now meeting in Communist District Number 10."

"The time has arrived in America," thundered the Grand Exalted Ruler, "when the issue is, 'Shall it be the Stars and Stripes of the United States of America, or shall it be the red flag of the Communist International?' This is no longer the time to merely talk our devotion to the flag and the institutions for which it stands—it is time to act our love of country. Will you, my brothers, join with me in a dedication of this order and its every lodge to a year of militant patriotism?"

Just what he meant by "act our love of country" Mr. Shannon indicated a few minutes later: "The police departments and sheriffs' offices of the country are the first line of physical defense. When they do their duty, let them have the encouragement that is their due. Go farther, and give them every assistance that they can use and want within the law."

To Mr. Shannon all this was no academic question. At the very moment that he spoke the reds in his home state of California had captured San Francisco through the general strike, organized, he knew, on instructions from Moscow, and were planning to set up Soviets all over California and perhaps at points east. Mr. Shannon met the challenge and issued what the Elks' Magazine of August, 1934, described as "a clarion call to arms against the red rabble."

The chief of the Elks lost no time in translating words into deeds. On August 11 he held a conference at the Hotel Traymore, Atlantic City, with district deputies of surrounding states, where the details of the "Pro-America" campaign were worked out. Other conferences were held. With talks before lodges where the "Pro-America" zeal showed signs of flagging, with sponsorship of anti-labor gag bills, with appearances before the Dickstein Committee on Un-American Activities, and with participation in the immortal galaxy of fifty-six outstanding Tories of 1935 who signed Mr. Hearst's new "Declaration of Independence," Michael F. Shannon cut a wide swath.

The "Pro-America" campaign, backed by the Hearst press and conducted in cooperation with the leaders of the American Legion, the Junior Chamber of Commerce, the Daughters of the American Revolution, and similar groups, bore fruit in the form of a variety of bills introduced in state legislatures and in Congress designed to suppress "subversive activities and propaganda," to outlaw the Communist Party, and to deport "undesirable aliens"—all the patriotic little acorns ready to begin growing into sturdy fascist oakhood.

Mr. Shannon, son of a police officer, is an ambitious Los Angeles lawyer-politician, and has been an active Elk for twenty-five years. He has served as deputy city attorney and was deputy district attorney of Los Angeles under the reactionary John Fredericks. Fredericks is the man who, as special prosecutor, sent the McNamara brothers to jail in 1910 in one of America's most famous labor trials. Shannon has represented oil interests in the Kettleman Hills oil field in California, and recently appeared for the executor of the Willard Van Brunt estate, one of the largest estates probated in that section for many months.

It would be naive to suppose that the "Pro-America" campaign was merely the result of Shannon's personal prejudices. On the contrary, there is reason to assume that his selection as national head of the Elks was dictated by his special qualifications as a red-baiter. On December 18 Shannon appeared before the Dickstein committee. He went through the whole litany of crimes of the reds and urged the use of "intelligent and lawful federal force" to forestall a Communist revolution. He concluded by presenting his eight-point "Pro-America" program. It calls for strengthening of the espionage activities of the Department of Justice, outlawing of organizations and imprisonment of individuals that "advocate" overthrow of the government by force and violence, suppression of publications alleged to advocate such doctrine, deportation of alien reds and revocation of citizenship of naturalized aliens, and more stringent immigration laws to prevent the entry of radicals.

During the next few months the Elks anti-red drive was speeded up. It centered around a campaign for signatures to petitions in support of the eight-point program. Some of the individual lodges—though by no means all—showed exemplary zeal. Thus the May, 1935, issue of the Elks' Magazine reports:

> Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, Lodge, No. 191, was recently commended by the Bethlehem Chamber of Commerce for the stand it has taken regarding the circulation of Grand Exalted Ruler Shannon's petition for signatures looking to the arrest of any citizen or alien advocating > the overthrow of the government. The directors were pleased that the eight-point legislative program of the Elks, as contained in the communication, was along the lines of a pamphlet sent out by the trade body to its members.

In other words, the Steel Trust approves.

In January Mr. and Mrs. John E. Waters, back from two years in the U. S. S. R., began a six months' lecture tour, speaking on Soviet Russia for the Elks. The Waters's had somehow been overlooked by William Randolph Hearst, but they had seen fully as many terrible things as Thomas Walker, Harry Lang, Andrew Smith, and Fred Beal.

On February 15 and 16 a two-day conference on the "Pro-America" campaign was held at the Hotel Commodore, New York. Supreme Court Justice James T. Hallinan, whose candidacy for the office of Grand Exalted Ruler had already been announced, was guest of honor. Speakers included Supreme Court Justice Ferdinand Pecora, who was then Exalted Ruler of New York Lodge Number 1; Lieutenant-Governor William Bray, also an Elk; Daniel E. Kerr, president of the New York State Elks; and Shannon.

Bills in the spirit of the eight-point program were sponsored in state after state. In California no less than eight of them, backed by the Elks, were introduced in the legislature. There the Masons were inspired to start a similar drive. In Michigan Frank G. Mitzel, vice-president of the state Elks, appeared at an open hearing to urge enactment of one of the most drastic of the gag measures, the Dunckel bill. Among those whom he had for company was Harry A. Jung, head of a labor-spy and anti-Semitic outfit known as the American Vigilant Intelligence Federation. In a number of states Mr. Shannon and his fellow-crusaders for fascism succeeded in enacting gag bills into law.

The high point of the "Pro-America" campaign was the formal presentation to Congress on March 26 of petitions, bearing, it is claimed, hundreds of thousands of signatures, urging the enactment of Shannon's eight-point program. This patriotic descendant of once-undesirable aliens led a band of crusaders to Washington for the presentation ceremonies, which took place on the Capitol steps in the presence of the 302 Senators and Representatives who are members or former members of the Elks. The Grand Exalted Ruler made a speech in which he invoked the names of Jefferson and Lincoln, both of whom would be thrown into jail under his eight-point program. Vice-President Garner and Speaker Byrns—both Elks—replied for the Senate and House respectively.

When Congress opened that day, Representative R. A. Green, a member of Lodge Number 990, Gainesville, Florida, of the B.P.O.E., citing the stirring ceremonies that had been concluded only a few minutes before, introduced his alien-deportation bill, couched in the spirit of the "Pro-America" campaign. The day after the presentation of the anti-red petitions, Representative Charles Kramer, who belongs to Shannon's lodge, Los Angeles Number 99 (of which Senator McAdoo is also a member), read the Grand Exalted Ruler's speech into the Congressional Record. Kramer is the author of two of the most sweeping anti-labor gag bills that came out of the activities of the Dickstein committee, of which he was an energetic member. These measures would not only outlaw the Communist Party and its press, but as Congressman McCormack admitted at the secret hearing on the bills, could be used to break strikes.

Elks in high office are thus doing their part in the "Pro-America" campaign. Others, who may not be participating directly, must be aware of this campaign and its implications. Surely President Roosevelt, who is a member of Lodge Number 275, of Poughkeepsie, knows what Brother Shannon is driving at. If he doesn't, he might ask Representative Hamilton Fish, who belongs to the same lodge.

It would be ridiculous, of course, to suggest that basic policies of government are determined by membership in a fraternal order; yet situations arise that may be colored thereby. I don't know how often Governor Clyde Tingley of New Mexico and Attorney General Cummings attend the meetings of the Elks' lodges to which they belong, but their refusal to act against the kidnappers of Robert Minor and David Levinson was entirely in accord with the "Pro-America" platform. And when Secretary of the Navy Swanson was beset by demands that he discipline Rear Admiral Yates Stirling, Jr., for writing an article in the Hearst press urging a Nazi-led war against the Soviet Union, did he perhaps turn for strength and comfort to the eight-point gospel of Brother Shannon, even though Mr. Swanson has allowed his membership in Lodge Number 227, Danville, Virginia, to lapse?

The most active Elk in the present administration is the patronage chief and conjurer of surpluses, Postmaster General Farley. Farley is a Past Exalted Ruler of Lodge Number 877, Haverstraw, New York, and a former president of the New York State Elks' Association. He can generally be seen at Elk conventions.

No less than thirty-four governors of states and territories are Elks, while a thirty-fifth is a former Elk. Governor Dave Sholtz of Florida served in 1933-34 as Grand Esteemed Leading Knight, an office second only to that of Grand Exalted Ruler. The new Grand Esteemed Leading Knight is Mayor Bernard F. Dickmann of St. Louis, while the new Grand Exalted Ruler, Justice Hallinan, is reported to have "pledged himself to continue the policies and principles of militant Americanism advocated by his predecessor" (New York Times, July 17). The Senate has 54 Elks and 9 former members, while in the House the figures are 197 and 42 respectively. Huey Long is a member and so is Bilbo of Mississippi. Congressman John W. McCormack, chairman of the Committee on Un-American Activities, and Congressman Dickstein, its moving spirit, are both former Elks.

The New York State membership includes Governor Lehman, Lieutenant-Governor William Bray, Al Smith, Mayor LaGuardia, former Governor Whitman, Ogden Mills, United States Judge Murray Hulbert, who is a past Grand Exalted Ruler, nearly all the General Sessions judges and the justices of the Supreme Court, President Nicholas Murray Butler of Columbia University, Dr. Frederick Robinson, president of City College, Borough President Samuel Levy, Alfred H. Schoellkopf, chairman of the State Temporary Emergency Relief Administration and president of the Niagara Hudson Power Corporation, and Henry M. Brundage, retired vice-president of the Consolidated Gas Company.

One wonders how all these people feel about the "Pro-America" campaign. One wonders, too, how the more than 500,000 members of the Elks feel about it in view of the fact that they had no part either in selecting Michael F. Shannon as Grand Exalted Ruler or in launching the anti-red drive. Three leading officials of the Elks told me the response from the members had been "hearty" and "splendid." But a fourth confided that there had been very little interest in the business, that the entire campaign, as he put it, had been "handed down from the top."

The drive toward fascism grows apace. Already the Tydings-McCormack civil-disobedience bill, which the Elks supported, has been sneaked through the Senate by means of the "unanimous consent" clause and has now been favorably reported by the House Military Affairs Committee. The powerful lobby of Hearstian red-baiters and fascists of every stripe are pressing for the enactment of the Kramer bills. Whether they know it or not, the national leaders of the Elks, in the name of the defense of democracy, have taken the road that leads to fascism.

The Crisis of the Middle Class

II. The Middle Class Under Fascism

By LEWIS COREY

IN the desperate effort to save itself, declining capitalism rejects its own values and achievements: revolts against abundance and development of the productive forces, against democracy and progress. Most sinister is the revolt against the future, as capitalism can survive only if it prevents emergence of the new social order represented by the economic forms of collectivism. The reaction becomes complete in fascist repression of all progressive forces. Already, in Italy and Germany, fascism has erected economic and cultural decline and decay into a system. It makes a creed of the most reactionary ideals, prejudices, and passions; it inflames nationalism and imperialism and drives more ruthlessly toward new and ghastlier wars. Fascism is the new barbarism that threatens to overwhelm the world. The threat calls on our generation to act, for fascist barbarism would consume our blood and bones, hopes and ideals, in the onsweep of its destructive fury.

All classes become desperate and are set in motion by aggravation of the economic crisis created by the decline of capitalism. The middle class calls upon its old ideals and forms of action: democracy, more reforms, and more state intervention in economic activity. But as these measures fail to produce results, the middle class realizes that new forms of action are necessary. What shall they be? If the new action is determined by the acceptance of capitalism and rejection of socialism, the middle class must mobilize against labor, whose struggle for a new social order becomes more aggressive under impact of the crisis. By that decision the middle class throws itself into the consuming fires of fascism.

The decision means that the middle class resolves to solve its crisis, as in the past, within the relations of capitalist property and against labor. But it forgets that this crisis is different from former crises, and that economically the fate of large groups in the middle class is now inseparably interlocked with that of labor.*

Former crises of the middle class were an aspect of the upswing of capitalism, and were "eased" by the upward movement of economic activity. Independent small enterprisers were increasingly limited, but it was still possible to become one, while the rapidly multiplying salaried employees and professional workers were assured employment and some hope of higher incomes. But the new, and final, crisis of the middle class is an aspect of the decline of capitalism, of a crisis of the system, and it is made hopeless by the downward movement of economic activity. Both business opportunity and the middle class must shrink as economic expansion shrinks, and the social forces of production and consumption are strangled to save capitalist profit from the threat of abundance. Independent small enterprise is not only limited more severely, it must move toward final destruction. Masses of lower-salaried employees and professional workers are imprisoned in the degradation and misery of permanent unemployment and depressed standards of living. They may move against labor, but capitalism throws them into the depths with the wage workers.

Whose interests are expressed in mobilizing the middle class against labor and resisting the transformation of collectivism into socialism? Only the interests of surviving small enterprisers and the higher managerial and supervisory employees who are identified with monopoly capitalism. But while their interests agree on saving capitalism, they clash otherwise. For small enterprise must limit monopoly to survive, and monopoly must more intensely exploit small enterprise as economic activity moves downward. Moreover, the propertyless masses of lower-salaried employees and professional workers are ignored, for their interests are wholly with collectivism and its socialist transformation as the only means of solving the "new" middle-class crisis of employment by releasing the productive forces. Under these conditions of inner class disunity, only an artificial unity is possible and an evasive program which is all things to all groups. A split personality, the middle class has no independent class interests. Hence the "unity" of negation: against labor, against democracy, against socialism and communism. Hence the "unity" of reactionary ideals: for the authoritarian state, for nationalism, for war.

The elements of this reaction are not altogether new. As small enterprisers realized that the struggle against monopoly was doomed, they began to hope for mere survival and "security" within the set-up of monopoly capitalism. This meant an increasing abandonment of the democratic ideals identified with freedom of enterprise and resort to the coercive measures of state capitalism. Another reaction against democracy appeared among the higher managerial and supervisory employees, who are entangled in the authoritarian, hierarchical relations of monopoly capitalism. It was symptomatic that American pre-war progressivism, especially in the person of Theodore Roosevelt, considered that middle-class needs meant acceptance of "regulated" monopoly, a state capitalism dependent on bureaucracy and caste, and an aggressive nationalism and imperialism. The reaction becomes worse as the middle class struggles for "security" in a declining capitalism: all progressive forces must be crushed for capitalism to survive. Out of the middle class leaps the monster of fascism: the class that formerly waged revolutionary war on authoritarianism now provides the mass support for a new authoritarianism determined to crush the ideals of liberty, equality, and democracy.

---

*This subject is discussed more fully in the third article of the series, The Middle Class Under Socialism, to appear next week.

The "independent" struggle of the middle class becomes fascism when its reaction merges with the reaction of the big bourgeoisie. Monopoly capitalism and imperialism represent a reaction against democracy and progress and an assimilation of authoritarian ideas: the urge toward an all-inclusive economic and political dictatorship. This reaction is invigorated by the decline of capitalism. Economic breakdown, falling profits, the burden of social services, and the growing revolt against capitalism drive the big bourgeoisie to action: it must more completely merge industry and government, use state power more vigorously to "reconcile" class-economic contradictions and mercilessly crush all opposition. But this cannot be done arbitrarily or by the old methods, for the discontent of the people is real and dangerous. Fascism, using radical phrases and middle-class support, provides the ideological justification, the "popular" sanction, and the mass support to suppress forcibly all progressive forces and prevent the transformation of collectivism into socialism. To call anything else fascism is to misunderstand its nature and bedevil the struggle against it.

From the beginning the more far-seeing big capitalists supported fascist movements: Mussolini was financed by the Union of Industrialists, Hitler by Krupps and the bankers. But fascism is not a conspiracy of big capital, which seizes on forces in the middle class already moving toward fascism. An "independent" revolt of the middle class, determined to save property and crush labor and socialism, must become reactionary and accept the relations of the dominant monopoly capitalism. Small enterprisers cannot hope to destroy the great corporate combinations and this would be resisted by managerial and supervisory employees, members of the middle class who are identified with monopoly capitalism and who would be the driving force of an American fascism. The propertyless masses of lower-salaried employees and professional workers are rallied by promises of "security" and "privileges," and by inflaming their passions and prejudices, as a minor caste in the new fascist set-up. Again, as in the past, the middle class becomes the support of dominant capitalist interests.

Fascism comes into power with the consent of the capitalist state, which surrenders, as it did to Mussolini and Hitler, to avert a civil war that might aid the revolutionary struggle. Now fascism combines with all the openly reactionary forces. It proceeds to destroy communism, socialism, and trade unionism: Mussolini destroyed them one after another, Hitler all together in one annihilating swoop. But liberalism must also be crushed and all middle-class organizations. Most dramatic was the suppression by the Nazis, shortly after coming to power, of the militant League of the Middle Class, composed mainly of small shopkeepers. When the fascist party becomes the state it purges itself of all "radical" elements, those who took seriously the old anti-capitalist demagogy and might now incite the middle class to defend its interests against the new regime. Fascism deprives the middle class of all independence: it must, like the workers, submit silently to the new authoritarianism of the totalitarian state, for freedom of action becomes a monopoly of the state and its big-capitalist masters.

The crises of the middle class—of property and of employment—are aggravated by fascism. It neither solves the crisis of capitalism nor prevents the inner class changes which increasingly convert the middle class into propertyless masses of salaried dependents. Nothing is changed except for the worse. Fascism is not a new social order; imprisoned within the forces of declining capitalism, fascism is the old capitalist order become putrid, organizing economic disintegration, mass misery, and reaction into a system.

What is new in fascism is the technique of creating "popular" sanctions for the ruthless suppression of all opposition and all progressive forces. Economically, fascism offers nothing new: its policy is merely the old state capitalism, only more of it. But state capitalism neither prevented depression nor revived prosperity in non-fascist nations; its planning is nothing more than piecemeal aid to capitalist enterprise to prevent complete breakdown and save profit. While fascism bluffs about "controlled capitalism" and the "corporate state," these offer no control over fundamental economic forces because they represent the repressive merger of monopoly capitalism and the state, and accept the vested interests of capitalist property; in fact, more economic disorganization is created. In fascist Italy the levels of pre-depression prosperity were lower than in other nations and the depression much more severe. Fascism in Germany did not end the depression but prepared an economic catastrophe. The crisis of capitalism is the crisis of an abundance that now threatens capitalist profit. Fascism strangles the forces of production and consumption; but as they are strangled, economic activity must move downward. Using collectivist measures to prevent the transformation of collectivism into socialism, fascism is a negative, destructive expression of the onward thrust of the new social order. Neither the old capitalist individualism nor the new socialist collectivism, that "system" must imprison the productive forces and bring about economic disaster and increasing misery.

And as the misery of the people becomes worse, fascism answers by making misery itself an ideal. Hitler talks of "heroic poverty." Mussolini asserts: "I know you are not looking for a comfortable life. Therefore I announce to you the approach of a hard period." They are reverting to medieval glorification of the poor.

The heaviest burdens of the new misery are thrust upon the wage workers. But the middle class, too, is engulfed in the economic disaster: it may try, but it cannot separate itself from the misery of labor. It must shrink in numbers as economic expansion contracts and monopoly capital secures a larger share of smaller markets. In Italy and Germany, under fascism, the middle class has decreased probably from 25 to 35 per cent as a proportion of all persons gainfully occupied. And its burdens have multiplied.* Fascism profits only the small minority in the upper middle class, which becomes a dominant class within monopoly capitalism.

The middle class rallies to fascism to defend the "natural right" to property, and is then increasingly deprived of the right. Concentration of property ownership under the fascist regimes of Italy and Germany has moved upward by from 30 to 40 per cent. Big property mercilessly expropriates the smaller. Fascism means a multiplication of the propertyless.

Independent small enterprisers rally to fascism for "security," but it makes them still more insecure. As economic activity moves downward, small enterprisers must increasingly be thrown out of business to protect the profits of the big corporations. In Italy, after Mussolini came to power, small enterprisers in industry and banking disappeared by the scores of thousands, more rapidly and more of them than in other nations. The state pursues a policy of encouraging industrial concentration and trustification, often by force, but usually by means of lower taxes, loans, subsidies, and government assumption of losses. An Italian fascist journal, Economia, says: "One must eliminate less perfect enterprises which produce at higher prices." Hitler's Germany made promises to help small producers, but actually cartel combinations were favored, even enforced, in the interest of big industry. In both fascist nations, moreover, taxation presses most brutally on the smaller enterprises. One reason for these developments is the greater control of the state by monopoly capitalism; another is the desire to strengthen big industry for purposes of militarism and war. Fascism massacres the independent small producers.

Small storekeepers, too, are massacred. They rallied to fascism to destroy socialist cooperatives and big department stores; the cooperatives were destroyed, in Italy and Germany, but not the big stores, which absorbed most of the business of the old cooperatives. Moreover, survival becomes more difficult as standards of living are lowered. Wages in Italy were severely cut after fascism came to power, as much as 40 per cent during the depression; they were cut nearly 50 per cent in the two Hitler years, 1933-34. The compensation of lower-salaried employees was cut almost as much. Declining mass consumption means fewer sales for the small storekeepers. The Nazis made them lavish promises, including "dividing up" the department stores, but not one of the promises was kept. (One reason was that breaking up the department stores meant throwing salaried employees out of work—an expression of the antagonism between the old and "new" middle class.) Now mass discontent at high prices is directed against the small storekeepers. A recent dispatch to the New York Times says:

> Numerous butcher and food-shop proprietors have been arrested. One Nazi leader has advised the police to "use harsher means than protective custody for those trying to plunder the people." The middle-class shopkeepers have been among the most enthusiastic supporters of the National Socialist movement. . . . The measures and denunciations now leveled at them, therefore, taste all the bitterer because they come from men they helped to put in power. As a matter of fact they are more the victims of Nazi economy than profiteers, for wholesale prices have gone up even more rapidly than retail prices. . . . But it is part of the National Socialist plans that the hapless middle-class traders are supposed to absorb the larger share of price increases.

Fascism sharply aggravates the crisis of property in the old middle class of small enterprisers. What of the crisis of employment in the "new" middle class? It, too, is sharply aggravated. Lower levels of economic activity mean the displacement of large numbers of technicians and the greater degradation of their craft function as more of them are forced to plan the limitation of production: to create want in the midst of plenty. A German professor of engineering in 1930, after pointing out that only 20 per cent of technical graduates got jobs for which they were trained and another 20 per cent any kind of job, asked: Is it not time to put a stop to this mass striving for higher learning?" Fascism, as in Italy, made the situation worse: Hitler's Germany cut yearly admissions to the universities from 40,000 to 16,000. This fascist limitation of education throws many teachers into permanent unemployment. Other professional workers are affected by the decline in living standards: the degradation of craft function is tragic, as the need for professional services mounts while their performers are unemployed. According to one student of German fascism: "The professional classes are poorer now than before." Millions of lower-salaried employees are permanently unemployed, while salaries of the employed are cut from 25 per cent up. As in the case of the wage workers, unemployment among employees is "reduced" by cutting salaries and instituting forced labor. The crisis of employment in the "new" middle class can be solved only by releasing the forces of production and consumption which fascism strangles.

Taxation multiplies the burdens of the middle class. The costs of state financial aid to big industry, of the all-devouring bureaucracy, of make-work schemes and greater armaments must be met by taxation. Wages are taxed, but there is a limit, and blood cannot be drawn from a stone. Great corporations and the rich evade taxes. So the middle class pays, and pays. Italy's national debt is immense, increased by fascism to nearly one-half the national wealth. Hitler in two years added twenty billion marks to the national debt, and in desperation has virtually stolen the savings deposits and insurance of the middle class to meet the state's financial needs. Taxation becomes expropriation.

What happens to the middle class under fascism is a continuation of what happens to it in democratic nations under the conditions of capitalist decline: consider the plight of the class in our own country. But fascism makes things worse, as the crisis of capitalism becomes worse. And as they become worse, fascism must strengthen its repressive measures and reactionary ideals. It urges war as an ideal and a way of life. It limits education and degrades it to the level of black magic: for fascism wages war on enlightenment and progress. The irrational is exalted, the appeal to "brawn, instinct, tribal customs, and blood." Il Duce, der Führer: they become god-emperors, as did the Caesars of old Rome. For fascism is the modern Caesarism: the organization of disintegration and decline and the stifling of progress. Fascism means the death of civilization. It calls for a rally of the forces of life to struggle against an approaching death.

---

*This is almost as true of the peasantry, whose propertied layers are rallied to fascism against the propertyless majority. Fascism in Italy and Germany encourages agriculture to promote national economic self-sufficiency (primarily for war purposes) and to consolidate the peasantry as a reactionary force. But that is done by means of higher prices, which lower standards of living among the wage workers and middle class and lead to economic disaster. The Italian peasantry has been burdened with debt by land-improvement schemes out of which speculators reaped great profits, while the small minority of proprietors are favored against the majority of tenants and farm laborers. In Germany the financial aid of the state and greater incomes from higher prices have been used mainly to pay debts; the great landed estates are favored and unemployed workers are forced to work on them at practically no pay: a new form of serf labor. Fascism has multiplied the burdens of taxation. In Europe, where production is low, fascism may encourage agriculture. But not in the United States, where the agrarian crisis is largely one of overproduction. What can fascism offer the 3,000,000 American farmers who, the experts agree, are unnecessary in an efficient agriculture? In the United States, even more than elsewhere, the agrarian problem can be solved only by releasing the forces of production and consumption.

Britain Tightens Control in India

By T. A. BISSON

NEARLY eight years after the appointment of the Simon Commission the British Parliament has finally passed the Government of India bill, embodying a new constitution for India. Our American newspapers, following the British lead, speak of this constitution as a "reform," as an advance toward "self-government." Reading these dispatches, one might be pardoned for believing that the British were about to retire from India with their self-imposed task of "tutelage" well and faithfully accomplished. But the headlines are more than usually deceptive. In this mid-depression and pre-war era colonies are not so lightly turned adrift, especially when they are strategically and economically as important as India.

The process of constitution-making began in 1927 with the "all-white" Simon Commission, which was boycotted from end to end of India. With the advent of a Labor government in England, an improvement in the atmosphere was sought through the round-table conference method. In July, 1930, Governor General Irwin went so far as to declare that the conference was regarded "not as a mere meeting for discussion, but as a joint assembly of representatives of both countries on whose agreement precise proposals to Parliament may be founded." This statement took no account of the fact that the Indian delegates to the conference were hand-picked by the Governor General. Nor did it envisage the Conservative capture of the government in 1931. Three successive sessions of the conference met in 1930, 1931, and 1932, but the draft proposals of the White Paper issued by the British government in March, 1933, somehow omitted the majority of the hopeful reforms discussed in the conference. These proposals were then turned over to a Joint Select Committee of Parliament, dominated by Conservatives, for eighteen months of critical examination. Their report in November, 1934, was prefaced by this statement: "No scheme for the future government of India is, of course, at present in existence which can be said to have been agreed on even unofficially between representatives of the two countries." On this basis the committee proceeded to insert a series of drastically conservative amendments into the White Paper proposals. The result, with the addition of certain reactionary changes by the House of Commons, was the Government of India Act of 1935.

The bedrock of this new Indian constitution—a stroke of imperialist genius—is the provision for a federation of the provinces (better, countries) of British India and the Indian states. Growing nationalist forces in British India had rendered increasingly untenable the existing set-up of an irresponsible central government and partially responsible provincial government. On the other hand, the continued maintenance of the autocratic authority wielded in their states by the Indian princes, in the face of the national-democratic unrest in British India, could be guaranteed solely by the British connection. What could be more logical than an alliance of the imperialist overlords and the native autocrats for the joint protection of their equally menaced positions? The new constitution cements this union in the carefully turned phrases of a legal document. No attempt is made to reconcile the basic clash between the autocracy of the Indian states and the quasi-democracy of the British-Indian provinces. The Indian princes will be represented at Delhi by their personal nominees in both houses of the federal legislature. The powers transferred to the federal government by the princes will be much more limited in scope than those transferred by the provinces. In addition, the Governor General will retain "paramountcy" over the powers not transferred to the federation by the states, and will thus be able to exert considerable leverage on the states which are members of the federation. A solid anti-nationalist and anti-democratic body, specially linked to the Governor General, is thus introduced into the federal government as a counterpoise to the nationalist movement.

This mésalliance is worked out to the last detail in the provisions for the Council of State and the Federal Assembly—the two houses of the federal legislature. The population of the Indian states is considerably less than one-fourth that of India as a whole. Yet in the Council of State the princes will nominate 104 out of 260 members, or 40 per cent of the total; while in the Federal Assembly the princes will nominate 125, or one-third, of the total 375 members. In the Council of State the princely bloc will require only twenty-seven additional votes from the British-Indian side for an absolute majority; in the Federal Assembly it will need only sixty-three additional votes for a majority.

The composition of the British-Indian side of the federal legislature is even more ingeniously devised. Each of the numerous British-Indian racial and religious communities and special interests is allotted a fixed number of seats in the two houses of the legislature. With approximately one-fourth the population of British India, the Moslems—traditional bulwark of British rule—are allotted one-third of the British-Indian seats in both houses. The caste Hindus, on the other hand, who constitute a clear majority of the population and supply the largest number of militant Indian nationalists, are given only 86 of the 250 British-Indian seats in the Federal Assembly. A handful of British residents—fewer than 100,000, if the British troops are excluded—is given seven seats in the Council of State and fourteen in the Assembly. Special seats are reserved to commerce and industry and to the landholders, constituting in effect a plural representation since their position will enable them to obtain their full share of seats from the regular constituencies. Inequalities exist even in the allotment of these special seats. In the Assembly eleven seats are given to commerce and industry, but only ten to labor; the landowners are given seven seats, but the agricultural laborers—numbering scores of millions—are given none. Lest nationalism sift through even these defenses, election to the British-Indian seats in the federal legislature is made indirect: by the upper houses of the provincial legislatures for the Council of State, and by the lower houses of the provincial legislatures for the Assembly. The retrograde nature of this provision may be gauged by the fact that members of the present Legislative Assembly of British India have been directly elected from territorial constituencies since the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms of 1918.

PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame Cal.

From a British-Indian side of the legislature so composed and chosen the princely bloc will readily find sufficient allies to enable it to dominate legislative proceedings. Sir Samuel Hoare's words in Parliament are significant: "I would ask honorable members to look very carefully at the proposals . . . for the constitution of the federal legislature . . . and if they analyze these proposals I think they will agree with me that it will be almost impossible, short of a landslide, for the extremists to get control of the federal center." It will be virtually impossible, in other words, to secure a majority in the federal legislature for a nationalist measure, much less a proposal designed to mitigate the extreme inequalities of wealth in India.

The executive branch of the federation constitutes the second line of defense against Indian nationalism. Three departments of the federal government, including the army and foreign affairs, are reserved for exclusive control by the Governor General. The other departments, including finance, are nominally controlled by Indian ministers responsible to the legislature. In this transferred sphere, however, the Governor General may intervene for a number of purposes, such as to prevent grave menace to the peace of India, to safeguard the credit of the federation, to prevent commercial discrimination (that is, against British concerns), to safeguard the interests of minorities, and to prevent the enactment of discriminatory or penal tariffs against British goods. To make this right of intervention effective, the Governor General is vested with a series of "discretionary" powers. These include the veto, which cannot be overridden by vote of the legislature; the passing of "Governor General's acts" without the consent of the legislature; the promulgation of emergency ordinances having the effect of law; and, in the event of a breakdown of the constitutional machinery, the assumption by proclamation of all powers vested in any federal authority. In addition, special safeguards are effective in the sphere of finance. Non-votable expenditures amount to some 80 per cent of the federal budget. Over the remaining 20 per cent the Governor General may restore amounts reduced or rejected by legislative vote. Currency and exchange is intrusted to a Reserve Bank, and railways to a specially constituted Railway Board, in both of which British influence is decisive.

In the provinces of British India the franchise has been extended to include roughly one-fourth of the adult population. It is still based, in the main, on property qualifications. Seats in the provincial legislatures are portioned out to the various communities and special interests, including Sikhs, Moslems, Anglo-Indians, Britishers, landholders, commerce and industry, labor, and women. Separate electorates for these groups have been perpetuated and extended, despite the fact that communal voting has been condemned by all observers of its effects, including the Simon Commission. Hindu-Moslem and other inter-communal antagonisms will thereby be strengthened, and the achievement of unity along nationalist lines correspondingly weakened. Upper legislative houses are provided in six of the eleven provinces, although heretofore the provincial legislatures have always been unicameral. The conservative elements are also buttressed by the property basis of the franchise and the plural representation accorded the bourgeois interests.

Executive authority in the provinces will be vested in a British Governor, advised by a Council of Ministers responsible to the legislature over the whole field of provincial administration. Effective ministerial responsibility, however, is limited by a series of "discretionary" powers intrusted to the Governor, closely parallel to those held by the Governor General. The Ministry of Justice, a key post in combating terrorism and civil disobedience, is subordinated to the Governor by special provisions. Strict financial and economic safeguards, similar to those in force at the center, are also effective in the provinces.

Hardly less important than the positive features of this general constitutional structure is the lack of any provision affecting the present status of the army and the civil services. At one time the round-table conferences had toyed with the idea of transferring the recruitment and control of Indian civil and police officials from the Secretary of State for India to the federal government—a measure which might have hastened the Indianization of these services, now predominantly British in personnel. No such provision, however, was included in the act, and the "steel frame" of an imperial civil service and an imperial police force will be maintained.

The problem of the so-called Indian army is even more fundamental. More than one-third of its troops are British—some 60,000. Early this year, out of a total of 5,773 commissioned officers, 5,578 were British and 195 were Indian. It was hoped that under the new constitution decisive steps might be taken toward Indianizing the officer ranks of the army. But the Joint Select Committee declared: "It is in our judgment impossible to include in the Constitution Act or in any other statute a provision for the complete Indianization of the army within a specified period of time." The consequences of this decision are momentous. It rules out the possibility of effective self-rule for India for an indefinite period. It necessitates the continued reservation of the Defense Department to the exclusive control of the Governor General. It places a non-votable army charge on the federal budget which has averaged at least 50 per cent of British India's central expenditures since the war. (A British soldier costs 850 rupees per year; an Indian soldier 285. Indian officers could probably be obtained at an even greater proportionate saving. Funds thus saved could be used for education and public health.)

It is not unnatural that this constitution has been opposed by virtually all shades of political opinion in British India. The eclipse of Gandhi's non-cooperation movement, crushed by Governor General Willingdon's repressive ordinances, has had the effect of demonstrating India's rejection of the act even more emphatically than would otherwise have been possible. Last November, for the first time in a decade, the Congress party entered the general elections to the Legislative Assembly of British India. It swept the elective seats in the Hindu constituencies and gained sufficient Moslem allies to dominate the Assembly, despite the strength of the government-appointed bloc. In the ensuing legislative session the government was defeated on vote after vote and forced to invoke its overriding powers. The Assembly rejected the federal aspect of the new constitution by seventy-four votes to fifty-eight as "fundamentally bad and totally unacceptable," and recommended that the Government of India "advise His Majesty's Government not to proceed with any legislation based on this scheme." The section of the army-appropriation bill submitted to the Assembly was cut to one rupee by a vote of seventy-nine to forty-eight, but the cut was restored by the Governor General. Amendments to the finance bill, including one reducing the salt tax, were similarly overruled by the Governor General.

Though politically ineffective, this opposition afforded a dramatic demonstration of the irresponsibility of the present Government of India. No such tour de force will be possible in the new Federal Assembly, where the nationalist elements will be definitely subordinated. Since the Congress party presumably intends to enter the elections for the new legislature, the constitution will receive a thoroughgoing trial at the very outset. It can hardly be doubted that its inability to satisfy the aims of the nationalist majority of India will be demonstrated in short order. Under these circumstances, the extreme rigidity of the new act—a few princes can block amendment of nearly all important sections—will encourage renewed resort to direct action. What form this will take is still uncertain. It is clear, however, that the Congress party's ineffectiveness has subjected it to increasing pressure from the left, both inside its ranks and out. The notable strikes carried through by the Indian workers during the past two years have served to strengthen this pressure. Before the struggle for India's national independence can be fought to an uncompromising conclusion, the present supremacy of its middle-class leadership may have to be overthrown by the Indian worker and ryot.

Moscow Frowns on Abortions

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, July 15

DURING the last month the Soviet press has been full of what every girl should know. Of course, all girls here know what they should know. There is only one bit of new information: abortions are harmful and dangerous and undesirable. It is much better to beget babies.

The Moscow cinemas have been demonstrating a picture called "The Private Life of Peter Vinogradov" which would be popular in the more conservative communities of certain conservative foreign countries. Peter is handsome and interesting, a good student, an inventor, and a Communist. The young ladies fall for him. First the girl friend of one comrade succumbs to his lure. Then the girl friend of another comrade. But Peter's intentions are not "serious." He is only "playing around." Both girls, accordingly, leave him, go back to their former friends, and get married, while Peter is reduced to the misery of single life.

"Go to Zags, Young Man," is the latest Soviet slogan. "Zags" is the marriage-registration bureau. It also has a divorce division. A. Soltz, the outstanding Bolshevik puritan, wants the men to go there too when the need arises. Writing in the Pravda, Soltz advises against the present practice of granting divorces in the absence of the father. It is not enough that the man pay alimony. He must be concerned with the upbringing of his children. But suppose he does not care? It is his social duty to care, comes the Bolshevik reply. And frightened by the recent propaganda campaign, many Communists who have not cared for years have suddenly begun to make telephone calls to their ex-wives inquiring how little Katya is getting on or whether Ivan has been promoted.

"In the land of Soviets," says the Pravda, "the family is a big and serious matter." Brilliant editorial writers abroad will say, "I told you so," and declare that they always knew the Bolsheviks would ultimately cease their attacks on the family. But the fact is that the Bolsheviks never attacked the family. The stress of the revolution inevitably broke up many families, for it broadened and exacerbated the conflict between fathers and sons which all countries and all ages have experienced. This was a by-product of the epochal Russian social upheaval. It was never a goal. Communists know that at certain periods in mankind's history no family existed. They admit, theoretically, the possibility of the family's demise. But they have no substitute institution for the family and, far from undermining it, they have fortified it.

In the past, the struggle within families was part of the class struggle. When a parent was counter-revolutionary, when the father was a petty merchant or capitalistic peasant, he could not live in peace with his children who leaned toward the Komsomol League of Communist Youth. The family was torn between political factions. Today, however, the class war is on the wane, and many people who grew up under the revolution have children of their own. The regime, accordingly, has no dread of the undesirable political influence and only welcomes the necessary moral and cultural influence of parents upon their offspring. The authorities are now stressing the wisdom of "honor thy father and mother." Aged parents should be helped by their children; boys and girls must be brought away from the street and drawn into warm, loving home life. Soviet society is concentrating unusual attention on these matters because its leaders realize how much harm came to the family during the stormy years of revolutionary turmoil.

"A bad family man cannot be a good Soviet citizen," a Pravda editorial announces. This is the spirit of 1935. It was inconceivable in 1923 when students boycotted their Nepman fathers or in 1930 when children interfered with the activities of their anti-collectivist parents. But the Soviet family is a different kind of family, the Bolsheviks insist. The woman can always find work. She is in all respects the equal of her husband. And "in the Soviet Union," according to the Pravda, "only real, big, unsullied and proud love can and should be the stimulus to marriage." The marriage act, in other words, must not cover a temporary relationship which can be ended in a few months by easy divorce. For a child may be born after the husband has deserted his wife. Such "frivolous conduct," Pravda explains, is "anti-social." It is rooted in the bourgeois conception that woman is a slave, a chattel, "a commodity that can be used and then discarded." It is a product of the property habit. Those who maintain that it is petty bourgeois to be interested in a family are themselves the lowest kind of petty bourgeois. "They defend the rights of women in public and at home they behave like pigs toward their wives and children."

Woman is still the weaker sex, Pravda admits, and the state must shield her. The offenders are almost always the men. "In our country, no one is compelled to remain married against his will. We have no despicable divorce trials. But the right to divorce which the Soviet code grants is not the right to license."

Then this official Communist publication makes a striking statement: "A family without children loses its raison d'être." It is rumored, therefore, that a childless woman will not be allowed to have an abortion unless there are convincing considerations of health. She cannot argue that she is poor. The government will help her, and so must the father. A prohibition against "killing the first child" would probably eliminate much philandering and promiscuity and encourage a more serious attitude toward marriage—although it must be said that Russians marry very young, and sometimes the dominant impression in university dormitories is the babble and crying of babies.

Propaganda against abortions is nothing new in the Soviet Union. I remember seeing in 1926 an educational film on the dangers of such an operation. The decree of December, 1920, which legalized abortions, also expressed the hope that they would ultimately disappear as a result of the strengthening of the socialist state. Physicians and nurses to whom women come for abortions invariably try to dissuade them. Special commissions carefully investigate every applicant for an abortion and many requests have been refused (hence, probably, a certain number of illegal operations). After the second month of pregnancy it is practically impossible to obtain permission for an abortion. One of the permanent mottoes of the central Moscow Institute for the Care of Mother and Child is: "Use Contraceptives to Avoid Abortions." But Soviet authorities likewise pointed out that since the operations here were performed in the best clinics by expert physicians, few deaths (one per 23,000) resulted from abortions and even very few serious cases of blood poisoning. They proudly contrasted this with the dreadful toll of "underground" surgery in bourgeois countries. In the last month, however, the papers have been full of articles by professors of medicine, directors of clinics, gynecologists, and the like, on the harm caused by abortions, performed under any conditions. Such agitation might be a desirable antidote to the earlier light-hearted approach to interrupted pregnancy. But when the press hammers away at abortions literally every day, and when this propaganda is accompanied by a glorification of festive marriage ceremonies, by emphasis on the holiness of marital obligations, by the announcement of prizes to mothers who have delivered triplets and quadruplets, by prominently displayed articles from women who have never subjected themselves to abortions, and by public praise to a low-salaried village school teacher who, mother of four children, nevertheless did not reject a fifth "although it is difficult to feed them all"—then one thinks of Mussolini.

The annual excess of births over deaths in the U.S.S.R. is more than three million, more than that of all the rest of Europe. With mortality, especially infant mortality, dropping, and general health conditions rapidly improving, the figure is sure to grow. Even at the present birth-rate, the Soviet Union will have a population of 200,000,000 nine years from now. This is an important political as well as social fact.

"Yes," a Communist said to me the other day, "the fascists also encourage more births. But their children are condemned to a bleak life in a jobless world of crisis and medieval reaction, whereas socialism guarantees a bright, happy future. Look at our new generation in the parks, summer camps, and streets." Nevertheless the crowded housing conditions of Soviet cities should deter the breeding of larger families. The apartment shortage itself would make any strict anti-abortion regulations a distinct hardship, particularly since illegal abortions could scarcely flourish under socialized medicine and strict Soviet control. The economic situation, however, has improved in the last two years, and many families are housed in new apartments. There is security. It is felt, consequently, that the more violent form of birth limitation ought to be checked, especially because men frequently take advantage of it to live a life free from the responsibilities of marriage.

In attempting to fathom the new intensive agitation against abortions, some commentators have hit on the clever idea that it is actuated by military considerations. Now the science of war has of course undergone very radical change in recent years but we have not yet heard that babies of six will man the trenches or operate airplanes. Less birth limitation in 1935 could only produce more soldiers eighteen years from now and by that time the world, and war also, will be different, and I cannot imagine Moscow is thinking of such distant days. Nor is there warrant for the assumption that the father of several children will fight with greater enthusiasm for his socialist fatherland. On the contrary, he may claim exemption. Do not unmarried young men often make the best fighters?

The simple fact is that the commissions which pass on abortions have hitherto been too lax in approving applications. The general spirit created by the present campaign will militate against easy "summer-time" relationships. Girls will no longer be "conservative" or even "counter-revolutionary" for refusing to yield to masculine importunity. More consideration will be given to the demands of family life, and fathers and mothers will be excused if their political and social activities suffer because they must spend time with one another and their children. These changes, and economic improvement, social stability, and the universal atmosphere of relaxation and normality are sure soon to heal the wounds inflicted on the family in the revolution's past.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Rhode Island Proves Nothing

By VERNON C. NORTON

Pawtucket, August 7

THE tremendous campaign of the textile interests in Rhode Island against the AAA processing tax undoubtedly helped to defeat Antonio Prince, the Democratic candidate for Congressman, in the recent election. But apart from this factor, the sweeping victory of the Republican judge, Charles F. Risk, in the First Congressional District cannot be interpreted as a repudiation of the New Deal. The collapse of the Democratic Party in an industrial district which nine months ago gave Francis B. Condon a 21,000 plurality must be charged to a deep-seated division within the party organization and to an intense racial feeling which gave impetus to an effective whispering campaign against the Democratic nominee. The vote was also a gesture of resentment against the recent operations of the Democratic machine.

Governor Theodore Francis Green, elected in 1932 on the crest of the Roosevelt wave and on a liberal platform, has ruthlessly abandoned his pre-election promises and built up the party machine as an organ of the same corporate interests which for so many years worked through the Republican Party when it was in power. The Democratic Party has now fallen into the control of two multimillionaires, Governor Green and United States Senator Peter G. Gerry, and from the day when it came into complete control of the state government it has made a rapid retreat from the principles it espoused while it was in the legislative minority.

The party split, in the campaign just concluded, developed openly over the utilities issue. The Democratic organization in the city of Pawtucket, the largest municipality in the First District, sponsored a program for public ownership of its electric-utility system—in accordance with recommendations made by Governor Green in his inaugural message but not in accordance with the actions of Green and his supporters since he took office. Lawyers associated with the Green-Gerry machine had been acting as lobbyists for the utilities in the Assembly, fighting against the enabling acts which would empower Pawtucket to set up its own distributing system and to issue up to $5,000,000 in bonds to finance the system. Thomas P. McCoy, Democratic boss of Pawtucket, then state budget director by appointment of Governor Green, controlled a powerful block of votes in the house and fought the administration's effort to put outright appointive power in the hands of the Chief Executive without definite tenure of office for any appointee. He also strongly supported the municipal-ownership program previously adopted by the party. When the utility lobbyists, most of them Democratic lawyers who for years had been committed to the party's program of competing municipal plants and more stringent state regulation, succeeded in killing the enabling acts, McCoy revolted. He was summarily removed from his position as budget director.

In the Congressional campaign McCoy led a militant minority to the convention and over the protest of Cornelius C. Moore of Newport, recognized as Senator Gerry's agent, he successfully sponsored a plank committing Antonio Prince, the Democratic nominee, to support of the "death-sentence" clause in the federal holding-company bill. Moore, serving as floor manager for the machine, was the registered counsel for the utilities during the legislative sessions when the Pawtucket municipal program was sabotaged in committee.

McCoy himself sponsored Felix A. Toupin for Mayor of Woonsocket, second-largest city in the First District, as his Congressional preference, but the Green-Gerry machine was in supreme control to nominate Prince at the convention. There is no primary law in Rhode Island. Toupin achieved fame in 1923-24 when, as lieutenant-governor, he presided over and dominated the state senate during a filibuster which eventually forced reform amendments into the state constitution. Mayor Toupin had been one of the principal targets of the Green machine. Prince is a French Canadian. Toupin is of French descent. Both live in Woonsocket and each claims control over the French voters who comprise about 25 per cent of the vote in the First District. Prince became involved some eight years ago in a politically embarrassing situation when a strong group of French Catholics challenged the authority of the Irish bishop, William A. Hickey. Prince is still associated in the public mind with the church revolt, and a rebellion among the Irish voters, especially the women, helped to defeat him and to break down the Democratic machine. Hundreds of devout French Catholics joined the Irish in resenting the Prince candidacy.

Several other causes had a cumulative effect on the outcome of the election. Prince refused to utter a word in support of the death-sentence clause, which led sincere Roosevelt supporters to suspect that he had been silenced by Senator Gerry and Congressman John M. O'Connell, elected from the Second District. Both Gerry and O'Connell had opposed the President's efforts to break the holding companies' control. Sentiment for Roosevelt was strong in the First District but many individuals deserted the Democratic candidate merely in order to join in a united attack on the Green-Gerry machine. Judge Risk, contrary to the general impression, did not concentrate his attack on the New Deal. He was disturbed when the anti-Administration press headlined his speeches in such a way as to make them appear outright denunciations of all Roosevelt policies.

The vote also expressed a widespread rebellion against Governor Green's political methods. He has tolerated a system of dual office-holding by Senators and Representatives in the Rhode Island General Assembly, as a result of which he controls Democratic caucuses in each house by keeping a majority of the party legislators on the state payroll. He ousted twenty-five District Court judges and clerks before their terms expired because the politicians wanted the positions. He traded Superior Court judgeships in order to get a partisan measure through an otherwise hostile Assembly. He condoned the action of a District Court judge, as chairman of a Democratic Party town committee, in bringing about the reduction of a World War veteran's relief allotment because the man intended to vote for Judge Risk, himself a veteran. By these and other tactics Green has been building a personal machine to support his ambition for a seat in the United States Senate. The defeat of Prince was in large measure a defeat of Green. And in so far as the issue of public utilities entered into the election, its outcome must be construed not as a repudiation of Roosevelt but as a defense of his more advanced policies.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Correspondence

The System

To the Editors of The Nation:

It seems to me that liberals never touch fundamentals. Frederick C. Lendrum's review of Hugh Cabot's book "The Doctor's Bill" is an instance. Could Mr. Lendrum not see, and could he not point out, that what is mainly wrong with our medical service is not so much the service itself as the economic system of which it is a by-product, namely, a system which makes people sick and drives them crazy?

A system which exploits the people cannot heal them. State medicine therefore could do no good. You cannot "socialize" medicine unless the things basic to life, fundamental to health, and essential to happiness are first socialized. The first step must be socialization of the means of wealth production, thereby permitting a more equitable distribution of the necessities, comforts, and luxuries of life. Rest is the most effective cure for illness, but how can a man rest who has to work for a living? Absence from worry is the best mental relief, but who can relax under a system of dog-eat-dog? Competition kills; cooperation cures. Capitalism opposes cooperation; socialism promotes it. Under socialism alone we can have socialist medicine.

Cleveland Heights, Ohio, August 1 Joseph Manlet

A New Scottsboro Case

To the Editors of The Nation:

The attention of your readers is called to the case of John Montjoy, Negro youth of Covington, Kentucky, who has been sentenced to be hanged on an alleged charge of rape, and whose hope lies in widespread petition on the part of all who are concerned in securing justice and equal rights for Negroes.

An investigation conducted by a committee of representatives of the American Civil Liberties Union, the International Labor Defense, and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People reveals the following facts in the case:

(1) Negroes are and have been excluded from the jury panel.

(2) The alleged confession of the accused was obtained seven days after arrest at 3:30 in the morning, under circumstances strongly indicating that the defendant's charge of duress and coercion is true.

(3) Although the police had the opportunity for submitting the woman to an immediate medical examination after the alleged act, no such examination was made.

(4) The court-appointed defense counsel presented no evidence of any kind in defense, not even putting the defendant on the stand.

On the above facts the committee bases its appeal for support in a campaign to secure reversal of the conviction and a new trial, which is now before the Court of Appeals. Prompt action in the form of petition, letters, and telegrams is earnestly requested. All such communications should be sent to Judge Rogers Clay, Kentucky Court of Appeals, Frankfort, Kentucky.

Mary D. Brite, Secretary, Cincinnati Branch,
American Civil Liberties Union
Edward Leavitt, Acting Secretary, Cincinnati Branch,
International Labor Defense
James T. Whitney, Secretary, Cincinnati Branch,
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
George A. Hedger, Chairman, Cincinnati Branch,
American Civil Liberties Union

Cincinnati, Ohio, July 10

Business Is Better

To the Editors of The Nation:

I notice that the Walgreen Company has just declared a dividend of 35 cents a share on the common stock, which is 5 cents a share more than the last quarter dividend. A friend of mine is employed as a cashier by this company, whose president is C. R. Walgreen, arch-American and red-baiter extraordinary. The Walgreen-instigated probe into communistic propaganda at the University of Chicago ended recently when it proved to be too ridiculous even for the Illinois legislature.

A few days ago my friend received notice that effective July 7 her hours would be increased from forty-eight to fifty-four per week at no increase in salary. The hours are so distributed that she works seven days a week. Every other Sunday she has a half day off. The intervening Sunday she works from 1:30 p.m. to 12 midnight. As it usually takes her a half-hour to check up after working hours, she has an eleven-hour shift on that day and also on every Wednesday. It is her understanding that this increase in hours is general throughout the organization and will result in the discharge of several hundred employees.

Chicago, July 10 James Brown

RANDOM HOUSE announces an unusual story by MISS GALE WILHELM
WE TOO ARE DRIFTING
"Far better than THE WELL OF LONELINESS" —New York Herald Tribune. Third large printing now ready. $2.00
RANDOM HOUSE, 20 E. 57 ST. N.Y.

The • Recommended by Physicians
SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE
By I. E. Hutton, M. D. •
"Dr. Ira Wile describes the book as a clear, succinct, non-emotional, authoritative and conservative exposition of the practical factors involved in making marriage successful on the sexual level. . . It is primarily concerned with the conduct of the honeymoon and with the technic of sexual performance."—Dr. Morris Fishbein. Price $2.00 (postage 15c extra)
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., 333 SIXTH AVENUE, NEW YORK CITY

Labor and Industry

The Nation Index of Labor Welfare

DESPITE a sharp decline in factory employment and payrolls during June, The Nation Index of Labor Welfare indicates that working-class living standards rose slightly from the previous month. This somewhat paradoxical development may be explained by the fact that the losses suffered in the manufacturing industries were largely offset by a 30 per cent increase in the earnings of anthracite and bituminous coal miners, together with smaller gains in retail trade and other non-manufacturing industries. Since employment fell more sharply than wages, average weekly earnings were somewhat higher in the face of a 0.2 per cent decline in the cost of living. This brought real wages to 99.3 per cent of the 1932 average—the highest since March. Although the number of unemployed rose approximately 100,000 during the month, its effect on the index was counterbalanced by the exceptionally large drop in the number of persons in rural districts receiving relief. In 140 of the largest cities relief rolls showed a seasonal decline of approximately 3 per cent, but for the country as a whole the drop was nearly 7 per cent.

The fractional gains obtained by the working class during June lose much of their significance, however, when it is realized that after more than two years of general business recovery living standards remain materially below the lowest point of the depression in 1932. Weekly wages have risen 5 per cent above the 1932 level, but the cost of living —according to the latest government estimate—has increased approximately 6 per cent. Compared with 1929, wages have dropped 30 per cent, while the cost of living has gone down only 18 per cent. In terms of real purchasing power, the average industrial worker was receiving almost exactly the same wage in June, 1935, as he received in the same month of 1934, but unemployment had risen by at least 600,000 during this period and over a million more persons were on relief, leaving The Nation Index 2 per cent lower than a year ago. The preliminary indices for June are compared with the revised figures of the previous month and with June, 1934, in the following table:

(1932=100)

	June 1935	May 1935	June 1934
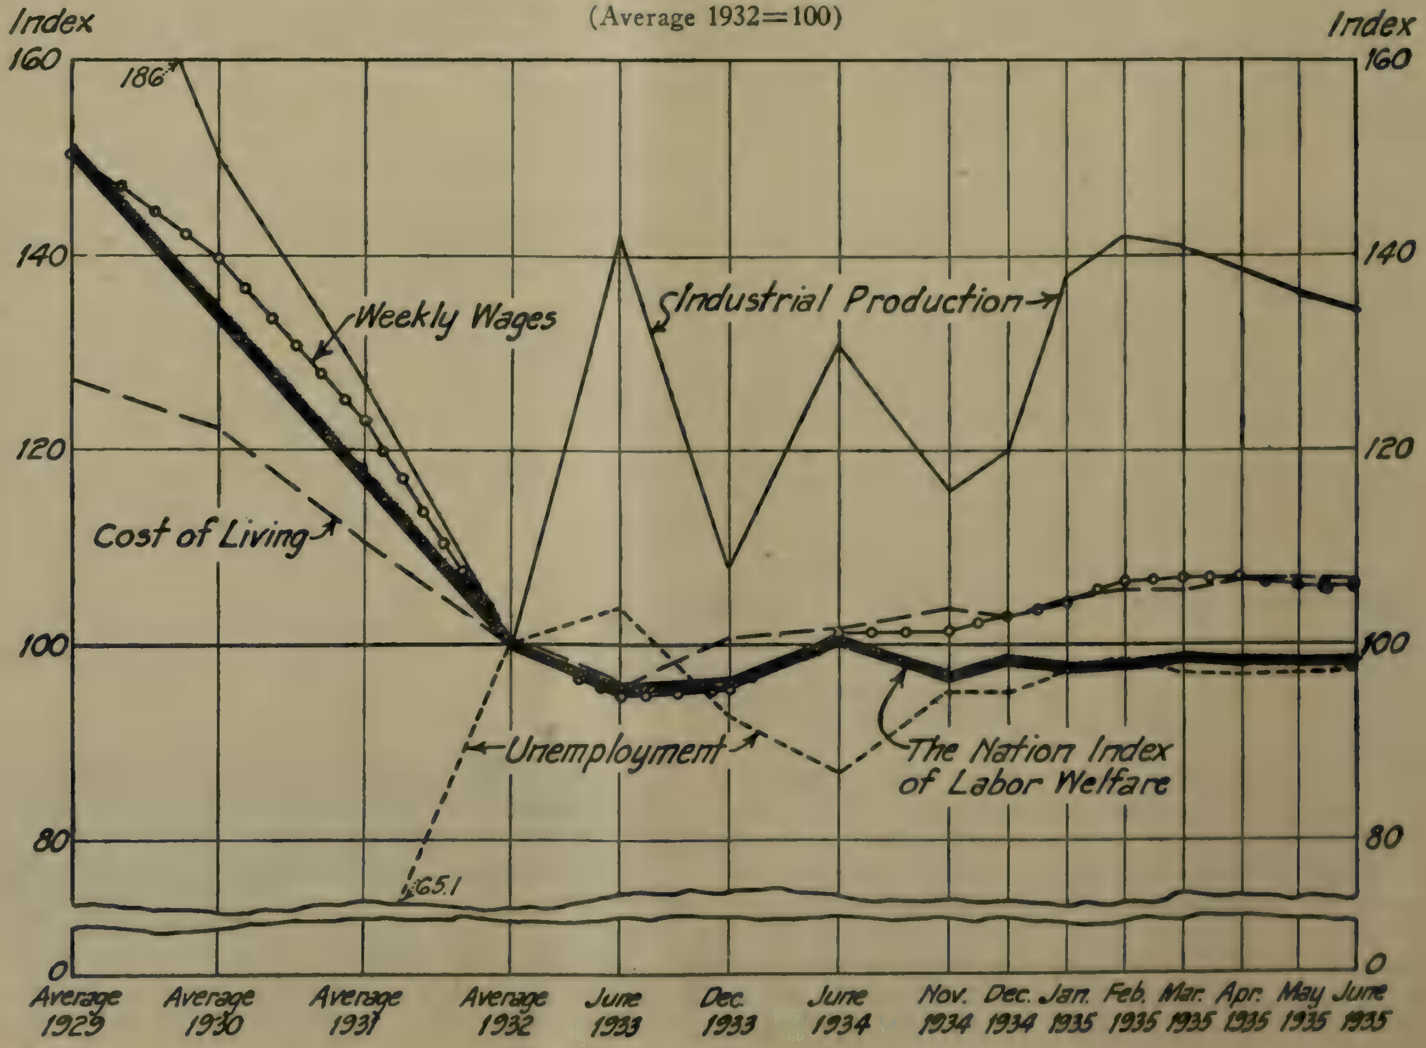
Industrial Production	134*	136	131
Average Weekly Wages	105.3*	105.1†	101
Cost of Living	106.0*	106.2†	102
Real Wages	99.3*	99.0	99.3
Unemployment	96*	95	88
Index of Labor Welfare	98.2*	97.9†	100.2

* Preliminary. † Revised.

THE CHART OF LABOR WELFARE

(Average 1932=100)



The Pullman Porters Win

By EDWARD BERMAN

WORKING-CLASS Negroes won a decisive victory on July 1 when the National Mediation Board certified the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters as the duly authorized representative of the porters and maids employed by the Pullman Company. This certification and the election which preceded it were the climax in a courageous struggle for labor organization and collective bargaining which has been carried on for more than a decade against great odds.

Aggressive attempts to organize the Pullman porters in an independent union attracted public attention about 1920. Toward the end of that year the Pullman Company countered with the usual device of company unionism. From that time on the efforts of the porters to make the employee-representation scheme function effectively in the workers' interest or to organize an independent union were met by the whole barrage of opposition which employers developed so effectively in the decade of the twenties. In February, 1921, the company established its Pullman Porters' Benefit Association to provide sickness, incapacity, and death benefits. As early as 1914 it had put into effect a pension plan for aged employees. In February, 1926, it introduced an employee stock-ownership plan. It also put into operation an extensive scheme of welfare work, with a newspaper for employees, as well as workers' choruses, bands and orchestras.

The porters and their leaders at first attempted to use these devices for the purpose of improving the lot of the workers. The company countered by employing spies and discharging porters who were too active in the interest of their fellows. The leaders finally realized that the condition of the workers could be improved only by organizing an absolutely independent union not subject to the influence of the Pullman Company, and on August 25, 1925, steps were taken to establish the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. Its officers, with one exception, were porters of long standing in the company's service. They gave up their jobs to become leaders of the union or were soon discharged for their activities. The one exception was A. Philip Randolph, a prominent publicist and leader among Negroes. Since 1925 all the officers have stayed with the organization, generally without salaries of any kind, eking out an often precarious living for themselves and their families by engaging in various small business enterprises.

The organization of the independent union led to increased opposition by the Pullman Company. Spying became more intense and effective, and discharges of active unionists became common. Porters many years in the service found themselves let out for reasons which were mere subterfuges. It came to be worth a man's job to show an active interest in the new union. Yet hundreds of porters continued to pay dues and to attend meetings.

In 1926 the union tried unsuccessfully to get consideration from the Interstate Commerce Commission on the question of wages. From 1930 to the beginning of 1934 it attempted with equal lack of success to get an injunction against the company under the terms of the Railway Labor Act of 1926. Meanwhile in 1933 the Railway Emergency Act had been passed. Among its provisions was one which had the effect of outlawing the company unions. Unfortunately, however, whether by oversight or otherwise, the act made no reference to the Pullman Company or to the express companies. In the autumn of 1933 the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters began a campaign of publicity to have the Pullman Company brought within the scope of the act. With the aid of Coordinator Eastman, who included proposals to this effect in his recommendations to Congress, an act was passed in June, 1934, correcting the defects in the previous legislation. The porters could now appeal to the National Mediation Board for the right to be recognized as the official agency of the porters for the purposes of collective bargaining. In preparation for the test it knew was coming, the Pullman Company, in October, 1934, reorganized its company union. The grosser forms of company influence were not so apparent in the new constitution. Presumably the organization was to be financed exclusively by the employees themselves, but it was specified that its officers should be employees of the company.

The fight between the new company union and the Brotherhood to secure official recognition from the National Mediation Board began late in 1934. At the direction of the board an election to enable the porters and maids to express their preference was conducted from May 27 to June 27. It resulted in an overwhelming victory for the Brotherhood. Of a total of 8,316 eligible votes, the Brotherhood captured 5,931 and the company union only 1,422. In only three cities, Louisville, Memphis, and Atlanta, did the company union receive a majority of the eligible votes. The Brotherhood won majorities in 25 cities; it also received the overwhelming majority of votes cast by mail. The Brotherhood has already taken steps to initiate negotiations with the Pullman Company. The real fruits of victory will not be realized until a collective agreement is secured, but the chances for such an agreement are excellent.

The reason for the porters' long and determined fight for an independent union is to be found of course in wages that are unbelievably low and conditions of work that most unskilled white workers would consider intolerable. The Pullman porter is regarded as an aristocrat by the workers of his race. The Pullman Company itself not only depends upon him to furnish courteous and efficient service to its patrons, but frankly acknowledges that the opinion which the traveling public has of the Pullman service largely depends upon him. It imposes upon him an enormous variety of tasks, skilled and unskilled; and the traveling public knows how well he performs those tasks.

It is one of the ironies of the status of the Negro in American life, however, that the Pullman porter is one of the worst-exploited workers in the country. A survey covering the year from March, 1934, to February, 1935, shows that the annual income of all porters covered by the sample investigation was $880. Porters on regular assignment received in that year $1,056, while those on extra service received $624. (Since extra porters must constantly hold themselves in readiness for duty, they have no opportunity to earn additional income.) This income was received only in part from the company. The average wage received by all porters directly from the company was $879; the sum of $237 was received in tips, but $236 was spent for occupational expenses. The weekly income of all porters covered in the survey was only $16.92, that of porters on regular assignment $20.30, and that of extra porters only $12. Obviously the common impression that porters get large sums in tips is erroneous. Some do, but on the average the amount is about offset by the sum which goes for occupational expenses. The status of the porter is well indicated by the nature and extent of these expenses. He is compelled to furnish his own brushes and shoe-polishing materials. He must pay for his uniforms until he has been in service for ten years. He must eat his meals from the dining car, paying half price for what he gets—and the middle-class American of small income knows that even half-price on a Pullman diner is too much. Moreover, he must sleep at night in the smoking compartment of his car unless a certain upper berth near that compartment happens to be vacant. He does not retire until the occupants of the smoking compartment go to bed. He is subject to call at every moment of the day or night while on service.

As against an average weekly income for the porters of $16.02, the average wage of all workers in manufacturing industries in the United States in 1934 was $19.12, in New York State $23.19, in Illinois $20.50, and in Wisconsin $18.29. Against the porters' annual average income of $880 may be set the "minimum comfort budget" calculated by Professor Ogburn for the War Labor Board for a family of five, which would have cost $1,516 in 1934. Against it may also be set the "minimum American standard budget" for a family of four established by an employers' organization, the National Industrial Conference Board. In a small city such as Marion, Ohio, this would have cost $1,129 in 1934. In New York City (and it should be remembered that most porters live in large cities) it would have cost $1,299.

But this is not the whole story. Hours of service are barbarously long. The porters are paid on a mileage basis, the basic wage being earned when they have traveled 11,000 miles per month. But they work before and after the trains get into motion, and for this "preparatory" and "terminal" time, as it is called, they get no pay. A survey made at the beginning of the present year indicates that on regular runs the porters put in an average of 9.2 per cent of their working time in getting cars ready for occupancy and receiving passengers, and 3.5 per cent in arranging cars after the train has arrived at its terminal. These hours of service are required by the company. Not infrequently, more than the stated time is required after a car has reached the terminal. The variations among individual porters are great. Some put in more than 50 per cent of all their service in the form of preparatory and terminal time. For example, there was the case of a porter required to put in 14 hours and 52 minutes of preparatory time and 3 hours and 5 minutes of terminal time out of a total service period per round trip of 26 hours and 30 minutes. Such cases are not uncommon. The important point is that an average of 12.7 per cent of all the time the porters spend in service is not paid for.

Investigation shows that in 1934 porters on regular runs worked an average of 317 hours per month, or over 73 hours per week. Contrast this figure with the fact that in the year 1934 workers in all manufacturing industries in the United States averaged just under 35 hours per week. The average net income for porters on regular assignment for the year from March, 1934, to February, 1935, was 27.8 cents an hour. In 1934 workers in all manufacturing industries received an average of 54.8 cents; and workers on federal public works projects, 57.8 cents per hour.

Here then is a group of skilled workers receiving an average annual income of $880, an average weekly income of $16.92, and an average hourly income, if they work regularly, of 27.8 cents. While many hundreds of thousands of their fellow-workers remain partly or wholly unemployed, they work 317 hours per month under conditions which are little short of disgraceful. They work, moreover, for a company which has consistently made large profits.

After many years of struggle and persistent devotion, the porters have succeeded in obtaining recognition of their union. It marks a most important step in their fight for decent working conditions. Their victory should give courage to the Negro working class.

Not the Type

By HEYWOOD BROUN

IT is really a pity that Franklin Delano Roosevelt is so obviously not the type around whom an independent labor party could be built up. If only one-third of the things his reactionary opponents say against him were true, Mr. Roosevelt could split the Democratic and Republican parties as soon as 1936 and make the first step toward bringing about a united front of liberals and the left.

Indeed, here and there men are beginning to suggest that the third-party movement indorse Roosevelt in the next Presidential campaign. Any such notion is preposterous. To use the favorite football analogy of the White House, Franklin Roosevelt has no aptitude for picking his holes. He is a runnning back who always seems just on the point of cutting loose for a long gain only to dart right into a nest of tacklers. Indeed, on several occasions he has emulated the unfortunate young player in California who, with a clear field ahead of him, grew muddled and ran in the wrong direction.

Still, I think that much must go down on the credit side to Mr. Roosevelt on account of some of the enemies which he has made and the manner of attack which has been unleashed against him. I find, for instance, that in certain sections of the country the whispering campaign was by no means whispered. A reader has sent me a copy of Crow's Pacific Coast Lumber Digest. This organ of the industry is published in Portland, Oregon, and in it I find an editorial by C. C. Crow entitled As We Totter on the Brink of Communism. It reads in part as follows:

> Picture this combination:
>
> A President of the United States who is either demented or, if sane, ambitious to overthrow our present form of government and set up one like Russia.

> A short-order Congress composed largely of demagogues who jump at the crack of the madman's whip. . . .
>
> An academic-parlor-pink-organized-labor-communist group thoroughly intrenched in governmental offices. . . .
>
> Vicious and radical men elevated to positions of authority and supported with the taxpayers' money, under the guise of relief, so that they may starve the business of the country into submission to their wicked schemes.
>
> In other words, picture the better people in all walks of life in the United States as with fear and trembling on bended knees they pray to God for deliverance from a diabolical set-up which menaces the peace and progress of the entire world.

And, strange as it may seem, this outburst comes from a representative of "the better people" who are insisting that we must have some form of sedition law because the radicals are seeking to create disrespect for our government.

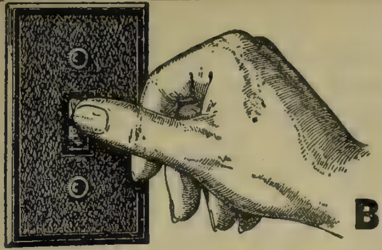
I turn with interest, also, to an editorial in the New York Times which appeared a little before the investigation of the utilities propaganda began. The Times, of course, was not so vitriolic in its criticism, but in the light of later events its position on the "800,000 telegrams" is not without significance. In speaking of the so-called "death sentence," which by the way was a punishing phrase manufactured by the newspapers themselves, the leading editorial said:

> It is stated that more than 800,000 letters and telegrams of protest and appeal reached members of the House within the past two weeks. They were not "form" letters. They came from small investors all over the country who had already lost on other savings and objected violently to having their utilities stocks and bonds made the subject of political attack. Mr. Roosevelt was imprudent enough to describe this sort of evidence of popular feeling in the matter as "falsified."

Well, by now there has been spread upon the records a wealth of proof that this "evidence of popular feeling" was not only falsified but falsified in the clumsiest way imaginable. It was not the President but the New York Times which was "imprudent" in going off the deep end after a school of fabricated Associated Gas and Electric telegrams. But has the New York Times printed a second editorial to say, "Excuse it please"? The Times has done nothing of the kind.

It may be that the election in Rhode Island is actually evidence of a reactionary tide rising in America. The result should not be minimized and it cannot quite be argued away. But I am loath to believe that the voters really want to go back to Hoover.

The tide against utter reaction is coming due for its flood. The newspapers of America have played the tory game with too much unanimity. To be sure they have not all gone to the lengths of Hearst, but many so-called liberal organs have been extremely cold to the more liberal portions of the Administration's program and many papers have abandoned all pretense of keeping their news columns and their editorial columns separate. The guardians of a "free press" calmly permit such headline phrases as "Soak-the-Thrifty Taxes" and act as if they were living up to the highest standards of newspaper ethics. It may be that an over-patient and long-suffering public will not rebel against newspaper leadership. But I believe it will. The most promising sign which I see for a new America is the growing skepticism of the newspaper reader.



BEHIND THE ELECTRIC SWITCH

BEHIND the electric switch are hours of freedom—time for the occupations and pleasures that you enjoy: books to be read, sports that you love, social contacts, long drives in your car.

When you turn over hard household tasks to electricity—sweeping, cleaning, laundry, cooking, heating, refrigerating, and all the rest—your time is your own for the things that have been barred by the mechanical domestic round. They are all awaiting you—behind the switch.

General Electric has developed home appliances that put you in command of all this electrical service. Among them are electric cleaners, washers, ironers, ranges, refrigerators, air-conditioners, heaters, and a host of smaller appliances. These point the way to the good times that lie behind the electric switch.

96-98J

GENERAL ELECTRIC

These GOLD BONDS incorporate PLANNED SAFETY

A COMPREHENSIVE system of planned economy has enabled the Soviet Union to meet on the due date every obligation assumed in the purchase of approximately $4.5 billions in foreign goods. Total foreign obligations have now been reduced to about $150 millions.

A similar method of planned safety for foreign commercial creditors has been applied to the safeguarding of funds invested in

SOVIET UNION 7% GOLD BONDS

These bonds are the direct obligation of the Soviet Union, whose ability to pay without resorting to moratoriums or other expedients has been so amply demonstrated.

For further information send for Circular N-12

Soviet American Securities Corp.
30 Broad Street Tel. HAnover 2-5330 New York

Books

Young Gloom

Winter Orchard and Other Stories. By Josephine Johnson. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

A WEAK, crepuscular melancholy pervades this volume of short stories by Josephine Johnson. Of the twenty-two stories only three strike a half-heartedly cheerful note. Five deal with unhappy love affairs, one with blindness, seven with death, and six with general frustration. This excessive preoccupation with would-be tragic situations, this sad determination to break through the bounds of personal experience, to seek in sensational events the very marrow of life and there to suck it out, is charming enough in a college student; one does not expect to find it in a Pulitzer Prize novelist. Undeniably, the twenty-five-year-old Miss Johnson has talent, a talent which is, at the moment, ingrowing, personal, static, purely descriptive. Her attempt to make herself into a philosopher or an ironist is valiant but premature. Her Weltschmerz is still the pleasant literary pain of late adolescence; her tragedies, seen from afar, foggily understood, overdramatized, become unreal little melodramas; and, in consequence, most of her pale repetitious stories have only hearsay value.

In general, Miss Johnson is at her best when she is dealing with simple sensory experience, when she lets her eyes, ears, nose, tongue, and fingers write for her, and forgets about her mind and emotions. A pie, a sunset, a jar of plum jelly, a frost, a young shoat, a million weeds and wild flowers, a field mouse, a quail, can impinge on her reader with more intense reality than the very best of her characters. Out of the changing of the seasons she can build a story like Winter Orchard, which needs no human drama to carry it. Mathilda, the history of a domineering old maid's eight lonely days in the woods, might have been a pleasant, quite plotless anecdote, had Miss Johnson not dug up the cheap old trick of the overheard, unkind conversation to give it an ironic-pathetic ending. The most successful story in the collection, Arcadia Recalled, gets all its nostalgic bite from its sharply observed, journal-like account of the daily phenomena of a child's vacation on a farm.

The rest of the stories in the volume, stories which concern themselves with people rather than with things, range, with one exception, from the barely competent to the ludicrous. Ludicrous to the point of burlesque is her single venture into the macabre, Return, a ghoulish tale intended, apparently, to be read with a French accent. Ludicrous in its frail toughness is her eyewitness's account of a condemned man's last hopeful moments, Sure, That's All. . . . Overwritten, humorless, touched with melodrama, perfumed with self-pity, I Was Sixteen, the study of a young girl's unrequited love, is yet honest and detailed enough to come close to being a good story. Safe is an acceptable, conventionally patterned narrative of the frustration of a young woman's love affair by her unconsciously jealous, consciously well-meaning spinster sister. In only one case does Miss Johnson's introverted sensibility really escape from itself; only once does a character show its own outlines, stand clear of the shadow of the author's young gloom. This is in Dark, where, in six fearful pages, Miss Johnson presents a blind man who has regained his sight only to lose it again in the fields at sundown.

Save for this piece, in her manipulation of human affairs Miss Johnson falls back on coincidence, on irony, misunderstanding, the intervention of outside forces—the writer's whole scrapbag of stunts—to give her stories the poignancy she feels in them but is unable to communicate by legitimate means. Out of the conjurer's bag, too, comes her cadenced prose. Too obviously rhythmical, somniferous, it goes far to debilitate her occasionally vigorous phraseology. It is amazing that a writer primarily concerned with nature could produce such a languid, hothouse collection as "Winter Orchard."

MARY MCCARTHY

Life of a Zero

James Lane Allen and the Genteel Tradition. By Grant C. Knight. The University of North Carolina Press. $2.50.

JAMES LANE ALLEN is little more than a name today, but time was, and not so long ago, when he was compared with Hawthorne, and his publishers, an old and conservative New York house, called him "the aristocrat of American letters, . . . perhaps the greatest of living novelists in America." That was in 1900. His popularity and reputation diminished rapidly thereafter, but even when he died in 1925 he was paid a glowing tribute in the New York Times by no less a person than Dr. John H. Finley, the late Adolph Ochs's official gladhander and tear-squeezer. Allen is still mentioned in the more refined backwoods of Boston, Louisville, Kentucky, and Pelham Manor, New York, especially among people who recall weeping over "The Choir Invisible," which was a best-seller for years after its publication in 1897. But the reading public as a whole, as well as the critics, has forgotten him, and rightly so.

A lonely and melancholy man, he wrote two dozen novels and several score of short stories, nearly all of which might just as well have been written in the Revolutionary Era for all the relation they had to their times. The Spanish-American War, the thieveries of the robber barons, Theodore Roosevelt's imperialism, the World War—these made no impression on him. His sole interest was "the inner world where beckon undying memories." He found "the unreal outer world of every day" mainly unattractive. He wrote a great deal about women, but always with a vast lack of understanding. There is no real evidence that he was ever in love or that he had one solitary affair. When he was sixty years old he wrote a "daring" novel, "The Bride of the Mistletoe," in which he referred with complete irrelevance to the middle-aged wife's "warm, foam-white thigh." In his middle thirties he wrote for the Critic a denunciation of Henry James, in the course of which he presented the following as his credo of good literature:

> Life as a whole is neither agnostic nor pessimistic; shall the novel that represents it be both agnostic and pessimistic? Life as a whole is spiritual and religious; shall the novel of life be devoid of spirituality and religiousness? Life as a whole presents a scene of happiness and success; shall the novel of life present a spectacle of wretchedness and failure?

Allen changed his credo during the succeeding forty years of his life, but only in minor detail. He remained the apostle of the Genteel Tradition to his dying day, and he was rewarded for this magnificent display of "character" by being relegated to oblivion.

A final word about his style. Its ornateness and sentimentality were so fulsome that even his staunchest admirer, Hamilton Wright Mabie, felt called upon to defend them. I quote a few typical lines culled from several of his works:

> The utter silence and heart-oppressing repose of primeval nature was around us. The stark white and gray trunks of the immemorial forest dead linked us to an inviolable past.
>
> [A description of a blind man:] a stranger smitten with eyes of perpetual night.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

> [A mother's soliloquy at the bedside of her sleeping child:] My heavenly guest! My guest from the singing stars of God!

Dr. Knight's discussion of Allen has value as a pioneer study, but otherwise it leaves much to be desired. It is deficient as writing and as criticism. His prose is reminiscent of Allen's. A few examples:

> [As a child Allen was] a docile little fellow contented with his few toys and learning to turn more and more to the mother, who set in front of him a blue mug full of fresh milk—that mug which was in those days the rightful inheritance of every free-born American child. . . . From her he learned to read and thus to add a world of experience to the narrow area of his goings and comings. He learned from her also things not found in books: it was her finger that beckoned him to the windows early on a winter morning to see a design etched by Jack Frost; it was she who called his attention to the rose just opened; it was she who asked him to admire the first snowfall and to watch and listen to the redbird sitting in one of the cedars that marched at right angles to the wide porch.

Dr. Knight admits that Allen is far from first-rate and that he largely deserves the oblivion that has overtaken him, but he insists on being "fair" with his subject, which is to say timid and stupid. Allen, he says, was sentimental, but the reading public of his time demanded sentimental stories and anyway, "If he wrote sentimentally it was because he was sentimental—what healthy, normal person is not?—and not because he pretended to be." As to the charge that Allen wrote exclusively about drawing-room people, Dr. Knight remarks: "Literature is a boundless realm. . . . The genteel writers were . . . within their prerogatives when they moved in a polite and distinguished society. There are drawing-rooms and garden houses in the world as well as mill towns, speakeasies, and tumble-down cabins. . . . One function of literature is undoubtedly to present men and women as they are, but another one is to present them as in their more aspiring moments they would like to be."

Dr. Knight is associate professor of English at the University of Kentucky. I am sorry for his students.

CHARLES ANGOFF

A Gentleman and His Personality

Don Fernando, or Variations on Some Spanish Themes. By W. Somerset Maugham. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

SOMERSET MAUGHAM likes to feel that the secret of accomplishment is "personality." He likes to think of himself as the owner of an urbane, distinctive personality, and he likes to believe that what made Spain of the "Golden Age" golden was a crop of highly developed personalities. His meditations and reflections on the arts and Spaniards of that heroic century, and his thoughts about himself, art, literature, and the drama are strung so consistently on that theme that to be accurate he should have called his book "Personality: My Own and Some Unlike Mine."

It is a romantic story of how its author set out to write a novel about Spain of the Golden Age, around a kind of Sabatini hero: bold, lusty, handsome, reckless, and at the same time refined, witty, cultured, with a spiritual side. But the portrait of an English monk seen in Cadiz—a cold, ascetic, aloof, and somewhat snobbish character also imagined by Maugham—obtrudes with such insistence on Hero Number One that the novel simply cannot get written. Both these characters transmit, synthetically, what Maugham looks backward to find in Spain's Golden Age. They are also a clue to the conventional charm and triteness that characterize most of his life-art-Spain interpretations.

Carrying no great burden of thought, the book ripples along pleasantly to conform with Maugham's definition of good writing "like the conversation of a well-bred man." It is full of entertainment, completely free of anything jarring or exciting; very, very cultured and lucid and superficial. Subtly, below the mellow obviousness of his meditations, Maugham carries on a kind of implicit argument with himself, a gentlemanly debate as to the relative merits of the life of art versus the life of action. Golden Age Spain—and Hero Number One—seems to symbolize the life of action; Maugham himself and the monk who blots out the cavalier signify the life of thought. Variations on this theme bring the author to the conclusion that the Spaniards never amounted to much as writers because they were "amateurs"—being chiefly engaged in non-intellectual activities; whereas fine writing springs from professional soil (with exceptions) and is the result of cultivation and personality.

But there is no room for argument in Maugham's philosophic approach to life, art, Spain, and action, since each has its merits because of a common denominator: personality. And with that illuminating contribution one can go a long way toward asserting that greatness is greatness because it is greatness.

ANITA BRENNER

Hermaphrodite

We Too Are Drifting. By Gale Wilhelm. Random House. $2.

THIS novelette is concerned solely with passionate experience. Miss Wilhelm sings a composed, dark-browed woman of thirty with a boy's slim body and small firm breasts whom we find coldly disentangling herself from Madeline, of whom she has tired, and ardently devising plans for meeting again a fresh young girl of twenty whose pretty face and figure, approaching her through a crowded restaurant, immediately captivate her heart.

One might point out the narcissistic worship with which the author regards her heroine. Jan Morale, famous for her wood-cuts, is as definitely romanticized as were Rowena, Rebecca, or Amelia Sedley. Jan smokes, drinks, whores, and curses; but she is a romantic figure, besought and admired by all. Kletkin, the great sculptor, only consents to marry another when he realizes there is no hope for him with Jan, reassures her continually that she is a "wonderful feller," and uses her as a model for his finest work, the bronze figure of a hermaphrodite. Beautiful, wealthy, married Madeline clings to her beseechingly. Beautiful, unmarried Victoria would leave family, home, and fiancé for her at a nod. Jan doesn't nod. She is always right, always noble, always melancholy, and a great artist.

One might point out also that the passionate dilemmas, the curses, the drinks, and noble melancholy of this stripling lover provide an amusing commentary, almost a reductio ad absurdum, of the Hemingway method of depicting passion. Further, these youngsters, struggling to be great and different, regard themselves as very wonderful fellers indeed, with their attic studios, their bohemian regalia, and their defiant independence. But in every great city today one may see just such dark-browed, passionate faces as Jan Morale's. They suggest the turbulent faces of the middle Renaissance. They belong to the breakers of molds, the destroyers, who sometimes also create and are sometimes sterile and sinister.

This is a first book. There is little really felicitous writing in it. Yet in spite of its defects it seems to be much more worthy of attention than, let us say, Miss Cather's smooth, accomplished tale of various fictitious and not too consistent characters through whose lives she points a moral and adorns a tale called "Lucy Gayheart." Miss Cather writes competently turned sentences, and Miss Wilhelm writes a sloppy, would-be modernistic melange in which, quite unconsciously I suspect, she imitates Hemingway on one page and Virginia Woolf on another, and seeks originality by the tried and true device of avoiding quotation marks and being very bold and stripped and most confusingly simple. Miss Cather constructs her tale competently and Miss Wilhelm hurls hers at the reader. Jan refuses to illustrate a successful writer's book because, she explains, "I read one of his books once. It was a big, fat circus horse galloping round and round a ring and never getting anywhere and all those trappings and everything." The book in which she stars is as stripped and lean as herself. It is written without sensationalism and without shame. It hews straight to its purpose and flings its passion at us. Out of such passion and sincerity literature may one day come.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Professor Read's Thesis

Art and Industry. By Herbert Read. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.75.

THIS lavishly illustrated book by England's warmest defender of the contemporary avant-gardists, made its appearance simultaneously with the exhibition of machine arts at London's Royal Academy. It seems to have been designed to serve as a comprehensive primer for befuddled laymen and doubting Thomases who are inclined to question the potential aesthetic validity of machine production. But I doubt whether the author's arguments will help either to enlighten the perplexed or convert the diehards. Nor can they be of very much use to the specialist, who has already been introduced to most of the issues which Professor Read raises, by the original exponents of functionalism in Austria, Germany, Holland, and elsewhere. When Read's indebtedness to such functionalist pioneers as Walter Gropius and Moholy-Nagy is subtracted from his total contribution, what remains is a keen and rather unusual talent for formal analysis. In the structural footnotes to the included illustrations are to be found, consequently, the book's most significant value.

There is certainly no ignominy attached to interpreting or expanding borrowed doctrines. Unfortunately, Professor Read seems not to have thoroughly understood the functionalist point of view or he never would have made the central problem of his book one which is of comparatively small importance—namely, the extent to which "the objects of machine production can produce the essential qualities of art." Instead of going directly to the root cause of popular misunderstanding by dispelling the bogy that a person who paints is necessarily more of an artist than one who, let us say, designs machine-loomed textiles, and explaining why art can be produced by any means provided an artist (a rare bird in any age) is the producer, Professor Read attacks his problem in the manner of a nineteenth-century German aesthetician and devotes a considerable portion of his book to spinning an ingenious but faulty web of dialectical proof.

Stripped to its barest essentials it runs something like this: There are two distinctive types of art—the humanistic arts, which are individualistic, intuitive, and "concerned with the expression in plastic form of human ideals or emotions," and the abstract arts, which are rational, objective, non-figurative, and have "no concern beyond making objects whose plastic form appeals to the aesthetic sensibility." The utilitarian or industrial arts belong exclusively, according to Professor Read's line of reasoning, in the second category, and he contends that the machine, "which works to adjustment and measure, can produce such works with unfailing and unrivaled precision."

An attractive simplification, certainly, and neatly argued, but glaringly fallacious. Professor Read's classifications have little basis in fact and completely pervert the true nature of the arts, which are neither wholly "humanistic" nor wholly "abstract," but a variable union of both. Creative intuition is based on the same organic and formal laws as creative rationalism, and where you find a divorcement between them you usually find, not art, but chaos or artifice. Our author's use of the term "aesthetic sensibility"—that is to say, the sensory appeal of a work having no organic or human reference—indicates a blindness on his part both to the real character of artistic creativeness and of creative appreciation. If the utilitarian arts are "abstract," it is because they embody a limited range of aesthetic relationships. The machine, it is true, is now best fitted to produce this type of art, but that does not mean it will always be so, or that the art of our age "is essentially an abstract art, quite distinct from the humanistic art of the Renaissance." Abstraction, in the sense that Professor Read uses the expression, is, I contend, a transitional stage rather than a permanent camping-ground.

What Professor Read has done is to make a thesis of a wish-fulfilment. It seems idle to conjecture whether the machine can produce art, or what type of art it will be, when what is needed is the kind of society in which the creative energies of man can find their richest expression and widest communal outlet. What is needed is sound craftsmen and the requisite technological and social training that will make them so. If the industrial forms which they create are fully dictated by their function, that is as much as we can hope for. If art is the result, so much the better.

E. M. BENSON

Prince Mirsky's Observations

The Intelligentsia of Great Britain. By Dmitri Mirsky. Translated by Alec Brown. Covici, Friede. $2.50.

THE literary criticism of Prince Mirsky displayed wide learning, remarkable industry, and a lack of any philosophical or aesthetic insight; this book, written by Comrade Mirsky, has the same virtues and the same deficiencies. It is a study of intellectual currents in Great Britain during the epoch of imperialism, beginning in the eighteen-nineties and extending down to the present, and is written from the viewpoint of the most dogmatic Stalinism. Different chapters deal with the Fabians, the Bloomsbury group, recent developments in science, philosophy, and religion, and finally with the intellectuals who have recently turned to socialism or communism.

The volume was apparently written before the change in the policy of the Comintern, since any socialist who does not support the Communist Party is described as a "social fascist." Mirsky displays great contempt for nearly everybody whom he mentions, and his invective is often amusing. He avoids the usual mistake of identifying aesthetic value with political direction, admitting occasionally that a bourgeois writer may have aesthetic merit; on the other hand he seems to have little interest in aesthetics, restricting himself mainly to the study of ideas. He makes great play with the word "dialectical," all the philosophers whom he mentions being denounced for their lack of dialectics. Mirsky himself, however, never

☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐

TIMBERLAND
A Modern Camp for Adults
Booklet on Request
33 W. 42nd St.
PEnn. 6-7663

The Rare Charm of An Intimate Congenial Group
Rate $29.50 a week
Superior Cuisine
De Luxe Accommodations
Fare $5.00 by Packards

TIMBERLAND In The Adirondacks
Pottersville, N. Y., Warren County
Esther R. Kessler — Israel H. Kessler

A NEW UNITY HOUSE RISES FROM THE OLD!

$27.00 week
Reduction for Union Members

AUGUST is the ideal month for a vacation at Unity House. More comfort, less crowding. The highlights of this month's greater programs include HENRIK WILLEM VAN LOON, MOLLY PICON, TOSCHA SEIDEL and the HALL JOHNSON NEGRO CHOIR. Write for illustrated booklet.

UNITY HOUSE
Forest Park, Pennsylvania
Owned and operated by the I. L. G. W. U. on a non-profit basis.
N.Y. Office: 3 W. 16th St. ● CHelsea 3-2146

In the Heart of the ADIRONDACKS...
Most Beautiful Summer Resort
●
For rest and relaxation of mind and body
9 Hole Golf Course on Premises
9 Clay Tennis Courts
8 Hand Ball Courts
½ mile Sandy Beach
SCAROON MANOR
ON SCHROON LAKE, N. Y.

"The Camp with that Wonderful Spirit"
CAMP MILFORD
KENT CONN.
MICKEY MICHAELS, Manager
A modern adult camp in the heart of the Berkshire Hills. Every outdoor activity. Congenial fellow guests.
SPECIAL AUGUST RATE
$27.50
Daily Rate [illegible]
Special R.R. rates N. Y., N. H. & H. Write for illustrated Booklet "N".
N. Y. office. 1440 Broadway. Phone PEnn. 6-7842.

WEEK-END (Aug. 16-17-18) PROGRAM
FRI. Outdoor Dancing
SAT. Chinese Cabaret Night
SUN. Campfire and Stadium Concert
Tennis, handball, baseball, boating, swimming.
Individual solarium cabanas.

Reduced R.R. fares every week-end.
Taxis meet all trains at Harmon Station.

BLUE MOUNTAIN LODGE
Phone Peek. 1403
Peekskill N. Y.

The Rustic Lodge with all modern accommodations. Less than two hours from New York.

NIGHTS OF GAIETY:
Broadway Acts, Dramas, Revues, Talkies, Campfires, Bridge, Concerts. Around the Samovar, Amateur Nights, etc.

DAYS OF FUN:
Tennis, Bowling, Fishing, Golfing, Baseball, Saddle Horses, Basketball, Handball, Boating, Swimming, Hiking, Gymnasium.

WEEKLY RATES START AT $25

"THE GATEWAY TO YOUR PERFECT VACATION"
Lake CHODIKEE COUNTRY CLUB
HIGHLAND N.Y.

Write for Illustrated Booklet "H"
New York Office: 277 Broadway.
Telephone WOrth 2-3733.

MOON HILL Lodge
ON SCHROON LAKE
IN THE HEART OF THE ADIRONDACKS
HOTEL ACCOMMODATIONS
COUNTRY CLUB ATMOSPHERE
ENJOY Golf, Tennis, Riding, Swimming, Etc. Large, Versatile Social Staff. Famous Cuisine. (Dietary Laws.)
Write for Booklet "N."
Sarah Solomon, Man. Dir.
Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y.
N. Y.: 11 W. 42d St.
PE. 6-7949

WUNNISHAUNTA
Camp for Young Men & Women
ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE
QUEEN WHITE MOUNTAIN LAKES
All Modern Camp Features
Sports . . . Dancing . . . Entertainment
Excellent Cuisine
New Low Rates: $22.50 - $25.00 - and [illegible]
Write for Booklet
Mrs. Sadie Brickman, Hostess
WOLFEBORO, NEW HAMPSHIRE

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, in the Adirondacks. One mile from Warrensburg. Private beach on Echo Lake. Tennis, handball, swimming, boating and canoeing. Cabins if desired. Guests met at Lake George. $19.00. R. J. Venton.

Cooks Falls Lodge
announces
An Elaborate Labor Day Week-End Program

Dear Friends and Guests!
You are cordially invited to spend Labor Day Week-End at Cooks Falls Lodge, and be treated to an unusually colorful program.
FRIDAY—"Gala Radio Revue"
SATURDAY—"The Hit Show of the Season"
SUNDAY—"Midnight Cabaret and Revue"
MONDAY—Farewell Banquet
This week-end program is to be rounded out with afternoon activities to include Swimming Meets, Baseball, Games and Water Carnivals. Come and take part in these activities and let us have the pleasure of serving you.
John & Ida.
Fri. Eve. to Sun. Noon—$12.00

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
A Camp for Adults in the
ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG N. Y.

AN ADIRONDACK CAMP of the BETTER TYPE Rates:
From $28 weekly.
Warrensburg, N. Y.
City Phone: VAn. 3-9874

ZINDOREST PARK
Monroe, N. Y., Phone [illegible]
Formerly a millionaire's country estate of 150 acres, most beautifully landscaped and located. Tennis, handball, swimming, rowing and dancing. Very fine saddle horses, expert instruction.
Open All Year.

RED OAKS Atlantic Highlands New Jersey
150-acre estate, beautiful country. Tennis, handball, nearby golf, riding. Log fires. Just over the hour from New York by train or auto. Penn. R. R. or C. R. of N. J. to Red Bank. Sandy Hook Boats to Atlantic Highlands pier.
Telephone: Atlantic Highlands 264
Management; Mascha and Hyman Strunsky

CAMP SAIDEL
ON TROUT LAKE
Sand beach, bathing, boating, fishing, tennis, handball, basketball and baseball; dancing, music and entertainment. Splendid dining and sleeping accommodations. No transportation charge from depot. Rates until Labor Day: $27.50 and $30.00.
Tel. Bolton [illegible] Lake George, N. Y.

BERKSHIRE PINES
"In the lyric Berkshire Hills"
WEST COPAKE, NEW YORK
Splendid cuisine; tennis, all water sports; golf within 20 minutes; billiards, etc.
Special Rates for September.
Call COPAKE 46, or write PEARL CHEIFETZ uses dialectical interpretations, his theory of causation being mechanistic. One's class position is responsible for one's ideology, and the factor of interaction, which according to Marx and Engels was the essence of dialectics, is ignored. Thus, for example, the novels of Virginia Woolf are explained by the fact that she lives on dividends from investments, and her statement that good artistic creation requires "a room of one's own" is an example of leisure-class ideology. This book will presumably please those already converted; but since it never suggests any reason why communism should be considered desirable, it is unlikely to make new converts; in fact, it will more probably alienate any who still have prejudices against intellectual fanaticism. H. B. Parkes

Shorter Notices

Feliciana. By Stark Young. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

If this volume of very slight sketches has anything at all to prove, it is that Stark Young is a Southern gentleman of the old school. He treats his Negro servants with that cheery condescension which is generally accorded to faithful household pets; he is full of ancestor worship and an almost clannish loyalty to the existing members of his family; he has a nostalgic love for the plantations known to his boyhood, and a quite definite contempt for anything that is Yankee and nouveau and untouched by the traditions of the Deep South. Apparently, however, Mr. Young wishes to prove something more universal than his individual debt to these traditions: "Life," he says somewhere, "if it is to last, must have a social scheme." By "a social scheme" Mr. Young undoubtedly means one capable of maintaining the manners and customs—even the atmosphere—of that part of the world which he so deeply admires. But the emptiness of his observations on life and human society in general, the reverence which even the most frivolous and questionable local institutions seem to inspire in him, and the labored quality of his style go a long way toward exposing the vitiating effects of this retrogressive and sectarian ideal.

Paul Elmer More and American Criticism. By Robert Shafer. Yale University Press. $4.

No better service could be rendered to the cause of liberal and radical thought than that an antagonistic philosophy should arise to force it to reexamine its premises and stiffen its defenses. Humanism was taken to be such an antagonist, but after its public flurry of a few years ago it has become again a private and (to use the phrase Dr. Shafer so much admires) "teeny-weeny" affair, sterile and ill-tempered, making extravagant and irresponsible statements in a void. Dr. Shafer's exposition of Mr. More's thought contains all that one needs to know to understand why (short of ascendancy on a wave of political reaction) humanism can be important only to the cloister. Dr. Shafer's concluding words on the man whom he calls the most remarkable in American letters will, in their significant meaninglessness, serve to give the emotional tone of the philosophy: Mr. More, he says, is a man "whose concern is with the highest subjects and whose style is that of a Christian gentleman." For the rest, the point of view is a mere juggling with unexamined symbols to the end that Mr. More's soul shall have comfort from the fear of death and eternity. Mr. More's one jolt was received when scientific materialism jarred his Midwest Christian pietism. He took up a sickly Platonism of the literary, quasi-sexual, O Beauty kind. He passed to Manicheanism, solving the problem of evil by declaring its necessity. Buddhism and Hellenism were next levied on, and now—apparently a little puzzled (he alone!)—the scourge of God upon liberalism and radicalism stands just outside the door of Christianity. Dr. Shafer is a little disturbed that Mr. More seems to be indicating the wicket of Anglo-Catholicism; he is also disturbed that in the field of immediate practical morality Mr. More has tended "to remain seemingly content with the practical rules which were good enough in the last century for Howells and Longfellow and Lowell and Holmes."

Contributors to This Issue

A. B. Magil is a labor journalist, author of a pamphlet "The Truth About Father Coughlin."

Lewis Corey is the author of "The Decline of American Capitalism" (1934). The articles now appearing in The Nation are chapters from his new book, "The Crisis of the Middle Class," which will be published in September by Covici, Friede.

T. A. Bisson is a member of the research staff of the Foreign Policy Association.

Louis Fischer, The Nation's Moscow correspondent, has recently published a new book on Russia, "Soviet Journey."

Edward Berman, consulting economist of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, is a member of the Department of Economics at the University of Illinois.

Mary McCarthy frequently contributes reviews of fiction to The Nation.

Anita Brenner, a student of Spanish affairs, contributes reviews and articles to various magazines.

Alice Beal Parsons is the author of "John Merrill's Pleasant Life."

☐ BOOKS ☐

LOUIS FISCHER'S
"THE SOVIETS IN WORLD AFFAIRS"
SPECIAL *$3.00 OFFER
2 VOLS. REG. $10.00 ED.
ALSO
"THE COMING STRUGGLE FOR POWER"
By JOHN STRACHEY
$1.05 (Reg. $3 Ed.)
AT WORKERS BOOKSHOP
50 EAST 13th ST., N. Y. C.
* Mail Orders 10c Extra Each Book.
Write for Free List.

☐ PERSONALS ☐

GET RELIEF from your moronic environment. Join Contacts, correspondence club for the mentally marooned. Send 3¢ stamp. Box 91, Station D, New York City.

STIMULATE your life through the joy of new friends acquired by joining the "Happiness Circle". Send stamped, addressed envelope for details: Dept. D, Box 107, Grand Central Annex, New York.

TWO young ladies with Southern accent desire positions. RIverside 9-1840 or CHelsea 3-0786.

Classified advertising must reach The Nation the Monday before date of appearance.

THE NATION
20 Vesey St., N. Y. C.
COrtlandt 7-3330

☐ HELP WANTED ☐

LADY. Furnished room in Doctor's apartment in exchange for caretaking, answering telephone. Small remuneration. Box 646, % The Nation.

WANTED: refined young man for office (typing essential) in all year country resort. State age, experience and references. Box 644, % The Nation.

☐ APT. TO SHARE ☐

YOUNG LADY—professional—to share apartment with another young lady—preferably midtown Manhattan. Box 645, % The Nation.

ROOM TO RENT

SPLENDID modern studio room with private family on University Heights. Moderate rental. Phone for appointment RAymond 9-5513.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 28, 1935 No. 3660

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 225

EDITORIALS:

Italy Defies the Powers 227
Must We Fight in the Next War? 228
"They Won't Work" 229
Helmut von Gerlach 230
ISSUES AND MEN. RUSSIA AIDS THE JEWS. By Oswald Garrison Villard 231
CARTOON: "OUR AIM IS TO ABOLISH SLAVERY." By Burck 232
SHENANIGANS OF THE POWER LOBBY. By Paul W. Ward . 233
BRITAIN'S BOOM IN WAR PLANES. By Frank C. Hanighen 236
THE CRISIS OF THE MIDDLE CLASS. III. THE MIDDLE CLASS UNDER SOCIALISM. By Lewis Corey 238
THE MENACE OF TAX-EXEMPT BONDS. By William Withers 241
CORRESPONDENCE 242

LABOR AND INDUSTRY:

Sponsorship. By Heywood Broun 245
Our Shrinking Cotton Trade. By Fred C. Kelly 246
Labor Notes 247
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 247

BOOKS:

Allegory for Our Time. By William Troy 248
Tall Timber. By Mary McCarthy 248
A Catholic Liberal. By Reinhold Niebuhr 249
Analysis of Renoir's Art. By Eliseo Vivas 250
Mr. Justice Cardozo. By Beryl Harold Levy 250
Shorter Notices 252

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING CHARLES ANGOFF

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional. THREE WEEKS' NOTICE AND THE OLD ADDRESS AS WELL AS THE NEW ARE REQUIRED FOR CHANGE OF SUBSCRIBER'S ADDRESS.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by the Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

THAT INTREPID EXPLORER, Senator Black, after cutting his way through an undergrowth of propaganda and the repeated attacks of hostile representatives of the power trust, has finally gained access to the fabulous kingdom of H. C. Hopson and his fellow utility magnates. Its furthest recesses remain to be explored, but enough has already been disclosed to show that the empire of the rolypoly potentate extends into the secretarial offices of the White House itself, that the watchdog at its gates is none other than John O'Connor, a member of the House of Representatives, and that its loyal army of defenders, for large fees, is already well known to the American public in the guise of prominent and respectable lawyers ranging from Patrick J. Hurley, former Secretary of War, to Basil O'Connor, the brother of John and former law partner of the President he now opposes. In the face of exposure some of the lesser figures in this hitherto invisible empire, such as Philip Gadsden of the Committee of Public Utility Executives, are running to cover, denouncing Hopson as they run. Hopson, to be sure, is a super-exploiter who feeds not only on the consumer but on other exploiters in the field. It is true, also, that the holding company is as often as not hated by the smaller companies from which it draws tribute. But Mr. Gadsden's self-righteous disavowal of Hopson and his methods should not be allowed to obscure the issue. The power trust has stopped and will stop at nothing to maintain its hold over one of the key resources of our industrial set-up. On the basis of the revelations so far published (by a not too willing press) Mr. Roosevelt is provided with the one issue most likely to clear his path to a second term.

WILL ROGERS AND WILEY POST were both small-town Americans who made good, each in his own very American way. Post was the poor boy with a single-minded passion for mechanics who by hard work and amazing persistence became one of the world's great aviators. Will Rogers was the genial Yankee, confused and humorous, who was claimed as friend by more men than any contemporary figure perhaps because of his very lack of strong or clear convictions or any single-minded purpose. His wit was a solvent and not a weapon; it offended none of its victims—except perhaps that other Yankee Calvin Coolidge, who was as indigenous and as limited as Rogers himself. His comments on public affairs were almost always amusing; they became increasingly reactionary and chauvinistic; they remained always the unpredictable and irresponsible "cracks" of a professional amateur. To call him a philosopher, as thousands have done since his death, is to credit him with order and vision, the two qualities which he most conspicuously lacked and most often spurned—his favorite boast that all he knew was what he read in the newspapers was not merely a quip. A writer in the Times remarks that "voting for Will Rogers became a habit with people; it was one of the best ways to file a protest without going Socialist." Laughing with Will Rogers served the same purpose. It is not surprising that he made a large fortune letting off steam for the American people, or that Wiley Post, though he learned how to circle the world in eight days, accumulated little of its goods.

DOES FRANCES PERKINS accept the responsibility which is legally hers for the policy of deportation now actively prosecuted in this country? Does she willingly stand for the use of the weapon of exile against militant union members and political radicals? At this moment there lies before us a long list of threatened deportations of men against whom nothing which justifies such action is even charged. We do not for a second suppose that Frances Perkins instigated these particular proceedings. Perhaps she does not know about them. But all of them must have been instituted in pursuance of a policy, and for that policy, whether she likes it or not, the Secretary of Labor is directly responsible. For her information, then, as well as for that of the public, we cite a few of these cases and demand that Secretary Perkins look into them immediately and act to remedy the human and legal wrongs she will discover when she looks. There is the case of John Ujich, a resident of the United States for thirty years, who has been ordered to surrender to Ellis Island on August 23 for deportation to Italy the next day. A bitter opponent of Mussolini and a Yugoslav by birth, Ujich's deportation will be equivalent to a sentence of death. He was arrested in Tacoma, Washington, for activities in behalf of the unemployed. Dan Agalos, a railroad worker who has lived in this country for twenty-five years, is an active union member and was arrested as an "agitator" and held for deportation following a speech which he made to railroad workers. Gust Saderquist is another union man from Portland, Maine. He was charged with advocating the violent overthrow of the government, but no evidence was brought forward at his trial to prove the charge. If he is deported it will be because he is a militant supporter of the rights of the unemployed and a Communist. These three cases are typical of many more. Is our immigration law to be used as a sly device for keeping out or throwing out radical political opinion? Is this the policy of the Administration as interpreted by the Department of Labor? Prompt action in the pending cases will be the most convincing denial that Secretary Perkins can offer.

THE SILVER BLOC is indignant over the recent decline in the price of silver. Despite the fact that the Treasury recently purchased more silver in a single day than was produced in the United States in the whole of last year, the Administration is charged with sabotaging the silver-purchase act by failing to run the price to $1.29 an ounce. In listing the dire effects of neglecting to push the silver program more actively, Senator Elmer Thomas, leader of the Senate inflationists, pointed out that a decline in value of silver at the present time will cause the United States to lose the huge sums expended in buying the metal at higher prices. This sudden solicitude for the government exchequer is indeed touching in the do-something-for-silver group. After having forced the government to throw away hundreds of millions of the taxpayers' money in the interest of a handful of speculators and stockholders, the silver bloc is complaining because the United States has not spent enough to rig the market. It is true that if the entire resources of the government were utilized to purchase surplus supplies of peanuts, rubber heels, typewriters, or silver, the price of those commodities might be run up indefinitely, to the profit of the producers of them. But there is no conceivable reason why silver should continue to receive the lion's share of governmental favor. Why not try buying up surplus stocks of labor at better than market wages? The producers of labor power also have votes.

CHIANG KAI-SHEK'S HOLD on China appears to be materially weaker as a result of Wang Ching-wei's resignation as president of the Executive Yuan. Officially Wang's retirement as the active head of the government was ascribed to failing health, but illness is frequently an attribute of statesmanship in China. It is significant that two other Cabinet officers closely associated with Wang's left wing of the Nationalist Party—Ku Meng-yu, Minister of Railways, and Chen Kung-po, Minister of Industry, resigned with him. That dissatisfaction with Chiang Kai-shek's open pro-Japanese policies has been growing in China can no longer be concealed. The withdrawal of the left wing from active responsibility in the government is probably an intimation that they, at least, foresee the doom of the present regime. Another straw which indicates the direction of the wind is the recently announced decision of the Chinese Communists to cooperate with any group which will actively oppose Japanese domination. If the Cantonese and the former Nineteenth Route Army group join the Communists and the Wang faction in open opposition to Chiang, there will be no outstanding political figure, outside of Chiang's immediate family, whom he can draw in to give "face" to the government. As a result he will either have to resign or—as is more likely—try to establish a personal dictatorship based on Japanese arms. In either event the end of Chiang's long reign is probably in sight.

JAPAN also is faced with far-reaching political changes as the result of the murder of General Tetsuzan Nagata, Director of Military Affairs and chief aide of War Minister Hayashi. General Nagata incurred the enmity of an influential section of the military clique because of the assistance he gave to Hayashi in eliminating certain extremists from high posts in the army. In planning his assassination Colonel Aizawa, one of the leaders of the fascist element, doubtless recalled the wave of anti-government feeling which followed the attacks on unpopular government officials several years ago. But if he expected a similar response to his crime he seriously misjudged Japanese psychology, for Nagata's murder brought an immediate reaction against the jingoist groups and in favor of the more moderate policies of Hayashi. The reaction may be temporary, but there is reason to hope that it marks the beginning of the decline of fascism in Japan. The military faction appears to have been seriously weakened by lack of leadership and internal dissension, while the civilian elements, discreetly silent as long as the nation was gripped by a patriotic frenzy, are beginning to reassert themselves. Barring a new adventure in Mongolia or Siberia, Japan may yet return to its senses.

WITH STREICHER arousing 100,000 "Aryans" in Berlin to a frenzy against the Jews, and Schacht denouncing irresponsible anti-Semitism in Königsberg, the German political scene in the third year of the Führer presents all of the confusion that is popularly supposed to exist only in a democracy. Ostensibly all opposition agencies have been either liquidated or "coordinated"—the recent steps against the Steel Helmets and Freemasons eliminating the last of the old non-Nazi organizations. Actually, however, organized opposition has never been more open and widespread. As we go to press, Catholic leaders are assembling in Berlin to "define" their attitude toward the Third Reich; farmers have balked at paying increased taxes; open Communist activity is reported in many industrial centers. The growing political unrest is but a reflection of heightened economic uncertainties threatening, according to Schacht, national bankruptcy. Prices continue to rise, while wages tend downward. Streicher's new drive against the Jews and Freemasons may serve to divert existing popular dissatisfaction, but it cannot give the Reich needed raw materials and credits; nor can Schacht with his more orthodox program as long as he is checkmated on every side by extreme measures of the Nazi fanatics. A dictatorship is of little value when the dictator cannot decide on basic matters of policy.

THE DUFFY COPYRIGHT BILL, which has passed the Senate after having been fought over for two years, contains many provisions which will please authors and reputable publishers, though some of the amendments which have been incorporated are in violation of the best principles of copyright legislation. The bill would extend the present copyright run of twenty-eight years (plus an optional twenty-eight-year renewal) to fifty-six years, it would prevent the copyrighting of photographs without the consent of the individuals, and it would give greater flexibility in the matter of damages where a copyright has been violated. All of these features are obviously good, but they are counterbalanced by Senator Trammell's amendment striking out the provision which would permit foreign authors to copyright their works in this country without having them printed here. The requirement of an American imprint has done grave injustice to European writers, especially those whose works sell in small quantities. Reputable American publishers, when they buy foreign sheets, ignore the printing requirement of the present law and arrange for royalties to foreign authors, but less scrupulous houses take advantage of the law to pirate foreign books. We hope that when the Duffy bill reaches the House this defect will be remedied.

WE REPRODUCE here a telegram, guaranteed to be genuine, which reveals the high mental plane on which a great publisher operates. It will interest the growing body of non-readers of the Hearst press. It should also prove enlightening to the rugged individuals in San Diego and Kalamazoo, to whom the typical Hearst red-baiting editorial is addressed, to learn that their daily journalistic bread is baked, sliced, and poisoned in a central office in New York.

> US31 NEW YORK, AUG. 7, 1935
> TO UNIVERSAL SERVICE BUREAUS
> AND ALL HEARST EDITORS:
> THE CHIEF INSTRUCTS THAT THE PHRASE SOAK THE SUCCESSFUL BE USED IN ALL REFERENCES TO THE ADMINISTRATION'S TAX PROGRAM INSTEAD OF THE PHRASE SOAK THE THRIFTY HITHERTO USED STOP ALSO HE WANTS THE WORDS RAW DEAL USED INSTEAD OF NEW DEAL.
> E. D. COBLENTZ

THE POLICE "CLEAN-UP" of the New York City parks has elicited considerable commendation from various sources, but it seems to us that a clean-up of the police themselves would be more in order. In line with what seems to be the traditional policy of the police everywhere, the New York constabulary appear to think that their uniforms entitle them to beat up citizens on the slightest provocation. Their indiscriminate slugging came in for considerable and wholly justified censure in the second report of Mayor LaGuardia's committee investigating the Harlem riot early this year. And only the other day they again showed their high-handedness by severely beating up a reporter of the New York Post for the "crime" of driving in the wrong direction on a one-way street in Brooklyn. The Post naturally played up the story, but there must be scores of such cases every week that do not get into the papers. A police force that acts like a bunch of gangsters is in need of a first-class purge of the kind that the first Roosevelt administered when he was police commissioner of New York City. Commissioner Valentine proposes to make the force more efficient by retiring all men over sixty. It would be more to the point if he took steps to instil some respect for the law in the minds of police officers, old and young, charged with enforcing it.

Rome Defies the Powers

FACED with complete intransigence on the part of Italy, old-fashioned diplomacy has proved no more successful than the League in finding a solution for the Italo-Ethiopian controversy. The Paris conference merely revealed what has been suspected for many months: as far as Mussolini is concerned, Italy is determined to fight. Baron Aloisi's inadvertent reference to the "front" was an accurate reflection of Il Duce's state of mind. Ethiopia, though not represented at the discussions, let it be known that it was prepared to grant substantial mineral and commercial concessions to Italy in the hope of averting war. It even intimated that it would be willing to extend extraterritorial rights to European colonists engaged in developing backward sections of the country, and to permit Italy to undertake railway and highway construction under most favorable terms. But Mussolini is not interested in concessions of this type. Ethiopia is fairly rich in undeveloped resources, but Italy is in no position to take advantage of the opportunities offered. A poor country, it would find difficulty in raising sufficient capital for the exploitation of Ethiopia's resources even if it were permitted to do so, while few Italians could be induced to take up residence under the African sun for the sake of dubious rewards that could come only after years of intensive labor. The failure of Italy to colonize and develop the resources of its present possessions is adequate proof of its lack of interest in mere economic opportunities.

In demanding annexation of the Ethiopian lowlands and a protectorate over the higher sections, Mussolini has made it clear that Italy is motivated primarily not by the prospect of great wealth but by considerations of national prestige. There is abundant evidence that the economic and political situation in Italy is far from satisfactory, and it is doubtless felt that a successful war is the one way out. This explains not only why Rome has shown so little interest in the Paris conference but also why war preparations have been stepped up in the face of Ethiopia's conciliatory attitude. It does not mean, however, that war is necessarily inevitable. Despite the fiasco at Paris three possibilities of averting hostilities remain. First and most likely, though highly unsatisfactory from the standpoint of international equity, is the possibility that Ethiopia may make territorial concessions of a sufficiently drastic character to satisfy the demands of Italian prestige. Or, to put it a bit more realistically, the powers may decide to sacrifice Ethiopian independence in order to prevent a most embarrassing war. Second, it is not inconceivable that strong diplomatic pressure exerted by Great Britain and France might yet force Mussolini to scale down his demands. Despite his apparently unyielding stand, Mussolini has shown that he is not wholly impervious to external pressure. Throughout the years his foreign policy has been characterized by bluster, but he has been extremely circumspect in action. A sudden shift in European alignments would almost certainly postpone or avert war.

Finally, there is the possibility that the international peace machinery may be brought into operation against Italy. Although the chance that the League of Nations will take vigorous action appears remote, hostilities could be prevented even at this late date if the moral and economic sanctions of that agency could be brought into play. Much depends on the attitude of Great Britain. Should England—after formal action by the League—take steps to close the Suez Canal to Italian troops and supplies, no war would be possible. Next to France and Great Britain, the United States is perhaps in the most strategic position to exercise pressure through established international agencies. As in the Manchurian controversy, the League is unlikely to act unless it is assured of our whole-hearted support. As sponsor of the Kellogg pact, to which both Italy and Ethiopia are signatories, we have a responsibility which cannot be dodged without rendering that document a scrap of paper. For if the world stands idly by and allows Mussolini a free hand in Africa, no power on earth can stop Hitler from following his example in Europe a few years hence. On the other hand, if the League by an eleventh-hour action, with or without the active aid of the United States, could stop a conflict for which preparations have been under way for more than a year, the danger of a war in Europe would be reduced almost to the vanishing-point.

Must We Fight in the Next War?

BARRING a sudden burst of energy in Washington, the outbreak of the Italo-Ethiopian conflict is likely to find the United States as unprepared as in 1914 to resist the forces drawing it into the inferno. The recent publication of Secretary Lansing's letter revealing one of the steps by which we became unwittingly entangled in the World War merely reinforces the fear that a new chain of events is in the process of being forged from which there will be no escape. No one in this country desired war in 1914. Yet once hostilities started, the temptation to enrichment by the sale of munitions and needed raw materials was irresistible. This necessitated credits, and when credits no longer sufficed, it became essential to advance loans or face the consequences of a severe industrial crisis. Finally, in 1917, as Ambassador Page's cablegram to Wilson so clearly shows, there came the choice between entering the war and losing the billions that the Allies owed American banking firms—a loss which would have led almost certainly to complete economic prostration. Given a society based on profit-making, war was the inevitable choice. From a political standpoint the attempt to maintain neutrality proved equally hopeless. Germany insisted that by shipping to the Allies and not to the Central Powers we were violating the spirit of our neutrality; yet to have cut off all shipments to the Allies would likewise have been construed as a hostile act. The result was that both sides constantly violated our "rights," leaving war against both as the sole means of preserving a strict neutrality between them.

Spurred by the threat of a new conflict in Europe, discussions have been under way in Washington for some months in an effort to find a means of averting a repetition of this insane chain of events. As early as last December President Roosevelt intimated that a fundamental change in the traditional concept of neutrality was under consideration. Nothing further developed, however, until April, when Senators Clark and Nye of the Munitions Investigating Committee introduced a series of resolutions in Congress providing for a mandatory embargo on arms, loans, and credits during war time. Similar bills were submitted in the House by Representatives Maverick and Kloeb. Early in July two of the Clark-Nye resolutions were favorably reported by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, only to be hastily withdrawn at the urgent request of the State Department. After some haggling a subcommittee was appointed to confer with Secretary Hull's department with a view to drawing up a program which would meet its objections. Meanwhile the House Foreign Affairs Committee has introduced a bill embodying the somewhat milder proposals of the State Department.

Although differing in detail, the Maverick and the Clark-Nye resolutions are practically identical in principle. In the belief that the prevailing policy of drift can only lead to war, they propose mandatory legislation, to be adopted immediately, which would abridge our traditional neutral rights by (1) prohibiting the shipment of arms and ammunition to all belligerents in time of war; (2) outlawing all loans and credits; (3) restricting trade in goods and raw materials which may be declared contraband; and (4) limiting travel by American citizens in war zones. The Clark-Nye bill would go a step farther and permit the President to declare embargoes on munitions and loans in case war threatened to break out in any part of the world which might involve "the United States in international complications." The McReynolds bill, following the recommendations of the State Department, says nothing about credits and would make the application of the other restrictions optional with the President.

All these resolutions bear the earmarks of a close study of the factors which led us into the World War, but the earlier ones exhibit a certain naivete in assuming that neutrality and isolationism are synonymous. More frequently than not an embargo applied against both parties tends to be a violation of true neutrality. In the Bolivian-Paraguayan conflict, for example, the arms embargo proved chiefly embarrassing to Bolivia, and thus virtually gave aid to Paraguay, the aggressor. Similarly, the refusal of many European countries to ship arms to Italy and Ethiopia has played directly into Mussolini's hands. An arms embargo by itself may be of little value, moreover, as long as raw materials and other supplies continue to be shipped. And it is highly doubtful whether any measure which so seriously curtails profits can be enforced under the capitalist system. Even under more primitive conditions the combined opposition of Southern planters and New England merchants forced President Jefferson to abandon the Embargo Act of 1807, similar in principle to the present proposals. An effective embargo against a number of major powers would not only endanger potential profits but cause us to lose a substantial share of our present trade with those countries.

It is thus an open question whether the abandonment of our insistence on traditional neutral rights would keep us out of war or produce a reaction which would force us into the conflict. A fully realistic view of the forces which dominate present-day society compels us to admit that the hope of remaining out of a major war once it has started is comparatively slight. In the interdependent world today our greatest hope lies in averting war, not in avoiding participation. This implies a willingness, hitherto absent, to accept our responsibility in creating and maintaining a world system of collective security. Acceptance of our responsibility under this system implies in turn a readiness to enforce economic and financial sanctions against aggressors.

This does not mean, however, that a fundamental revision in the traditional conception of neutrality is not imperative. If the mechanism of collective security breaks down, as seems almost certain in the Italo-Ethiopian controversy, it is still essential that we make an effort to keep out of the conflict. If we are to achieve this, there is no way open save something closely approaching the Clark-Nye formula. Most of the objections which have been offered to this proposal would be eliminated if the President were given discretion to impose the foregoing restrictions on one or both of the belligerents, as is provided in the McReynolds bill. But whatever action is taken must be taken speedily. Delay until the next session of Congress will in all probability be fatal. Once war is under way, and the opportunity for profits is apparent over the horizon, talk of peace will be largely idle chatter.

"They Won't Work"

LOOSE talk about the refusal of persons on relief to take jobs in private industry is growing rather than diminishing in volume. "They'd rather live on relief" has become a theme song among reactionaries, who find in it an argument perfectly suited to their purposes. A correspondent in California writes to tell us of an anonymous feature story which appeared in the Los Angeles Times of August 4 entitled I Found Independence on the Dole. It purports to be a true story written by a woman who with her husband has been living on relief for several years. The author of the article boasts of numerous pleasure trips and other luxuries. "You see, during the past three or four years I've averaged $12 a week on my sewing and that's all for extras. I do not keep the cash in the house but send it by post-office money order to a friend back East who banks it for us." Once in a while, she says, she feels rather sorry for the woman who holds the mortgage on their property. "I try to be fair with her though. Last winter when she was ill and without funds I gave her $5." The Times calls the article to the attention of the "small home-owner who is struggling to keep off the charity rolls," a category which probably includes a majority of the Times readers. "The Times," concludes our correspondent, "unlike the Hearst papers, is well edited and usually ably written. It dominates the breakfast tables in Southern California. Is it any wonder that the lunatic fringe in Los Angeles is probably a little wider than anywhere else in the United States?"

The viciousness of such propaganda is apparent. This particular story bears all the earmarks of having been manufactured. Yet the person of small means is in no mood to disbelieve it. It provides him with a scapegoat—the unemployed—on whom to blame his increasing misery. And it is easier to attack the poor devil clinging to the next lower rung of the ladder than to understand and combat the forces which are pushing both of them slowly downward.

Two weeks ago we adduced evidence to show the falseness of the charge that "they would rather live on relief." Since then Harry L. Hopkins, Federal Emergency Relief Administrator, has made public a study of alleged job refusals among relief clients in Washington which shows that out of 220 cases studied only 4 were found that could with justice be attributed to unwillingness to work. We have also received a copy of a bulletin issued in June by the FERA which contains the results of a similar investigation in Baltimore, Maryland, of 195 cases of alleged refusals. Here, too, the number of actual refusals was 4, while in a study made in Memphis, Tennessee, in 39 cases only one genuine refusal was found. Since the newspaper publicity given to these government findings has been conspicuous for its absence, we print below in much-abbreviated form the results of the investigation in Baltimore. They are more or less duplicated in the other two studies.

> 1. The many broad generalizations about "job refusals" have been based upon a few sporadic incidents and much loose talk.
> 2. Of the 195 cases against which the accusation of "job refusal" was leveled in March and April, only 4 were clear cases of unjustified refusal.
> 3. Of the total cases, 31 involved domestic servants among whom "unemployability" by reason of family composition was found to be acute. This group was also peculiarly subject to wage scales below the minimum-subsistence levels established by the relief administration.
> 4. Of the 164 cases involving other occupations, 65 were found to be persons who had never been on the relief rolls; 65 were either at work or were permanently or temporarily unemployable; 15 did not receive the call or did not get the job; 10 refused for extenuatory reasons; and in 5 cases the records were confused but pointed toward the guiltlessness of the client.
> 5. On the whole, the notion that "forcible measures should be introduced into the relief program to get able-bodied persons to work" is a gross extravagance.

What were the "extenuatory reasons" in the ten cases cited in Finding number 4?

> A mother with four small children failed to accept a job because there was a contagious disease in the employer's home. Two persons failed to accept temporary jobs because of serious illness in their own homes. A daughter, thirty years of age, could not leave her seventy-five-year-old blind mother in order to accept work. One mother refused to accept a job and leave her two children nine and ten years of age. (In this case, further relief was withheld because she had a sister, not on relief, who might have been able to care for the children.) One worker said he had asked for and was refused transportation for an out-of-town job. (His case was "closed" and further relief denied while the case was investigated.) Having had all his tools stolen, a carpenter was obliged to remain on a work-relief job, although he had been offered private employment. Another worker failed to leave a work-relief job and accept private employment because he did not understand that his work-relief job was "relief." (Relief was cut off in this case.) In one case a job was refused because a strike was on in the plant. One worker, whose trade wage was $1.10 per hour, refused to work for 65 cents an hour at the trade. (His relief has been cut off while the case is investigated.)

The bulletin devotes a special section to the situation of the 31 domestic servants included in the survey. Their reasons for refusing jobs were:

Unable to provide transportation for out-of-town jobs	2
Failed to secure jobs for which they reported	2
Unable to leave home for out-of-town job	1
Needed at home to care for sickness	3
Unable to accept "live-in" jobs on account of family responsibility	5
Unable to leave small children (three were unmarried mothers)	8
Accepted job, leaving after first day because not as represented	1
Had part-time job paying more than the job offered	1
Refused jobs primarily because of low wages	8

It will be noted that 8 of the 31 refused jobs primarily because of low wages. Since this is the unforgivable sin for those who earn their living by exposing the unemployed let us examine some of these cases. A two-day odd job at $1.20 a day was refused because it was overloaded with washing. (The usual wage for such work is $1.50 to $2 a day.) A widow with a ten-year-old daughter refused a job the net wage of which would have been $2.60 a week; a seventeen-year-old girl who recently had an operation for appendicitis, who has a serious hernia, and who is an incipient tubercular, refused a job requiring that she do the housework, the washing and ironing, and care for two children at $5 a week; the mother of three small children refused a part-time night job (estimated to require thirty-five hours) paying $2.50 a week; an unmarried mother refused a full-time job netting $4.60 a week because it would be insufficient to support her and her four-year-old son; a widow, the mother of three small children, refused a job paying $5.60 a week, on the ground that this wage would not permit her to provide for care for her children during working hours; a recently deserted mother of four small children would not accept a temporary job at $1 a day.

We cannot better the conclusion of the government bulletin itself: "Until reasonable and just standards are established and maintained, merely to affirm that 'some of them find more security in relief than in work' is to beg the main question."

Helmut von Gerlach

WHEN Helmut von Gerlach, writer, statesman, and refugee from Nazi Germany, died suddenly in Paris on August 2, the world lost one of the most interesting personalities in pre-Hitler public life. The Gerlachs were of ancient Brandenburg nobility, close to the Hohenzollern court. From time immemorial they had been ministers, generals, statesmen, and clergymen. His milieu predestined Helmut von Gerlach for a successful political career. But early in life he threw family and tradition to the winds, unable to reconcile the ideals of a Prussian aristocrat with his own political conscience. As a young state official he was located in the remote country district in which lay the estates of the Bismarck family. His nature rebelled against the suppression of a peasantry still living under semi-feudal laws. These early years awakened in him the deep sense of social responsibility which gave direction to his whole later life.

At that time—in the early eighties—Europe was struggling under the weight of a severe economic and political crisis. In France the adventurer General Boulanger was making his historic attempt to establish a military dictatorship. In Germany Hofprediger Stöcker, a gifted demagogue, had founded the Christian Social movement. Offering a mixture of pietism, reaction, anti-Semitism, and a sort of charity-socialism, Stöker collected a petty-bourgeois, feudal following. Its ostensible purpose was the erection of barriers to the growing power of the new capitalist bourgeoisie. In practice it became the chief opponent of the Social Democracy. In retrospect Stöcker's doctrine presents itself to the student of German history as a forerunner of National Socialism. The young Gerlach was caught up in a movement which seemed to him an expression of rebellion against existing evils. How could he know that half a century later he would have to flee from Germany to escape the vengeance of the fully matured successor of this anti-Semitic "socialism"? In 1896 he followed the famous Pfarrer Naumann out of Stöcker's party into the National Social Party, which stood for an imperial state combining progressive social ideas with an intense imperialism in foreign affairs, and for a highly developed capitalism with better conditions for labor. Soon after his election to the Reichstag in 1903 as the only representative of this paradoxical movement, Gerlach came to realize that imperialism is the father of political and social reaction. The Morocco crisis and the narrow escape from war with France turned him against the imperial house. Gerlach became a pacifist.

It was as a leader of the pacifist movement that von Gerlach earned the admiration and respect of the present generation. He was one of the few in the Reich who stuck to their pacifist convictions when Germany went to war in 1914. After the German revolution he belonged to the very small group of bourgeois democrats who remained true to their cause. He was severely critical of the complaisance of the Social Democracy toward the increasing militarism of the new regime and the growth of the fascist movement. He was one of the few who favored friendship with France. Only the weak and compromising policy of the Social Democracy prevented him from joining the Socialist movement. The Communist philosophy offended his ingrained faith in democracy and his highly developed individualism.

German reactionaries hated men like Gerlach and Ossietsky the more because they regarded them as traitors to the class from which they had sprung and for that reason more dangerous than the average radical. As editor of the Welt am Montag before and during the war, Gerlach was feared and respected by the ruling groups. As regular contributor and, after Carl von Ossietsky's arrest by the Gestapo, as editor of the Weltbühne in Berlin, he was a powerful influence against war and fascism and for international understanding. Shortly after the advent of Hitler he was warned that he must leave Germany at once or share the fate of his unfortunate colleague.

We may or may not agree with Gerlach's point of view. But in times of great crisis the example of one true and courageous fighter holds out hope to millions who would otherwise despair.

Issues and Men

Russia Aids the Jews

NO nation has done more to aid the Jew in this crisis of the race's history than the wicked and godless Soviets. France, it is true, has been marvelous in its friendship and hospitality and has received from Germany about 25,000 émigrés, both Jews and Gentiles. England, too, has lived up to its historic reputation of according asylum to the victims of political and racial persecution. According to the official figures of James G. MacDonald, League of Nations High Commissioner for German Refugees, Palestine has so far absorbed 27,000, the United States 6,000, and South America 3,000 victims of Hitlerism. It has remained for Russia, however, to set aside an entire area of not less than 18,000,000 acres, Biro-Bidjan, as a "Jewish autonomous region," with the promise that as soon as the number of Jews there reaches 25,000, Biro-Bidjan will be proclaimed a Jewish republic and admitted to the Soviet Union.

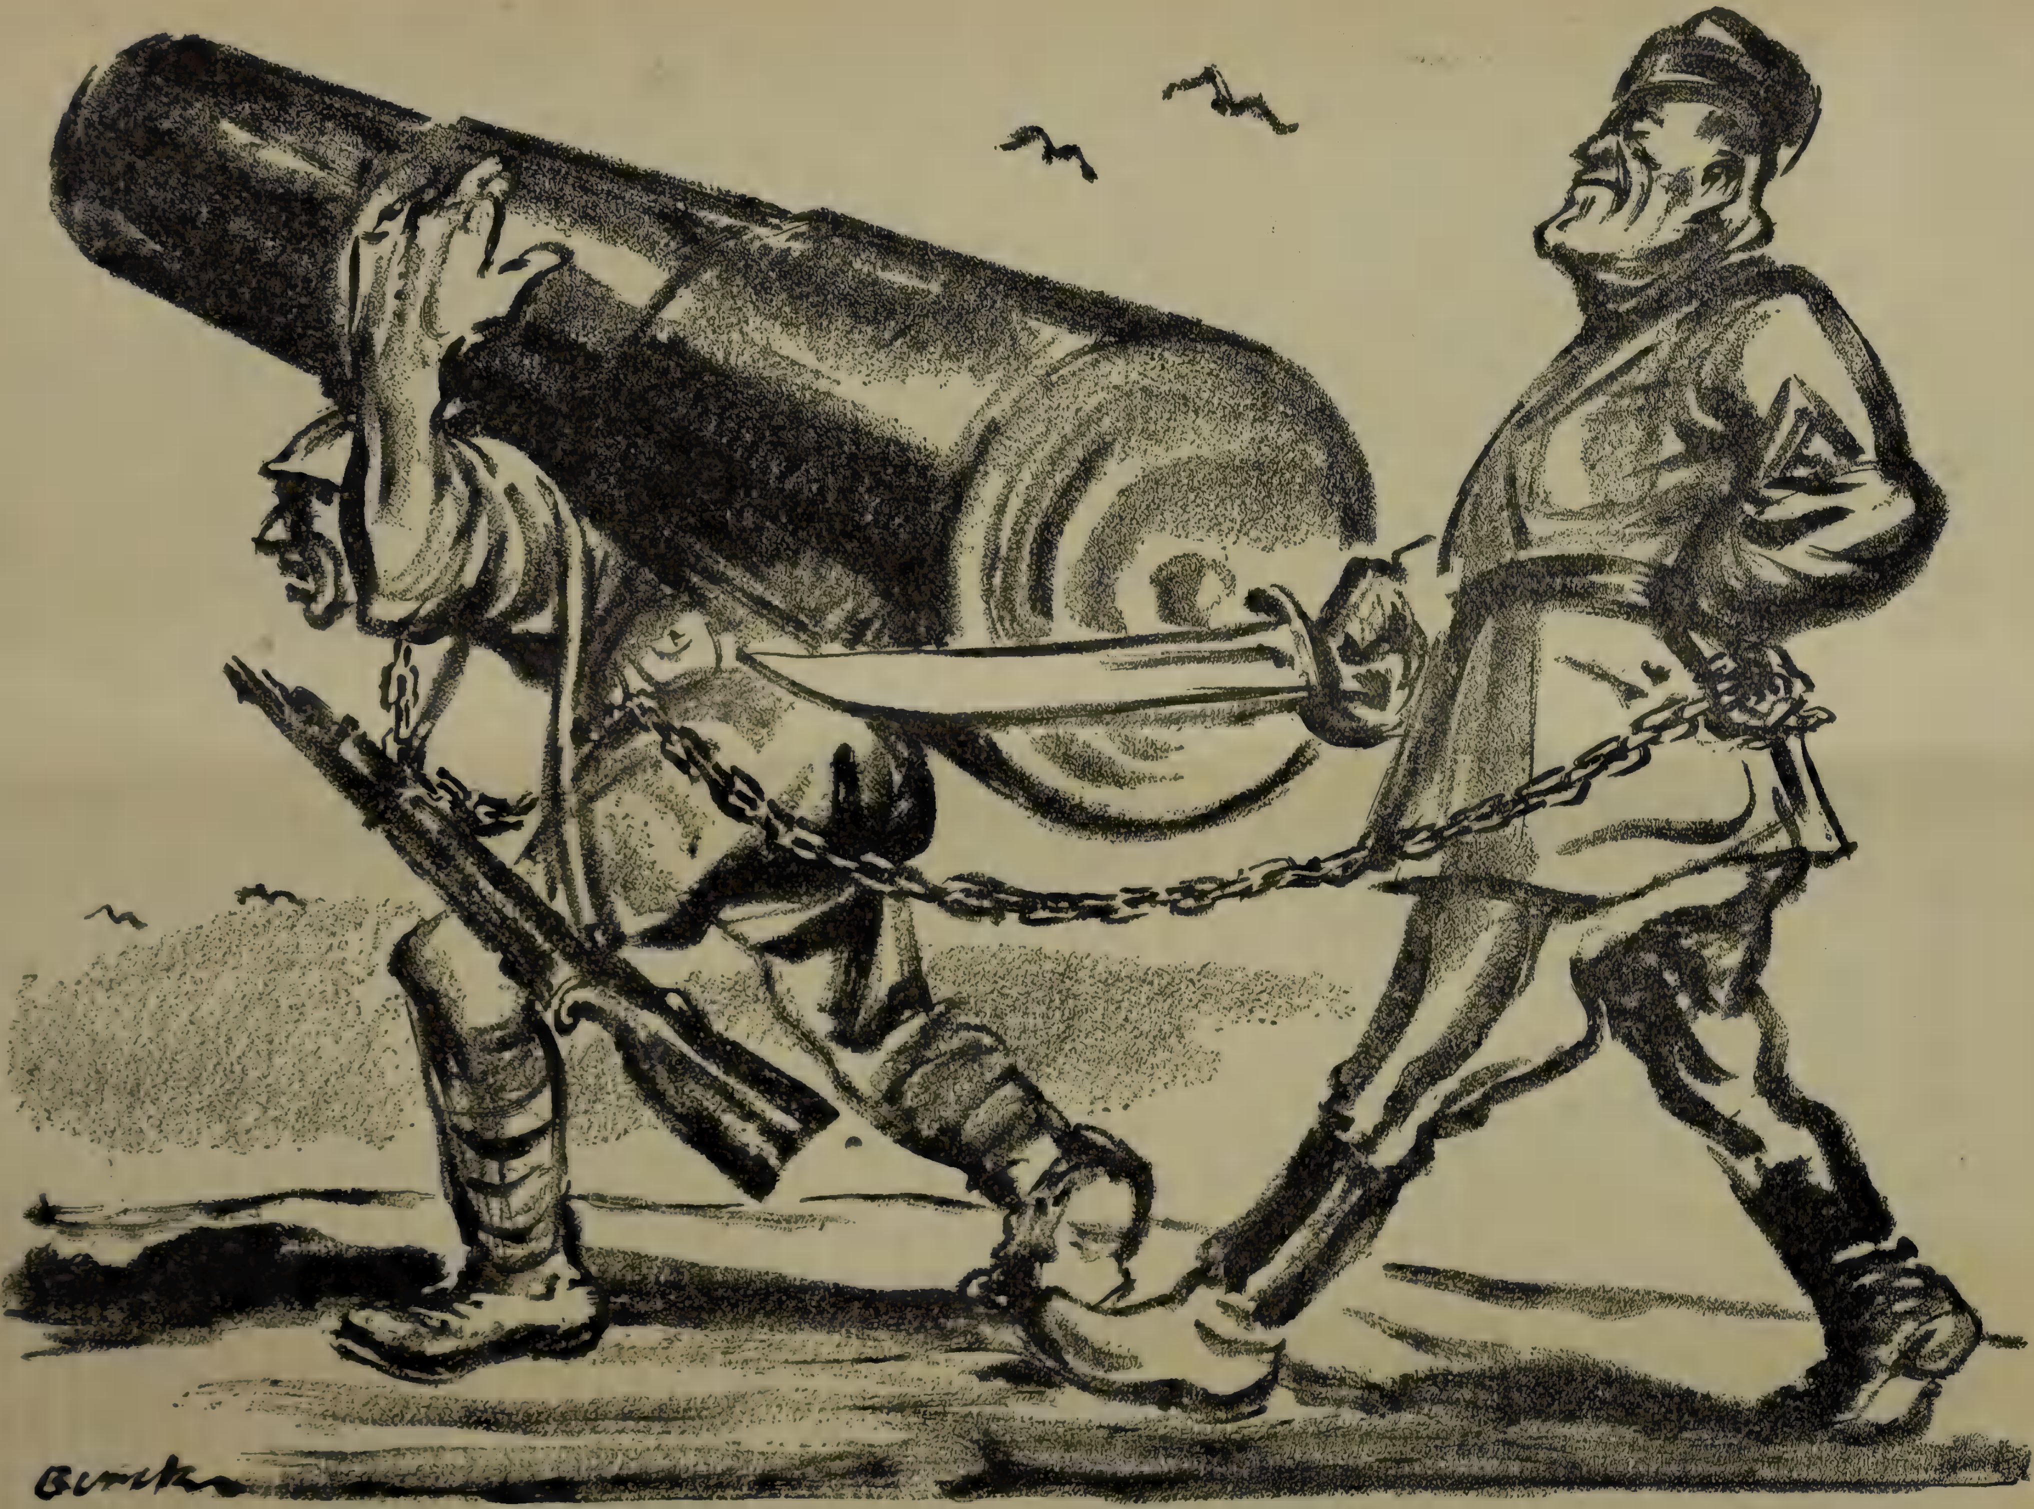
I am well aware that this most generous and high-minded—truly Christian!—action will be seized upon by Hitler and other reactionaries as further proof of their false charge that the Soviet government was founded by Jews and is still ruled by them. Others will say that this gesture is not pure humanitarianism but a clever device to strengthen the Soviets by building another bulwark against the Japanese—Biro-Bidjan is now part of the "Far East Territory" of Russia on the Manchurian border—and generally to serve the cause of communism by adding to the wealth and strength of the Soviet Union. It is quite possible that these motives may have influenced the Soviet government, but when one recalls the historic anti-Jewish attitude of the Russians, the rising tide of anti-Semitism in Poland, Rumania, and Hungary today, and the denunciation of Soviet Russia as a Jewish-run state, one must surely give credit to the leaders of the Soviets for having offered hospitality on such a large scale. Their action is all the more remarkable because there are four other places in Russia where "Jewish regions" have been set aside, with a total Jewish population now of some 83,000 persons. The least that can be said of all this is that the Soviet government is living up to its policy of complete respect for its national minorities.

The significance of this promise of a future Jewish republic can best be understood if one realizes the limitations of Palestine and faces the renewed German attacks upon the Jews. There is obviously a most determined effort to drive the German Jews out, or to shut them up like lepers as too unclean to participate in any communal activity, to enter a hotel, a cafe, a theater, a concert, or a health resort, or to enjoy a bathing beach. This is a challenge to the whole world, for Hitler and his vicious aides care not one whit what happens to the victims of their cruelty. They are willing that the remaining Jews or half Jews in Germany, who total between 800,000 and 900,000 (there were only 562,000 pure-blooded Jews in Germany in 1932), shall flee over the border, after being robbed of their property and money, and become a burden upon the rest of the world. They have not the slightest regard for the vast task thus put upon other nations, no realization that this gives foreign nations the right to take a very active part in Germany's internal affairs, despite the German Ambassador's latest statement to the contrary. According to Mr. MacDonald it has been a desperate struggle to place the 80,000 refugees, of whom from 15 to 20 per cent are non-Jews who have left Germany for reasons of conscience or political beliefs. He reports a grave situation among the thousands of refugees in Paris, Prague, Amsterdam, and elsewhere. The Christian church bodies, with the exception of the ever-generous, ever-noble-spirited Quakers, have failed to contribute to the relief of this desperate human need. What will happen if the 80,000 refugees are swollen to 400,000?

While the Soviets have not fixed the maximum number of Jews they will take in Biro-Bidjan, it is understood that they are ready to accept immediately more than 4,000, provided that those chosen are suitable persons for their new environment and that they are equipped with the tools of their trades—when they have trades. The government will give to a settler his passage to his new home and bestow upon him land and a house, but insists that the immigrant must have health, strength, training, and equipment. To supply these things is one of the pressing problems of the hour, and is the reason why sustaining committees have been formed in this country and England under the honorary chairmanship of Lord Dudley Marley. The Soviet government does not ask that the new settlers be avowed Communists. It does expect that they will abide by Russian laws and institutions whether they approve of the abolition of private property or not. The Soviets simply offer a man the right to live a new life and to build a new home under conditions which promise his safety from persecution because of race or religion. Unquestionably settlers will not have liberty as we understand it, or freedom of utterance. But they are offered a chance to live, to exist, and that is all the Jew can hope for in many places under the sun today.

One word more as to Biro-Bidjan. The region now has a population of only 50,000, of whom 30,000 are Russians, 12,000 Jews, 4,500 Koreans, who have preferred to move there rather than to live under Japanese rule in the land of their ancestors, 3,000 Ukrainians, and 1,000 Chinese. Lord Marley, who has recently visited Biro-Bidjan, declares that it has sunshine the whole year except during the rainy season of six or eight weeks in the middle of summer. The climate is like southern Canada, with plenty of snow for three or four months. Setting this tract aside for the ill-treated Jews of the world is a magnificent deed, and history will so proclaim it.

Oswald Garrison Villard



"Our Aim Is to Abolish Slavery"

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Shenanigans of the Power Lobby

By PAUL W. WARD

Washington, August 17

HARDENED though it is to manifestations of putrescence in the legislative process, Washington stands aghast at the sordidness of the fight in Congress over the Wheeler-Rayburn public-utility holding-companies bill. The capital has been especially jolted by the in-fighting methods—the parliamentary and extra-parliamentary scrouging and biting—resorted to by the Honorable John J. O'Connor, Member of Congress from New York's Sixteenth District, and by the discovery of a member of the President's official family—Assistant Secretary Marvin McIntyre—consorting with the enemy. Both men have betrayed the President—one through guile, the other through stupidity—in a fight revolving around the one major issue before Congress in which the sincerity of Roosevelt's position was beyond question, and the capital's revulsion accordingly has been accentuated.

It was apparent from the beginning that the Wheeler-Rayburn bill—an attempt to curb the plundering of operating companies, investors, and consumers by the brigands of high finance—had Roosevelt's heartfelt support. Questioned frequently about it at press conferences, he never attempted to evade, even when the legislative situation was delicate. Furthermore, in his replies he displayed an uncharacteristic familiarity with the measure's details.

The issue was so plainly a personal one with Roosevelt that the recent disclosure that his former law partner, Basil O'Connor, was in the power trust's pay would have caused amazement even had not Basil's elder brother, John, been busily engaged fighting on the utilities' side in the House. Basil, a member of the Committee on Fitness and Character, First Judicial Department, New York, had been not only Roosevelt's law partner from 1924 until he entered the White House but also, for many more years than that, his close friend; he was a house guest of the Roosevelts soon after the inaugural and until recently has been a frequent White House visitor. Furthermore, the younger O'Connor—Basil is forty-three and John fifty—owed to Roosevelt whatever prominence he had attained in political and legal circles which he did not owe to his brother John. He had been an obscure lawyer, practicing solely as an individual, until Roosevelt took him into partnership in 1925.

When Roosevelt came to Washington, Basil O'Connor returned to his lone-hand practice; his influence in New York and Washington thereafter was limited to what he could reflect from Roosevelt and Big Brother John. It was this latter fact that lent particular piquancy to the revelation by spokesmen of the Associated Gas and Electric that the company had paid Basil a $25,000 retainer for his assistance and counsel in certain matters concerning them in New York. It lent something more than piquancy to Brother John's machinations with the Wheeler-Rayburn bill. John, too, had obligations to Roosevelt—if not personal ones, at least party ones. And he was in position to meet them, for as chairman of the House Committee on Rules he was, next to the majority leader, in power in the House. He had assisted in electing Representative Bankhead (Democrat, Alabama) to the floor leadership in order to remove Bankhead from the Rules Committee and thus make himself automatically the senior majority member and, as such, chairman. Since only by extraordinary procedure—impossible in the case of a close-fought issue—can any piece of major legislation reach a vote in the House without the consent of the Rules Committee, its chairman has close to life-and-death power over important bills.

Until the Wheeler-Rayburn bill reached his committee, O'Connor had used his power quite unmistakably in accordance with Roosevelt's wishes. To be sure, he had delayed the Wagner labor-disputes bill, and Representative Connery (Democrat, Massachusetts), chairman of the Committee on Labor, once complained before a meeting of A. F. of L. leaders that his committee "reports out all kinds of labor legislation but we never can get a vote because we can't get a rule"; but there is no reason to believe that O'Connor's behavior in these respects was contrary to White House will. If anything, it was condoned there; John was serving both Roosevelt and Tammany at once. He unquestionably was also serving Tammany in his handling of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill; nearly all members of the Tammany delegation in the House, including Tom Cullen, the delegation's leader, voted against the measure. O'Connor, moreover, has reason to serve Tammany; its sachems control his district and he had a hard primary fight in 1934 which he would like to avoid having to face again in 1936.

His first move against the Wheeler-Rayburn bill was taken in the face of Administration efforts to obtain a showdown vote on its most controversial provision—the section which the power trust with poisonous skill has dubbed the "death sentence." O'Connor, who prides himself on his cunning mastery of parliamentary tricks, had his committee report out a rule under which a record vote could not be obtained. In all fairness it should be noted that the course he followed was strictly in line with House procedure and that to have reported a rule calling for a record vote with the House sitting as a committee of the whole would have been extraordinary procedure. O'Connor took refuge in the technicality and waxed bitter when the press, watching members of the House slink between the tellers and try to hide from the galleries how they were voting on the "death sentence," treated his action as a piece of pro-power trust perfidy. Vigorously he denied that, but he, too, voted against the Administration—and the public—on the "death sentence," and when, days later, proponents maneuvered the bill into a position where a record vote was possible, he sought by resort to a technicality to block that showdown.

He was unsuccessful in his effort, but the proponents of the "death sentence" failed to bring about its adoption by compelling their colleagues to rise and be counted for or against it in sight of their constituents. The vote came on a motion to instruct House conferees on the bill to accept the Senate version of the "death sentence"; it was defeated 210 to 155. The opposition professed to be against the "drastic" treatment which the Senate version would accord holding companies, an obscenely hypocritical profession, for the House version prescribed for the holding companies precisely the same life or death that the Senate version prescribed. The only difference was that, whereas in the Senate version an effort had been made to surround the regulatory powers delegated to the SEC with safeguards which would protect them from invalidation by the courts, the House version contained no safeguards. The power trust's lobbyists had seen to it that in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce the "death sentence" provision was plucked and stripped until it was certain to succumb to the first court assault upon it.

The bitterness of the debate in the House over the bill —and especially the charge of Representative Brewster (Republican, Maine) that through Tom Corcoran of the RFC the Administration had threatened to cancel the Passamaquoddy power project in his state if he did not support the measure—precipitated what was supposed to be an investigation by the House of lobbying in connection with the measure. Still unembarrassed by his brother's connection with the power trust—and Basil was in the pay of a section of the utilities industry regarded as a pariah by all the rest—O'Connor leaped once more into the breach. This time he was able to prescribe extraordinary action by the House. He brought out a rule, a resolution, under which his own committee would conduct the investigation, instead of a special committee appointed for that purpose. And having accomplished his object there, he proceeded to bend all efforts toward turning attention away from the power trust's army of lobbyists, bivouacked on whole floors of the town's swankiest hotels. The investigation focused instead on the efforts of Administration officials to push the Wheeler-Rayburn bill through Congress in the Senate version.

The proceeding was so noxious that the Senate promptly moved to smother it by starting a lobby investigation of its own in charge of a special committee headed by Senator Black (Democrat, Alabama). Black's committee soon had made a laughing stock of O'Connor's investigation. Taking O'Connor by surprise, Black organized his committee, mapped a program, and had a witness on the stand within ten minutes. The witness was Philip H. Gadsden, a United Gas Improvement vice-president who headed the power trust's chief lobby, the Committee of Public Utility Executives, which in recent weeks has been occupied chiefly with issuing statements denouncing Basil O'Connor's clients, Associated Gas and Electric, and emphasizing that it considered them so contemptible that it would not open Mr. Gadsden's "committee" to membership for them.

Black not only had Gadsden on the witness stand with breath-taking speed but he also stole a march on O'Connor by having the records of Gadsden's "committee" seized before O'Connor could impound them. Then, after scoring that point and eliciting from Gadsden the information that his committee had spent some $300,000 to defeat the "death sentence," Black recessed his committee and sent out questionnaires to all utility companies to form the basis of a bona fide and comprehensive lobby investigation. From then on it was nip and tuck between the House and Senate investigating groups, with Black's committee constantly in the lead. Unlike O'Connor's committee, Black's plainly was concerned with digging up the dirt against the power trust. With equal plainness, it was bent on counteracting O'Connor's efforts to whitewash the power trust and besmirch the Administration. Black's committee would meet suddenly and briefly, snatch the headlines away from O'Connor's blundering investigators by breaking out a new bit of scandal right under O'Connor's nose, and then recess again. O'Connor whined, blustered, protested, but obdurately kept on.

Then came l'affaire Hopson. Black's committee with the aid of House members—who appeared not too strangely to lack faith in the bona fides of the House's investigation under O'Connor—had dredged up evidence that Associated Gas and Electric alone had spent some $800,000 fighting the "death sentence" and that in doing so it not only had caused thousands of protest telegrams to be sent at its expense to Congressmen without the knowledge of those whose names were signed to the messages (including some men long dead and others missing), but also had sought to destroy the evidence of this duplicity. From Associated Gas and Electric representatives who were called, it was learned not only that Basil O'Connor was on the utility's payroll but that so also were Patrick J. Hurley, former Secretary of War, and Joseph P. Tumulty, Wilson's former secretary, who now practices law and lobbying in Washington. A subpoena was issued for H. C. Hopson, master of the Associated Gas and Electric monstrosity. It was issued the last week in July but to no avail, for Hopson, who two years ago had evaded a Senate Banking Committee subpoena for six weeks, had taken it on the lam.

The Senate's search grew hot and bitter, and as it progressed, O'Connor's committee began to catch up. Finally it, too, issued a subpoena for Hopson. Then apparently a deal was made by Hopson, and it was not with Black but with the brother of Hopson's retainer, John O'Connor. Certainly, if it was not a deal, appearances never were more deceiving, for Hopson surrendered, preferentially, to the House committee. The arrangements for his surrender were made without the knowledge of any member of that committee except O'Connor, and after the surrender was effected O'Connor fought valiantly to protect Hopson from being captured by the Senate committee. An attempt was made to give Hopson's surrender the appearance of an actual capture by O'Connor's committee, but that broke down when Hopson, testifying under oath, was compelled to say he had given himself up by arrangement. He professed, however, not to know with whom or by whom the arrangement was made.

O'Connor had Hopson secreted away from the Senate committee's process-servers the night of his arrival and brought him before the House committee the following morning, August 13. When an investigator for the Black committee attempted to serve Hopson with a subpoena that noon as he left the House hearing, he was pushed aside by a bodyguard O'Connor had provided for the utilities magnate. Haled before the Black committee, the guards testified they were acting under instructions from O'Connor. The latter hid Hopson away the rest of that day and night, and the following day found himself in trouble with members of his committee who objected to this smelly procedure, with the result that one of Black's investigators was permitted to serve Hopson with a subpoena as he left the House hearing a little before noon. The subpoena ordered Hopson to appear at once before the Black committee, but he ignored it. Black had his committee wait for Hopson until 1:30 p. m. Then he reconvened it at 3 and it waited for Hopson until 4 p. m. Hopson having failed to put in an appearance at that hour, Black's committee presented to the Senate a resolution citing Hopson and his attorney, William A. Hill, for contempt.

O'Connor promptly put on another amazing demonstration. The head of the committee that was supposed to be probing lobbying for the House immediately appeared on the Senate floor, lobbying frantically to save Hopson from being cited for contempt. He had told Hopson to ignore the Senate's subpoena and argue that he could not respond to it while under subpoena from the House. To afford Hopson a technical basis for that argument, O'Connor had Hopson at that very moment tucked away in a cubbyhole where William Collins, investigator for O'Connor's committee, was going through the motions of questioning him to preserve the aspect of custody. O'Connor's lobbying in the Senate apparently had some weight with Senator Robinson, the majority leader, for Robinson tried to have the contempt citation held up, but he was unsuccessful and it was passed without debate or a dissenting vote.

Then the Senate's hunt for Hopson began anew. This time the searcher carried not a subpoena but a warrant for his arrest. It was never served. Hopson was too well hidden. And in the morning the dauntless O'Connor made one more bid to save his brother's client. He strove to put through his committee and the House a resolution which would have directed the House's sergeant-at-arms to arrest Hopson and hold him in sole custody until O'Connor's committee had completed its farcical questioning of the financier. The resolution would have perfected Hopson's defense against the Senate's contempt citation. But O'Connor's plans went awry. His committee revolted and refused to report the resolution in the form presented. It insisted, and so did the House, that Hopson be made available to the Black committee whenever his presence before the House committee was not required. O'Connor, striving valiantly to fulfil his mission and stave off Hopson's appearance before the Black committee until Congress had completed action on the "death sentence," then shot his last bolt. He had Hopson questioned in chambers by Collins until after five o'clock that afternoon, then offered him to the Black committee with the understanding that O'Connor should have him back in the morning. Black's committee, however, was not to be so easily gulled; instead of saying it was too late in that extraordinarily hot day for the committee to sit in interrogation of Hopson, it fairly boosted O'Connor's fat and grotesque little protege on to the witness stand and kept him sweating there for two hours. In those two hours it elicited more information from him than O'Connor had even attempted to produce in two days.

We have skipped over l'affaire McIntyre in this chronological narration of O'Connor's shenanigans (the libel laws forbid a more precise descriptive) the better to keep their multiplicity clear. L'affaire McIntyre occurred on the night the Senate's sergeant-at-arms, Chesley Jurney, with an arrest warrant in his hand and trailed by a pack of reporters, was searching for Hopson. The search had led by ten o'clock to the Shoreham Hotel and the door of a suite there occupied by B. B. Robinson, who had directed the Associated Gas and Electric lobby and in the process, as he told O'Connor's committee, had had "oh, a wonderful time" entertaining Members of Congress. What Jurney and his trailing pack of reporters found in the suite of Robinson, chief foe of the bill which more than any other had Roosevelt's heartfelt support, was not Hopson but Robinson himself, a squad of blondes, Amon G. Carter, publisher of the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, and two Administration officials—L. W. (Chip) Robert, Jr., Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and Marvin H. McIntyre, the man who determines who shall and who shall not see the President.

Both McIntyre and Robert are famous seekers after the flowing bowl and merry company, and McIntyre, at least, finds the capital's lobbyists the best of guides to both. Finding him, then, in company with a lobbyist would have been no surprise under ordinary circumstances. But finding him making merry with Hopson's tool, Robinson, shocked Washington into a realization of the incredibility of McIntyre's habits and of that greater incredibility—that Roosevelt keeps him in the White House.

There is another and corollary incident that demands mention, and that is the disgraceful performance of the Associated Press in connection with l'affaire McIntyre. (He, incidentally, is reported dauntlessly to have had dinner the following day with Robinson.) Publisher Carter, on noting the pack of reporters at Jurney's heels, proclaimed the fact that his paper was a customer of all three press services represented there and warned the representatives that if they put the story of their encounter on the wires he would get their jobs. Then he hustled them into the hotel's bar and left a blank check behind to pay for drinks. To the Hearst press service's everlasting credit it promptly dispatched the tale. The United Press also put it on the wire, albeit not until long after midnight when it could not catch many papers. The Associated Press, however, suppressed the story, and not until late the following day did it release the yarn. Even then it acted only under badgering from editors in various parts of the country, and, although one of its own men had witnessed the incident, the Associated Press avoided responsibility and had the story sent out of New York in a form which represented it as an exclusive yarn dispatched to the New York Post by its Washington correspondent. Carter, it appears, is a power in the Associated Press. He is newsworthy in his own right. He boasts large influence with the Roosevelt Administration and can point at least to the fact that his protege, Silliman Evans, was made an Assistant Postmaster General at the New Deal's outset. Evans now heads the Maryland Casualty Company by the good grace of Jesse Jones and the RFC. Carter also is remembered as the man who struck terror in the hearts of Rice Hotel guests during the Democratic national convention at Houston in 1928 by some fancy open work with a bullet-spitting six-shooter in moments of excessive hilarity. His and McIntyre's companion on the night of August 14, "Chip" Robert, was a protege of the late Jack Cohen, Atlanta publisher and Democratic national committeeman from Georgia. Cohen wanted to be Secretary of the Navy, and failing in that was solaced by having his bosom friend "Chip," an Atlanta construction engineer, made Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in charge of public works. Morgenthau has since stripped him of virtually all authority, and he now has charge of "engraving and printing and mint service."

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Britain's Boom in War Planes

By FRANK C. HANIGHEN

London, August 5

THE recent rearming of Great Britain is the cause of the greatest boom in the armament business since the World War. The cause of the rearming, however, does not seem to be entirely the widely publicized menace across the Rhine. The desire of the armament makers to boom their own business apparently has had much to do with it. Certainly the press and the friends of the armament makers in the government have employed all the devices for manipulating public opinion, including exploitation of the monarchy, to build up an atmosphere of alarm and war excitement. In the aeroplane they have found the most spectacular and appealing of the weapons of war. A picture of the King inspecting a Handley-Page bomber—common in British newspapers in the past few months—has become the symbol of Britain's new war boom.

The Jubilee and preparations for the Jubilee were coincident with the introduction of the new defense estimates, which increased the war budget by £10,539,000, and brought a sharp rise in Vickers shares. The air force, in the midst of the hanging of Jubilee festoons, was the principal recipient of favors. On May 3 Ramsay MacDonald announced: "The government is already taking steps for the further and accelerated extension of the Royal Air Force." In June the tempo increased. Then the Hendon Air Show was held before 100,000 spectators. The show is held every year, but this year two of its items at least received fresh publicity. One was a "robot" or pilotless, radio-directed plane displayed in a special exhibit on the ground. The other was an exhibition of bombing practice which cogently pointed a moral, namely, the need of increased appropriations to modernize the air force. A squadron of ancient biplanes was sent aloft to belly awkwardly over a field of targets and to drop bombs with rather marked inaccuracy—in front of the press box. A few days later pride in the Royal Air Force was revived by another air show held at Mildenhall—unlike Hendon, a new event this year. There one of the features was a large squadron of Handley-Page bombers which flew past the King and his "four soldier sons."

The pace accelerated. The government announced a new anti-aircraft defense program for civilians, including organization of first-aid squads, education of civilians in gas-defense measures, provision for gas-masks for the personnel directing the campaign, and other measures. But no appropriations for equipping the people with gas-masks accompanied the announcement, and the whole arrangement quite noticeably placed the expense and duties of the plan on the shoulders of local and non-official organizations. However, the announcement was well-timed and sensationally phrased, and made the first page of all the dailies.

Then came the review of the fleet at Spithead, the first since 1914, with seaplanes occupying a prominent place in the activities, and the King, in navy blue, on the deck of the reviewing yacht. Finally, a week later, London was "attacked" by an "enemy" air fleet in maneuvers lasting four days. The same maneuvers last year took two days. The King, according to the papers, expressed great interest in the Northland (defending) force and "asked many questions." After that, royalty and aviators prepared to relax their duties during the month of August.

But the Stock Exchange is far from relaxed and not likely to become so. For the predictable boom in aircraft business has accompanied these gala events of the spring and summer. As a matter of fact, the boom got under way in 1934, when Handley-Page showed a profit of £44,950 as against £20,441 in the previous year. Hawker in 1934 made £146,836, De Haviland £106,620, and Armstrong-Siddeley £152,494. The announcement of these earnings has increased excitement among the traders on the Exchange. Thus De Haviland shares, from an issue price of £1 rose in June, 1935, to £3/2/6. Fairey Aviation, Ltd., increased more than two and one-half times, Handley-Page more than three times, Hawker almost six, and Rolls-Royce eight times. With these big firms leading the way, a number of small fry have entered the field. The number of new aircraft issues has been considerable. Phillips and Powis shares, issued in March, 1935, at 6/1, rose in June to 9/3; Parnell Aircraft (on a select list of contractors approved by the R. A. F.), issued at 5/, rose to 5/7½ in June; British Aircraft, Ltd., issued in April at 5/, rose to 7/6 in June.

The financial section of the Daily Herald on June 19 reported that "great activity in the issuing of shares in aircraft companies is now, as was to be expected, taking place as a result of the government's air-force policy. Today's particulars are published of an issue at par of 700,000 ordinary shares of 5/ each in Aero Engines, Ltd." Aero Engines, Ltd., it seems, are confident of profits, for they possess the license for the latest and most formidable weapon, the Hispano-Suiza motor cannon, which fires an explosive shell forward through the center of the propeller shaft. The Herald virtuously remarked: "Investors must decide for themselves whether this is the sort of development out of which they would like to make profits." Many, it appears, so decided, for later it was announced that the issue was oversubscribed.

A number of foreign firms have appeared on the scene to participate in this harvest. Fokker is now engaged in building an aeroplane factory in the north, and the Bellanca Company from the United States has purchased ground on which to build a plant. It is reported that Douglas Motors executives are in England to survey the situation.

With this competition to fear, the larger firms have formed the inevitable mergers to safeguard their preferred position. The Hawker Company, which raised its dividend from 15 to 20 per cent on June 18, seems to have gobbled up the Armstrong-Siddeley Development Company, Ltd. The new firm will be called the Hawker-Siddeley Aircraft Company, Ltd. With Armstrong-Siddeley come its subsidiaries: Armstrong-Siddeley Motors, Ltd., Sir W. G. Armstrong Whitworth Aircraft, Ltd., A. V. Roe Company, Ltd., and Air Service Training, Ltd.—the latter having a contract to train pilots for the R. A. F. Hawker earned 40 per cent last year, while Armstrong-Siddeley earned 31.2 per cent. The Herald says: "The new holding company will thus be in an excellent position to obtain full advantage from war preparations which have already proved so profitable to some sections of the City."

War preparations include about a hundred new aerodromes scattered strategically over the country. Thus a new feature has been introduced into the land speculation which has accompanied the famous building boom here. In the windows of real-estate offices in London may be seen signs advertising property as "suitable for aerodrome sites."

With this keen gambling in land and aircraft shares there have naturally been some murmurs from Members of Parliament. Questions have been put to Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lester, Minister for Air, about the conduct of the government and the aircraft companies. But Sir Philip has never been very informative, limiting himself to a statement that a committee appointed by the ministry will see that no discreditable transactions occur. Sir Philip, so far as it can be ascertained, at the present time owns no aircraft shares. But in the past he has had munitions shares, and until very recently he was heavily interested in tin. He was formerly at the head of the Tin Producers' Association formed to assist the tin pool which last winter furnished the major financial scandal of the year. Tin, according to the News-Chronicle of July 20, is widely used in munitions, and "the cause of the rise [referring to the record high prices of this product] is a recent rapid increase in demand, partly from European armament interests."

The press, with but few exceptions, has given its enthusiastic support to this armament program, but, at least in one instance, not altogether gratuitously. The royal arms inquiry brought out that the Daily Mirror, which had been conducting a loud campaign for increase of the air force, held 4,000 shares in the Fairey Aviation Company, Ltd. During this boom period the shares of the six principal aviation companies, including Fairey, have increased in value 70 per cent on the average.

One of the most substantial results of the armament boom has been the creation, within the past few years, of the busy munitions town of Corby, in Northamptonshire. The press has taken no notice of the phenomenal growth or the nature of this mushroom city; newspapermen have considerable respect for the Official Secrets Act. The works at Corby, which produce mainly aeroplane parts and shells, are surrounded by barbed-wire entanglements. It is said that this new arsenal is designed to replace the Woolwich arsenal in case the latter is destroyed by an air raid; certain portions of the Corby works can be changed within a few hours to duplicate operations performed at Woolwich.

All this frenzied activity in finance and manufacturing, which "must," as the Handley-Page officials said of their own company, "primarily depend on orders from the government," is apparently, then, the result of the government's defense program. And the government's defense program, according to the government's statements, is the natural result of its discovery of the startling rearmament of Hitler in defiance of the Versailles treaty. Britain must arm against the German menace, and the arms manufacturer must patriotically supply the weapons. Yet there is reason to think that Hitler's announcement of his aircraft policy was not the motivating cause of British rearmament in the air. Examination of the facts in chronological order reveals what looks suspiciously like a regulation arms scare.

The opening of the great Parliamentary campaign this spring for increased aircraft appropriations began on April 1. On that date the perfect pretense was provided by Hitler's famous statement that the German air force equaled the British. From then on newspapers agitated and M. P.'s obliged with estimates. As a matter of fact, the lathes in Leeds and Corby had been turning long before April 1. On February 20, 1935, the magazine Aeroplane said: "Every aircraft factory in this country at present is either already turning out masses of aeroplanes for the new squadrons and for the increased reserve . . . or else the factories are tooling up for production—which means that new machine tools and special apparatus are being installed—or else negotiations are going on between the manufacturers and the Contract Department in the Air Ministry." Thus more than a month before Europe openly entered the military aircraft race the organ of the English aircraft manufacturers announced their preparations.

Statements and counter-statements from the various European chancelleries followed in quick succession. After Hitler's announcement on April 1 General Denain, Air Minister of France, said that in France "air reequipment was being expanded and accelerated." England then spoke in the person of Sir Philip Sassoon: "The Royal Air Force has still a margin of superiority over the German air force. Nevertheless, the rate of Germany's air development is such as to cause His Majesty's Government grave concern." On April 17 the British Home Office set up a department for preparation against air raids. On May 3, after MacDonald's statement that the British government was expanding the R. A. F., Göring retorted: "We have expanded the technical and industrial capacity to its extreme limit, to create the air arm at a single blow." And so on.

With this great show proceeding so profitably for aircraft share-owners and so gloriously for R. A. F. officers, the heavy-armament industry and the admirals and generals seemed rather neglected. But their reward was not withheld long. At Aldershot the Royal Commander-in-Chief reviewed the mechanized squadrons of the army and announced that the transport of the British first and second divisions would be fully mechanized within a year. The navy had its inning on July 16 at Spithead, where the "Sailor King," as the press called him, watched the maneuvers and parade of the fleet. One of the features of the navy show was a realistic anti-aircraft battle. A robot plane, pilotless and controlled by radio, was sent up as a target for naval anti-aircraft guns. "Attacking" at the rate of fifty miles an hour, the robot remained unscathed after a very large number of rounds had been fired at it, but was finally winged and brought to the surface of the water. Some experts later stated privately that the aim of the batteries was so bad that the plane—maneuvered, of course, by naval radio operators—had to be guided into the trajectory of the shells. The navy was jubilant over having proved that aircraft were not so invincible as the recent publicity had suggested. It reaped further advantages on the morrow of the review when the Beaverbrook papers announced that the fleet was so obviously outdated that it was doomed to defeat in another war. The Daily Express immediately started a campaign to rehabilitate the fleet at an estimated cost of £250,000,000.

Thus under the popular sponsorship of the monarchy the arms boom has got well under way—the aircraft program leading, the naval program following. It is not certain that the aircraft boom, either in Parliament or on the Exchange, will decline hereafter, but it is certain that traders will be a little more catholic in buying their armament shares. Witness the following. Immediately after the campaign for a new navy was launched, the firm of Vickers announced that it had completed steps to acquire all of the share capital of Vickers-Armstrong, amounting to £17,464,251. This firm, according to the financial editor of the News-Chronicle, has "assets of great potential value, including control of the English Steel Corporation, in addition to ordnance and armament works." The editor concludes: "Although Vickers 6/8 shares have risen to nearly 15/, I would not sell."

The Crisis of the Middle Class

III. The Middle Class Under Socialism

By LEWIS COREY

A TRAGIC contrast torments the world. It is the contrast between capitalist decline and decay, with its menace of fascist barbarism, and the economic and cultural promise of a liberated collectivism which provides all the elements of socialism.

One element of socialism is the capacity of industry to produce abundance. It is wholly possible, on the basis of existing American economic resources, not only to abolish poverty but to make plenty available to all. There are efficient means of production, all the necessary labor and raw materials, including the increasing creation of synthetic materials, and constantly larger masses of scientific knowledge capable of technological application. By freely and fully using all our economic resources and by limiting incomes to $10,000 (a limitation that would affect only 350,000 persons out of 52,000,000 gainfully occupied), every family can be assured the minimum income of $4,000 yearly. Yet, in the most prosperous year 1929 the majority of wage workers had incomes below $2,000; while 80 per cent of the members of the middle class, which, in the futile hope of saving itself under capitalism, may rally to the program of strangling the productive forces, had incomes below $3,000. Socialism, moreover, by utilizing the more efficient techniques already offered by science, can again increase the output of goods and services even while it multiplies creative leisure, and remake the world.

Another element of socialism is found in the collective forms of economic activity with whose efficiency the capacity to produce abundance is inseparably identified. Economic activity is now institutional, not personal; collective, not individual. Ownership in the dominant corporate industry is separated from management. Stockholders perform no function except that of ownership, and the passive nature of this ownership strips it of all social value. Initiative and management are impersonal, cooperative, and collective, the functions of hired men. There is no economic individualism: wage workers and salaried employees must conform to the rhythm of the machine and the discipline of its organizational relations. But the old relations of individual ownership and appropriation still prevail and fetter the productive forces; hence the clash of new and old social orders. For collectivism, which increasingly includes the performance of professional and cultural services, represents a vast socialization of economic activity—the objective basis of socialism.

Only a simple change in the capitalist relations of collectivism is needed to transform it into socialism. Ownership is vested in a decreasingly small class and stripped of all constructive functions: why not social ownership? The majority of the people—80 per cent of them—are employees dependent on the oligarchy of monopoly capitalism: why can they not work for the self-governing community of labor? Industry is collective but appropriation is still individual: why not collective appropriation of the fruits of collective labor? These changes would instantly release the forces of production and consumption; the capitalist-fascist alternative is to strangle them.

The third element of socialism is conversion of the mass of the people—88 per cent of them, including more than two-thirds of the middle class—into propertyless dependents on social property owned by a small capitalist minority. Wholly typical and dominant is the proletariat of wage workers. But the working class includes in the larger sense the masses of lower-salaried employees and professional workers. For they are not a "new" middle class in any economic sense. They developed within the orbit of the middle class and may still accept its ideals, but they are thrown out of the class by their propertyless and dependent condition. The term "new middle class" has definite meaning and application only to the higher managerial and supervisory employees, who are essentially "institutional" capitalists. The masses of lower-salaried employees and professional workers are economically and functionally a "new" proletariat, separated from ownership of the means of production and dependent on the sale of their labor for a livelihood. Their immediate and final interests are one with labor and the struggle for socialism.

Proletariat and salaried employees, including professional workers, are the product of the same forces which transformed economic individualism into collectivism. The first step of capitalist production was to convert independent artisans and craftsmen into wage workers. Salaried employees, as a distinctive and important group, developed much later. They developed when collective large-scale industry began to transfer the tasks of administration, management, and supervision to salaried employees, who, for a time, grew more rapidly than wage workers. Collective forms of economic activity transformed increasingly larger numbers of independent enterprisers into wage workers or salaried employees, performing dependent, routine tasks. Hence, in economic origin and function, wage workers and salaried employees are identified with the collectivism which is the basis of socialism.

This identity of interest is strengthened by increasing proletarianization. The scarcity value, economic security, social standing, and incomes of salaried employees made them clearly members of the middle class in the earlier stages of capitalism. But collectivism proletarianized their functions while multiplying their numbers. Most salaried employees were converted economically into wage workers and most professional independents into salaried employees. They may still cling to middle-class ideals, but defense of capitalism, except in the case of salaried employees, is wholly opposed to their economic interests.

Salaried labor is increasingly mechanized and becomes, even in the case of professional workers, the mere performance of routine tasks. Scarcity value is destroyed, economic security and social standing are undermined, and incomes are relatively lowered. This appears most clearly among the millions of clerical employees. The clerk was formerly a confidential employee who might aspire to become a firm member or to marry his employer's daughter; now he performs the most routine tasks and in 1929 earned an average of $1,400, not much more than the wage worker's $1,200. The average of all lower-salaried employees and professional workers was $1,800: the average of millions of organized skilled workers was much higher. Proletarianization was sharply revealed and accelerated by the depression: millions were thrown out of work or had their salaries slashed, their security and privileges destroyed, although in former depressions they had been measurably protected against the cyclical storm.

The fate of lower-salaried employees and professional workers, moreover, is inseparably interlocked with labor by the increasing misery of capitalist decline. The increasing misery of the earlier stages of the Industrial Revolution, which was accompanied by economic progress and multiplication of the productive forces, affected only wage workers and peasants; salaried employees multiplied more rapidly, the new technological basis of industry needed the services of more technicians, and professional independents thrived on rising standards of living in the middle and upper classes. Now, however, increasing misery is accompanied by economic retrogression and strangling of the productive forces; millions of salaried employees are thrown into permanent unemployment, along with still more millions of wage workers, while the performance of professional services, now largely dependent on the masses, must be severely limited by lower mass standards of living.

United by their origin in collectivism and by their propertyless, dependent condition, the identity of interests of wage workers and salaried and professional workers becomes final in socialism, which arises out of the transformation of collectivism. Socialism is the creative unity and meaning of the class-economic changes wrought by collectivism, including the increasing disintegration of the old middle class and the upsurge of the "new," all of whose useful functional groups are necessary under socialism.

The struggle for socialism proceeds outside the orbit of the middle class. For that class is no longer the carrier of a new social order; it is split by discordant interests and the clash of new and old social orders among its antagonistic groups. As surviving small enterprisers try to solve their crisis of property within the relations of capitalist production and the higher-salaried employees cling to monopoly capitalism, they drive the middle class toward fascism. Hence the struggle for socialism proceeds within the orbit of the working class, which includes the masses of lower-salaried and professional workers—9,000,000 of them out of a middle class of 13,000,000.

As the crisis of employment drives the salaried and professional workers toward socialist liberation of the productive forces, they must discard their inherited class allegiances, an ideological break which is the whole problem of rallying the "new" proletariat. They must discard their inherited antagonism to labor; the antagonism is against their own interests, it profits only the independent enterprisers and higher managerial employees, and it is inflamed by fascism for its own barbaric purposes. They must grow an economic backbone by the organization of unions and, through the unions, work actively in a labor party based on all unions. These are all means of struggle for the improvement of conditions and against the menace of fascism. But as the crisis of capitalism becomes worse, it appears clearly that defensive action is not enough. For under conditions of economic decline and decay mere reformism drives the two groups of the working class apart and replaces united struggle with a dog-and-cat fight for "salvation" against one another. That creates the opportunity for fascism, which offers to make salaried and professional workers an important caste in the new reactionary set-up, and destroys all chance of rallying to socialism the poorer small enterprisers, especially the storekeepers. It becomes clear that the only answer to the increasing misery of capitalist decline and the menace of fascism is the communist struggle for the overthrow of capitalism and the transformation of collectivism into socialism.

The planned economy of socialism, unfettered by the vested interests of capitalist profit, imposes an unbreakable control over economic activity and liberates the forces of production and consumption. That the control works is amply proved by the Soviet Union. During five years of the depression the United States suffered a loss of 260 billion dollars in goods and services which might have been produced if prosperity had not broken down in 1929: the total losses of the capitalist world are probably 700 billion dollars. The only nation which escaped the depression is the Soviet Union; its planned economy, by preventing a cyclical breakdown, produced around 75 billion dollars' worth of goods and services which would not have been otherwise produced. That is one aspect of creative socialist control.

What becomes of the middle class under socialism? The class has already gone through two transformations. By the sixteenth century it had become a petty bourgeoisie and begun its unsuccessful war in defense of small property against the big bourgeoisie. After the Industrial Revolution, with the onsweep of collectivism, the middle class became decreasingly a class of propertied independent enterprisers and increasingly a "class" of propertyless, dependent salaried employees and professional workers. The third and final transformation appears under socialism: the old middle class of independent enterprisers completely disappears, their functions absorbed in the fuller collectivization and socialization of industry, while the useful functional groups in the "new" middle class—the "new" proletariat—are absorbed in the community of labor. Socialism completes the process, already almost completed under capitalism, of converting independent owner-managers into employees, while employees are liberated from their dependence on monopoly capitalism.* They are liberated by the right to work and to an income, by the protection of all-inclusive social insurance, and by the increase of leisure and independence.

The upward movement of economic activity under socialism would mean a constantly greater need for the functions now performed by salaried employees. Socialism means a greater demand for clerical and managerial and supervisory workers. For as economic activity more fully realizes the promise of technology, completely automatic production, it becomes more and more an activity of organization, management, and supervision. But when managerial and supervisory functions are stripped of their exploiting capitalist relations, their performance becomes wholly a form of productive social labor.

The number of technicians must grow as automatic production grows and more of the work is performed by technicians. Their craft function is liberated, while manual workers are increasingly converted into technicians. This is of the utmost cultural significance, for it breaks down the distinction between manual and mental labor, a tendency already apparent in the most modern existing plants. Thus technology itself confirms one of the most derided "utopian" ideas of Karl Marx, who fifty years ago wrote of the "higher phase of communist society, after the enslaving subordination of individuals to the division of labor and with it also the antagonism between mental and manual labor have disappeared, after labor has become not merely a means to live but is itself the first necessity of living." Obliteration of the division of labor, which means that it increasingly becomes a function of the mechanical equipment, depends for its fulfilment upon socialism, with its unlimited technological application of science and its mass participation in higher learning. That means a cultural revolution whose creative value is incalculable.

As the economic surplus and standards of living rise under socialism, there is a constantly greater demand for professional services. Unlike the tragic situation now prevailing—millions of people denied professional services while the performers of these services are degraded by unemployment—socialism liberates the professional workers by providing conditions for the free and unlimited performance of their craft functions. The tendency is already clearly apparent in the Soviet Union. Two non-Communists, A. Newsholme and J. A. Kingsbury, report that socialization of medicine in the Union, which they consider a "great achievement" and a "challenge," has "removed the doctor almost completely from the field of monetary competition and has thus abolished a chief source of inadequate medical care." The socialization of professional services offers their performers more leisure, more satisfactory compensation, and more opportunity for creative labor.

Socialism opens up immense possibilities for educational workers: the mere introduction of smaller classes would be an achievement and multiply the number of teachers, easing burdens and making the work more productive. Complete realization of socialism and the transition to communism, moreover, are inconceivable without an increasing mass participation in higher learning, for cultural and not merely occupational purposes. In the Soviet Union the Five-Year Plan for 1932-37 calls for universal, compulsory high-school education—the first time a nation has set itself that objective. This, according to Valerian V. Ossinsky, is a "decisive step toward the abolition of all distinction betwen the manual and the mental worker." The final objective is universal college education. For socialism can accomplish its great purpose—the creation of a new man, master of himself and of his world—only by a cultural upsurge which involves the transformation of education.

Thus socialism offers the useful groups in the middle class the liberation of their craft function and multiplication of the opportunity for its performance, whereas a declining capitalism and fascism offer the direct opposite. That socialism moves in that direction is amply proved by the tendency in the Soviet Union. An American socialism, moreover, would realize its aims much more easily and rapidly, as the objective economic basis of socialism—collectivism and the capacity to produce abundance—is most highly developed in the United States. The tasks of socialist construction were enormously complicated in the Soviet Union by its low economic and cultural heritage; the Bolsheviks were forced to devote the major part of their great work to industrialization, a task already accomplished by capitalism in our country, where 75 per cent of the problems, difficulties, and mistakes of the Bolsheviks would simply not arise. Our task would be the comparatively simple one of introducing the relations of a socialism whose economic forms are almost fully in existence.

Unlike fascism, which makes an ideal of dictatorship and authoritarianism, socialism includes liberty, equality, and democracy in new and higher forms. Communist dictatorship is wholly functional and temporary: it is destroyed as socialism abolishes classes, multiplies abundance and leisure, and makes higher learning available to all. The old middle-class ideal of the liberty and equality of men owning their means of livelihood becomes the liberty of labor and the equal right to share freely and fully in social property: the always limited and now dying democracy of small owners of property becomes the democracy of the self-governing community of free workers. Economic individualism is replaced by the freedom of human and cultural individuality. That means the rebirth of democratic ideals, not their fascist death.

In this crisis of civilization, of which their own class crisis is an aspect, the members of the middle class may recall the great expression of the bourgeois struggle for power, the Enlightenment, that magnificent rejection of the traditional and defiance of old ideals, passions, and prejudices. The spirit of the Enlightenment, according to Immanuel Kant, was "liberation of man from his state of minority, the incapacity to use one's understanding." Its motto was, "Dare to understand!" It meant, in the words of Thomas Jefferson, the foremost American exponent of the Enlightenment, "to go forward instead of backward, to disbelieve that nothing can be devised more perfect than was established by our forefathers." We, too, must reject the traditional and defy old ideals, passions, and prejudices: we must dare to understand. The answer to the new barbarism must be a new Enlightenment, whose elements are provided by Marxism: the perceiver of a new world and its creator. Dare to understand: forward, not backward! Upon that depends the future of the world, our future.

---

* Independent enterprises which do not employ labor are not immediately socialized; this is particularly true of small storekeepers, who are formed into cooperatives (they now form "voluntary" chains) as a step toward final socialization. Socialization of larger enterprises is immediate, and it means this: their salaried managers work for the community instead of for a handful of parasitic stockholders. Nor is it necessary in the United States to proceed rapidly with the collectivization of agriculture. That was necessary in the Soviet Union because of the preponderance of an individualistic peasantry and the backward state of agriculture. The larger American farms—roughly 40 per cent of the total with 80 per cent of the output—would be socialized and the smaller farms formed into cooperatives (already used by the farmers). Experience would prove the necessity of socialization, as only that could solve the problem of farmers being displaced by more efficient agriculture, for whose products there is a limit. In the last analysis, however, socialization of agriculture would become complete most rapidly in the United States, because of the greater mechanization. That involves the planned unity of industry and agriculture, including decentralization of the former.

[This is the last article in Mr. Corey's series on the crisis of the middle class.]

The Menace of Tax-exempt Bonds

By WILLIAM WITHERS

THE President's recent tax proposals threw new light for a few days on one of the greatest flaws in our tax system—the existence of large numbers of securities which are wholly tax exempt. The Treasury's loss of revenue caused by this convenient form of tax avoidance offered to the wealthy was demonstrated to Congress by Secretaries Glass, Houston, and Mellon. Yet on two occasions Congress has refused to pass the needed legislation, and when the issue was again raised recently, it was quickly buried beneath the usual Washington dust storm. Until this year the Roosevelt Administration has shown little interest in the problem of social taxation. But the "left-wing" tax bloc, headed by Senators La Follette, Norris, and Couzens, has pressed for higher inheritance and income taxes and for a constitutional amendment to eliminate tax-exempt bonds, recognizing the futility of raising rates on taxable income while the federal and local governments were issuing a large number of non-taxable securities. This bloc would probably have had little success if Huey Long had not stirred up such strong sentiment for his Share-the-Wealth program that the President could no longer ignore the problem of taxation. He then lent his support to a half-hearted tax measure intended to "balance" the tax structure by increasing the taxes paid by the rich. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Roosevelt chose to pull his punches and omitted the tax-exemption amendment from the list of reforms to be achieved during this session.

Under the real-property tax persons holding intangible wealth such as securities tend to escape their full share of taxation. After the passage of state and federal income-tax laws the exemption of government securities rightfully became a leading issue, since the income tax had been urged as a means of tapping the income drawn from securities. But holders of government bonds have continued to dodge taxation. As a result of court decisions based upon the doctrine that government agencies could be destroyed by taxation, the federal and local governments are prohibited from taxing each other's securities, and a tax-exempt class has been preserved. The situation can only be altered by a constitutional amendment so far as the outstanding debt is concerned.

The exemption of federal issues from taxation is objectionable on both social and fiscal grounds. It makes impossible a balanced and equitable tax system, well adapted to a social state. The federal tax system was not sufficiently progressive before the depression, and in the past five years its weakness in this respect has been accentuated. Not only have investors been offered huge short-term Treasury issues which escape both normal taxes and surtaxes, but by far the largest amount of federal revenue now comes not from the income tax but from excise taxes. Income as a source of tax revenue has become both absolutely and relatively less important. Our large exemptions, particularly in connection with the large federal issues of the past few years, make many of the comparisons between British and American income-tax rates meaningless. Tax exemption, together with the relatively minor role played by the income tax in this country, makes for a tax system which in toto is unduly burdensome on the poor. A recent Senate amendment to the tax bill eliminates the exemption privilege on future federal issues. Assuming that this provision is spared when the bill finally emerges from conference, it still does not reach the tax-free local bonds or federal bonds already issued. The former could be taken off the tax-exempt list only by local action, the latter by a constitutional amendment. Under these circumstances the application of higher inheritance and corporation taxes and surtaxes which can be avoided merely adds to the grotesqueness of our tax system.

An outstanding example of the ramifications of the exemption feature in our tax network is found in the social-security bill. Implicit in this bill is the tendency of Congress to avoid progressive tax legislation. Provision is made for payroll taxes, levied on employers and workers, with which to build up reserve funds. These funds are to be invested in federal securities. In other words, Congress proposes to support and pay off the federal debt, not, as it should, by graduated income taxes, but with revenues obtained from a regressive payroll tax. In the face of such legislation it becomes even more important to abolish tax exemption on government issues, so as to compensate at least in part for the coming system of taxing the poor to support the poor. It is true, of course, that the reserve funds of the security bill provide a means of eliminating tax exemption indirectly, since they will reduce the opportunities for private investors to buy government bonds. As payroll contributions increase, the demand of the security funds for government issues will grow, but it is obvious that it will take years to withdraw all federal securities from the hands of the public in this manner.

Apart from the social consequences of the preservation of a large tax-free class, the loss of revenue from tax exemption has long presented a serious problem to the Treasury. Recently published figures for 1933 placed the amount of securities completely exempt from the federal income tax at $31,000,000,000 and from the normal tax at more than $13,000,000,000. Since then the amount of both local and federal debt has increased greatly. Assuming a combined federal and local tax-exempt debt of fifty billions, the interest on this debt at a rate of 3 per cent would be one and a half billions. Most of this interest would be taxable at high rates, since the securities are held by banks and wealthy individuals. No satisfactory statistics of the amount and distribution of these holdings are yet available; until they are, the amount of lost taxes cannot be exactly determined, though it is probably somewhere between three and five hundred millions a year. Some authorities have claimed that the income tax now collected could be doubled, which amounts to placing the tax loss at around one billion dollars. At the very least it is evident that the revenues lost to the Treasury through tax exemption are far greater than those it will gain through the proposed new taxes.

As surtaxes are increased, the wealthier taxpayers find investment in tax-exempt securities increasingly to their advantage. Although the attempt to avoid taxes in this way may so increase the demand that the government can find a cheap market for its bonds, the Treasury's loss in potential taxes more than balances its savings in interest payments. As long as tax-exempt securities exist as a recourse for investors, a rise in tax rates may actually decrease revenue.

Although the strongest argument for tax-exemption is its supposed tendency to encourage the sale of government bonds, the last six months of Treasury operations have indicated that the credit of the federal government does not need the stimulation of such devices as tax exemption. The strength of the federal credit and the easy state of the money market make this a propitious moment for the removal of the exemption feature. Almost all the Liberty bonds issued to pay for the World War have been refunded, and the average annual interest rate on the federal debt has been reduced to the lowest point since 1916. Since January the Treasury has successfully completed some of the largest refunding operations in our history. One factor in this success, which should not be minimized, is the great increase in tax collections after 1934. If a genuine revenue-producing bill were passed, tax exemption would be unnecessary as a means of supporting the nation's credit.

Tax exemption has also promoted to a considerable extent the unduly large bank holdings of the federal debt. Federal securities held by banks now amount to well over 50 per cent of the total issued. Securities held by banks are taxed under the corporation income tax, which has been defined as a normal tax. Since United States securities are exempt from normal taxation, they are, of course, completely free of taxation when held by banks or other corporations. A slight increase in the corporation-tax rate, such as is proposed in the pending tax bill, will fail to reach corporation income from government securities. The increase in bank holdings of government securities is objectionable in many ways. First, if banks are obtaining a steady and safe income from federal securities, they may be unwilling to loan sufficient amounts to private industry during periods of credit uncertainty. Second, government bonds can be used as collateral for bank loans, which may lead to inflation, since the credit extended on these bonds as assets is a net addition to purchasing power, analogous to paper money. Third, since the government is at present so dependent for revenue upon the sale of its bonds, banks can easily become the most influential factor in the government bond market and thus exercise a coercive influence on government policies.

Taken together, tax exemption and the proposed payroll tax largely offset the progressive taxes on high incomes contained in the present tax bill. Emphasis on the latter will, however, undoubtedly be a main feature of the coming political struggle in the West, and the real nature of our tax system as a whole will continue to remain obscured. It will be claimed that we have taken the British road of high and progressive taxation to the longed-for goal of a balanced budget, although we shall have done nothing of the kind. It will also be said that the government has dealt large corporations a serious blow by a graduated corporation tax, but the extent to which this blow is weakened by tax exemption will not be evident. Tax exemption will continue to effect changes in business organization and investment practices by which taxes may be avoided. The absurd inconsistencies in the proposed revisions of the tax structure deserve intelligent and persevering criticism.

Inconsistency in the tax structure arises from confusion in underlying tax and economic theories. It is true that we cannot balance the budget without increasing taxes, but equally important is the fact that we cannot spread purchasing power without increasing the progression of taxation. We cannot successfully spend for recovery if the funds are obtained from taxes levied on the poor. At present the Administration favors spending for recovery and at the same time deliberately seeks to impede its own efforts in this direction by making use of payroll and excise taxes and by increasing the degree of tax exemption. The removal of tax exemption through a constitutional amendment as well as through the proposed tax bill would help to bring about more progressive taxation and eliminate some of these inconsistencies. It is to be hoped that President Roosevelt will see his way to hasten action on this much-needed reform, which would reflect a genuine effort to reduce tax evasion and modernize the American tax system.

Correspondence

The Farm Mortgage Moratorium Act

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

A great deal of misunderstanding exists as to the precise nature of the Frazier-Lemke Farm Mortgage Moratorium Act, of which William Lemke, Member of Congress from North Dakota, is the author, and which was decided to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States on May 27, 1935. At the outset it should be remembered that this decision is not yet final. A petition for rehearing has been filed which cannot be disposed of before the first Monday in October. If that petition is sustained and the hearing is granted, the whole subject will be again open for consideration by the court.

In the case in which the court passed on the act, known as the Radford case, the debtor owned a farm now appraised at $4,450. The mortgage on the farm amounts to approximately $9,000. Under the national bankruptcy act, as it existed prior to the Frazier-Lemke act, the debtor might have filed a petition in bankruptcy, lost his farm, and all his other property except $400 of personalty exempt to him as the head of a family, and have been discharged from the payment of all his debts. Such action on the part of the debtor would not have been of any benefit to the creditor, would not have increased the value of the farm, and the rental value thereof would have remained the same. Radford on the other hand would have gone on relief.

Instead of filing a petition under the national bankruptcy act Radford endeavored to obtain the benefit of the Frazier-Lemke Farm Mortgage Moratorium Act. But the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the holder of the mortgage had a constitutional right either to get the farm or be paid his debt in full, and that the Frazier-Lemke act which gave the debtor the right to retain his farm as a tenant for five years, in the meantime paying a rental fixed by the District Court, and which also gave the debtor the right to get back his farm by paying in cash the reasonable present value thereof, without regard to the amount of the mortgage debt and without the consent of the holder of the mortgage, was so unreasonable in its terms and so arbitrary in its provisions that it constituted in effect a deprivation of the property of the creditor without due process of law, in violation of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Radford contends in the petition for rehearing that, inasmuch as the court decided in the gold cases that individuals owing debts payable in gold could discharge such debts with paper dollars worth 60 cents, no sound reason exists why Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional power to enact uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy, does not have the right to allow Radford to regain his farm by paying the reasonable value thereof, although such value is less than the mortgage debt and a sole creditor objects thereto.

Radford's note, the payment of which was secured by a mortgage on his farm, was owned by a single creditor. This creditor was demanding one hundred cents on the dollar or the farm, in payment of the debt. The Supreme Court, as already explained, decided that the holder of the mortgage had a constitutional right to make such a demand. The court also ruled that the creditor could not be deprived of such right by an act of Congress. But at the same time, the court recognized that under established principles of the national bankruptcy law, if Radford's note, secured by a mortgage on his farm, had been owned by three or more creditors, that situation would have produced a different legal result. In that event, a majority in number and amount, with the cooperation of the debtor and the approval of the court, might have compelled a minority to accept less than one hundred cents on the dollar. Radford claims that no sound reason exists for such a distinction between a debt owned by a sole creditor and a debt owned by three or more creditors. Accordingly, in order to protect the rights of corporations to adjust or scale down their debts, Radford asks that the farmers of the country be accorded a like right.

If the Supreme Court does not agree with Radford and grant him a rehearing, a serious situation may arise. An objecting minority of a group of creditors in a corporation reorganization proceeding might claim:

1. Under the logic of the Radford case, that the constitutional power to block a settlement was vested in a sole creditor.

2. Hence, that the sections of the national bankruptcy law enabling a majority in number and amount of the creditors of a corporation, with the cooperation of the debtor and the approval of the court, to compel a dissenting minority creditor to scale his debt is likewise unconstitutional.

Such a result would invalidate a horde of corporate reorganizations. These reorganizations affect property of a value in excess of billions of dollars.

The Frazier-Lemke Farm Mortgage Moratorium Act should not be confused with the act bearing the name of the same authors and relating to the refinancing of farm mortgages. This latter act, not yet passed, contemplates lending three billion dollars to farmers to aid in refinancing their mortgages. The Moratorium Act has for its purpose the reducing of the amount of the debt secured by such mortgages.

Washington, D. C., July 20 EDWIN A. KRAUTHOFF

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

The Case of Romero

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

At the end of May Manuel Romero, World War veteran, who has been for over thirteen years an employee of the Columbia University dining-rooms, was told that, inasmuch as the Horace Mann dining-room was closing, he would not be needed until the opening of the summer session. In former years he had been transferred directly from Horace Mann to the Teachers' College Cafeteria, which remains open all the year round. On July 5 Mr. Romero applied at the Teachers' College Cafeteria for the promised employment. He was told by Miss Reed, the manager, that he would be the first man called. One week later he returned, only to find that two new workers, non-students, had been hired and that he, obviously, was not going to be rehired. Miss Reed stated: "You are a Communist because you have joined the union. You are my enemy." Mr. Romero is the father of five children and the husband of a sick wife. Thus, by this arbitrary act, seven persons are deprived of their only means of livelihood.

A group of students representing nine student and professional organizations went to Acting Dean Del Manzo to inquire the reason for this abrupt dismissal after so many years of service to the university. Dean Del Manzo said that he accepted Miss Reed's explanation, namely, that Romero was "unsatisfactory." When asked if Romero had been inefficient, he said that no such accusation was made. When it was pointed out to him that Romero's "unsatisfactoriness" seemed to resolve itself into his being a union man, he averred that Miss Reed had the "right to hire and fire anyone she liked and that it was none of the students' business anyway." However, he referred us to Miss Reed.

Miss Reed immediately threatened the delegation with "ejection by an officer." She shouted that on no condition would she rehire Romero.

After calling mass-meetings which in their turn sent protest resolutions and delegations to the Dean and Miss Reed, the students instituted a boycott of the cafeteria, which to date is 33 per cent effective. Mr. Romero, always accompanied by one of his children, is picketing Teachers' College at meal times. The subject is under discussion all over the campus. The problem of "the teacher and the social order" has emerged from the syllabus of the course of study into reality. Following hard upon the Medical Center cases and the revelations concerning the Casa Italiana made in The Nation, this case is but one more step on the road to fascism at Columbia University. All those who wish to stop this advance should send protests to Acting Dean Del Manzo and Miss Elizabeth Reed, Teachers' College, Columbia University, New York City.

COMMITTEE FOR THE REINSTATEMENT OF ROMERO

New York, August 10

Negroes at C. C. N. Y.

To the Editors of The Nation:

Last spring Welford Wilson, star track man of the City College team, underwent a harrowing experience of Negro discrimination at the Penn relays. Open hearings revealed the glaring prevalence of discrimination at the college.

For many years the "Jim Crow" policy of the administration has gone unchallenged. Negroes have never worked in the recorder's office, in the bursar's office, or on the curator's staff. Negro athletes have been discriminated against in competing for varsity berths and in representing the college in certain extramural athletic contests. There is not one course offered which gives the history of the Negro and colonial peoples. Never has the administration permitted a Negro to join the staff or faculty of the college.

This term a broad movement has developed among the Negro and white students, supported by outside organizations, to win jobs for Negro students and teachers. The Provisional Committee has already secured the indorsement of the National Students' League, the Student League for Industrial Democracy, the St. James Church, the Mother Zion Church, the New York Branch of the Urban League, and other organizations. We are urging qualified Negro instructors and professors to apply for positions at the City College. The Provisional Committee is anxious to secure carbon copies of applications and all correspondence with the college authorities in reference to these jobs. All interested are asked to get in touch immediately with the committee.

New York, August 7 Jerry Johnson, for the Provisional Committee

The Bremen Incident

To the Editors of The Nation:

I was quite sure that you would editorially be worked up about the demonstration on the Bremen. My regret is only—and I do not speak as a Communist, for I am not one—that the demonstration was not more effective and that the flag was not torn into shreds before being tossed into the sea.

And you are quite mistaken in assuming that such incidents injure the anti-Nazi cause. Quite the contrary. Such things penetrate even into Germany, give the people some idea of how foreign nations feel about their government, cheer the rebellious spirits, and give them more courage to resist the gangster government.

New York, August 1 William J. Robinson, M.D.

Japanese Land Control

To the Editors of The Nation:

Mr. George West seems to have misunderstood my recent article on the Japanese in California. I did not deny "the truth" of any statements made by Mr. West, but I did deny the correctness of his conclusion that the Alien Land Act has "effectually stopped Japanese land ownership." The Alien Land Act has, so far as record ownership is concerned, effectually stopped ownership of land by alien Japanese; but surely Mr. West does not think that it has thereby prevented alien Japanese from controlling and, by various indirections, actually owning land in California. If he thinks so, I can only repeat that he is mistaken. Mr. K. Mukaeda, president of the local Japanese Association, recently testified in a public hearing in Los Angeles that the Japanese control 70 per cent of the vegetable and 90 per cent of the berry-production acreage in Southern California. The fact of Japanese ownership and control of farm land in Southern California is apparent to anyone who has eyes and drives an automobile.

As to the other points: (1) I mentioned Mr. West's article for the reason that I wanted to show the persistency of Japanese prejudice, which flamed into existence shortly after an excellent California journalist had pronounced it to be dead; (2) I omitted mention of the defeat of the anti-Japanese legislative program because these measures had not been defeated when the article was written.

Few informed Californians have ever questioned Mr. West's "reputation for accuracy." I am sure that I never have. A fact is one thing, a conclusion another.

Los Angeles, August 8 Carey McWilliams

Fight for All or None

To the Editors of The Nation:

In your issue of July 17 you condemned me editorially for holding "it the duty of religion to support war to repel an enemy." I was disappointed to learn that you would pass judgment on any question or individual without first learning the facts. If you had taken the trouble to secure information by writing to the person involved you would have found that I objected to a proposed reservation to the peace resolution, the reservation being "except in case of invasion of continental United States."

My contention was that we could not morally justify an exception of a selfish nature. The ethics of religion demand that we pursue an aggressive policy of justice for our fellowmen as well as for ourselves. If military force be accepted as an adequate and appropriate means of repelling an invader of our land, then it should be used also in defense of a neighbor nation against a similarly wicked attack. It might also be used to forestall an invasion of our land. If, on the other hand, brute force should properly be eliminated as a means of solving difficulties between civilized nations, there should be no need, and there could be no logical or moral justification, for resorting to it in accordance with the reservation.

Milwaukee, August 7 Joseph L. Baron

State-Endowed Music

To the Editors of The Nation:

It is to be hoped that the state-endowed music referred to in your current issue will ultimately attain permanency. As at present constituted, all music projects partake of the temporary nature of the entire work-relief program, which means that musicians will again be unemployed when funds for professional workers are exhausted.

The choice of Dr. Sokoloff as head of the national undertaking is an assurance of the highest standards and its consequent success. With his background of knowledge and experience he may be able to convince the authorities that it is just as important to have state-endowed music as it is to have a national theater and municipally supported art galleries.

If Dr. Sokoloff keeps hammering away at the idea of subsidized music, it may eventually be looked upon as something more than a mere war-time measure to keep up the morale of the nation.

Philadelphia, August 12 David Dubinsky

Labor and Industry

Sponsorship

By HEYWOOD BROUN

GEORGE JOABY drank Napoleon brandy from a fragile glass and remained disconsolate. The deal had been a bad one any way you looked at it. If he had only stuck it out another twenty-four hours this dreadful bargain would not be hanging over his head. With a shudder he noted the smell of something burning, but it was only his cigarette which had fallen upon the thick carpet.

Only a day after he signed the ridiculous bond Consolidated Truffles had come along with its offer of sponsorship. And really he didn't believe the man had anything to do with that. It was just a coincidence. Lots of people had said he had a good radio voice long before he got into the big money. What possible proof was there that he hadn't done it on his own?

That was certainly true of the opportunity which came to him to do those indorsements of that motor truck. He got that job through meeting the advertising magnate down at Great Neck one week-end. The magnate said that anybody who could tell such funny stories certainly ought to be able to write advertising copy. And it was himself, George Joaby, man of letters, who posed the picture and wrote the caption. After they got done with the newspapers and the magazines they even used it on the billboards—there he was at the wheel of the truck with the snappy slogan "I'se sitting pretty."

And nobody could deny that. Publishers said the sale of the little book was phenomenal. It was marvelous, they said, for a book of "that type" to do so well. George was getting a little impatient with the recurrence of the phrase "that type." He had never pretended that the thing was profound, but it had wit and a brilliant style, and a good many of his radio listeners had written in to say that the piece about the cat made them cry. After all, there was his radio public, and perhaps it was true that to just a slight extent he had pushed the book over the air. But only in a joshing way. Why shouldn't it be a best-seller? Certainly that triumph was not based on the fearful bargain he had made only a year ago.

The chance to do the biography of that banker was certainly not the result of any black magic. That commission was one he could honestly say he got on his own. The same could be said for the part he took in the film. They were trying to make it a sophisticated picture and they needed his name. He didn't think his charge had been excessive. And now the money was rolling in from every direction. The cigarette company merely wanted him to pose blowing smoke rings in the face of a pretty girl. And that would be easy money, too. But what should it profit a man if he gained the whole world only to lose—and George Joaby writhed in anticipative agony. He was alone in his library but he spoke the words aloud, "Whatever possessed me to sell my soul to the Devil?"

"That's what I want to know," said a well-remembered voice. Joaby looked across the room. The Devil in a dinner coat was sitting in the big leather chair.

"I gather," continued the visitor, "that you resent the little bargain we made a year ago, eh what?"

"I maintain," George said a little stiffly, "that I was cheated. You gave me nothing but a promise of success to come, but as I look back at my triumphs of the year they were all honorable and achieved without your lifting a little finger. I suppose you don't pretend to be a radio agent, or are you going to tell me that it was your fine hand which got me the contract with Consolidated Truffles?"

"I hear you perfectly," said the Devil, cupping one hand after the manner of a man in an ad of an ear trumpet which George Joaby had never indorsed. "We are, I trust, gentlemen, discussing without rancor a little matter which concerns us both. I have no intention of asserting that I gave you your broadcasting ability. You were born with that. It came, if you like, from God. I have listened myself with very great pleasure. If you're not sick of compliments, may an old fellow tell you that he sincerely admires your smoothness. Your voice has a silken quality. Did you ever know a fellow called Faust? No, of course you wouldn't. How time flies! But there was a decided vocal resemblance. Good fellow, Dr. Faust, but there was, as I remember, some scrape with a girl."

"I trust," said George Joaby, "that you didn't come here tonight to sneer at me. I'm not in the mood and in just an hour and a half I'm on a national network."

"One of your little ghost stories?" the Devil inquired. "You really have quite a flair for the horrible."

"Did you come here to talk business or not?" interrupted George. "Frankly I want to be quit of our contract."

"Now that is a coincidence," said the Devil, "because as a matter of fact so do I. You must appreciate that it is a little irregular. If you had come to my office you would have observed the very large sign which reads, 'No mistakes rectified after leaving the window.' But this case is different. Please don't take it amiss but I don't want your soul."

"And why not?" asked George Joaby, flabbergasted.

"Because," said the Devil, "I have always made it a principle to deal in exclusive rights. I have never been content merely to hold an interest. In good faith I bought your soul, but the very next day you sold it all over again to Consolidated Truffles, and the next week to the Mammoth Motor Truck Company, and now I foresee that you are about to dispose of it to a cigarette company. I could sue but I prefer to buy my way out of the bargain." And with that the Devil laid upon the table thirty small white coins.

"That old thirty-pieces-of-silver gag?" asked George Joaby in a mixture of relief and irritation.

"No," said the Devil, "not exactly. I'm following a form and also pointing a moral. In the morning you will find that those coins are familiar coppers. I'm sorry to say that at the moment they are white hot since they've come through my fingers. Restrain, then, your eagerness and don't snatch even though it is money."

Our Shrinking Cotton Trade

By FRED C. KELLY

IN the course of a recent jaunt over the country, I stopped in Dallas, Texas, and went to call on an exporter in the Cotton Exchange Building.

"He's gone to Brazil," a clerk told me.

I went to the floor below in search of another acquaintance who might be able to tell me what was going on in cotton. He too was in Brazil. I made two or three more calls, only to find that all the important key men had journeyed to Brazil.

"Why all this exodus to South America?" I inquired.

Oh, I was told, one must live. These men have always made their living by selling cotton to foreign countries. It is the only business they know. If they can no longer sell American cotton, then they must find other cotton to sell. Because American cotton, pegged by government action at 12 cents a pound, is too high for foreign buyers Texas lost one-half of its export cotton business within the last year. Much of this trade has gone to Brazil, which has increased its cotton production from 300,000 bales three years ago to more than one million bales this year. The growers there have been plowing up coffee lands and planting cotton, but still they cannot supply the demand. They are handicapped by lack of ginning facilities. When American cotton dealers went from Texas to Brazil in quest of a share of this new business, the Brazilians said: "We can't give you all the cotton you want until we have more gins. Now if you would care to invest in gins, or lend us money——" The Americans took the hint. And so it happens that American capital is today helping to make Brazil a formidable competitor of America in the world cotton trade.

But Brazil is not the only country. When the United States government arranged to reduce cotton acreage by one-third and paid money to farmers for the cotton they did not plant, many farmers reasoned this way: "I have always wanted to go to Mexico, where labor is cheap, and raise cotton. But I never had enough money to go there and finance myself. Now I can take this government money and start growing cotton in Mexico. I can't sell American cotton abroad at 12 cents a pound, but maybe I can make a little money selling Mexican cotton at the world price." Again American money is creating more foreign competition for American cotton.

Texas is beginning to feel sharply the effects of this declining trade. Ninety per cent of the cotton grown in Texas has been for export because the cotton in other states is nearer American markets. Now half of this trade is gone. This loss affects not only tenant farmers and laborers, who are no longer needed, but employees in ginning establishments and clerks in exporters' offices. It reaches into numerous allied industries. Even the telephone business feels it. In one office, I was told, toll charges which used to amount to $10,000 a year will be less than $2,000 this year.

A few figures obtained from one of the former big exporters in Dallas tells in part the story of the decline of American cotton in world markets. For ten years, from 1919 to 1929, average annual consumption of American cotton throughout the world was 13,161,000 bales, and of foreign-grown cotton, 8,842,000 bales, or 60 per cent American and 40 per cent foreign. After the entrance of the Federal Farm Board into the cotton situation in 1929-30, the percentage of American cotton dropped to 52, and a year later it was below 50—the first time since Civil War days that the consumption of foreign-grown cotton exceeded that of American cotton. Estimates for the season of 1934-35 indicate that American cotton will constitute only about 48 per cent of world consumption. On this basis American cotton used both at home and abroad would amount to only about 11,640,000 bales. If we were still furnishing 60 per cent of all cotton used, our share of the world cotton trade would be 14,550,000 bales. In other words, we have lost to foreign competitors about 3,000,000 bales. In England alone the consumption of American cotton during the last six weeks of 1934 dropped 68,000 bales below the figures for the previous season; yet the total consumption of all kinds of cotton in British mills remained almost the same.

This decline in cotton exports is not to be accounted for by the increased use of cotton at home. In 1933 about 6,122,767 bales of cotton were used in the United States; in 1934 consumption dropped to 5,320,334 bales, though domestic consumption of most other commodities was increasing. This decrease was probably due to the processing tax on cotton, which encouraged greater use of other, tax-free, fabrics, such as rayon. In other words, at a time when we were unable to sell our former share of cotton to foreigners, and when more families were in need of cotton goods than ever before, the consumption of cotton dropped as a result of our recovery program.

The decline in cotton exports cannot be explained, either, by citing the difficulties of foreign exchange. If foreigners had quit buying because they could not obtain dollars to make payments, then surely other exports would have shown similar decline; the truth is that the export of most commodities showed a considerable increase in 1934 over 1932 and 1933.

Foreign trade in American cotton formerly provided employment for 2,000,000 Southern families as farmers and laborers—in ginning, compressing, storing, the milling of cottonseed oil, transportation, and merchandising. The loss of much of this trade, perhaps forever, helps to explain why a shockingly high percentage of people in the South are on relief. Add to this the fact that a new mechanical cotton-picker is now available capable of doing the work of from 75 to 100 men and the plight of the Southern worker becomes apparent. The situation is becoming so serious that many people in different parts of the South, especially members of college faculties, are talking of collectivization of farm lands as perhaps the only solution. The state or national government, they say, will have to take over the land and produce cotton for domestic use at prices low enough to permit its consumption on a grand scale. Just how this could be done without interfering with competing industries is not explained.

When I left the Texas cotton region and entered the cattle country, I discovered that cattle men didn't like the cotton program any better than the cotton dealers did. With less cotton planted, cotton-seed has advanced in price. It would have advanced anyhow because of another phase of the government agricultural program. With bonuses to encourage the raising of fewer hogs, there is less animal fat available and this has forced a greater demand for cotton-seed oil. This in turn means higher prices for cotton-seed cakes, an important item of food for cattle. As far away as Wyoming, D. L. Whitaker, the president of the Wyoming Stock Growers' Association, told me he is facing a deficit for the first time in forty-three years of ranching because of the high prices of feed. As a result of the artificially high cost of feed in this country, he added, a vast amount of canned beef is being shipped to the United States from the Argentine, and cattle on the hoof are coming in from Canada and Mexico. Cattle men, so long as feed is too high-priced to allow a profit on their cattle, cannot afford to pay more than $1.50 a day for labor, and they complain that men now on relief work, at relatively decent wages, are reluctant to forsake relief and accept this unalluring private employment.

Reduction of cotton acreage is not giving people more cotton fabrics any more than higher prices for food are giving people more to eat. Neither is it giving people in the South more employment. Evidently the planners at Washington did not fully foresee the results of their cotton program. Maybe they did not see farther than getting farmers a better price for cotton. The results appear to have been of even greater benefit to Brazil. People in the South with mobile capital who could move to Brazil have been able to adjust themselves to the new situation. But what of the tenant farmers and laborers, the cattle men, and all the other workers and industries directly or indirectly affected? The whole program seems to have had a string of consequences not always favorable to the forgotten man. It almost looks as if there might be something just a wee bit awry.

Labor Notes

From 4,600 Strikers

THE following appeal comes from the 4,600 shipworkers of Camden who have been on strike for fourteen weeks. The issues involved in the union's controversy with the New York Shipbuilding Company, with which the Navy Department has contracts amounting to $50,000,000, were fully discussed in The Nation of August 14. Conferences are now in progress in Washington looking to a settlement; its terms are of special importance to organized labor because the company is determined to break the union, the government is an interested party in position to enforce its labor policy, and union recognition is a primary issue.

> The Camden strike is not merely a dispute between one company and its workers concerning wages and hours. The Shipbuilders' Council, backed by the most powerful open-shop organization in the United States, the Iron and Steel Institute, is fighting us with their millions to break unionism not merely at Camden and the shipbuilding industry, but in all basic industries. If we can win this strike, we shall have defeated the strongest organization of capital in this country. If labor can sink its differences and present a united front, it will have taken a great step in building up a defense against the otherwise unbeatable forces of these great corporations. Newspapers all over the country keep reporting that the strike is almost over. This is not true. Telegrams from Camden keep warning, "Disregard news reports. Strike still on." These newspaper reports are a part of the propaganda spread by the shipbuilding corporation. Our chief need is financial assistance. In most families fourteen weeks on strike means the end of all resources. Our commissary is supplying more than 1,900 meals a day. Now is the time that the New York Shipbuilding Corporation expects to be able to break the strike. Will you help us by sending your contribution immediately to the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers, 572 Fairview Street, Camden, New Jersey?

Bulletin from Terre Haute

THREE HUNDRED patriotic merchants, realtors, and professional men in Terre Haute have formed a "law and order" group to prevent the recurrence of a general strike. They have proposed the formation of vigilance committees, the passage of an anti-picketing ordinance, and the employment of war veterans at a dollar a day to prevent violence caused by "outside agitators." The president of the local gas company told members of the new organization that they must be prepared to sacrifice their lives if necessary. Since the war veterans are to be hired, it may be assumed that the dying is to be done by proxy. The outlook for industrial peace in Terre Haute is gloomy indeed. If the strike at the Columbian Enameling and Stamping Company is settled by federal or state conciliators, there will remain the "law and order" men, who intend to perpetuate the open shop by keeping labor so intimidated and inarticulate that government conciliators will never hear of Terre Haute again. If the remaining companies of national guardsmen are removed, civil liberties still face the merchant fascisti, who will apparently have very nearly full sway. The city administration will not interfere. In fact, the mayor was one of the most vociferous orators at the first "law and order" meeting. The chief of police has already declared war on all soap-box orators.

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL W. WARD is a Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun.

FRANK C. HANIGHEN collaborated with H. C. Engelbrecht in writing "Merchants of Death."

LEWIS COREY is the author of "The Decline of American Capitalism." The articles appearing in this and the two preceding issues of The Nation are chapters from his new book, "The Crisis of the Middle Class," which Covici-Friede will publish in September.

WILLIAM WITHERS is a member of the Department of Economics at Columbia University and the author of "Retirement of National Debts."

FRED C. KELLY was the first syndicated Washington columnist—twenty-five years ago. He contributes regularly to magazines and has written numerous books.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR is professor of applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary and the author of "Reflections on the End of an Era."

ELISEO VIVAS is a member of the Department of Philosophy at the University of Wisconsin.

BERYL HAROLD LEVY is studying law at Columbia, where he received his Ph.D. in philosophy.

Books

Allegory for Our Time

Land Under England. By Joseph O'Neill. Simon and Schuster. $2.

ALLEGORY is a form that has become so obsolete in our time that when we suddenly reencounter it, as in this astonishing work by an Irish philologist and educator, we are at a loss to explain the nature of our response. This is undoubtedly the explanation of the very confused expression of approval with which Mr. O'Neill's book was received in England. Because it is so unlike the general run of sentimental and realistic fiction of the last few decades it was referred to as if nothing quite like it had ever before appeared on the literary horizon. Yet Mr. O'Neill himself, who as a Catholic probable knows his Dante, and as an Irishman his Swift, shows no such unawareness of the literary tradition. His book is an allegory of the most conventional type. (It should for this reason be distinguished from the "scientific romances" of Butler and the early Wells, which take us from the symbolical to the merely descriptive realm.) Like most of the best-known allegories of the past, it is capable of being read on three distinct levels of interpretation—the literal, the political, and the philosophical. The only questions for criticism would be whether it can be read on each of these levels with equal interest and whether all three are successfully fused in the whole.

To begin with the most superficial of them, the narrative records a journey underground to a land of strange and horribly dehumanized beings, whose dress, customs, and political temperament suggest a race descended from the legions of imperial Rome in Britain. In the opening chapters one of the last representatives of the Julians, a Yorkshire family with a tradition of Roman origin, returns from the war, which has had a sterilizing effect on his personality, and engages in a long search for the secret entrance to the legendary land that lies under England. He disappears; and his son, a technician unmotivated by any dreams of returning to ancestral securities, goes in search of him. Descending through a hole in the Roman Wall, he passes through a Dantesque region of sunless cliffs and caverns, peopled by enormous toads and spiders, until he comes finally to a Roman trireme manned by the ghostlike inhabitants of the place. He is then permitted to visit their houseless cities, their schools, and the sanctuary of the great Master of Will and Knowledge, whose function it is to see that everyone finds his proper place in this vast soulless commonwealth of phosphorescent darkness. Human speech is unknown because the will of the one is perfectly identified with the will of the many; all communication is by a kind of instantaneous telepathy. Education consists in "mind-murder," an eradication of all will and desire from the minds of the young so that they will offer no resistance to the role that is assigned them by the state. The society is hierarchic but all classes are united in a common subordination to the social will. Technology is at the stage at which it was left by the Romans. The people eat, work, and sleep in great roofless "compounds." Beyond this Mr. O'Neill does not go in filling in his picture; no mention is made, for example, of the relations between the sexes, although one cannot but wonder how such automatons manage to propagate themselves. The concrete imagination is more lively in the description of the miasmal swamps through which the hero makes his escape, away from the father whom he has found even more incurably "absorbed" than the others, and back to the confused sunlight of modern England.

It is not necessary to puzzle over what all this may or may not mean on the political plane. With an explicitness into which Swift would never have lapsed, Mr. O'Neill uses the words fascist and Nazi in one of the closing passages of the book. It is clear that as Dante put the Neri in an appropriate section of hell this Irish Free State official is properly disposing of the varicolored O'Ryans and Mosleys. His subterranean breed of voiceless robots is the product of a rigorous fancy which would reduce the fascist ideology to its most logical consequences in terms of human will and personality. Yet it is too striking not to be recorded that what is most curious in all of Mr. O'Neill's account of life under England is its basic similarity to so much of the life over England. And by England one means all of that modern bourgeois democratic society which Mr. O'Neill seems to accept as an alternative. Between the mass mind of the submerged Romans and the mind of England in this year of the Jubilee, between the schools for mesmerizing the young and the Hearst newspapers, there is not really much choice. The English critics have forgotten that the late D. H. Lawrence spent most of his life writing about that "warm and sunlit" England in exactly the same way that Mr. O'Neill writes about the dark lands underground. The conclusion to which one is forced is that all states, in so far as they represent something external, tend to extinguish the individual personality. It may be only inveterate romanticism which makes Anthony Julian believe that the air into which he escapes is altogether free and pure.

This is to say that it is as an allegory in the most abstract sense, that is, on the philosophical plane, that Mr. O'Neill's book can be read with the greatest pleasure and satisfaction. It proposes again the ultimately insoluble problem of the relationship between the individual and the world. More exciting than the physical adventures of its hero, more convincing than its demonstration of a particular kind of social organization, is its restatement of the paradox by which the highest assertion of individuality is always accompanied by the deepest sense of social isolation. The most moving section in the whole book is that in which Anthony Julian, unexpectedly released by his captors, wanders through a swamp in such loneliness that for want of some animate company he throws his arms around a tree trunk. This is the real meaning of the book—the old conflict between isolation and absorption that has occupied thinkers and artists since the beginning of time. As for its political solution, the alternatives are probably never so drastic as they are here made, never a choice between the hypnosis of fascism and the day-dream of democracy. The individual needs some background against which to see the outline of his shadow: the real alternative would be a society which would give him a chance to measure that shadow.

William Troy

Tall Timber

Honey in the Horn. By H. L. Davis. Harpers and Brothers. $2.50.

AT the time when the American Mercury, with Mencken at the helm, was going in for local color, for rough-hewn, native American pieces, H. L. Davis and James Stevens were the lone, literary ambassadors from the tall timber of the Pacific Northwest. With the passing of this initial, somewhat forced growth of "indigenous" writing, the prose of Mr. Stevens and the poetry of Mr. Davis suffered an eclipse. Now, however, Mr. Davis has received the 1935 Harper Prize award for "Honey in the Horn," a novel so reminiscent of the Paul Bunyan stories as to bring nostalgic tears to the eyes of an old reader of the changeling Mercury.

"Honey in the Horn" is not a fantasy; its boy-girl plot is unrolled in straight, realistic fashion; yet in its use of hyperbole, its full-blown, homely metaphors, its poker-faced humor, it bears a plain family resemblance to the tall tales Mr. Stevens used to tell. As a novel it is a flat failure; its virtues are those of a folk tale; its value is anthropological.

The period of Mr. Davis's novel is the early nineteen hundreds; the setting is the state of Oregon, from the homestead farm lands in the east, through valley hop fields and mountainous grazing land, to the Indian fishing villages on the coast. As comprehensive as an encyclopedia article is Mr. Davis's study of the customs, characters, and occupations of the Oregon settlers. Imbedded in each chapter are chunks of historical information. There are dissertations on agriculture, on hunting and fishing, on Indian tribal customs; and a million varied human specimens are on display, earmarked, well catalogued, like livestock at a county fair. Storekeepers, sheriffs, harvest hands, strike-breakers, Indian bucks and squaws and whores, wagon trains of migratory settlers, gamblers, horse traders, gun-toting desperadoes elbow each other for space in these hard-packed pages. It is from these myriad thumbnail characterizations, in which each individual, though briefly glimpsed, is so highly colored that he seems like the hero of a minor saga, from the literal descriptions of flora and fauna, from the occasional bright nuggets of rustic philosophy, that the novel gets its modicum of life. Unfortunately, this blend of folklore and history is presented not for its own sake but simply as a backdrop for a faltering, mystery-romance story involving a pair of lovers. The heroine is a beautiful, savage, straight-shooting adolescent; the hero, a morose, untutored boy of seventeen, whose character is so amorphous that it persists, at odd moments, in merging with that of the author. These personalities, thinly imagined, indistinct, are too weak to support the mass of detail with which the book is stocked, and what might have been an entertaining non-fiction portrait of early Oregon becomes a tiresome, maladroit novel. The unflagging, chest-thumping virility of Mr. Davis's style does nothing to give his book either distinction or interest although his prose transcription of the Western drawl is occasionally amusing.

MARY McCARTHY

A Catholic Liberal

Thomas More. By R. W. Chambers. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.75.

PROFESSOR CHAMBERS, a specialist in sixteenth-century English history, has performed an invaluable service in this timely biography of Thomas More. The study of More's life is timely because it marks the four-hundredth anniversary of his death at the hands of Henry VIII and his recent canonization by the Pope. The biography justifies the canonization of More as a Catholic saint and also explains the tardiness of the church in recognizing him as a saint. For More was a humanist, a Renaissance scholar, and an internationalist. He was in fact a Catholic liberal; and his liberalism seems to have retarded his ultimate recognition even as his martyrdom for the Catholic faith seems to have made it inevitable. Tardy or not, the Catholic church chose an opportune time to raise him to the company of saints. More died protesting that he was "the King's good servant but God's first." Those words have a unique relevance to the modern European situation, where, particularly in Germany, Catholicism has again become a bulwark of the individual conscience against the claims of the totalitarian state.

Professor Chambers's book, which combines a meticulous scholarship in details with profound insights into the meaning of the dominant historical forces of More's era, is chiefly designed to prove that More was not the paradoxical figure and the creature of antithetical moods delineated by most of his biographers. It is true he was both a Renaissance scholar and an English lawyer; both an intimate friend of the internationalist, Erasmus, and the courtier of Henry VII, the author and instrument of a rising nationalism; both a semi-ascetic who wore a hairshirt to his dying day, and the Lord Chancellor of England; both a preacher of tolerance and a judge of heretics; an advocate of divorce in his "Utopia," who lost his head because he would not sanction Henry's divorce of Catherine.

While Professor Chambers does not resolve all these contradictions he does make the thesis very plausible that they are derived from a perfectly unified world view, the view of the Catholic liberalism, known as humanism, of which Thomas More was, next to Erasmus, the most brilliant exponent. If, in his Utopia, men are guided purely by the light of reason, that does not mean, according to the biographer, that More wanted to dispense with the Catholic faith. It meant only that he followed the theory of medieval schoolmen that men are guided by the natural law of reason and that the insights of the Christian faith are added to this natural law. The thesis of More's Utopia was: The Christian nations are condemned by the fact that the light of reason alone ought to guarantee a greater justice than they have achieved. He did not draw the conclusion from this argument which the eighteenth century would have drawn and did draw. He did not desire the elimination of faith. The equalitarian tendencies of his Utopia are ample proof that his ideal commonwealth was not modeled after Plato. Plato and Aristotle taught that inequalities were natural and inevitable. Catholic theologians followed the Stoics in a rationalistic equalitarianism, which they relegated, however, to a Golden Age.

The fact that More opposed Henry's papal tendencies in the first part of his reign and lost his head later because he would not accept Henry's usurpation of the spiritual headship of the church—that too is not an inconsistency. "The essential thing is that More warned Henry against committing himself too much to the Italian ruler who is 'a prince as you are'; and then also gave his life for the spiritual primacy. In this, as in almost everything else, Henry is the exact antithesis of More; Henry devoted the first half of his reign to promoting the interests of the 'small Italian princedom' and the second to destroying the spiritual primacy." Professor Chambers's contention that some of the misunderstanding of More is caused by the judgments of later "liberals" whose liberalism was informed by the new nationalistic and foreigner's influences, whereas More's liberalism thoroughly conformed to medieval presuppositions, not only is convincing but gives valuable clues for the understanding of subsequent history.

However great the difference between More's type of medieval liberalism and that of the eighteenth and nineteenth century, the two are similar in the pathos of their disappointed hopes. Upon the accession of Henry VIII to the throne one of the followers of Erasmus in England wrote: "Heaven laughs and the earth rejoices; everything is full of milk and honey and nectar. Avarice has fled the country. Our king is not after gold or gems or precious metal but virtue, glory, and immortality." The sorry realities of Henry's reign stand in the same relation to this naive estimate of his virtue as does the present state of the world to the high hopes of the eighteenth century.

Professor Chambers has not only given us a convincing picture of a great character but he has thrown light upon the whole sixteenth century and in addition he has made its issues relevant to our own.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Analysis of Renoir's Art

The Art of Renoir. By Albert C. Barnes and Violette De Mazia. Minton, Balch and Company. $5.

ALTHOUGH Renoir is acknowledged to be one of the two greatest modern painters, there was no study of him available in English until the publication of this book, which undertakes a sustained analysis of his development and of his relations to the traditions in which he was so deeply rooted. One who is acquainted with the authors' previous studies and with their educational work at the Barnes Foundation can think of no one better qualified for the task. The result of their research is a serious technical job, addressed to the task of objective analysis and exhaustively documented.

The first part of the book is given up to a statement of the method which guided the authors in their work. Much of this will be familiar to the student of aesthetics and to those acquainted with the introductions which the authors have written for their two previous volumes or with the more extended statement of his principles which Mr. Barnes made in "The Art in Painting." The second part of the book consists of a minute study of Renoir's development from 1860 to 1918. The "apotheosis" of this growth is found to have taken place in a Bathing Group, of 1916, and the analysis of this picture (pages 144-150) is only one illustration of the fact—evident throughout the whole study—that the authors react more sensitively, more fully, and in a better-integrated manner to aesthetic values in painting than any other contemporary writer with whom the reviewer is acquainted. This second part is supplemented by an Appendix, containing some eighty single analyses of important canvases of the master, and by 158 illustrations. A study of Renoir's relations to two great traditions of European painting—the Venetian and the eighteenth-century French—follows the inquiry into the development of Renoir's form. Here the authors seek to demonstrate that in the integration of the plastic values of his canvases through color, in his imaginative handling of light, which infuses bright and dark colors alike and thus replaces the Venetian soberness and density, in the spontaneity of his drawing and in the rhythmic interdependence of the whole composition, through which Renoir achieves a dynamic organization of solid volumes in space—in short, in every important respect, Renoir carried the traditions from which he stemmed to "expressive and decorative heights never before attained in the history of painting." What made such success possible was Renoir's endowment of unsurpassed technical resourcefulness, plastic imagination, and a perennially fresh interest in the world.

But even if one should disagree with the high estimate of Renoir at which the authors arrive, the central value of the book would remain unimpaired. For its value does not depend upon ex cathedra dicta regarding the order of rank of Western painting. Its value lies chiefly in the manner in which the method is applied to compel the reader to carry on a personal inspection of Renoir and of the artists to whom he is related. What they point to in concrete terms one may find in the canvas, if one knows how to look at pictures; but the value one may put upon it will certainly vary within a wide range.

And yet the work has a much wider implication, and other important practical uses besides. For in their conception of growth and of perception, which the authors have borrowed from Dewey and which they have adapted to the aesthetics of painting, they furnish us, it seems to me, with the only basis upon which the vital art practice of any period can be adequately defended against the protean attacks of the philistines. The old philistinism attacked modern painting because it refused to use only those forms which were approved by officially consecrated mediocrity. The new philistinism is too sophisticated to phrase its objections in the old terms. But at bottom its attacks amount to the same thing. Contemporary painters are being told that it is time to quit experimenting and to begin to consolidate the technical gains of the last seventy-five years. But what they are really asked to do of course is to give up their integrity as artists. Experiment is of the very essence of art. Artists who have no need to experiment have ceased to grow, and are, for all artistic purposes, dead. Analysis such as is found in this book is the most effective answer to the truculence of the new philistinism. For this analysis demonstrates objectively and by concrete citation what aesthetics can only state in very general terms, namely, that the so-called regionalist, the political, and such other contemporary movements in painting, in so far as they emphasize literary content at the expense of plastic values, lead in the end to artistic suicide. And as a corollary this book also serves to demonstrate in a concrete and objective fashion that while the painter expresses not only the purely visual aspects of his world but also whatever human values may inhere in the visual, he can express the latter only through his plastic means, nor can the manner of expression and the values expressed ever be thought of by the painter as distinct. There is nothing new about all this. But in the light of the current popular fallacies which infest criticism and seem even to affect the practice of the artists, it is today very much in need of reiterated demonstration.

ELISEO VIVAS

Mr. Justice Cardozo

Mr. Justice Cardozo: A Liberal Mind in Action. By Joseph P. Pollard. The Yorktown Press. $3.

THE liberal judge resembles the liberal in politics chiefly in a genuine open-mindedness toward both sides of an issue. He is able to see that a rule which applies to an employer should also apply to his workmen, even though it favors them. But in such impartiality, which is rare enough, the resemblance ends. The judge cannot be militant to right an uneven balance. His law-making power, now no longer covert, is still interstitial within a private-property profit system, and generated only in the occasional case. Usually he must defer to the legislature or refer a large wrong to its remedial wisdom. But in interpreting statutes already passed, his liberalism typically consists of an unliteral fidelity to their widest social effectiveness.

Cardozo has been preeminent in implanting his own insistence "that the judge is under a duty, within the limits of his power of innovation, to maintain a relation between law and morals, between the precepts of jurisprudence and those of reason and good conscience." He has been admirably unpharisaical, but neither as forward-pressing as the pragmatic bent of his thought would seem to vouchsafe nor as willing to subordinate law to ethics as his revolt against insulated legalism, and the non-pragmatic recognition of a distinction between intelligence and goodness, would augur. Still one would wish to see revised editions of his trilogy of jurisprudential writings, since none of the lawmen have been so willing as he to go beyond a previous cast of thought or expose to scrutiny the judicial technics.

Mr. Pollard's book is no philosophic presentation of Cardozo's thought but consists almost entirely of a quilting of his decisions in various areas—personal injury, family strife, crime, labor troubles, business and government, et cetera—with just enough dilution to admit lay intelligibility. This critical arrangement reveals peculiarly the tenor of Cardozo's mind and his influence on New York law. It also reinforces

☐ RESORTS ☐

UNCAS LODGE Uncasville, Conn. A modern adult camp on 165 acre charming New England farm. Private lake. 3 fast tennis courts, 5 piece orchestra, saddle horses and golf. Unexcelled cuisine.

RATES: $22.50 WEEKLY

Management: Diana & Abe Berman
N. Y. Phone. NEvins 8-2384—evenings
Sunday excursion train: 2½ hours to New London, $2 round trip.

VINEYARD LODGE
Ulster Park, N. Y.

"Garden spot of Ulster County"
Modern hotel midst beautiful 200-acre fruit and grape farm. Solarium, horses on the premises, tennis, swimming, social activities. American-Jewish cuisine. $17 and up.
J. Rosenthal, Kingston 157J2.

BARLOW FARM

on Candlewood Lake, Sherman, Conn. $18 per week. $3.50 a day for weekends. Tel. New Milford 501 Ring 3. For information, N. Y. phone MAin 4-8276 evenings.

UNUSUAL we emphasize is CAMP ARTEMIS, Brewster, New York. 1½ hours from Grand Central. Guest artists week-ends. Daily $3. Friday to Sunday $5. Weekly $15-17.

HILLMAN HOUSE—Pearl River, N. Y. Pleasant retreat in beautiful Rockland County. One hour from City. Swimming. American-Jewish cuisine. Rates $16.00. Phone 959. N.Y. Office EVergreen 8-9548

Make "HILLCREST LODGE" your "COUNTRY HOME." Golf, tennis, handball, on the premises; swimming nearby. 25 minutes by train, 50 by car. Millington 364, Plainfield, N. J.

☐ SCHOOL ☐

STUDY THIS FALL AT A WORKERS' SCHOOL IN THE OZARKS. THREE MONTHS FOR $50. Address inquiries to Commonwealth College, Mena, Arkansas.

☐ PERSONAL ☐

COUPLE, successful parents, will share their home and children with boy or girl of school age for winter. Outdoor life. New York. References. Box 646, % The Nation.

"GREATEST INVENTION since Edison," enthusiastic member writes about CONTACTS, correspondence club for mentally marooned. Send 3c postage. Box 91, Station D, New York City.

WANTED, Lady correspondent, maid or widow 30 to 50. Widower. Give birth date in reply. Reference of highest. F. M. Hamilton, 2601 Highland Ave., Terre Haute, Ind.

BOOKWORM: male, 24. Thrives in arid places. Little air or sunlight. No care or attention. Penman and typist. Remuneration secondary. Box 648, % The Nation.

☐ POSITION WANTED ☐

WANTED before Oct. 1. A College Church or work with college students by an earnest, well educated clergyman; wife and one child. Living quarters—moderate salary. Personal interview. Best of references by presidents, faculty and students. Box 649, % The Nation.

☐ HELP WANTED ☐

WANTED—Teaching couple for Progressive Jewish Boarding School—opens Sept. 16 for 10th school year. State experience, salary expected and send references. THE HOME SCHOOL, Plainfield, N. J.

The SOVIET CINEMA MARCHES ON USSR
AMKINO
will present this season at
The CAMEO THEATRE

"PEASANTS"
Friedrich Ermler's great saga of the Russian peasant in the struggle of collectivization. Awarded the Order of Lenin. (Premiere about Aug. 28).

"PEPO"
First Armenian talking picture with a colorful oriental background.

"NIGHTINGALE"
Nicholas Ek's first film since "The Road to Life." A thrilling historical drama. All in color.

THE NEW
"GULLIVER'S TRAVELS"
A daring satire based on Swift's famous story. One human actor and 1,500 puppets.

"AIR CITY"
Dovjenko's greatest achievement in the Cinema.

"WOMEN"
A revolutionary document of Soviet women in the struggle for freedom.

and

Sergei Eisenstein's new masterpiece, as yet untitled

And Others To Be Announced Later in the Season
WATCH FOR OPENING DATES

Coming Soon in The Nation

Eight Months of Congress
A Summary
by PAUL WARD

■

The Future Begins in Soviet Russia
by MARGARET MARSHALL

■

Social Security Under the New Deal
by ABRAHAM EPSTEIN

sharply the need for acquaintance with the mind of the dominating judge if one is to know the law in the realistic sense in which Holmes defined it—as prediction of what the courts will do in fact. A political scientist reading Cardozo's decisions in the chapter on the Workmen's Compensation Act found no principle of order. A good lawyer, familiar with the bent of Cardozo's mind but not with this branch of law, found it possible to guess his decisions in all but one doubtful case.

Cardozo was the sole dissenter in the oil case, but his liberal reading of constitutional provisions since his appointment to the Supreme Court still cannot go beyond a certain point in respect to basic issues of national regulation of interstate commerce, delegation of legislative authority, and due process. Drawn up short in the third Negro disfranchisement case from Texas, which finally succeeded in its perverse objective, and forced to concur in the Schechter case, he shows clearly in these decisions, made since the publication of Mr. Pollard's book, what constitutional limitations are, even to the most benevolent and discerning interpreter. They serve to point clearly the lesson either of patient respect for forms of government or drastic change in our federal system. A law restricting the power of the court to declare acts unconstitutional would not be enough.

Not only as one of the small company of outstanding American judges listed by Pound in his Foreword but also as avowed philosophic jurist, Cardozo takes his place as successor to Holmes. His thought is more eclectic, less strictly philosophic, and less strikingly individual. But his liberalism is more sympathetic to reform, more like that of Brandeis though less economically informed, rather than simply the wide Holmesian tolerance of experiment. His style, still to be hailed by literary anthologists, is more sinuous and baroque, less incisive but equally eloquent, and marks as memorably the imprint of a man upon the law which he has helped to create.

The book is still to be written which would yield a psychograph of the man together with a critical analysis of his philosophy as found in his addresses and juristic writings as well as in his decisions. The connection between his Jewish heritage, his respect for the dignity of man, and his sympathy for the oppressed, between his bachelordom and his concern for family solidarity, his gentleness of nature and his judicial strength, his philosophic outlook and his specific decisions, awaits illumination at the hands of the biographer who should rise to such competence. BERYL HAROLD LEVY

Shorter Notices

Fuel. By Wilfrid Gibson. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

Wilfrid Gibson, in 1915, was a fairly important minor Georgian. Following the lead of Masefield and Kipling, he was one of those who helped banish from poetry the fin de siècle machinery of troubadours and lilies and sighing damsels. Today, after twenty years, Gibson is unchanged. There is still in his poems the conscious effort to impregnate the common raw materials of life with poetic significance; and there is still the passionate romantic thrust, the preoccupation with the immediate emotion, that characterized all the Georgians. On the whole, "Fuel" has all the virtues and all the faults of the better grade of Georgian verse. Mr. Gibson has managed to temper a little the faintly adolescent enthusiasms that marred the poetry of the younger Georgians; but if he gains thereby in balance and moderation, he suffers a proportionate loss in brute poetic drive. We are not much impressed today by the admittance of skyscrapers and coal mines into poetry—both have become poetic staples—and it is unfortunately just this marriage of poetry to the tangibles of modern life that is Mr. Gibson's chief stock-in-trade. These poems may be fully as good as his earlier volumes, as I think they are. But it is impossible that they should have upon the mind of 1935 the same startling impact the earlier poems had upon the mind of 1915. Written by a younger man, these poems would be simply anachronistic. Coming from Wilfrid Gibson, they are still somewhat irrelevant to our own day; but they form an honorable and not unimportant addition to the corpus of pre-war verse.

Spangled Banner. The Story of Francis Scott Key. By Victor Weybright. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

Mr. Weybright appears to have told everything that is worth knowing about the author of our national anthem except how Key's name should be pronounced. Thanks to his industrious researches, Key appears as a man of considerably more importance than has generally been thought. He was born (prematurely and out of doors, according to local tradition) into the best planter society of Maryland, won distinction as a lawyer, helped to organize the American Colonization Society and was one of its vice-presidents, enjoyed the intimate friendship of Roger B. Taney and John Randolph, served for some years as district attorney for the District of Columbia, and successfully adjusted the controversy between the United States and Alabama over the lands of the Creek Indians. All this, however, has been forgotten, and he is remembered only as the prisoner of war who composed "The Star-Spangled Banner" while the British fleet was bombarding Fort McHenry in the War of 1812. Mr. Weybright gives a lively account of the episode and assembles a good deal of information about the history of the song. It was "perhaps unfortunate," he thinks, that the words and music were made by law the national anthem, in 1931, since they were "already practically recognized as such" by that time and "scarcely needed Congressional sanction." The New York World, after remarking that the tune is "quite unsingable, except by professionals, and probably there is nothing to do about it," saw "virtue" in the fact "that it does require a wide compass, so that school children cannot sing it, and that it is in three-four time, so that parades cannot march to it." The poem, of course, is not bad as such productions go, but it would be interesting to know how many patriots could recite any but its first and last stanzas.

On Economic Planning. Edited by Mary L. Fledderus and Mary van Kleeck. Covici-Friede. $3.

This is distinctly not just another book on planning. The conference of the International Industrial Relations Institute at which the papers contained in this book were presented had as its objective planning which "can end unemployment, establish security, and raise standards of living." By definition this excluded the great bulk of the so-called planning that has been in evidence during the depression—restrictive, piecemeal controls which have been established for the sole purpose of restoring profits. The importance of this distinction is amplified in the introductory chapter by Dr. Alfons Goldschmidt, director of the newly formed Social Economic Laboratory, who argues that fascist or Nazi "planning" is a contradiction of all of the principles of social economic planning and is in reality but an ill-concealed attack on working-class living standards. Valerian V. Ossinsky, vice-chairman of the Soviet State Planning Commission, contributes a detailed and comprehensive study of the principles and results of Soviet planning; these are admittedly far more in harmony with those which the conference was seeking for the United States. Miss van Kleeck closes with a concrete, realistic discussion of the objectives and problems of economic planning in the United States. The book is not a blueprint of a new social order, but it presents a challenge to thoughtful men to begin preparations for such a chart.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1935 No. 3661

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 253
EDITORIALS:
Sanctions or War? 256
Showdown at Geneva 257
Farce in Albany 258
ISSUES AND MEN. SENATORS WAGNER, NYE, AND OTHERS. By Oswald Garrison Villard 259
CARTOON: "SOON, ADOLF, THERE WILL BE NO ONE LEFT TO BLAME BUT ME AND YOU." By LOW 260
"SOCIAL SECURITY" UNDER THE NEW DEAL. By Abraham Epstein 261
GERMANY CODIFIES LYNCH LAW. By Emil Lengyel 263
EXIT THE FILIPINO. By Carey McWilliams 265
THE FUTURE BEGINS IN SOVIET RUSSIA. By Margaret Marshall 266
THE MEANING OF THE MODERN DRAMA. I. THE CONDESCENSION OF THE CRITICS. By Joseph Wood Krutch . . 269
CORRESPONDENCE 270
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
Apology for Not Being a Communist. By Heywood Broun . . . 274
How the Lumber Strike Was Broken. By Selden C. Menefee . . 275
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 276
BOOKS:
Salvation from Within. By Dorothy Van Doren 277
The NRA and Recovery. By Maxwell S. Stewart 277
Middle Western Marriage. By Mary McCarthy 278
Russian Reminiscences. By Hans Kohn 279
Shorter Notices 279

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING CHARLES ANGOFF

ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional. THREE WEEKS' NOTICE AND THE OLD ADDRESS AS WELL AS THE NEW ARE REQUIRED FOR CHANGE OF SUBSCRIBER'S ADDRESS.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by the Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

WITH HUEY LONG filibustering until the last minute, the Seventy-fourth Congress managed to adjourn on its second attempt. The indescribable chaos which marked its last hours, following the revolt of Southern Senators against the cut in the AAA cotton loan, was merely the climax of a riotous session. Yet despite differences between the Administration and Congress on many major issues and constant friction between the two houses, an impressive amount of significant legislation was enacted. The social-security bill, though grossly inadequate and defective, must nevertheless rank among the most far-reaching pieces of legislation ever adopted by an American Congress. Add to this the banking bill, the utilities act, the gigantic appropriation for public works, the Wagner labor bill, the recent neutrality legislation, the Guffey bill, and the increased income and estate taxation, and one has a record of legislative achievement exceeded only, perhaps, by the Seventy-third Congress. Looked at from the standpoint of the needs of the American people in the sixth year of the depression, however, the record is by no means satisfactory. The great majority of the eleven million unemployed are still wholly unprovided for, and the demise of the NRA left the millions of employed without protection in the matter of hours and wages. The great accumulations of wealth are practically untouched by Roosevelt's widely heralded tax measures, and our antiquated and outworn tariff and commercial policies—which lie at the root of the depression—remain fundamentally the same as in the heyday of post-war insanity.

THE HAMILTON FISH MENTALITY of certain State Department officials doubtless explains the otherwise inexplicable protest filed by the United States against the recent conference of the Third International in Moscow. Surely the existence of the Comintern is scarcely news, even to the State Department. Nor has the affiliation of the American Communist Party with the Third International ever been kept secret. The Communist Party is a legal organization which has for its purpose the socializing of our economic order—an aim shared, according to the Republicans, by all the members of the New Deal. These facts were all known in November, 1933, and there has been no change in the situation since that date. That Soviet representatives in this country have scrupulously refrained from the least connection with American political activities is incontrovertible. No one has even accused them of interfering in our affairs. The protest was based solely on the participation of American Communists in a conference held on Soviet soil and on remarks made by them which were said to indicate Comintern influence in the American political scene. In asking the Soviet government to prevent Americans from participating in the Comintern, we are in effect asking the Soviets to do our own dirty work for us. We do not and legally cannot object to Communist activity in this country. But we do object, apparently, to our Communists making speeches about the American political situation in foreign countries. Just what the State Department expects the Soviet government to do is not clear. Surely it is not so unrealistic as to expect it to ban the Third International altogether. We suspect that what it really wishes to prevent is the further use of the Comintern as a sounding board for mass discontent and disaffection in this country.

IT HAPPENED ONCE BEFORE in the brief history of the Third Reich that a minister stated his case in the forum of public opinion and defied the Propaganda Ministry by distributing his speech to the German people. Vice-Chancellor von Papen, after his famous Marburg address, by a mere accident escaped death in Hitler's blood purge of June 30, 1934. Dr. Hjalmar Schacht is in no such danger. After Schacht's recent speech in opposition to Nazi Jew-baiting, Julius Streicher and his rowdies of the S. A. and the Hitler Youth arranged a number of noisy street demonstrations demanding Schacht's removal, but farther than that the matter will not go. Dr. Schacht has announced his financial plans for the immediate future. On September 1 he will convert public treasury (short-term) notes amounting to one billion marks into ten-year bonds, the third refunding operation since the beginning of 1935. The savings banks will be forced to take half of this new issue, although they have already advanced the state a billion marks. But since these institutions have estimated aggregate deposits of close to twelve billion marks, the German government should find it a simple matter to extract another four or five billions from the same source in the next three or four years. The other five hundred millions the government will take from the reserves of the business banks. With this financial reserve the Nazi dictatorship will be in a position to pay for its armaments and its job-producing enterprises for some time to come. Under present conditions it would be hopeless to try to float a bond issue for anything approaching that amount in the open market. The future of the Third Reich is too uncertain. The public, especially the moneyed interests, have no exalted faith in its ability to meet its obligations one, or two, or ten years hence. By using the savings of the masses to convert short-term notes into long-term bonds, Schacht leaves the Reichsbank free of government paper to accumulate funds for a possible emergency. Insurance companies, business banks, savings banks, mortgage banks, and the gold-discount bank must invest hard cash in these exceedingly doubtful government bonds. The Reichsbank holds its fists in its pockets that it may the better come to the assistance of the Nazi regime should a crisis arise. The Reichsbank is Hitler's last hope. Its president can challenge even Streicher and Goebbels with impunity.

SOME YEARS AGO General Erich von Ludendorff propounded the theory that the Jews, Catholics, and Masons started the World War for their own separate and collective good. Since then he has specialized in the international crimes of the Jews, and now, according to the Associated Press, he has developed the remarkable thesis that "Jews are deliberately fomenting extreme nationalism in Japan in order to imbue the Japanese with the idea of a world mission and then to bolshevize the nation." From this the Jews "expect to make vast gains." The theory is a beautiful one, but unfortunately it conceals a boomerang. There are about 1,000 Jews in Japan, while the total population of the country is some 65,000,000. Thus, one Jew must be more effective spiritually and intellectually than 65,000 Japanese. But the Japanese, according to Nazi philosophy, are almost as good as the Aryan Germans. Hence every Jew in Japan becomes as effective as, let us say, 50,000 German Aryans. But this conflicts with another tenet of the general's philosophy, to wit, that no Jew can conceivably be as good as even one German in any branch of human endeavor. The general, great thinker that he is, no doubt has a solution for this disturbing equation.

SOCIAL CREDIT scored its first important political victory on the North American continent when it captured fifty-six out of sixty-three seats in the recent Alberta provincial elections. This triumph was obtained by an astute application of much the same kind of tactics as those employed by the Townsend movement in this country. Instead of promising $200 a month to persons over sixty years of age, the social-credit adherents guarantee that everybody will receive at least $25 a month when their plan is perfected. While William Aberhart, leader of the Alberta movement, is somewhat vague about how this sum is to be raised, he insists that it entails no "gigantic scheme for taxation." Proponents of the social-credit theory believe that the amount of money available for the purchase of consumers' goods is always considerably less than the aggregate cost of the goods. They would eliminate the resulting gap between production and effective consumer demand by issuing credit to be used solely for the purchase of consumers' goods. This "basic dividend" would supposedly be sufficient to cover the necessities of food, clothing, and shelter. The inflationary effects of pumping a vast amount of new purchasing power into the system would be avoided, according to Mr. Aberhart, by establishing a "just price" for all commodities, and by regulating the price spread. The catch in the scheme, of course, is that it is unadulterated inflation, and no law on earth can keep prices down if the relative amount of the purchasing medium is increased. But inflationary projects have always made a strong appeal to a debt-ridden population, and it is possible that the results of the Alberta election may put new life into the moribund Douglas movement in this country.

WHEN HARRY HOPKINS was director of relief in New York State, he characterized the scheme of work-for-relief then in vogue in New Jersey as an "illegal system of forced labor." Such procedure, he said, fostered the very unwholesome attitude that relief clients should be grateful for the aid they received, whereas, if eligible for relief, they were entitled to such assistance "by virtue of being citizens." The Works Progress Administration in New York City has announced that persons on home relief who refuse to take WPA jobs at the "security wage" will be cut off relief and then arrested for non-support of their families. Mr. Hopkins's principles, like the American standard of living, are deteriorating. The head of a family of four on home relief, according to the New York Times, receives about $53 and is often able to pick up a few days' work, although this is forbidden, to increase his income. At the "security wage" he will get $55 a month, but will have practically no chance of earning extra income; he must also spend money for carfare and lunches. In a word, he and his family will have even less than they have been getting, and if anyone imagines that even two dollars more or less are not an important consideration he has never lived on a budget of $55 a month for four people. It will be a pretty spectacle when the Domestic Relations Court convicts its first victim for refusing to reduce his family's already deficient diet. We hope Mr. Hopkins and General Johnson will be present.

MEANWHILE white-collar workers have even less use for the "security wage" than bricklayers. When a thousand to fifteen hundred of them picketed General Johnson's office, they received assurances that no one would be fired for taking part in the protest, and a worker thus discriminated against was restored to her job. But two days later Dr. Harold G. Campbell, Superintendent of Schools, announced that he had discharged fifty-nine play-school teachers provided for the Board of Education by the Works Progress Administration. The charge against them, he said, was that they had abandoned their classes to join in the demonstration. The number has risen to 107 and Dr. Campbell refuses even to discuss the question. General Johnson, while assuring them they would not be taken off the payrolls and would be transferred to other jobs immediately, has passed the responsibility to the Board of Education by stating that it is the final judge of the qualifications of teachers assigned to it. The teachers, many of whom hold licenses, have brought forth strong evidence to show that the charge of abandoning their classes is false. By careful prearrangement, in order to prevent any such charge, the children were left under adequate supervision. Mr. Campbell's accusation is leveled against trained and experienced teachers, some of whom have worked steadily winter and summer for two years without vacation or sick leave. By being transferred to other jobs they must take up work for which they are not trained; what worries the teachers even more is the possibility that they will be barred from winter education projects to which in former years they have been assigned at the close of play-school work. The real reason for their discharge is their participation in the stoppage for which General Johnson has promised there shall be no dismissals. Mr. Campbell and the Board of Education should be forced to meet the issue, and General Johnson is in a position to make them do so.

LOBBYING is rapidly developing into one of our major industries. From a swift survey of one recent week's newspapers the average citizen must wonder if there is a prominent man alive who has not drunk a cocktail with B. B. Robinson to save widows and orphans from the death sentence, dined with a shipping magnate to save the American merchant marine, and made whoopee with a blonde for the general good of the country—there must, by the way, be more blondes in Washington than in any single Scandinavian country. As Congress closes, its various committees have fifteen major inquiries planned or in process. The only one on the list in which we dare to make a presumption of innocence is the inquiry into all matters pertaining to replacement and conservation of wild life. The others include the two investigations of the power lobby and an inquiry into an alleged super-lobby maintained by the chain-store interests, an examination of bankruptcy and receivership proceedings in the federal courts, and an inquiry into international banking during the World War. Even with Congress adjourned, the newspapers are assured of a brilliant fall season, with bigger and better scandals involving our best people.

LILY-WHITE schools and colleges may be heading for legal extinction along with lily-white jury panels in the South. The precedent set in the Scottsboro case has encouraged a series of assaults on other forms of racial discrimination conducted through the office of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. In Maryland a graduate of Amherst, Donald Gaines Murray, was excluded from the state university law school on the ground that he was a Negro. Mr. Murray sued the president of the university and the state Board of Regents and obtained a court order directing the university to admit him. The university has entered an appeal, stating that since the court order was obtained "several other applications by members of the colored race for admission to the Law School of the University of Maryland have been received. . . . That one application by a colored student has been received for admission to the Pharmacist School. . . . That also there have been received and are on file applications by colored students for admission to the College of the University of Maryland." The appeal rather plaintively points out that these applications must be ruled on one way or the other before the opening of the college in September. The university claims that scholarships are provided for colored students in professional schools outside the state and that this constitutes the "equal educational facilities" required by law. In Virginia a Negro girl, a former student in a Northern college, has applied for admission to the state university as a graduate student. Similar applications are pending in Missouri. Each case will be fought through, if necessary to the Supreme Court, in order that definite precedents may be established.

NEGOTIATIONS have been completed between Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles and representatives of the government of Panama for a treaty which promises to rectify many of the abuses cited in Carleton Beals's recent article in The Nation and discussed on another page of this issue in letters from Mr. Beals and the executive secretary of the Canal. The new treaty bans armed intervention by our forces. It will permit Panama to build a trans-Isthmian highway and to construct radio broadcasting and receiving stations, a right hitherto reserved to the Canal Zone and the United Fruit Company. Obviously the new treaty is generous compared with those which previous Administrations sought to force down Panama's throat. The question is, To what extent will its enlightened purposes be carried out in practice? According to present regulations Panamanians are not to be discriminated against in the hiring of outside workers for the Canal Zone, but in practice this rule has been largely ignored. During the last trouble in Panama the United States carefully abstained from armed intervention, but it nevertheless violated the treaty of 1903 by refusing to permit the constituted authorities to transport troops over the canal and the railroad. Panama thereby got a much better government—the best, in fact, that it has ever had—but who will deny that this was intervention? Unless the United States learns to make its practice conform more closely to its treaty obligations, the latest revisions will have little more than academic value.

WE NOTE with no surprise that the recent war maneuvers of the army and the National Guard have revealed "serious and startling deficiencies in equipment and in officer and 'non-com' personnel." Only five of our tanks, it is said, are "serviceable," the rest being inefficient, costly to operate, and out of date. The whole army seems to be enmeshed in a maze of red tape, and to lag far behind foreign forces. Offhand we cannot remember any army maneuvers, either in this country or abroad, which did not reveal similar weaknesses. The recent British air maneuvers, for example, appear to have been organized for the sole purpose of frightening the British public into contributing more money for aviation. That we can understand, for there can be no doubt that Great Britain is highly vulnerable to an attack from the air. But our War Department has no such excuse. If the present army authorities cannot provide the United States with an army sufficiently strong to cope with Mexico, Canada, or any force likely to invade the country on an annual appropriation of more than $400,000,000—to say nothing of the PWA grants—the remedy is not to increase appropriations but to abolish the army as a useless luxury.

Sanctions or War?

THE speed with which temporary neutrality legislation was rushed through Congress dramatizes the American people's passionate abhorrence of war. Seldom in our history has a spontaneous demonstration of the popular will been translated more quickly into action. The fact that the bill as finally adopted was satisfactory neither to the Senate isolationists, such as Nye and Clark, nor to the State Department does not rob it of its value. Even in its emasculated form it serves notice on our financial and industrial interests that another war to save profits would encounter far more determined opposition than the last one.

To assume, however, that the passage of the Pittman resolution removes all danger of our being involved in the war now looming in Africa would be fantastic. Wars are not stopped by expressions of peaceful intent. Wilson's reelection in 1916 on a "he kept us out of war" platform was fully as emphatic a declaration for peace as the present neutrality laws. Yet while the votes were being counted, powerful forces were drawing us irresistibly into the conflict. These same forces are in existence today, only slightly modified by the new neutrality legislation. It is true that from now on it will be illegal to export "arms, ammunition, or implements of war" for use by belligerent states, for American citizens to ride on ships belonging to a nation engaged in war, or for American ships to carry munitions destined for warring countries. These are steps in the right direction. But had they been in effect in 1914, there is no assurance that they would have prevented our entry into the war.

Quite apart from the tremendous influence of British propaganda and the other non-economic factors which predisposed us to enter on the side of the Allies, it is evident that the greed of armament manufacturers was but one of many forces driving us into the struggle. Only a part of our inflated exports to Europe in 1914-18 consisted of articles specifically forbidden under the Pittman resolution. Yet many of the others—including côtton, wheat, copper, chemicals, petroleum, and steel—are as indispensable to the conduct of a war as ammunition and firearms. Had neutrals not furnished Germany with fats in 1914-18 it never would have been able to hold out for four years. And from a business standpoint it makes little difference whether we sell the belligerents potatoes or cannon. An increase in the sale of any article would give some group a vested interest in the war. Credits would be necessary to finance the transaction, and after a certain period there would be a demand for loans to replace credits. The fact that loans would ostensibly be extended to finance the sale of non-military supplies would only make it more difficult for the government to bar their flotation.

On the high seas the problem of neutrality remains practically unchanged. As in the past we may expect that the superior sea power will attempt to enforce a blockade to prevent supplies from reaching the enemy. The inferior power will retaliate by resorting to submarines or aircraft to check the trade of the other. The mere fact that American ships will not be carrying munitions will scarcely protect them against interference from one or both of the warring countries. It is even possible that the weakening of our traditional neutral policy will cause belligerents to have even less hesitancy than in 1917 in challenging America's "rights." Should this lead to the sinking of American ships or the loss of American lives, vociferous elements both in and out of Congress would not hesitate to call for war on the ground that our "national honor" had been violated. No neutrality laws can curb a Hearst or a Chicago Tribune.

The truth is that once a major war has started, the chances of remaining out of it are extremely slim. As in combating an epidemic, the best strategy is to prevent the virus from gaining a foothold. And it is at this point that the Pittman resolution with its mandatory embargo provisions raises the most serious problem. If the conquest of Ethiopia is to be prevented, it can only be through a rigorous application of sanctions. Arbitration and conciliation have been tried and have failed. Attempts of the League to exercise moral suasion have proved futile. Old-fashioned diplomacy, with its compromises and concessions, has been no more successful. Mussolini has let it be known that he is committed to a war of aggression and has virtually dared anyone to stop him. Sanctions may also fail, but they present the sole alternative to war. Surely no country was ever more vulnerable to commercial and financial pressure than Mussolini's impoverished domain. With little capital, an unstable currency, an insufficient supply of foodstuffs, and a notoriously backward industry, Italy would be unable to maintain hostilities for six weeks without active foreign aid. If in addition to other sanctions the League would order England and France to close the Suez Canal to troops and supplies from Italy, Mussolini's designs would be completely checkmated.

Obviously it would be futile for the League to invoke economic measures unless it were assured of the full support of the world's greatest commercial nation—the United States. It was particularly unfortunate that the President was forced to accept the mandatory provisions of the Pittman bill on the very day when the British Cabinet was meeting to consider the possibility of applying sanctions. Although the rumor was never confirmed that Great Britain had specifically asked for American cooperation in bringing financial and economic pressure to bear upon Italy, the chances are overwhelming that at least an unofficial inquiry was made. The action taken at Geneva on September 4 will depend very largely on the nature of Washington's reply.

At first sight it would seem that the new neutrality legislation precludes any action on our part in support of the League against an aggressor. The law specifically requires that the arms embargo be imposed on both powers, and since Italy manufactures its own munitions the burden will fall, as is usually the case, on the weaker country. The President has no power to impose a boycott or to declare an embargo on contraband destined for an aggressor. Nor does he have authority under this legislation to forbid American citizens to extend loans and credits to the Italian government. Fortunately, this does not mean that the Administration's hands would be completely tied should it desire to cooperate in sanctions against Italy. The embargo on "implements of war," which would be automatically applied against both belligerents, could be stretched—by Presidential definition—to cover almost any article which the League might decide to withhold from Italy. The fact that we should be unable to ship these articles to Ethiopia would be of little consequence as long as Ethiopia was able to obtain supplies from other countries. And by a fortuitous chance we already have on our statute books a law which, if enforced, would prohibit the extension of loans or credits to the Italian government while applying no such restriction to Ethiopia—the Johnson act forbidding loans to countries which are in default on their war debts to the United States.

LIBRARY

Thus the machinery for at least a limited cooperation with the League is in existence. It remains to be seen whether the Administration has the courage and the imagination to use it. As the wealthiest and strongest of the great nations, the United States has a responsibility for leadership which cannot be shirked without disastrous consequences. Our first duty, clearly, is to caution Italy openly against violation of the Pact of Paris. Should the warning not be heeded, as is likely, the least we can do is to assure the League of our willingness to cooperate as far as our laws will permit in such non-military measures as may be decided upon. Contrary to the general impression, the risk involved in joint action of this type is negligible. Mussolini may shake his fist threateningly at Great Britain when the latter talks of sanctions, but if the United States and the League powers take a common stand he will have little choice except to seek a face-saving compromise. Such a stand is the one guaranty against a war that may destroy all that is left of Western civilization.

Showdown at Geneva

UNTIL the League Council convenes on September 4, things will remain as they are on the Ethiopian front. Italy will send no fliers to Addis Ababa and England will not close the Suez Canal. Everyone connected with the controversy will be occupied with maneuvering for position. It seems incredible that one of the most hard-headed arbiters of international politics should have overlooked the fact that imperialist tensions in Africa are too great to permit any one nation to start trouble without immediate and menacing repercussions.

At present it is obvious that Italy has at least temporarily gained the upper hand. Mussolini met England's talk about closing the Suez Canal with the bold declaration that "sanctions are war," and the subject was quietly dropped. A hastily called Cabinet meeting, it was reported, would make important decisions, but the outcome was the very unsensational announcement that Britain would do nothing before the convocation of the League Council. The transference of the fleet at Malta and the sending of naval reinforcements to the canal are elementary precautions to safeguard British interests against any eventuality.

Everything now depends on Geneva. Though no one knows what will happen there, one can make a fairly confident guess. England will probably come to the Council with new proposals more favorable to Italy than those previously rejected. Reports from Addis Ababa give the impression that the Ethiopian emperor is eager to arbitrate. Unless Mussolini insists on his pound of flesh, it should be possible for the two contestants to come to terms. But if, as seems likely at present, the Duce refuses to budge from his position, England may try to localize the conflict. Sanctions will undoubtedly be a last resort, and will be applied only if assurance of American support is obtained. The danger is that nothing will be done and that Ethiopia will be consigned to the same fate that overtook Manchuria.

Given a choice, the imperialist powers of Europe would have preferred to checkmate this flagrant Fascist attack on an inoffensive nation. But all are slaves to the prevailing insecurity on the Continent. No one knows what the next day will bring. An announcement like that which appeared in the always well-informed Informazione in Rome, confirming a previous report from Paris that Mussolini had offered Hitler a military alliance, a ten-year non-aggression pact between Rome and Berlin, and a common offensive against the "democratic" nations of Europe in the event of an "overt act" by the League powers, overshadows all merely humanitarian considerations. Of all the nations of Europe interested in this situation, Austria once more plays the most pathetic role. As officially recognized ward of the Duce it must register enthusiasm for his Ethiopian campaign, though it knows that the price may be its national independence.

France is in the most unpleasant position. It has linked its fate with Italy's in order to defend Austria's independence. But it must have the friendship of Great Britain or fall into the maw of the Fascist Charybdis. If, for instance, Great Britain should move for sanctions against Italy in the coming session of the League Council, France could hardly vote against them knowing as it does that the nations of the Little Entente are too intensely concerned with their own national problems to be reliable allies and that the pro-German tendencies of Bulgaria, Greece, and Hungary may, in a crisis, seriously cripple the position of the French in the Balkans. Without Great Britain, France is in danger of isolation. If the German-Italian alliance becomes a fact, the understanding with Italy will be flimsy protection indeed. In its search for allies France is negotiating for the realization of its old dream, a Danubian federation under French influence.

With the kaleidoscopic suddenness with which issues and nations emerge and disappear in the European picture, England and Italy have suddenly taken on a menacing importance in the affairs of Europe. There is a story current in political Paris which shows that England's role in the conflict has long ceased to be that of the benevolent outsider. Mussolini, it is said, quite bluntly declared to Captain Eden when the latter visited Rome a few weeks ago that he would rather come to a showdown with Great Britain there and then than be subjected to constant and irritating friction. Captain Eden, whose recent diplomatic adventures have shown him to be a very forthright young statesman, retaliated with the admission that the so-called Italo-Ethiopian conflict seemed to have developed into an open contest for supremacy between Italy and Great Britain, in which the former's firm intention to rule the Mediterranean had become disquietingly apparent. There are times, it seems, when the shrewdest of diplomats tire of using their words to conceal their thoughts.

At no time since its inception has Geneva been a more important factor in world affairs. Not that the League has taken or is likely to take an aggressive stand. But with both England and France vitally concerned in its continued existence it has certain obligations toward Ethiopia which cannot be ignored. General Smuts, the South African Premier, explained this a few days ago. If the League fails in its duty in the Abyssinian question, he said, the world will return to the system of individual alliances which existed before the World War. Such a development would seriously disturb the security of the British Empire. Britain must keep the League alive. The stand it takes in Geneva on September 4 will be determined by this paramount consideration.

Farce in Albany

THE New York State Federation of Labor, representing the largest section of the organization, at its recent convention at Albany rejected a proposal for the formation of a labor party and turned down a resolution favoring industrial as against craft unions, threw out a Communist, and proclaimed its whole-hearted support of the Democratic Administration, both national and local. The Albany proceedings were conducted throughout by the high moguls of the A. F. of L. bureaucracy. It was Joseph P. Ryan who led the opposition to the labor-party proposal. "We all know," he said, "such a party would be the desire of Communists, who would attempt to control." It was Mr. Ryan also, as head of the credentials committee, who announced the expulsion of Angelo Savarino, delegate from the Bricklayers' Union in New York City. "The American labor movement has no use for Communists," said Mr. Ryan, who is a one-reason man, "and we will not permit any Communist to sit in this convention." It was William Green who revealed what may come as a surprise to many workers—that Governor Lehman is labor's man of the hour. To be sure, the president of the American Federation of Labor was not very specific. "It is wonderful, indeed," he said, "that a man who, like the Governor, is the product of an entirely different environment from that in which the average worker lives should be able to understand and appreciate so fully the great human needs of the hour." Finally there were only a few dissenting votes when the resolutions committee submitted the indorsement of President Roosevelt for having "demonstrated by word and deed his vital interest in the welfare of the working people" and in particular for his program for "social and economic security of the masses of the people" which "has been enacted into law."

All this is not exactly news, but it serves to emphasize once more the gulf which separates the present leadership of the federation from the American labor it pretends to represent. Even on the basis of the traditional policy of rewarding labor's friends and punishing its enemies, the indorsement of the present Administration does not make sense. According to the Monthly Survey of Business issued by the A. F. of L. itself, the condition of labor in terms of buying power and employment continues to grow worse. "Even before the death of the NRA [i. e., Mr. Roosevelt's policies]" reads the bulletin for June-July, "workers' buying power was gradually losing ground. . . ." As for the color of the President's labor policy, the rank and file remembers, if the bureaucracy does not, such outstanding betrayals as his attempt to persuade labor to accept the notorious no-strike "truce" offered by the steel trust—it was turned down by William Green; his extension of the automobile code, including the Wolman labor board—this controversy led to an open break between the White House and Mr. Green; his overruling, through Mr. Richberg, of the findings of the National Labor Relations Board in the Newspaper Guild and Colt Firearms Company cases; and his insistence on the "security wage," which even the Albany convention denounced—almost in the same breath with its indorsement of the Administration! Finally there is the peripatetic example of Hugh Johnson, who in spite of his strike-breaking sprees from coast to coast continues to enjoy high favor from the White House.

A few weeks ago in Connecticut representatives of 150 locals of the A. F. of L. unanimously voted for the formation of a Connecticut labor party "anti-capitalist in nature," to be based on A. F. of L. unions, independent unions, and other mass organizations, irrespective of present political affiliations. High A. F. of L. officials were conspicuous for their absence, and Miss Perkins was not one of the honored guests and speakers. Instead, its key speaker declared that the movement for a labor party had grown in part out of the bitter experience of the workers in the Colt Fire Arms strike, in which the Richberg-Roosevelt technique in defeating the provisions of Section 7-a was so well illustrated.

In Oregon the annual convention of the State Federation of Labor likewise moved far to the left. It favored the formation of a new party representing "the interests of the producers" and denounced the profit system. "We declare," runs the vigorous resolution, "that the retention of profits by any commercial or financial institution is immoral so long as there is any citizen willing and able to work who is not employed." The convention also rapped the Roosevelt "security wage," and demanded repeal of the criminal-syndicalism law in Oregon; it commended the principles of the Townsend old-age pension plan but stipulated that it be financed by steeply graduated income levies. In Oregon the rank and file has had the recent and bitter experience of seeing a militant strike of some 40,000 lumber workers sabotaged and defeated not so much by any outside agency—though the usual contingent of national guardsmen, state police, and a strike-breaking governor was on hand—as by one of that tribe of labor vice-presidents who support the House of Green and who would rather deal with an employer any time than with a worker who wants to fight for better conditions. The story of how the lumber strike was broken is told on another page of this issue.

American labor, as represented by the Connecticut and Oregon meetings, and the bureaucratic parasites which feed upon it will test their relative strength once more at the A. F. of L. convention in October. The rank-and-file protest will undoubtedly be stronger this year than it was last. Eventually it must make impossible such farcical proceedings as those which passed for a labor convention in Albany.

Issues and Men

Senators Wagner, Nye, and Others

IT was right and proper that Senator Wagner should stand next to the President when the social-security measure was signed, for he more than anyone else had been responsible for getting the bill through Congress and for licking it into the shape in which it was finally passed. He achieved this because he believed heart and soul in this reform and for seven years had been demanding it and creating public sentiment in its behalf. It took endless time and patience, study and hard work to get this legislation through—legislation which will long stand as a landmark and will remain in the front rank of Mr. Roosevelt's achievements. I am well aware that the law is far from what it ought to be, that it is but a beginning, and that it is probably far from satisfying Robert Wagner himself. Still it is a tremendous step forward. I do not intend, however, to discuss the law. I wish only to dwell upon the great service rendered by Mr. Wagner. We do not usually think of him as a Progressive Senator in the sense of his belonging to the little Senatorial group that goes by that name, probably because he, a product of Tammany Hall, is still a pretty good party man. But that is just another reason why we should be grateful for the highly enlightened and intelligent service he has rendered.

I wish particularly to call attention to it by way of additional protest against popular criticism of Congress as either a do-nothing body or one that does too much, and as retarding, therefore, our recovery. If you take your job in Washington seriously, the time you must give to it is overwhelming. You have to deny yourself adequate sleep and rest, many pleasures, and all social life which is not absolutely necessary. Even then one wonders how Congressmen can possibly study and digest half the legislation upon which they are supposed to hold intelligent opinions. Most people think that all a Senator has to do is to sit in his seat from noon on and listen to long and totally unnecessary speeches. They have no idea of the hours Senators must devote to the all-important committee work, the hearings, the drafting, the redrafting, revising, and amending of bills. This is often tremendously exhausting and laborious work. Then there is the mail. How a Senator ever gets through the important letters that come to him is beyond me—even if he has two or three able secretaries.

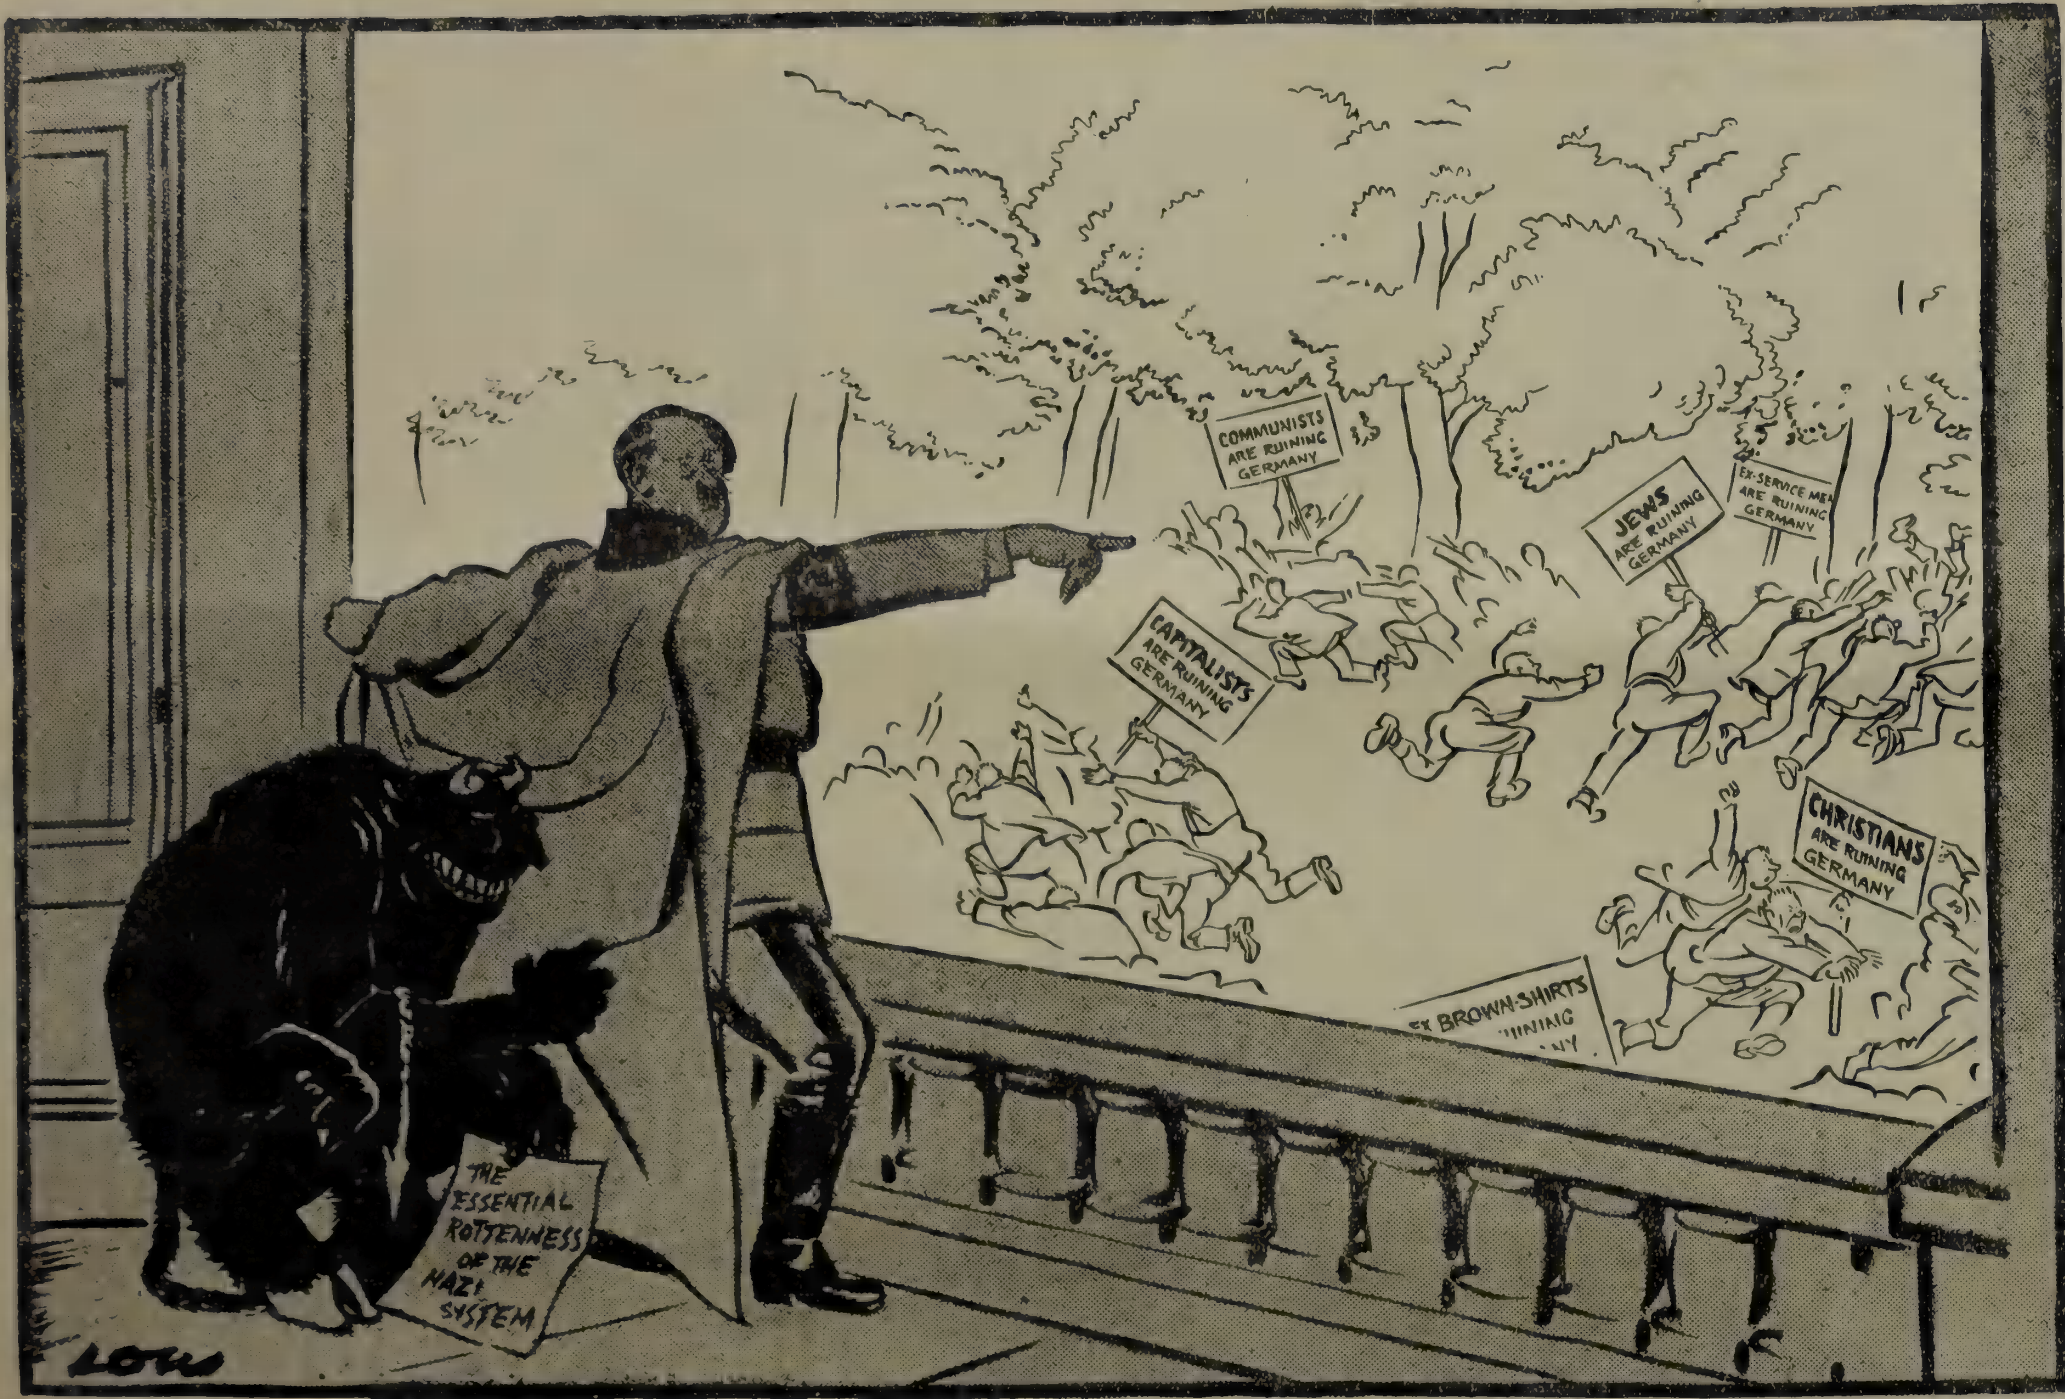
"But," friends say to me, "the trouble is that there are so few men of the kind you describe. They are a mere handful compared to the drones and mossbacks or the demagogues of the Huey Long type." To which my reply is that the group is much larger than liberals realize, because there are hard-working and conscientious men in the other camp who not only do their share in working the machinery of Congress but often make contributions of great value. Take Senator Couzens of Michigan, for example. His experience with big business concerns has often been most useful. Borah, who no longer belongs in the Progressive camp, is one of the hardest-working men in Washington. There are others less conspicuous who bear their share of the brunt of the legislative battle. When it comes to the list of the Progressives and those with progressive sympathies, the number is encouragingly large. Norris, Nye, Frazier, Bone, Schwellenbach, La Follette, Shipstead, Costigan, Wheeler, Clark (in some matters) are not all; Long of Louisiana, Walsh of Massachusetts, Neeley of West Virginia, and a number of others vote progressively on occasion. The emergence of a group of first-term Congressmen enthusiastically progressive, headed by Maverick of Texas and Marcantonio of New York, has been the happiest event of the present Congress. What both groups lack in numbers they make up in earnestness, studiousness, and being constantly on the job; only once was the Senatorial group caught asleep and that was when the infamous Tydings-MacCormack sedition bill was slipped through without a record vote or any fight against it.

The kind of service the group renders has just been admirably illustrated by Senator Nye's jumping in and demanding the passage of the neutrality bill under threat of a filibuster. It was the more creditable because the White House was obviously opposed and the State Department, it has been reported, asked that there be no legislation at this session. But Nye and Bone saw their opportunity and made the most of it, and public opinion rose to them promptly. Here again the thanks of the country are due to Senator Nye. This was not a haphazard happening. Nye has worked up to it by months of engrossing labor on the munitions inquiry, interspersed with much speaking throughout the country to arouse public opinion, a task that makes great additional demands upon his time and strength—I am told that he accepts no fees for these talks. But meanwhile he is supposed to be in his seat with adequate regularity, keep himself informed on pending legislation, serve on other committees, and answer mail, which since the beginning of his munitions work has poured in from all over the world. No, I shall never join in any wholesale denunciation of Congress. Look at the amount of legislation of great importance that has been passed this year. By no means all of it will last, and beyond doubt much of it was hasty. But no one who reads the list of what has been put through can charge Congress with being all talk without accomplishment.

Undoubtedly regrettable compromises have been arrived at in conference committees. That has always been the case, notably in our tariff legislation, and it does not mean that Congress is unworkable or ineffective. It does call for a study of how the procedure of Congress can be speeded up. Meanwhile, I hope the liberals of the country will join me in giving unqualified praise to Senators Wagner and Nye for their recent services.

Oswald Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW



COMMUNISTS ARE RUINING GERMANY
CAPITALISTS ARE RUINING GERMANY
JEWS ARE RUINING GERMANY
EX-SERVICE MEN ARE RUINING GERMANY
CHRISTIANS ARE RUINING GERMANY
EX BROWN-SHIRTS
THE ESSENTIAL ROTTENNESS OF THE NAZI SYSTEM
LOW

"SOON, ADOLF, THERE WILL BE NO ONE LEFT TO BLAME BUT ME AND YOU."

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press

"Social Security" Under the New Deal

By ABRAHAM EPSTEIN

THE social-security bill was signed by the President on August 14 with a succession of pens and under flood lights—as if to make up for the previous lack of publicity accorded it. Never before in the history of this or any other country has a bill of such great scope and import been passed with public opinion in such a daze about the issues. Unfortunately the present law seems doomed from the start by its complex, slovenly, and mangled character. The subject of social insurance, in which economics, politics, statistics, social policy, trade unionism, wages, and industrial production are intertwined, was barely discussed in the United States prior to the President's message to Congress in June, 1934, when he promised to undertake "the great task of furthering the security of the citizen and his family through social insurance." For more than half a century social-insurance programs have been keen political issues throughout Europe, but here there has not been even academic interest; our newspapers gave the subject no notice until a year ago and have given it very little since. Everywhere abroad social-insurance measures have been championed chiefly by organized labor. Our labor movement has either opposed them or given half-hearted and uninformed support.

No wonder, therefore, that the President's speech of June 8, 1934, fell like a bombshell on the country. The most ardent advocates of social insurance in America were bewildered by its boldness and political audacity. Even more deluding was the almost universal approval which greeted the speech. Everybody jumped on the social-security bandwagon. Governors made it their campaign issues. Congressmen spoke for it. Candidates for state legislatures made it a plank in their platforms. Even candidates for city councils and sheriff's offices felt compelled to declare themselves in favor of social security. And when, on November 6, 1934, the American electorate gave the President the most Democratic Congress in two generations, hopes were raised sky-high.

Like all nine days' wonders, it was too good to be true. The President spoke of "social security," and who could be against that? True, he did mention "social insurance," but why bother to discover the meaning of so strange a term? Of several hundred articles and newspaper stories on social security appearing during the past year, less than a score attempted an analysis of social insurance. Social security was identified with old-age pensions, for an ardent twenty-year campaign for old-age security had brought about a tremendous popular demand for old-age protection. More than half the states had actually adopted pension laws. This movement had gained such popularity that it attracted a galaxy of nondescript promoters ranging from the Fraternal Order of Eagles to the messianic Dr. Townsend. The country was thus clamoring for old-age pensions. But the Administration, symbolized by Madame Secretary Perkins, seemed for a while almost totally unaware of this uproar. Miss Perkins had been principally concerned with the problem of unemployment insurance. As late as November 14, 1934, there was an attempt to confine the federal program to unemployment insurance. At that time the President, in a speech admittedly prepared under Miss Perkins's supervision, said, "I do not know whether this is the time for any federal legislation on old-age security."

This conflict in basic objectives marked only the beginning of the confusion. Difficulties were inherent in the very make-up of the President's Committee on Economic Security. For in creating a committee to study this subject and prepare legislation, the President, instead of setting up an expert commission, intrusted the subject to five of his busiest Cabinet members, already driven to distraction by the many tasks of the New Deal program. The responsibility for formulating the concise and comprehensive legislation fell naturally upon the chairman of the committee, Miss Perkins. For one reason or another Miss Perkins ignored the recognized American students of the problem. A one-day circus was staged in Washington on November 14 with over 300 "experts" in attendance and with the formal speeches so arranged as to frustrate one another. A staff composed largely of complete novices in social insurance or of persons connected with some fringes of the problem was recruited to advise the Cabinet committee. There were also a Technical Advisory Committee of various government office-holders, some fourteen other committees, and an Advisory Council of prominent representatives of the public, employers, and workers.

The direction of the committee's staff came exclusively from the chairman of the Cabinet committee. Since Miss Perkins had no particular panacea for old-age dependency, the staff was comparatively free to work out this phase of the program. Had their recommendations been followed, we might have had a constructive method of meeting the problem of old-age dependency. But Miss Perkins had a palliative for unemployment. Early in 1934 she sponsored the Wagner-Lewis bill providing for the encouragement of unemployment insurance through the tax-offset method. This involved a federal tax on employers' payrolls throughout the nation, to be remitted to employers who paid a duplicating tax under state unemployment-insurance systems.

When, after the nation's reaction to the President's speech of November 14, it became clear that action on old-age security could not be postponed, old-age pensions were added to the security program. Since the old opponents of labor legislation were busy fighting the NRA and other New Deal activities, their opposition to the measure was palsied. They were also convinced that it was useless to fight the swelling tide of enthusiasm for old-age pensions, and they were not much worried about the cumbersome tax-offset method proposed, since they felt this would either be held unconstitutional or prove so complicated and irksome as to nullify itself. There remained only the question of health insurance. Here the reactionary American Medical Association got busy at once and succeeded in suppressing any suggestion for health insurance made by the Cabinet committee, as well as the committee's staff report on health insurance, promised for March 15, 1935.

The Administration had probably never dreamed that it would have to do more for old-age security than establish a system of federal subsidies to states enacting standardized pension laws. Such bills had been before Congress for many years, and committees in two successive Congresses had reported them favorably. This legislation would have passed the Seventy-third Congress had not the President promised a more comprehensive program for 1935. But when the Cabinet committee learned of the future expense involved—considerably exaggerated by the staff because of unfamiliarity with the problem—it indorsed the logical plan of instituting simultaneously a system of contributory compulsory old-age insurance. Although handicapped by a total lack of information on a subject requiring years of study, the staff did draft a reasonable plan, which was approved by the Cabinet committee and incorporated in the original bill.

This plan provided for payroll contributions from employers and employees to reach 2½ per cent each within the next twenty years. Pensions to all insured were to begin in 1942 out of money borrowed from the accumulated fund. After thirty or thirty-five years the federal government was to reimburse the loan. But when the President learned that the federal government would owe the fund more than a billion dollars by 1970 he ordered his Secretary of the Treasury—a member of the Cabinet committee, who apparently had approved this scheme before it was introduced—to insist that under no circumstances would the federal government assume any financial responsibility. The plan must be made self-sustaining.

Under White House pressure the House committee stepped up the contributions to a total of 6 per cent within twelve years. This transfers the entire burden of old-age dependency after 1942 to the backs of the young workers and their employers, to the exclusion of the well-to-do, who have shared in the maintenance of the aged poor since the establishment of the Elizabethan poor-law system three centuries ago. Since industry will make every effort to pass on its levy to the consumers, it means that the young employees—in their dual role of workers and consumers—will bear the major cost of the accumulated problem of old-age dependency. No other nation has ever put into operation a plan of this nature without government contributions derived from the higher-income groups.

The old-age contributory insurance plan is fraught with many other dangers. Enormous reserves, estimated at more than $10,000,000,000 by 1948 and at more than $40,000,000,000 in 1980, are contemplated. These will create a stupendous problem of investment. Experience everywhere indicates that politicians will hardly be able to keep their hands off such easy money. The cold-storaging of so much sorely needed purchasing power not only frustrates the expressed aims of the New Deal but may definitely hamper recovery. The constitutionality of the entire scheme is also extremely doubtful.

In the matter of unemployment insurance the staff's task was even more onerous. Despite violent criticism no other plan except the tax-offset method was countenanced. When the staff's expert on unemployment insurance opposed this plan as ineffective, he was promptly dismissed. His report was never published. Every effort was artfully made to have the Advisory Council indorse the tax-offset method. This body also was ignored and dismissed as of no further use when, after careful deliberation, all the representatives of the employers and of organized labor and some of the outstanding members of the public decided by majority vote against this plan. Only the clumsy, duplicating tax-offset method permitting individual company reserves and making possible a miscellany of forty-eight contradictory state laws with grave constitutional difficulties was permitted to emerge.

The work of the Cabinet committee was shrouded in mystery until the day the bill was introduced. It was prepared in great haste by an inexperienced young Harvard graduate without consultation either with students of the problem or the experienced Congressional draftsmen. It is even doubtful whether all the members of the Cabinet committee examined it. So incompetently and loosely drawn was the bill that its introduction caused a sensation. Although it was completely unintelligible, Administration impatience rushed Congressional hearings at which official spokesmen attempted to explain away the meaninglessness of the drafted bill. Administration spokesmen consumed more than 1,000 of the nearly 2,500 pages of testimony in both houses. Only after these spokesmen were through were others who persisted in their attempts allowed to speak. The House Ways and Means Committee attempted to limit all outside witnesses to five minutes and on one occasion forcibly ejected a Communist spokesman when he overstepped the time limit—a procedure unknown in Congress in many years.

The House committee could not proceed with the bill as presented and ordered its draftsmen to make it intelligible. The latter, unable properly and constitutionally to retain the unemployment-insurance provisions permitting all kinds of individual schemes, limited all state plans to the pooled fund. Angered by the slipshod job presented to it, the committee took the Social Security Administration Board out of the Department of Labor and made it independent. Outside of the contributory old-age insurance plan insisted upon by the White House and the questionable tax-offset scheme the House bill was sound in its federal grants to states for the aged, dependent mothers, and child welfare.

The proponents of social insurance were encouraged by the improvements made in the House. They looked forward to the removal of other faulty features in the Senate. But this was not to be. The Administration was insistent, and few members in either house had time to master the lengthy and complicated bill covering ten different subjects. Convinced that the Administration's choice was "all or nothing," they made up their mind to vote for all. Thus during five full days of Senate discussion not even half a column of the Congressional Record was devoted to the prodigious and unprecedented scheme of unemployment insurance, outside of explanatory remarks by the committee chairman and Senator Wagner, the sponsor of the bill. The economically unwise and socially menacing contributory old-age insurance plan was given less than a column in the hundreds of pages of Congressional debate, and that only toward the very end. Only its constitutionality was thoroughly discussed. Senator after Senator declared that this part of the bill is unconstitutional but no one made an effort to amend it to avoid nullification. During the debate on the Clark amendment to exempt private pension schemes from contributory insurance a number of Senators pointed out that this would further complicate the constitutional difficulties. To this Senator Clark replied in typical vein: "The constitutionality of the proposed act is already so doubtful that it would seem to me to be a work of supererogation to bring up the question of constitutionality in regard to the pending amendment."

The Senate bill not only differed much from the original proposal but destroyed every improvement made in the House. The Clark amendment further ruined the old-age contributory plan. The House improvements on unemployment insurance were wiped out by restoring most of the original questionable provisions. Even the simple subsidy plans were undermined by the Russell amendment granting federal pensions in states which have no pensions as yet, thereby pitching the entire subject into the political arena and halting state action for old-age security. At the insistence of the House conferees the Clark amendment was eliminated and the Social Security Board, which the Senate had reinstated in the Department of Labor, was again made independent.

The United States thus possesses a new Social Security Act, just as a short while ago it also possessed a National Industrial Recovery Act and a Railroad Retirement Act. Its fate now lies with the courts. The federal grants for pensions in old age, to dependent mothers, to the blind, and to varied child-welfare and public-health activities are sound and constitutional. They mark truly advanced steps and genuine progress. The unemployment-insurance and old-age contributory insurance plans, however, are administratively and socially unwise.

The effect this bill may have on the American social-insurance movement is of vital importance. Social insurance is recognized today as offering the only practicable instrument for meeting the problem of insecurity arising from modern industrial development. It is used in communist as well as capitalist and fascist countries. Its chief asset lies in its power to distribute the cost over all groups in society—the rich as well as the poor. But in placing the entire burden of insecurity upon the workers and industry, to the exclusion of the well-to-do in the nation, the present social-security bill violates the most essential modern principles of social insurance. There is also grave danger that the administrative perplexities inherent in the bill, to say nothing of possible court nullification, may deal a death blow to the entire movement in the United States.

Germany Codifies Lynch Law

By EMIL LENGYEL

Berlin, August 15

GERMAN criminal law has been one of the pet objects of Nazi vociferations. The Nazi journals have pointed out the anomaly of living under a "heroic" Teutonic regime while at the same time having to apply a system of laws conceived by such French sob-sisters as the Encyclopedists and Rousseau. Even impartial observers saw the inconsistency of protecting the defendants in criminal trials with constitutional safeguards while exposing the rest of Germany to unmitigated tyranny. This anomaly is now at an end, and if it should occur to some Nazi leaders to stage another Reichstag fire, they could be sure that the defendants would be condemned whatever the evidence.

The change was effected through the Penal Code Amendment Law, which was promulgated on July 5 and will go into effect on September 1. It has been described by Dr. Hans Frank, President of the Academy for German Law and Reichsminister Without Portfolio, as revolutionary. The law codifies Nazi lynch justice, divorces jurisprudence from impartiality, and makes the National Socialist Weltanschauung the guiding star of criminal trials. This revolution in German law is accomplished, first, by making the judges entirely subservient to Nazi ideology and, second, by freeing them from the trammels of objective application of the law. Article I of the amendment provides: "Punishment will be meted out to anyone who commits a deed made punishable by law or deserving punishment in accordance with the basic principles of the criminal code or sound public sentiment. If no definite criminal law applies to the deed, it must be punished in accordance with the law the basic ideas of which best fit it." As official and semi-official commentators of the amendment have pointed out, the law and its accessory stipulations make it incumbent upon the German judge to accept fully the party line of National Socialism. If he should fail to see the light according to Nazi wishes, he may be promptly called to order by the State Attorney, who is given the right to appeal against judicial decisions that do not stretch the law in such a way as to convict a defendant.

It was a red-letter day in the history of mankind when the legal axiom, "No punishment without law" (nulla poena sine lege), became the keystone of the judicial structure. Under systems based on it the citizen knows what actions the state considers offenses against the community. The principle which the Nazi law announces is expressed in the axiom, "No crime without law" (nullum crimen sine poena). Under the old system the defendant was supposed to be innocent until found guilty; under the new he may be found guilty even if he has broken no law fitting the case. The new law, in short, gives the Nazi state the legal means to crush political opposition of every imaginable kind.

Already the law has cast its shadow over the criminal courts of the Reich, and judges anxious to please the regime have begun to apply its principles. To what tyranny it may lead can be illustrated by a few recent cases. One of them, reported in the ultra-Nazi Frankfurter Volksblatt, is particularly noteworthy because of the judge's comments.

An Aryan of Wetzlar wanted to marry a Jewess who had been his sweetheart for five years. He applied to the town registrar, who refused to marry them on the ground that as a National Socialist he considered such mixed marriages harmful to the community. The Aryan took his case to the court and petitioned it to direct the registrar to perform the marriage. The court rejected the claim of the petitioner and gave its motives in the following statement:

> While it is true that existing laws do not prohibit the marriage of a man of German blood and a Jewess, this technicality must not be allowed to support the claim of petitioner. With the accession to power of National Socialism in Germany the principles of its Weltanschauung became the basis of the racial structure of the German Reich. . . . Under the new order the supreme aim of the country is the liberation of Germany from all harmful influences of alien races, the strengthening of the German soul, and the preservation of its purity for all times to come. It is not a valid objection that mixed marriages have not yet been forbidden, and it is rooted in the typically Jewish and liberal conceptions of law and morals. It was just such axioms as "whatever is not forbidden is permitted" that broke the backbone of the German legal system under the old regime. On the other hand, the National Socialist ideal of law proclaims the rule of "Thou shalt!" . . . And the marriage of a man of German blood and a Jewess is an unbridgeable contradiction of this ideal.

The case of a merchant-tailor in Schneidemühl was told in the Westdeutscher Beobachter, with words of strong commendation for the judges. According to the newspaper's story, a Jewish merchant boasted to a customer of his that a bigwig of the local Nazi Party had bought a coat from him. This statement was carried back to the Nazi, who sued the merchant for slander, although he did not deny the truth of the statement. The Schneidemühl court found the merchant guilty and sentenced him to a month in prison. The merchant took the case to the higher court in Marienwerder, which reversed the decision of the first court and ordered a new trial, not because the merchant had been unjustly punished but because the punishment was not severe enough. Said the learned judges of East Prussia:

> The lower court committed an error in protecting the aggrieved party merely in his capacity as a political leader of the National Socialist German Labor Party. The charge of buying from a Jew is a grave reflection on the honor not only of a political leader . . . but of every citizen. Those who buy from Jews are no longer members of the German nation.

Since there is no law as yet in the Third Reich against buying from a Jew or talking about such purchases, the courts at Schneidemühl and Marienwerder handed down their decisions in accordance with Nazi Weltanschauung rather than the letter of the law.

Another typical case was tried by a special court at Frankfurt-am-Main. The defendant was a man with an excellent war record, a victim of shell-shock. He was accused of having made disparaging remarks about the wife of General Hermann Göring. The prosecution did not even contend that his remarks constituted slander or a similar offense punishable under the law. Nevertheless, the court sentenced him to four months in prison under the special law protecting members of the government against "clandestine attacks." The man's excellent war record and shell-shock were taken into consideration.

In a trial held before the county court of Berlin-Lichterfelde, a father was deprived of the custody of his seven-year-old son. The court found that the father had no right to bring up his child since his pro-Communist leanings were notorious. Here again the law was stretched to cover an extraneous case.

After the promulgation of the penal-code amendment the State Attorney in Berlin-Moabit, referring to the crime of the Catholic nuns who had been charged with taking money out of the country for their foreign missionary work, said that since smuggling money was as execrable (fluchwürdig) as high treason, it should be punished with death.

The official Nationalsozialistische Parteikorrespondenz is crusading to make it a capital offense for Jews to have non-Jewish lessees or sublessees in their apartments and houses, for Jewish physicians to treat non-Jewish patients, and for Jewish lawyers to represent non-Jewish clients.

The ravings of that bloodhound of anti-Semitism, Julius Streicher, have received legislative backing from the new law. Streicher wants to have the "defilers" of the German race beheaded. More conservative Nazis urge that such crimes against the race be punished under the law on incest, which may mean a prison sentence of fifteen years.

Great changes are also taking place in the execution of sentences. Political prisoners, who under the old regime were segregated in fortresses, are now treated as common criminals, or—as the experience of many of them has shown—even worse. (Hitler knows from personal experience how the Weimar republic coddled its few political prisoners. While in the fortress of Landsberg on the Lech he was given complete freedom to conspire with his comrades at twilight conferences in a friendly drawing-room.) Nor will there be any coddling of short-term prisoners. In democratic countries it is the tendency to alleviate the hardships of such offenders, but the Nazis will carry out these punishments with the utmost rigor.

The search for the best way of carrying out capital punishment has caused much headache in the Reich. Members of the law-codifying commission discussed the possibility of permitting persons under sentence of death to say farewell to this world in a heroic way by drinking a cup of poison. Finally conservative counsel prevailed, and executions will be performed by the ax-man in full evening dress, his hands in spotlessly white gloves. Secretary of State Roland Freisler gets lyrical about beheading: "Death tops the criminal system, and in it the absolute mastery of the whole over the part finds its most complete, most serious, and most solemn expression."

The number of executions under the Third Reich as compared with those in the previous regimes is shown by a writer in Das Neue Tage-Buch, the German émigré weekly. While the annual average of executions under the Second Empire and the Republic was six or seven persons, not less than sixty-seven death sentences were passed by German courts from January 1 till July 15 of the current year, and during the same period thirty-seven persons were beheaded, while thirty sentences are either under appeal or on Hitler's desk. During these six and a half months Hitler pardoned only four men and three women. Three of the pardoned men killed their wives or sweethearts, showing that the Leader takes his dislike of women quite seriously. These executions include only the legal ones and not those in which condemned prisoners were found hanging in their cells or were shot while attempting to escape. Nor do they include the quiet blood purges in which the Nazis are said to indulge from time to time.

Exit the Filipino

By CAREY McWILLIAMS

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT on July 11 signed HR 6464, a measure to provide free transportation to the Philippine Islands for Filipinos residing in the United States. The publicity which the measure received did not, however, make mention of Section 4 of the act: "No Filipino who receives the benefits of this act shall be entitled to return to the continental United States." In other words, the bill is in effect an exclusion act, for no Filipino who takes advantage of the act can reenter the continental United States except within the quota established in the Philippine Island Independence Act of March 24, 1934—which is tantamount to permanent exclusion. It is impossible to understand the motivation back of the transportation measure without having in mind the real story of the Filipino in the United States, which is to say, the Filipino in California.

At the time of the passage of the Japanese Exclusion Act of 1924, the farm industrialists intended to use Mexican labor. Mexican labor had been recruited in ever-increasing volume since 1914. It was cheap, plentiful, and docile. But suddenly the Box bill and the Harris bill threatened the supply. It was at this point that the farmers beckoned to the Filipino. In fact, the first marked increase in the number of Filipinos entering continental United States occurred in 1923, in anticipation of the exclusion act. In 1923 2,426 Filipinos entered California, whereas in the three preceding years the average annual number of arrivals had been only 618. During the years from 1923 to 1929, the average annual number of Filipinos entering the United States was 4,177. Figures compiled by the State of California, in an official report of 1930, indicate that there were about 34,000 Filipinos in the state at that time. The purpose for which this supply of "cheap" Filipino labor was recruited is conceded. The Commonwealth Club of California, on November 5, 1929, issued a report on Filipino immigration in which it was stated that "threat of Mexican exclusion has created an artificial demand for Filipino laborers. They are regarded as the only remaining substitute in the cheap labor field. . . . The large agricultural interests are acting as a conduit transmitting numbers of such immigrants."

But it was soon discovered that the Mexicans would not be placed on a quota basis. This circumstance, coupled with the discovery of the militancy of Filipino labor, prompted the farm industrialists to start a movement to exclude the Filipino. In 1927 Congressman Welch of California, who is the sponsor for HR 6464, and Senator Hiram Johnson introduced legislation in Congress which had as its aim the exclusion of the Filipino. This plot was scotched when it was pointed out that the Filipino probably could not be excluded under his status as a national, and the plan to get rid of him had to wait until the passage of the Philippine Island Independence Act created a situation which made exclusion legally feasible.

The Filipino, militantly race-conscious, began to protest against his exploitation in California at an early date, and has grown increasingly rebellious. The Filipino Labor Union, restricted to agricultural workers, has seven locals with a membership of about 2,000 in California today. The Filipino is a real fighter and his strikes have been dangerous. In August, 1934, about 3,000 Filipino workers went on strike in the valuable lettuce fields near Salinas, California. On September 3 a union of white workers employed in the packing sheds returned to work under an agreement to arbitrate. In fact, they were told to return to work by Joseph Casey, A. F. of L. official. But the Filipino field workers refused to call off the strike. State highway patrolmen were summoned and, aided by special deputies and a local vigilante group, they formed a small army which went the round of the lettuce fields "suggesting to idle Filipino field hands that they move." Approximately 700 Filipinos, among those who refused to return to work, were driven out of the Salinas fields by force. The camp of Rufo Canete, a popular Filipino labor contractor, was raided by vigilantes and burned to the ground, at a loss to Canete of approximately $16,000. Many Filipinos were corraled and held incomunicado; and of course the strike was broken.

With the exception of the Mexican, the Filipino has been the most viciously exploited of any of the various races recruited by the California agriculturists to make up their vast army of "cheap labor." Practically all Filipino agricultural labor is supplied by contract, the contractor charging for board and transportation and a fee for his services besides. It is impossible to verify just how much the average Filipino field worker is bilked by the contractor, so closely is he "protected" from investigators. The very sociability of the Filipino has been exploited. For example, the Filipinos like to work in large numbers. The use of large numbers of Filipinos in the asparagus beds of the Delta region near Stockton, California, has enabled the growers to increase productivity per acre—as it makes possible a more thorough picking—while at the same time it has decreased the average wage of the workers. In 1929, as compared with 1925, there was an increase of 16.2 per cent in the number of Filipino workers in this district, but a decrease of 38.5 per cent in the average daily earnings. Admittedly the Filipinos are excellent workers: "They are willing to work under all sorts of weather conditions, even when it is raining and the fields are wet," reads one report.

Today, after his brief but strenuous period of service to American capital, the Filipino faces deportation, as a fitting reward for his efforts. The acute Commissioner of Immigration, in reporting on HR 6464, pointed out that "the Filipino cannot be removed unless he makes application for the benefits of the act." But the Filipino lives in California, and he applies to Washington for free transportation. There is a great distance intervening and doubtless many forces can be applied in California that would not echo too loudly in Washington. It is estimated that about 15,000 Filipinos will "avail" themselves of the offer to return. But the Filipinos that I have talked to have no desire or intention to take advantage of the act. They regard it as a trick, and not a very clever trick, to get them out of this country.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

The Future Begins in Soviet Russia

By MARGARET MARSHALL

QUITE aside from any dishonest motives, the truth about Russia, like the value of Soviet money, depends upon who gets it. Imagine two entirely sincere seekers after this truth. One is past middle age, in spirit if not in years, fairly well off and conservative, fond of and in a position to command the amenities of life (including free speech), aware of the depression but skeptical of attempts to prevent such catastrophes. He will find that Russians don't get enough to eat, that housing conditions are intolerable, that there are soldiers everywhere, that everyone works long hours, that there is no freedom of thought, that peasants don't like collectivization, that babies are taken away from their parents and put in crèches, that children in school are filled with propaganda, that classes are too big, that hospitals are insanitary and badly equipped, that trains are dirty, that Russian women have no shape, that all plays are too long, that the plumbing is bad, that skilled workers are not skilled, that wages are low and prices are high, that life is one long pep talk, that there is great inequality in the incomes of individuals, that there is no family life, that children can be executed, that women have to clean the streets, that artists and writers are severely censored, that most things can't be bought and those that can are of poor quality, and so on. The Saturday Evening Post or the Hearst press could send such a seeker to the Soviet Union without so much as an instruction and be sure of an "unfavorable" report.

The other seeker is young, thinks the world is in a pretty bad way but that something can be done about it. He lacks a sense of security or is worried because millions of others lack security and run the risk of being hungry even in rich countries. He is not terrified or bored by the idea of physical hardship. He is tired of the sophisticated cult of defeatism. He feels that the social mechanism in which he lives is running down with fatal consequences for the creative impulse. In Russia he will find that the vast majority have more to eat than they used to and feel confident of having still more, that the cities are crowded but there is more building going on than anywhere else in the world, that it is considered a great honor to belong to the Red Army, that Russia is so busy it doesn't want a war, that everybody has a job and most people work overtime (with pay) because there is so much to do, that everybody gets a vacation with pay, that Russia is one big closed shop, that education is free and universal, that even a poor worker can get professional training at the government's expense, that housemaids go to school, that seventy new school buildings are being put up in Moscow this summer, that the peasants are proud of their new electrified barns and their experimental stations complete with microscopes, that mothers who work in factories or in the fields can leave their children in crèches under responsible supervision, that workers and their families receive medical care free, that some hospitals are good and some are not but that even a poorly equipped hospital may seem good to a Russian who could never go to a hospital before, that there are no "illegitimate" children, that wages are going up and prices are coming down, that goods to buy are improving in quantity and quality, that everybody goes to the theater, that writers and artists are treated better than they deserve, that criminals are given a chance to become useful citizens, that Russia, in every phase of activity, is beginning a long ascending curve of development whose future limits are indiscernible.

The truth is usually said to lie somewhere between two extremes. In the case of Russia it lies in the two extremes and all the way between. The American, above all others, is in a position to understand why this can be so. An infinite range of pictures could be drawn of American life, all of them literally true yet striking every note between the extremes of "favorable" and "unfavorable." It is easy to see how untrue any one of them might be if instead of being set in its context it were emblazoned on the cover of Liberty or Harper's or The Nation as The Truth About America. In Moscow in May a prominent and rich American just over from the States reported that the stock market was going up and that conditions in general were rapidly improving. According to other observers, unemployment was increasing and conditions in general were getting gradually worse. In both reports the specific fact was correct. The stock market was going up and so were the unemployment figures. The mere fact of size makes both countries the easy prey of unscrupulous or unintelligent reporters. And in both there is a basic inconsistency which increases the confusion. In America the world's most advanced technological area is being constrained by a backward political system; in Russia a highly advanced political idea is being applied to one of the earth's most backward areas.

It is possible to understand a new phenomenon only in terms of our own experience. In their propaganda against communism Hearst and his like have applied this principle with studied dishonesty. In terms of American middle-class standards, life in Soviet Russia is on a low level materially. To imply, however, that this has anything to do with communism as an economic system is as dishonest as to criticize the capitalist system because there were no ten-cent stores in San Francisco in 1849. In fact, an American may come closest to the truth about physical living conditions in Soviet Russia if he thinks of it in terms of our own pre-industrial frontier. (This is not true of the social standard of living. There were no crèches, no rest homes, no factory hospitals, no free pre-natal care on the American frontier; and these amenities are still lacking in spite of our tremendous progress.) Suppose the settlement of the West had taken place over a territory many times as large and inhabited by a race of people deeply sunk in ignorance and regarded as animals by a handful of rich chiefs who were themselves only slightly civilized. Suppose, moreover, that the pioneers had determined to telescope history by carrying out at the same time the industrialization of this area and the education and rehabilitation of its inhabitants; had determined, in other words, to bring about within a short period, over one-sixth of the earth's surface, an orderly rise in the cultural and economic level that would take tens and perhaps hundreds of years if left to the disorderly processes of capitalist development. Such is the gigantic tour de force on which the Bolsheviks are engaged.

Consider Baku, which is a working model of this tour de force. It sprawls on the edge of the Caspian Sea in an expanse of desert. About the horizon dry hills, like dun-colored linen long folded and spread out in heaps, reflect the heat of the tropical sun. For vegetation there are the vast forests of "oil trees," the thousands of derricks which make Baku one of the great oil-producing centers. Forty-six languages are in actual use by a mixture of races that could hardly be surpassed for variety and stages of culture. There are many veiled women in the city streets, and in the outlying valleys nomads may be seen trailing along desert paths. On a tip of land above Bibi Eibat, the biggest of the oil districts, is a Persian mosque where women in more or less serious states of illness lie on rugs and pray for recovery; the naked children playing outside do not understand Russian. But at the other end of the town are headquarters of the Bolshevik planners who expect to transform Baku into a model industrial city by 1940. It is a staggering project, enough to weary the bones of Seeker Number One. At present Baku's population is around 600,000. So far, I was told, new apartments for some 50,000 people have been built. But it is expected that Baku will have a population twice as large by 1940, and according to the plan all the inhabitants will be housed by that time in the new apartments now rising steadily above the primitive, pueblo-like dwellings that climb up and down the dry knolls of the town. Nor is this all. Baku is at present dusty and hot. Already on a high hill overlooking the sea a public garden has been started. Eventually it will cover the entire slope, thus conserving moisture and affording relief from the intense heat. It will be equipped with open-air restaurants and other recreational facilities. Some distance away another huge tract of land along the sea is being converted into a park and through the city smaller areas are being planted. Meanwhile the oil industry is being remodeled along American lines.

Baku feels like a frontier town for all its ancient Oriental walls and streets. Yet one may visit there one of the newest and best examples of the ubiquitous crèche; and in the garden of a former private estate is a night sanitarium for oil-refinery workers, who are subject to diseases affecting the lungs and for that reason are given special care. At the factory they are examined every two weeks and given special rations of butter, eggs, and milk and medical supervision. If in spite of this care they develop some infection they are given treatment ranging from forty-five nights in the sanitarium, during which time they work during the day, to an indefinite stay with complete rest until recovery in one of the rest homes along the Black Sea or in the mountains.

The crèche is housed in a former mosque. Because of the language complications it is conducted in three sections—Russian, Persian, and Armenian. And the attractive young woman who showed off so proudly its toys, tool chests, and tooth brushes, carried blithely on her shoulders not only the job of fitting 240 children (in two shifts) into a regime of "cooperation," cleanliness, and naps, quite new to their experience whether they were Russian blondes or Persian brunettes; in many cases she must also teach their parents the advantages of sleeping in beds and eating with forks.

Given the complexity and variety of conditions in Baku, a writer could undoubtedly find material for a picture that would fit into the Hearst gallery of Soviet horrors. He would need merely to select his facts.

If the country is regarded as one vast frontier, it at once becomes apparent why the new Russia is far from "model" in the sense in which the term is used by Americans so conditioned to technical excellence that they take it for granted, forgetting the long years of its development. Moscow, like New York in the twenties, is full of holes and hoardings and the smell of damp cement. But the new buildings are often bleak as only unsuccessful modernistic architecture can be. The elevator in Moscow is not what it is in Manhattan. The best buildings are the factories, where light and air are the essential elements and the lesser amenities would be out of place. The great blocks of houses have many windows but are otherwise gaunt and forbidding. Inside they are more inviting. The rooms are large and light; and the joy of the occupants seems to endow them with a certain warmth. But they are a far cry from the model homes which fill American monthly magazines. The decoration is crude. The kitchen and bathroom equipment is bleak and inferior. Poor material and unskilled construction are everywhere apparent. Buildings scarcely finished have already begun to peel; there are faint cracks in the plastered walls and many rough edges. In housing, the government is faced with the task of sheltering the nation adequately and at the same time teaching its builders the first elements of construction.

The furniture displayed in shop windows is hopelessly bourgeois and the factory-made clothes show a crying need for good designers and materials (those government stores where clothes are made to order, of course at a higher price, show much better designs). The inferiority of Soviet products and processes for the home market—aside from technical factors—is also bound up with the taste of the buyers, which, like other natural resources, is only beginning to be developed. The leathery-faced peasant woman in felt boots with a burlap bag slung over her shoulders whom I saw rooted in front of a window full of cosmetics in Leningrad has not yet been able to afford her first jar of cold cream despite the success of collectivization. Another peasant woman, also leathery-faced but by her brisker movements indicating a slightly higher stage of development, was actually buying face powder in a booth in the collective market in Moscow where she had just disposed of her milk—the empty cans shone through the burlap bag slung over her back.

Within the Union itself the equipment and efficiency of institutions vary greatly. The crèche of a collective farm near Kharkhov was cruder in every way than the crèche of a workers' settlement in Moscow. The children's garden in Baku was much the best equipped of the three, but the diet of the children would hardly coincide with the ideas of a Park Avenue pediatrician. In all three the youngest Soviet generation—many of them with shaved heads and the appalling solemnity of two-year-olds—were taking the first steps toward the only planned culture so far attempted. But in all three the process was beginning from a low level. In Moscow the parents were of course relatively enlightened. The intellectual level of the parents in Baku has already been indicated. Likewise, in the crèche of the collective farm, which occupied the house of a former kulak, the parents as well as the children must be taught the A B C's of culture. (Even the word culture at this stage has a frontier meaning bound up with the humble state of the mass to which it is being applied. More than once I heard it used in connection with such simple forms of enlightenment as cleanliness and literacy.) At the collective farm the windows of the room where several peasant babies were lying in their separate beds (this in itself constitutes a minor revolution in Russia) were not wide open as they had been in the Moscow crèche. The director explained that since the open window was unknown in the houses to which the babies would return at the end of the day, she was making the shift gradually.

The Russians themselves are the first to admit that Russian products and processes are inferior measured by American standards. But there can be no doubt that the next ten years will see a swift increase in material well-being in the Soviet Union which may prove disconcerting even to a Hearst reporter. The passion to master technique which extends from the government offices in Moscow to the customs clerk who investigated the mysteries of a zipper so thoroughly that he put it out of commission; the boldness of the Russians in undertaking, for all the lack of skill, projects dizzying in their magnitude; the great resources of the country; the energy of submerged millions which is only now being released—all these factors make it seem inevitable that Russia will undergo within a brief period an industrial and technical development comparable to that of America since 1900. But that development, though it is and will continue for some time to be inefficient, will not leave in its wake the waste of material and particularly of human resources that has been the fatal by-product of capitalist industrialization. In Russia industry is free of the million and one individualistic controls which have heretofore thwarted its logical development into an instrument of universal plenty; the government can consciously direct its development according to a country-wide, long-range plan. And the state has a vested interest in husbanding its human resources. In one quite unsentimental sense it is merely raising up consumers without which the vast output, both economic and cultural, of an industrialized Russia could bring only catastrophe.

From the foregoing brief outline it should be clear how much significance may be attached to the words "favorable" and "unfavorable" as applied to the huge and complex spectacle of Soviet Russia. They are exactly as significant as they would be if applied to the United States, which is much less huge and complex. It should also make clear the absurdity of the idea still held even by intelligent people that the Russian authorities in some miraculous way can keep the tourist—who is neither blindfolded nor hog-tied at the border—from seeing the "unfavorable" as well as the "favorable" aspects of Russian life. To be sure an interview with a member of the opposition is not offered as one of the items on the program of Intourist; it is also true that the tourist is shown the best example of any given development, a tendency which even a 100 per cent American should be able to understand. The average American, confronted with a new "truth about Russia," can best assay its worth as a condemnation of socialism by asking himself which of the adduced facts, providing they are accurate, may be justly attributed to a pre-industrial or early stage of development and which to socialism as an economic pattern.

In reality, of course, the argument between the Hearst press and its opponents on the left is not about life in Soviet Russia. By associating the idea of socialism with that scarcity of necessities as well as luxuries, with the high prices and low standard of living which must prevail in a country whose resources are just beginning to be developed, the propagandists on the right hope to discredit a socialized state in the eyes of the average American, to whom scarcity is rightly abhorrent. And it is unfortunate but true that the radicals in this country, out of entirely opposite motives, have fallen into the same error. They have spent most of their energy denying the truth of the Hearst allegations. Yet no one in his senses would deny that physical living conditions in Soviet Russia are lower than most Americans are used to. The real answer is that communism as an economic system has brought about remarkable improvements even in a country as backward as Russia; the potential richness of life in a socialized America, given the industrial plant which already exists, is a goal with which to fire the imagination not only of our lowest income groups but also of that great middle class of skilled workers (the A. F. of L.), technicians, and professional workers whose support must somehow be enlisted. Yet there is no doubt that in the minds of most members of that great middle class socialism is associated with the idea of scarcity, of "dividing up," as well as with an overtone of religious zeal and a curious kind of crabbed pessimism. (The technocrats played up science and plenty but lacked the political courage of their technical convictions.)

In the literature of the left, for instance, the propaganda against the controllers of wealth too often leaves the impression that wealth itself is vile. But true communism can exist only in the midst of plenty. From this point of view the preoccupation of Americans with material well-being is sound. The problem is to convince Americans that they can be securely rich only when the means of production are socially owned and operated for the benefit of all.

The religious overtone which still clings to salvation on the left needs to be dispelled if the socialist state is to enlist the support to which it is entitled in a country where the very scientific development that makes it ripe for collectivism has discredited religion. The zeal that will establish a socialist America will be closer to the cool unmoralistic passion that drives an inventor or an engineer to attain every day of our lives some new superlative in a labor-saving machine or a transatlantic liner. The impulse toward collectivism as a mere matter of efficiency is becoming stronger as the limitations of individualistic control and management become apparent. It runs like a red streak through all the muddled policies of the New Deal. To harness this impulse the radicals must devise an appeal as modern as Dnieproges.

The natural habitat of the American spirit is optimism —perhaps because of the very richness of the land itself.

Yet in much radical propaganda there is an undertone of pessimism, even defeatism, which dejected intellectuals may find enjoyable, but which is unbecoming to the prophets of a new and abundant life. The invention of a magnificent new steel-rolling machine which does the work of 1,500 men is likely to be reported in the left press with an unalloyed gloom, in which hatred for the steel trust somehow becomes part of the attitude toward the machine. The fact that 1,500 men have been made miserable by a machine whose only reason for existing is to alleviate man's misery is valid propaganda against a capitalist system which thus thwarts both men and machines. But it is such machines that will make a socialist society the finest man has ever conceived. They belong, for the moment, to the steel trust or the automobile magnates, but they hasten rather than defer the final collapse of capitalism. In general, American technical progress deserves more constructive attention from the left—as much, say, as it is receiving at this moment in Moscow, where the place of the machine as a servant in the building of socialism is fully realized.

It is necessary to demonstrate in unmistakable terms that nothing good can come out of the present set-up, but the crown of thorns has no place on the brow of the advocates of socialism, especially in America, which already has the industrial equipment to make it real. The fascists everywhere are riding into office on radical promises. On the left there is much less talk than there should be of the bright future which only a socialist state can deliver.

The Meaning of the Modern Drama

I. The Condescension of the Critics

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

BOTH commercially and artistically the theater is always dying but never dead. Its financial collapse is annually announced by at least two or three producers, and for some reason or other its critics, also, have a penchant for depressing generalizations not so frequently indulged in by the critics of any other literary form. It is the "future" of poetry or the novel that is perpetually being anticipated by those who have the welfare of literature at heart, but the standard discussion of the drama takes the form of lamentation. Occasionally, a more or less glorious past is admitted, but generally only the professional student of the drama recognizes even that, and more serious writers are likely to leave the stage severely alone except upon those recurrent occasions when they remember to express either the contempt or the regret aroused by the fact that it is hopelessly commercial, trivial, and immature.

Perhaps because they form a special class, those who do find themselves interested but not quite hopeless are always proposing organized efforts to do something drastic about the situation, and drama lovers—of the serious variety—are especially prone to unite into little groups of serious thinkers. No one ever heard of a Fiction Association; there is no Junior League Committee for the Study of the Familiar Essay; but the Drama League is so taken for granted that it seems inevitable, and whenever two or three embryo playwrights, ambitious directors, or even chronic spectators are gathered together, a "movement" is sure to result.

Browning was probably the only poet who ever generated an international association devoted to a cooperative effort to understand him, but from the time of Ibsen on it has been taken for granted—at least by those who were interested at all—not only that existing dramatic literature needs group study but also that the playwright and producer somehow need the guiding hand of clubs or "organized audiences" which can issue manifestos, lay down programs, and encourage tendencies.

Now one does, of course, occasionally hear of the same sort of thing in connection with the novel. Its future is sometimes mapped out for it and its current preoccupations lauded or condemned. But on the whole there is a much stronger tendency to regard an individual novel or the work of an individual novelist by and for itself; a much less constant inclination to discuss "the novel" as something apart from this novel or that and as something the flourishing or depraved state of which is more important than any particular achievement. And if this is true it may furnish at least one of the reasons why the drama is so generally referred to as dying or sick, for any form of art is bound to create a depressing effect if one considers the general level of achievement in that form and discounts as mere unimportant accident any one of the outstanding works by which alone it is really justified.

Time and time again I have been told either that modern dramatic literature was insignificant or, more mildly and specifically, that "this has been a dull season." Usually I have replied by citing three or four plays which seemed to me exciting, or moving, or conspicuously funny, but time and time again I have received in return some variant of the retort that though the pieces in question were obviously not without merit, in general, nevertheless, the theater was vulgar and its dramas unimportant. But so in general are the novels and poems and essays which indicate the "state" of fiction and poetry and comment, if it is assumed that the true state is represented by the rule rather than the exception. Art, so it seems to me, is always truly represented by the exceptions, and the only thing that really matters is that the exceptions should occur.

Up to a few years ago the drama as a whole was most commonly accused of a certain moral timidity; just now of course it is more frequently blamed for failing to dwell with sufficient insistence upon "important"—that is, economic—matters. Love, sacred or profane, is still its most usual theme, and consequently the varieties of that passion continue to furnish the material for most of its presentations. That this is equally true of all the literature, dramatic or otherwise, which has come down to us since the days of the Greeks might seem to indicate both that the subject does have a continuing interest and also that more variety is possible in its treatment than would at first seem likely. But for the moment we may let that point go and add that the most self-conscious and most aggressive "movement" of the moment is undoubtedly one which regards as trivial the usual preoccupations of all literature, ancient or modern. One may also add that two or three of the plays produced as part of this movement are of exceptional interest and that there is at least a possibility that it will increase in importance until it comes to play a part not unlike that played half a century ago by the "revolutionary" drama of Ibsen and his followers.

Superficially at least there is a good deal that is similar —as well as a good deal that is not—in the two situations. In both cases a set of "new ideas" was introduced into the drama, and in the former case at least their force was sufficient both to destroy a tradition and to create another. In both cases there is involved a new subject matter which seems to many repellent in itself, and in both cases there is present a large measure of proselytizing zeal. Perhaps Mr. Odets is either a new Ibsen or at least a preliminary sketch for one to come.

In the case of the "new drama" of the nineties it is now clear, however, that its greatest significance was not its most obvious one. As is so often the case, the abiding interest of these literary works seems more or less corollary to the conscious intention of their creators; and just as the main concern of the father of the English novel was that moral teaching which no one is now interested in, so too the least interesting aspect of the drama of Ibsen and Shaw is that part which represents most directly the most specific enthusiasms of the authors. "A Doll's House" and "Mrs. Warren's Profession" have now no more than an antiquarian interest, while plays like "Hedda Gabler" and "Man and Superman," in which the theses are less easy to state, remain, comparatively speaking at least, alive. In other words, it would appear that in the case of these two dramatists their political and social creeds furnished a sort of motive power, but that their best work was that in which these creeds found the least direct expression. Nor is the paradox one to be observed only in their case. The Catholicism of Dante and the anarchism of Shelly seemed of supreme importance to each, and neither is by any means irrelevant to the poetry of either. Yet the fact remains that the best work of both is certainly not to be found in their more explicitly didactic passages, and that in their case also their convictions served them best when these convictions furnished the implicit premises of their thought and imagination rather than when they were expounded as doctrine.

Dante would doubtless have objected to the suggestion that his work was too Catholic just as strenuously as Shaw would have objected to the suggestion that his was too socialistic. He would have proclaimed St. Thomas his master as doggedly as Shaw has insisted upon his devotion to Nietzsche, Samuel Butler, and Karl Marx. But neither the talents nor the function of the poet are the same as those of the teacher, and his best work is done when he uses what he has learned for his own purpose rather than when, out of enthusiasm and loyalty, he tries to repeat a lesson.

Even if we assume, then, that the new left-wing drama constitutes the beginning of an important literature, we are probably justified in assuming also that the best of it will be that in which the revolutionary convictions of its authors serve rather as premises than as items in a creed to be expounded and enforced. We need not, to take a specific example, be surprised to find that Mr. Odets's "Until the Day I Die," in which he sets out specifically to excoriate the Nazis, should seem less interesting as a play than his "Awake and Sing," in which his radical convictions merely furnish him with a point of view from which to regard the life of a Jewish family in the Bronx. Neither need one be surprised if Mr. Odets himself should violently dissent from this view. He would merely be making about his own work the same mistake which great writers of the past have frequently made, and it is no more arrogant for the critic to insist that this particular author is wrong than it is for him to pronounce a similar judgment concerning other and at least equally great writers of the past. Shaw's dictum, "Happiness and beauty are by-products," may not be universally true, but the second half of the statement is true at least of the tendential writers who may achieve beauty only in the pursuit of what they believe to be righteousness and truth but who, nevertheless, do achieve it as a by-product and not directly in the pursuit itself.

This is the first of a series of four articles and is intended to serve as an introduction by suggesting the themes of the remaining three. Of these, the first will discuss the "revolutionary drama" of fifty years ago and the last will attempt to indicate the parallels and divergences between it and the professedly "Marxian" drama of the present. The middle one will be devoted to some consideration of the established tradition of our theater and some defense of those playwrights who have contributed to it. Despite the contention of the members of the newer movement, it is, I believe, possible to represent the period between the decline of the problem play of the Ibsen school and the rise of the new proletarian drama as something more than a mere interregnum devoted to frivolity.

Correspondence

Beals on Panama

To the Editors of The Nation:

There has been noted with interest an article by Mr. Carleton Beals, captioned Revolt in Panama, which appeared in a recent issue of The Nation. It is felt that your attention should be invited to some of the more striking misconceptions of fact which seemingly form the basis of Mr. Beals's opinions.

The general statement that goods may be purchased in Canal commissaries at prices from 50 to 75 per cent lower than in the United States is not a fact. Nor is it a fact that the commissaries "return juicy profits to our government." The two statements are obviously incompatible, and the fact is that prices in the Canal commissaries will average about the same as in the United States even though the prices of some articles may be lower and others higher than in the United States. Prices in the commissaries are fixed so as to bring a return of 3 per cent on the investment of the government in the commissaries. Electric current and ice are, and always have been, produced by the government in the Canal Zone and have not been furnished privately. In referring to this matter, Mr. Beals may have had in mind the situation in Panama and not that in the Canal Zone.

It seems hardly necessary to deny the statement that the employee "who utters the least breath of discontent is soon on his way back to the United States," which is not a fact. Statements of this sort are not particularly important, but it is important when a writer of Mr. Beals's reputation falls into the serious errors indicated in the following:

> The Canal Zone has long felt that it has been generous to Panama. Along with the State Department, the banks, and the public utilities, the Zone for a long time ran the little republic through puppet governments; and its dark-skinned inhabitants, not to mention tourists, received all the benefits of low-priced commissariats, cheap movies and restaurants, and hospital service in one of the model institutions of the world. With this large additional business of a hundred thousand Panamanians and half a million tourists annually, more than the entire resident population of the country, the Zone could sell goods ever more cheaply and cut hospital fees ever lower.

In view of the fact that Mr. Beals has visited Panama and the Canal Zone, the foregoing statements are little short of astonishing. So far as this office is aware, the charge has never been made seriously, anywhere, that the Canal Zone has "run" the Republic of Panama through "puppet governments." The statement that the inhabitants of Panama and the tourists visiting the Isthmus have generally been allowed to patronize the Canal commissaries, the clubhouse, hospitals, and restaurants is simply not a fact. This is not to say that no tourist and no Panamanian non-employee of the Canal enterprise has ever used those facilities, because it is obviously impossible to prevent absolutely the occasional misuse of such facilities, notwithstanding the elaborate precautions which are taken to restrict their use to those who are authorized. Incidentally, Mr. Beals states the number of tourists to be half a million annually; in 1934, which was a good tourist year, the total number of passengers arriving on the Isthmus of Panama, including tourists, was 101,934.

Mr. Beals states that as a result of allowing Panamanians and tourists to patronize Canal facilities "all native enterprise was stifled." The fact is that Canal commissaries, completely within the rights granted by the 1903 treaty, furnish supplies to the personnel of the United States government in the Canal Zone and also furnish sea and ship's stores to passing vessels as a necessary part of the service demanded of the Canal organization. These commissaries are not open to the public generally, and it is to be noted that restrictions on sales have been self-imposed although none is prescribed in the treaty. As a matter of fact, merchants in the Republic of Panama are reaping most substantial benefits from the traffic which has been attracted to the Isthmus by the Panama Canal. Individuals not connected with the canal enterprise are not permitted to purchase in the government commissaries, and inspectors from the Canal Zone cooperate closely with those in Panama in the apprehension and punishment of those who improperly introduce into Panama purchases made in the Canal Zone. Because of this most important restriction, the expenditures made on the Isthmus by the tens of thousands of members of ships' crews and of passengers from vessels using the canal, as well as the many thousands of tourists who visit the Isthmus every year, all go to merchants in the Republic of Panama, and the aggregate of the expenditures made by these visitors each year is an item of the greatest economic importance to the Republic of Panama. It is to be remembered, too, that notwithstanding the operation of government commissaries in the Canal Zone, a substantial portion of the salaries and wages paid to United States government personnel is spent in the neighboring cities of Panama and Colon. These substantial benefits constitute a continuous transfusion of economic sustenance into the Republic of Panama. The often-repeated assertion that the policy being pursued by the United States in the Canal Zone has been gradually lowering the economic condition of Panama is the opposite of the truth. When the treaty of 1903 was ratified, the Republic of Panama had virtually no income from shipping and very little from any other source. The cities of Panama and Colon were without water and sewage systems, were practically unsanitated, and the streets were unpaved. Periodically the inhabitants suffered from epidemics of yellow fever and pestilential diseases. In 1902 the death-rate in Panama City was only a fraction under 100 to the 1,000; last year the Panama City death-rate was less than 13 per 1,000. Today, in matters such as sanitation, paved streets, water and sewer systems, health conditions, etc., these cities are unsurpassed in Central America. The economic development, likewise, has been little short of phenomenal, and the cities of Panama and Colon have more than trebled in population. It is beyond dispute that the development of these cities is directly attributable to the construction and operation of the Panama Canal.

It is not only not a fact that there is a boycott of Panamanian labor in the Canal Zone, as stated by Mr. Beals, but Panamanians are given preference over persons of other nationality by the Executive Order of February 20, 1920, which prescribes that only citizens of the United States and of the Republic of Panama may be employed at the higher rates of pay and that these citizens shall be given preference in all grades. The provisions of this order have been observed.

Referring to the Panama Railroad Company, Mr. Beals made the following observations:

> Among its numerous advantages, the railroad has that of being one of the largest single landlords in all Panama. Besides its vast tax-free realty properties in the capital, its owns Colon, the second largest city in the republic, except for nine blocks and four scattered lots. It collects ground rents for Uncle Sam from business men, houses of prostitution, open cribs, saloons, gambling dives, pick-up cabarets, private homes, and the vilest slums on the continent. High ground rents continually force native residents to sacrifice their homes. In no other place in the world is a government the owner of practically an entire foreign city. Not only are the title and present manner of using these properties dubious, but by an improper interpretation of the original concession the railroad flatly refuses to pay taxes, and though the Zone supervises sanitation, it makes no contributions to police and fire protection, public schools, parks, or other necessary public services.

It is rather important to note in connection with the lands in the city of Colon to which Mr. Beals refers, that the Panama Railroad Company, a New York State corporation, on June 4, 1850, obtained from the Republic of New Granada (now the Republic of Colombia) a concession to build a railroad across the Isthmus of Panama, and among the reciprocal exchanges in the contract of concession was the grant to the railroad company of a use of all the vacant lands on the island of Manzanillo, with the condition that these lands would revert to the government of New Granada upon expiration of the concession. The amended concession of 1867 confirmed the grant, and when the Republic of Panama was established by secession from the Republic of Colombia on November 3, 1903, the rights in the reversion passed to the newly formed Republic of Panama. By the treaty of 1903 Panama surrendered to the United States these reversionary rights in the property of the Panama Railroad Company, including the lands on Manzanillo Island. Prior to June 4, 1850, Manzanillo was a small, almost uninhabited, marshy island, most of which was swept by the tides. In the course of the years several millions of dollars were expended in filling and otherwise improving the island so that it might be made habitable, and the modern city of Colon is built on this land developed by the Panama Railroad Company.

The charge has frequently been made and as frequently refuted that the Panama Railroad Company is profiting through immorality existing in Colon. The practice of prostitution is strictly regulated by law in the city of Colon and is confined to a small area within the city. All land owned by the Panama Railroad Company is outside of the area so restricted. Again, it is important to note that, with unimportant exceptions, only the land is owned by the Panama Railroad and the structures erected upon the land are privately owned and rented. It is to be noted further that since 1908 all leases of Panama Railroad lands have contained the restriction that the land may not be used by the lessee or a sublessee for any class of gambling or for prostitution.

Mr. Beals's statement that "high ground rents continually force native residents to sacrifice their homes" is not a fact. It is to be noted that generally the private dwellings erected on Panama Railroad lands are owned by persons who are quite able economically to pay the relatively low land rents. The poorer classes generally reside in small apartments not owned by them, and if any of these persons have been forced to vacate their dwellings because of high ground rent, the fact is not known to this office. Land rents generally are fixed to bring no more than a fair return on the assessed valuation of the lands, which is not high. For several years during the depression a discount of one-third of the amount of the rental has been allowed for prompt payment. On July 1, 1935, the amount of this discount was reduced to 25 per cent because of generally improved economic conditions.

The exemption from taxation of Panama Railroad property in the Republic of Panama is provided by treaty and hence is not a matter within the control of the Canal administration. It may be stated, however, that this exemption from taxation was granted in return for valuable concessions enumerated in the original and supplementary contracts and was one of the considerations upon which the treaty of 1903 was negotiated. It is to be noted, too, that extensive areas in the city of Colon have been leased to the government of Panama for use as parks and playgrounds and for the erection of public buildings for nominal rentals of one dollar per year. The ordinary rental for this land would greatly exceed the value of the tax exemptions granted to the Panama Railroad Company.

The matter of the Panama Railroad Company foregoing its concessionary rights so as to permit the construction of a trans-Isthmian highway has been the subject of diplomatic conversations for a number of years, and the press reported recently that a satisfactory understanding on this subject had been reached.

The statement that the major reason for building Canal structures in New Cristobal was to enable Canal employees to evade the operation of the national prohibition act "and other strict American regulations" is too patently absurd to warrant comment. Suffice it to say that these buildings were erected on land owned by the Panama Railroad Company and that since the earliest days of canal construction there have been buildings belonging to the canal enterprise in the cities of Colon and Panama on land owned by the Panama Railroad Company.

Panamanians are not required to have a "costly car and driver's license" in order to operate their automobiles in the Canal Zone. The fees for these licenses are fixed by mutual agreement between the municipal authorities of the cities of Panama and Colon and the authorities of the Canal Zone. To operate his personal automobile in the Canal Zone the Panamanian pays a purely nominal registration fee of one dollar for his car and another dollar for an operator's license—exactly the same fees which Panama and Colon charge Canal Zone residents to operate their cars in those jurisdictions. The fees for reciprocal licenses for commercial cars are somewhat higher than for cars for personal use but are the same in the Canal Zone as in Panama and Colon.

Mr. Beals states that "the 1903 treaty obliges the United States to maintain adequate communications between the two Panamanian regions on either side of the canal, but such communications exist only at a few points and are interrupted at night." The treaty contains no such provision. As a matter of fact, however, since the completion of a highway into the interior of the republic by the Panamanian government created a need for a means of vehicular communication, a ferry and seven mile of modern concrete highway have been maintained to connect the areas east of the Panama Canal with the territory on the other side of the canal. The service furnished by this ferry has been augmented as the need therefor has been demonstrated, and at the present time ferry service is operated on a twenty-four-hour schedule daily without charge either to Panama or the users of the ferry.

It is stated by Mr. Beals that "in defiance of the treaty the Zone does not permit Panamanian customs collectors or immigration inspectors at the ports." Mr. Beals apparently overlooks the fact that the Canal Zone is not a part of the Republic of Panama and that by Article III of the 1903 treaty Panama granted to the United States sovereign rights, power, and authority within the Canal Zone "to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority." The treaty provided, however, that Panama should have the right to establish such "houses and guards as it may deem necessary to collect duties on importations destined to other portions of Panama and to prevent contraband trade." As a matter of fact, the closest cooperation exists between the customs and immigration authorities of the Republic of Panama and the Canal Zone, and considering the opportunities for misunderstanding inherent in the situation, there has been a remarkably small amount of friction.

I hope you will appreciate that the foregoing is written solely for the purpose of clearing up any misapprehensions of fact which may follow from a reading of Mr. Beals's article. It is perfectly realized that there may be room for differences of opinion as to matters of policy in the administration of the affairs of the Panama Canal, but it is believed that criticism of those policies should be based upon a fair examination of the facts.

Balboa Heights, C. Z., August 2 C. A. McIlvaine,
Executive Secretary, The Panama Canal

To the Editors of The Nation:

By the use of half-truths Mr. C. A. McIlvaine attempts to throw up a typical official dust cloud over the main thesis of my article on Panama. Also he gives the false impression that I consider still existent certain abuses changed by the Roosevelt-Arias agreement.

The manifest benefits of the Panama Canal to the world, to us, and to Panama were not at issue in my article. Restated my thesis was (1) that the right to build the canal, however much results may or may not have justified the means, was secured by force and fraud; (2) that the 1903 treaty, even with its subsequent minor modifications, gives us today an unfair advantage over the Republic of Panama; (3) that regardless of the origin of the treaty, it is now inadequate (it is in fact being changed), and that the situation which has developed at the end of thirty years is in many respects intolerable for the Panamanian people; (4) that the continuation of the present situation will work continual hardship on the Panamanian people through the perpetuation of a monopoly arrangement. The present Roosevelt Administration has resorted to a few palliatives.

But instead of meeting the problem I have raised, Mr. McIlvaine drags out the hoary goddess of sanitation—stock argument for all our imperialistic ventures. Personally I am tired of conceiving of Uncle Sam as a glorified sewer-digger. It might be well to remember that prior to the cleaning up of yellow fever and malaria in Panama, those scourges, the causes of which had but recently been discovered, also endangered our own Southern ports. But to have done wonderful things along such lines scarcely entitles us to ignore evolving economic and political needs.

Nor am I particularly interested that in 1850 Manzanillo Island was tide-swept marshland. So was most of San Francisco. But today San Francisco is not in the position of having to rent the ground for parks and other public purposes from the railway companies that contributed to its development.

Mr. McIlvaine says that the ground rents are a fair return on "the assessed valuation," which "is not high." I do not know what he means by assessed valuation since the lands in question are not taxed. By Panamanian standards the rentals are high, and actually the ground rent charged brings in about three times what our government charges its Zone employees for the ground and houses erected thereon in the Zone itself. I have talked with numerous home-owners and others who have had to sacrifice their property to the railroad or to other more fortunate Panamanians. The recent discounts to rent-payers for cash payment naturally benefited only those not hard hit by the depression, and were a measure designed to benefit the Panama Railroad (that is, the United States government), not the renters. Also I am well aware of the provision which prevents subleasing for immoral purposes, but in a survey which I made last year with one of the Colon police officials, I found that gambling, prostitution, and pick-up dance privileges were by no means confined to the nine square blocks of the city not owned by the railroad.

The governor's reports and our census are remarkable for the things they conceal. No statistics are available to the outsider of the number of Panamanians hired on the canal, but despite the official clause cited by my critic, the evidence points definitely to discrimination, a fact confirmed by numerous personal cases brought to my attention. The last census reveals 4,301 persons in the Zone whose mother-tongue was Spanish. Deducting, as well as can be done, given the hazy classifications, those who come from Spain, Puerto Rico, the Philippines, and Central and South America, the conclusion is reached that in that year not over 1,200 Panamanians were employed. This represents a little over 4 per cent of the employed civilian population or a little over 7 per cent of all foreigners employed. The number of black Jamaicans probably approaches nearly 70 per cent.

Mr. McIlvaine is quite mistaken about "the total number of passengers arriving on the Isthmus, including tourists." He took the Governor's Report and misread it. The number was actually only 28,828. The number he refers to were in transit, in addition to the number I have here given. Besides these, 10,097 arrived by air. My estimate of a total of half a million included ships' crews. In 1934, 5,533 commercial vessels went through the canal, with an average tonnage of 5,180; 12,066 vessels cleared from canal ports. The crews all spend money, formerly much of it in the Zone, now all of it in Panama. The estimate of half a million does not include the various war vessels touching Isthmus ports. In 1934, at one time alone, 110 American war vessels visited the canal.

Mr. McIlvaine is so intent on making me mistaken in all things that he is willing to blacken the good name of the Zone administration of which he is a part. I pointed out the superior economy and efficiency of the Canal Zone. I consider it a compliment to the Zone that goods can be sold so much more cheaply than in the United States and yet return what under the circumstances becomes a juicy profit. But my critic hastens to assure us that Zone residents must pay on the average as much as in the United States, despite the fact that the merchandise is purchased in vast wholesale quantities, that it is tax-free, that it is carried in government bottoms at cost, that it pays no duties. If what he says be true, then something is rotten in Denmark and we shall presently be having a Congressional investigation. As a matter of fact, through personal pricing and lists furnished me by executive officials, I came to the conclusion that the average price is way below that paid for similar merchandise in the United States. The relatively few things of high price were provided by private contract, which would bear investigation. With reference to electric light and ice, however, more than 50 per cent of the silver employees (the poorest paid) and a large portion of the gold employees (a polite terminology for Jim Crowism) must pay the excessive rates of the local subsidiary of the Electric Bond and Share Company.

The return on investment for the whole canal is arbitrarily set at 3 per cent, then deducted from any further profits. As a matter of fact, last year's total return on canal business, as set off from tolls, was 5 per cent. For railroad-commissary activities, sales totaled $8,347,226.33, exclusive of returns from manufacturing plants, bakeries, laundries, etc., and products of a value of $4,436,000 were bought. The turn-over in the cattle industry was put at $120,514, but only $13,468 was spent in Panama for 250 head of fat steers.

Mr. McIlvaine declares that at no time have Panamanians or the visiting public ever been allowed to buy in the Zone in government commissaries or use hospital and other facilities, though he admits this has not been at all times rigidly enforced. Without going into certain abuses in the interpretation of the 1903 treaty, which my critic sets up as the final word in all matters and which I am arguing must be rectified, he need only to turn to the various executive orders of Presidents Taft, Roosevelt, and Wilson, as well as those of the governors—which owing to his position he can find within reach of his hand—to learn that our policy with regard to free sales to Zone employees, passengers, crews, ships, and Panamanians has not been uniform and has fluctuated from free sales back to restriction and vice versa. The last Governor's Report, page 66, states that "the agreement between Presidents Roosevelt and Arias imposed specific restrictions on sales to commercial vessels and reemphasized the necessity of applying the restrictions to sales generally."

The Treaty of 1903, Article VI, declares that the privileges granted the United States, including that of constructing a canal, "shall not conflict with rights of way over the public roads passing through the said Zone." This has generally been accepted by both parties to mean that transportation across the canal at road points had to be maintained by ferries, bridges, or as some now propose by subways. When I was there this ferry service, to the annoyance of Panamanians, was maintained from 6 a.m. to 9 p.m. only. I can still remember my discomfiture on arriving after many hours' drive through the jungle at 9:03 p.m., with no hotel accommodations available for the night. According to the last Governor's Report, this same schedule was maintained, with twenty-four trips between the hours mentioned—not as Mr. McIlvaine states a twenty-four-hour service. If this irritation has been removed within the last two months, the step is commendable.

Unfortunately I do not have the space to take up all the misrepresentations to be found in each statement of Mr. McIlvaine's reply. I merely regret that Mr. McIlvaine has not fairly presented the facts.

New York, August 11 CARLETON BEALS

Labor and Industry

Apology for Not Being a Communist

By HEYWOOD BROUN

NOT very long ago a business associate looked at me severely and said, "Heywood, I want a frank answer to an honest question. Are you a Communist?" That was easy enough. I said no. But if he had followed up his original inquiry by asking why, he would have put me into quite a pickle. In that event I should have been obliged to go into a sort of Freudian and economic autobiography.

As far as logic goes I ought to be a Communist or at least make an attempt to gain admission to that party. I mean that some sort of cooperative commonwealth seems to me the desirable goal of society, and I see only the slimmest chance of any such end being attained by democracy. Increasingly evidence piles up to support the Communist contention that there are powerful members of the present social order who cannot be dislodged by anything but sufficient force to achieve their liquidation. Even if radical legislation is passed in the United States, the Supreme Court is set to throw it out, and the curtailment of the power of that body to veto the popular will would still leave the opportunity for successful nullification on the part of the strongly intrenched.

Any evolutionary development toward the almost perfect state is a long shot. And yet up to now that is the horse I intend to back. This inclination on my part may very possibly be the result of things which would come out in my unwritten economic and Freudian autobiography. But that would be a work to be accomplished in nothing less than eight volumes. It might be rather tedious even if I had the will to write it.

Lacking such a sourcebook, the best that I can do is to rationalize my reluctance to align myself with the deep left. I am, for various reasons, a person who quails and quibbles at the sight of blood—even my own. In all fairness anybody who talks about a revolution in America ought to make some rough work sheet of what it would cost in slaughter and in agony. My Communist friends assure me that they do not favor a proletarian purge for any sadistic reasons. It is simply true that certain persons could never be induced to play along with the new order. Common sense would dictate their removal. "Would you," say these same advocates of the violent overthrow of government, "object to a surgical operation upon a patient who was dying? Would you say that the surgeon must be inhibited against the use of his scalpel because it would shed blood?"

When I say that I would not oppose surgery in emergencies I am confronted with the argument that the social body of this land is sick unto death under the capitalistic system and that only the knife can save it.

I have no reason to pretend that I think our present estate, or that which lies just around the corner, is in any way healthy. But the medical analogy is less than completely sound. The technique of revolution, in spite of one successful operation, is still far less sure than that of surgery. The wildest figures of Hearst and his allies in regard to the toll of change in Russia still remain a good deal less than the losses caused by the last great war among the imperial powers. But would the American revolution be more or less bloody than the coup which brought the Communists into power in Russia? Who can say? Nor is it within the ability of any man to predict just how long a militant and severe dictatorship would be required here to bring about a classless society. I have always been sorry that John Reed called his book "Ten Days That Shook the World." Both friends and foes of the Soviets have been inclined to take the view that the upheaval in Russia was accomplished with quick and sharp precision. The original push was fast enough and comparatively bloodless, but that was little more than a prologue to what followed.

I'm not particularly concerned with the gap between the figures of friend and foe in estimating just how many lives were required to lift the new state beyond the possibility of counter-revolution. Not all the bills and accounts are in even yet. What would it mean in America? My own surmise is that a successful Communist revolution in America might very well require fifty years and possibly a hundred. It would surely entail guerrilla warfare over a long stretch of time and a great extent of territory. It may be that my estimate of the time required is much too high. I am basing my guess on the fact that America, the so-called land of opportunity, is one of the most severely stratified nations in the world. It contains a middle class far more numerous, articulate, and class conscious than any known in Russia. To be sure, some portion of this class would probably embrace a revolutionary movement eagerly, but I doubt if the bourgeois radicals would ever amount to much more than one-fifth of the total number. The other four-fifths of the middle class would present a problem much tougher than that which the Soviet authorities face in the case of the kulaks.

I do not see any immediate prospects for a revolution in America. This opinion is not based wholly on my own observations but largely on the testimony of commentators whose judgment I trust. Some of them are Communists. To be sure, the revolution which does not seem imminent in 1935 might conceivably be taking solid shape by 1940 or even earlier. But what are we to do until the doctor comes?

By "we" I mean those of us who are frankly disappointed in the fruits of democracy and still sentimental enough to hope that there might be one more voyage left in that old hull. I think that the best and the only thing we can do is to fight the menace of fascism up to the very hilt of our capacity. It may even be that within a very few years the whole question of alignment will beyond any argument reveal itself as a choice between fascism and communism. Such a choice should be easy. But I still want to see democracy saddled for one last roundup. In fact, I'll back the old standby if he can be lured up to the post. Sure, I'll back him with almost everything I've got. Part of my bet, of course, would go on him to show I believe in democracy. But I'm no fanatic.

How the Lumber Strike Was Broken

By SELDEN C. MENEFEE

Seattle, August 20

THE technique of the employers in breaking the Pacific Northwest lumber strike showed great improvement over the methods used in the maritime strike last year. The lumber operators made two significant advances: they managed early in the struggle to get the use of the state police and the National Guard; and they successfully cultivated the cooperation of the old-line union officials in breaking the rank-and-file movement.

The strike virtually ended when the Tacoma local of the Sawmill and Timber Workers finally weakened on August 3 and voted 1,391 to 97 to accept the third offer submitted by the operators. The agreement called for the reemployment of all union men without discrimination within thirty days, at a minimum wage of fifty cents an hour and the old forty-hour week. The operators agreed to collective bargaining with their own employees only on condition that the union be reorganized on the basis of plant locals. The latter provision makes the A. F. of L. organization into a counterpart of the old Loyal Legion of Loggers and Lumbermen, the much-hated "4-L" company union sponsored by the operators during the war.

With the National Guard gone from Tacoma, the only large centers in which the men were still out on strike were Aberdeen, Hoquiam, and Raymond, on the coast. These are also the only locals which have maintained rank-and-file control. Mass picket lines several hundred strong were built there daily in the face of three companies of the National Guard. At Aberdeen 9,000 men and women paraded the streets on July 8 as a protest against the strike-breaking tactics of the "Cossacks" and the "tin soldiers" or "boy scouts" (the state patrol and the National Guard). But even there the strike lines weakened at the end of the thirteenth week. A mass demonstration of 800 Aberdeen pickets on August 12 led to the appointment of Brigadier General Carlos Pennington of the National Guard as "arbitrator" by Governor Martin. The discouraged strikers voted on August 15 to accept the operators' terms, pending negotiations on the crucial point of union recognition.

The greatest benefit derived from the strike has been the education of the rank and file of the workers. The settlements reached so far are a far cry from the original demands of seventy-five cents an hour, the thirty-hour week, and full union recognition. The rank and file of the workers know that the strike was broken, and why.

The operators could not have smashed the militancy of the strikers by their own efforts alone. In the early stages of the strike they attacked the union and openly threatened vigilante violence through full-page newspaper ads of the "Committee of 500," the Seattle Chamber of Commerce in disguise. But these ads ceased after an exposure of one of the committee's meetings in the labor paper Voice of Action. The news columns of the daily press were open to the operators, who issued statements that their financial condition made it impossible for them to pay higher wages, but the labor press countered by printing figures from the United States Department of Commerce for 1933, showing that the seventy-four mills in the Seattle-Tacoma area had paid in wages $5,750,782, while the net profits for the year had been $5,817,401, or nearly 30 per cent of the gross business done. The use of the state's military forces in the attempt to break the strike influenced public opinion in favor of the strikers. Since picketing by the union was forbidden, many acts of violence were committed daily by desperate individuals; there were street fights against known "scabs" and bombing of their homes and cars as well as of mill property. Thus military violence bred labor violence, and strike-breaking was kept down to a minimum. Also the unions were able to obtain injunctions against the stopping of picketing in Aberdeen, Longview, and Chehalis. But the state police often paid little attention to the court orders.

It is clear that the operators, even with the armed forces of the state under their control, were not strong enough to break the strike. The decisive factor was the splitting of the union ranks by the union officials themselves. Just how the "labor leaders" came to play into the hands of the employers is not known, but objectively speaking they cooperated well. When the preliminary strike conference was held in March, the conservative International Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners was given jurisdiction over the budding new union. This course was perhaps chosen by A. F. of L. officials in preference to building a new union because of the industry's early background of I. W. W. unionism. When May 6, the date set for the strike, neared, the august Brotherhood tried to postpone action "pending further negotiations." But the rank and file recognized that this merely gave the operators a chance to store up lumber and refused to wait. In Bellingham they went out a week early to stop such action by the operators. In Everett, on the night of May 5, Leo P. Flynn of the Seattle Carpenters and Joiners threatened to remove the charter of the local unless it postponed strike action; he was escorted from the Labor Temple. The strike was on, and by the end of the week 40,000 timber workers were out.

The elder statesmen in the Brotherhood showed little enthusiasm. President Hutchinson of the Carpenters and Joiners sent Abe W. Muir up from San Francisco as his district representative. Muir spent most of his time conferring with the operators, while the rank and file of various unions "pulled out" lagging mills to make the strike front solid. At one mill near Seattle, "pulled out" by rank-and-file longshoremen chiefly, the strikers had to wait for days for the union to send out someone to sign them up.

Muir apparently tried to break the strike from the first. He encouraged the McCormick mills in Port Ludlow and in Oregon to continue operating after they had granted merely a five-cent raise in pay without real union recognition, and these mills worked day and night shifts for weeks supplying their own orders and those of other members of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association.

Mills in southern Oregon continued to operate and Muir made no move to organize them. He kept 3,000 Longview workers from striking for more than a week by continual "negotiations." He offered the McCormick settlement, now known as the "Muir plan," to strikers in Portland, Longview, and other places, but they turned it down.

Finally on June 6, a month after the strike had started, the Northwest Joint Strike Committee was set up at an Aberdeen conference of 240 rank-and-file delegates to take the terms of settlement out of Muir's hands. The committee went back to the original demands and called for a rank-and-file vote on any settlement, to be supervised by the committee. From this date on, Muir's chief fight was directed against this body, and quite naturally, for his job and salary were threatened by it. He issued statements calling it a dual organization dominated by reds, which was patently false.

Muir then embarked on a charter-pulling campaign, starting with Longview and Aberdeen. He encouraged strike-breaking in Longview by signing up the few men who returned in new Carpenters and Joiners' company locals, and one charter was hung in the company dining-room of the Long-Bell plant. The head of the Long-Bell local was formerly president of the 4-L local there, and the first meetings were guarded by state police. But the Central Labor Council refused to unseat the Sawmill Workers' delegates. Five hundred of the strike leaders were never rehired by the company. The Sawmill and Timber Workers' local is suing the Carpenters and Joiners for $500,000 damages, with the trial date set for September 13.

In Aberdeen the old local was replaced by two new ones separating the loggers from the mill workers. A Seattle official frankly told a reporter that the purpose of this "reorganization" was "to get rid of the Joint Strike Committee." But the Aberdeen rank and file were so solid that Muir had to back down and let the rank-and-file workers in a body into one of the new unions. "Aberdeen is quite a problem—I'd rather not talk about it," said the Seattle official.

In Everett, the headquarters of the Joint Strike Committee, Muir's strike-breaking reached new heights. The union there had turned down the "Muir plan" by a vote of 1,500 to 3. Early in July the operators threatened to take advantage of Governor Martin's kind offer of the loan of the National Guard. The Everett Central Labor Council threatened a general strike if this occurred. The operators put off action for a week. Meanwhile Muir removed the charter of the rank-and-file local there and called the workers in the six largest plants to six meetings, in order to issue them separate charters on a plant basis. The workers voted this down, but had to accept it in the end because they wished to stay in the A. F. of L.

When Muir had thus confused the situation, the operators called in sixty state police and all the mills opened at once on July 15. The "Cossacks" broke up all picket lines. A Muir man stood with the police and pointed out the rank-and-file leaders, who were then arrested. Civil rights were suspended, home-owners were chased from their own front yards in the mill district, and one man waiting for a bus was struck by police when he refused to move on. That afternoon the Joint Strike Committee organized a protest parade of 2,000 strikers and sympathizers, with an American flag at the head. The police broke it up and arrested twenty-four rank-and-file leaders, including Max Barnett, secretary of the Joint Strike Committee. Several hundred paraders stormed the jail that evening. The men were released the next day, but the strike was broken. Everett marked the turning-point in the strike, and the operators no doubt heaved a sigh of relief when those days were over.

There is now a strong "Wobbly" sentiment in Everett, Aberdeen, and other places in favor of splitting away from Muir and the whole A. F. of L. But the majority feel that this would merely give Muir a chance to shout "dual unionism" and are bending their efforts toward strengthening rank-and-file control in the union and getting rid of the Muirs in the A. F. of L.

Besides the education of the rank and file, the three-month strike resulted in certain other gains. Union recognition was not won and the strike was broken, but the men are going back to work organized, and if the maritime strike was any criterion the strike-breakers will not last very long on their jobs. The workers are now hired through union halls free of charge instead of through employment agencies notorious for favoritism and fee-splitting with employers, who kept "two crews—one going and one coming." The fifty-cent minimum wage represents an increase of from five to seven and a half cents over the old wage, and adjustments in the upper brackets have increased the pay of skilled workers to as much as $1 an hour in some places. Hours remain at forty.

The workers have lost their faith in the old-line union leadership and their illusions in the impartiality of the state. There is dynamite in the situation, figuratively as well as literally. The Sawmill and Timber Workers' Union may turn out to be the Paul Bunyan of the Northwest labor movement.

Contributors to This Issue

ABRAHAM EPSTEIN is the executive secretary of the American Association for Social Security and author of "The Challenge of the Aged" and "Insecurity—a Challenge to America."

EMIL LENGYEL is the author of "Hitler," "The Cauldron Boils," and "The New Deal in Europe."

CAREY MCWILLIAMS is a California lawyer and journalist.

SELDEN C. MENEFEE is a teaching assistant in sociology at the University of Washington.

MARY MCCARTHY frequently contributes reviews of new fiction to The Nation.

HANS KOHN, professor of history at Smith College, is the author of "Orient and Occident" and "Nationalism in the Soviet Union."

Next Week in The Nation

Eight Months of Congress

By PAUL W. WARD

Books

Salvation from Within

Vein of Iron. By Ellen Glasgow. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

As distinguished from those novelists who believe that a disorganized and unjust political system can be replaced by one which will offer to the individual the order and justice he needs and deserves, Miss Glasgow, fully recognizing the harsh illogic of the world today, presents a counter-theory of salvation of the individual by his own integrity and inner virtue. Her scene is the Great Valley of Virginia; her protagonists are the Fincastle family, chiefly exemplified by grandmother, son, and granddaughter, descendants from a line of pioneers who sought the first American frontier in the face of wild forest and wilder savages, and possessors of the iron that brought the earlier members of the family through the trials of establishing a nation. The story begins with ten-year-old Ada in the year 1900; it ends in 1932, with Ada and her sixteen-year-old son carrying on the Fincastle tradition, after years of privation, humiliation, and disappointment, through a World War, a decade of post-war recklessness, and the first four years of world-wide depression.

Miss Glasgow, in other words, has attempted to cover a large canvas in time and to touch the lives of most of the villagers of Ironside with the movement of the world for thirty years. Her Fincastles during that time have plenty of suffering on which to test the edge of their fortitude. Ada's first disappointment, the doll with real hair that she wanted and the doll with a china head that she got, is by no means her last. She lives to lose her lover to a slut, to watch her mother die of a lingering and painful illness, to bear her child in ignominy, to nurse her husband through war-engendered despair, to experience bitter poverty. But such is the bright strength of her spirit that she is as ready for a new life at forty as she might have been at ten, and has as much energy, resilience, and tenderness to undertake it. Nor is her inner fortitude Ada's only consolation; her two-day idyl on a mountain top, the happy first years of her marriage, the closeness of her family, the enduring love of her husband, these also sustain her. It is to Miss Glasgow's credit that her Ada, if she is firm, is not a prig; if she can bear sorrow, she can also experience joy; and she has her moments of rebellion.

Only the stubbornly doctrinaire will quarrel with a novelist for saving the world in his own way; and salvation by inner virtue may be as good a way as any other. Miss Glasgow is a writer of comedy; in comedy you may lift yourself by your own bootstraps, so long as you experience the ultimate lift. Ada was brought to peace and sufficient comfort at last by her own ardent endurance; her father by the consolations of philosophy; her grandmother by her unshakable confidence in the existence of God. For their friends the Hamblens, who perfectly exemplified the dignified and decorous tradition which the Fincastles—and through them, one may guess, Miss Glasgow—admired, dignity and decorum were not enough to keep them from disaster. When their small living was swept away in a bank crash, they could find no other way out than suicide. Perhaps the wild post-war generation, who discarded dignity for reckless pleasure and substituted for decorum a heartless irregularity, were right after all. Perhaps only those are saved by inner virtue who are born under a lucky star, or who are designed for the heroines of comedy. The less fortunate majority may require the world to move before they are relieved of their suffering.

Miss Glasgow's readers, of course, are not bound to resolve these problems. They can be content with a novel of more than average interest and intensity by a novelist with more than ordinary skill at creating characters who breathe and walk by themselves. They may complain that too many events are crowded into a book that nevertheless sometimes seems too long; they may object that disappointment suffered by a person in a story must not be too clearly suspected by the reader in advance. They will still be able to read a novel important not only for its description of contemporary life but for its recollections of one of the most moving aspects of the American past. That Virginia which Miss Glasgow knows so well she makes more clear with every book she writes; as it continues to be familiar, it will also be received with affectionate admiration.

Dorothy Van Doren

The NRA and Recovery

The National Recovery Administration. By Leverett S. Lyon, Paul T. Homan, George Terborgh, Lewis Lorwin, Charles Dearing, and Leon C. Marshall. The Brookings Institution. $3.50.

The authors of this book could scarcely have foreseen that within a few weeks after the publication of their work the NRA—which had been one of the most controversial and spectacular political developments in American history—would be of only academic interest. Even after the Schechter decision few persons anticipated that the principles upon which the NRA was based would vanish from the public consciousness almost as quickly as they had appeared. But the social and political significance of this grotesque attempt to lift the country out of the depression by its economic bootstraps is in no way affected by the Supreme Court decision. As America's first large-scale experiment in government regulation of business, the NRA—with all its absurdities—is of incomparable importance to those who would build tomorrow's world.

Had the authors been forewarned of the early collapse of the NRA machinery, they would have doubtless altered the plan of their volume somewhat. As it is, the greater part of its 900 pages is devoted to a comprehensive and painstaking analysis of code making and administration. Apart from the concluding section—and brief comments at the close of each of the earlier ones—no attempt is made to evaluate the policies described. Yet the mere presentation of facts, divorced from the ballyhoo and emotion of the early days of the Blue Eagle, is guaranteed to give the average reader a far more unfavorable picture of the NRA than he had previously held.

In contrast to the general excellence of the study, the first chapter—dealing with the origins and background of the act—is frankly disappointing. The authors touch lightly upon certain precedents, such as the Federal Trade Commission and war-time experience with industrial control, and sketch briefly a few of the lines of thought prominent during the depression which appear to have influenced the NRA. But the basic question of how this peculiar assortment of nostrums and economic fallacies happened to be made the basis of the most far-reaching legislation in American history remains unanswered. Until someone provides us with detailed information regarding the personalities who aided in shaping this legislation, their experience and background, together with an analysis of the dominant political and economic forces of the day, there will remain a serious gap in the popular understanding of the recovery program.

It is manifestly impossible in the space available even to summarize those sections of the book which describe the complicated mechanism of the NRA. The value of these chapters is materially enhanced by the fact that several of the authors occupied important posts in the National Recovery Administration and played a role in shaping the policies which they describe. To their credit it may be said that this does not appear to interfere in any way with the objectivity of the study. They have given a faithful picture not only of the achievements of administration but also of the incredible confusion and chaos which existed. In part this anarchy was due to haste and an almost complete lack of precedents. In the main, however, it was the outgrowth of the conflicting objectives of the act itself. The assumption that reform and recovery were synonymous proved ill-grounded. Yet no one appears to have seen clearly which of the two goals should come first. The result was a system of trial and error which the authors describe as proceeding "beyond the bounds of caution with thoughtless disregard of consequences."

The nearest to a critical appraisal of the NRA as a whole is found in Mr. Terborgh's section, which analyzes the effect of the act in terms of recovery. Admitting the difficulty involved in disentangling the influence of the NRA from the multitude of other factors affecting the situation, Mr. Terborgh nevertheless presents considerable evidence to indicate that the codes hindered rather than aided the recovery movement. Having pointed out the fallacy of the theory that a business revival can be attained through raising wage rates, either prior to or simultaneously with an increase in prices, he shows that the NRA violated the basic premise of the theory. The rise in hourly wage rates was approximately the same as that of the cost of living and wholesale commodity prices, but prices were the first to advance. Moreover, contrary to the popular impression, "less than half of the employees in all industries combined had their hourly wage rate raised as a result of the NRA," while the majority of those whose hourly rates were increased "were already making more real income per hour than they made before the depression." Such advance as occurred in hourly earnings was offset, furthermore, by the restriction of hours under the codes and the increased cost of living. After careful calculation, the author concludes that the average real income per employed worker, as contrasted with dollar wages, showed a decline of 5 to 6 per cent under the NRA. Since employment was spread by approximately the same percentage, it is evident that the workers who were previously employed "provided the principal source from which the newly added workers obtained their . . . income." And after analyzing fluctuations in property income, Mr. Terborgh concludes that very little change has occurred in the basic distribution between labor and capital, though he feels that the income of both groups might have been somewhat higher if it had not been for the restrictive effect of the codes.

Many readers will doubtless be somewhat disturbed to find the staff of the Brookings Institution coming out so emphatically against the NRA and especially angry at its rejection of the widely held theory that recovery can be hastened through a general increase in wage rates. It is true that its basic criticisms of the codes are very much the same as those made by conservatives in the spring of 1933. But before jumping to the conclusion that the Brookings Institution has sold out to the Liberty League and the Republican Party, one should study its underlying economic arguments in connection with those advanced in the earlier Brookings volumes, "America's Capacity to Consume" and "The Formation of Capital." On the surface the basic conclusion of the latter—that the depression is due to an increasing maldistribution of wealth—may seem to conflict with the criticism of the NRA wage theory. Actually, however, the books are wholly consistent. All are based on the assumption that the production of goods and services—real wealth—and not money is the basis of economic well-being. The NRA failed because it tended to restrict production rather than to expand it. "The Formation of Capital" argues that permanent prosperity can only be achieved through a fundamental redistribution of wealth. The present book shows that under the capitalist system this is a far more complicated task than merely raising hourly wage rates, particularly if the latter can only be gained through the fostering of monopoly practices.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Middle Western Marriage

Dwell in the Wilderness. By Alvah C. Bessie. Covici-Friede. $2.50.

THIS family novel of the Middle West has its end and its beginning in the marriage ceremony performed in 1888 over Eben Isaac Morris, young proprietor of a drygoods emporium, and Amelia Millard, a clergyman's daughter. Superficially it was a commonplace Victorian marriage. Amelia was no beauty, and Eben was no catch. Having met and fancied each other, they had gone through an elaborate, rigidly supervised courtship. Once, at the time of their engagement, they had been allowed to kiss, under her parents' monitory eyes. They had dined and attended church and sung hymns in the parlor. Yet for all this caution, decorum, and common sense, theirs was a union which bore within it the seeds of insanity and disaster. On the wedding night it was apparent that the half-hysterical girl, who had been taught to hate the flesh as she would the devil, was the victim of a deep-seated sex neurosis. In subsequent years she produced four living children, but whenever her husband tried to kiss her mouth, she proffered him a pale and horrified cheek. Thirty-odd years of respectable wedlock turned her into a domineering old woman, fearful and at the same time pathetic, a paranoiac, unrecognized as such by her own family. Thirty-odd years of ungratified love of life made Eben Morris an economic failure, a futile, emasculated, bewildered derelict. Of the four children, one grew up to be a priggish, big-shot executive; one was a drunkard; one a homosexual; one a sad, poetic, maladjusted divorcée.

The demons that haunt the Morris household are, of course, familiars of contemporary fiction, yet they are still terrifying. The psychopathological offshoots of nineteenth-century moralistic dualism have been studied before; they remain engrossing. Were Mr. Bessie equipped with the proper scientific implements with which to probe the character of Amelia, "Dwell in the Wilderness" might have been a fine novel. In its present form it is a disorganized, deceptively lifelike piece of work. It has moments of genuine horror and a continuous superficial verisimilitude. The material aspects of the family life are at all times sharply presented. Using a dozen different recent techniques of the novel—the interior monologue, the dream, the revery, newspaper citations, snatches of popular songs, the shifting point of view, the sharp parenthesis breaking the long, loose-jointed colloquial sentence—Mr. Bessie has contrived to make the behavior of his people recognizable and therefore half true.

Beyond this, however, he cannot go: behavior he perceives, but not its sources. The novel revolves about Eben and Amelia. It is the woman's sexual illness, plus the man's inability to deal with it, which poisons the family cell. Each action of the novel should, accordingly, spring, directly or indirectly, out of the central situation, or, conversely, impinge upon it. Unluckily, Mr. Bessie was unable to plumb the center of his story; consequently it exerts neither centrifugal nor centripetal force upon the subordinate actions. In many instances the characters, tastes, and careers of the four children are in no way predicated upon the marriage of their parents, with the result that they seem irrational, and the novel comes to remind one of a rambling family history, spirited but pointless.

MARY MCCARTHY

Russian Reminiscences

The Grinding Mill. Reminiscences of War and Revolution in Russia (1913-1920). By Prince A. Lobanov-Rostovsky. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THIS book contains no new information, but it conveys successfully an atmosphere, and although this atmosphere of Russia, war, and revolution is not unknown, the book will interest many readers because it is well written and full of life and movement. At the beginning of the World War the author was a member of the high Russian aristocracy in his very early twenties. To judge from the book, which is an intimate narrative of the young man's life and feelings during those troubled years, he far surpassed his comrades in education, intelligence, and gentleness. He naturally writes from the point of view of an extremely wealthy Russian aristocrat; the book tries to record his feelings and thoughts at the time of the events. But they were not typical of the average Russian officer of his class. Prince Lobanov-Rostovsky seems to have been more humane and refined than most of them. Was it this fact or a certain sheltered position that never allowed him to see the cruelty and unspeakable savagery of the civil war in Russia? "That was the only time in my life I saw a knout," he remarks after a visit in 1920 to the offices of the Inter-Allied Commission in Constantinople—after having spent five years in Russia during the war and the various phases of the counter-revolution. This one sentence reveals the striking one-sidedness of the book.

I did not witness the civil war in southern Russia, where Prince Lobanov saw it. I witnessed it during two years in Siberia, "the only place," as Prince Lobanov writes, "where a popular movement against the reds seemed to be afoot." There it was clearly the use of the knout by the white Russian officers, not only against the reds and the greens, but against their own soldiers and the civilian population, which contributed largely to the loss of the civil war notwithstanding all the initial advantages which the white armies had enjoyed. All the counter-revolutionary efforts against the Bolsheviks were doomed, not only because of the political backwardness of the personally honest white leaders but also because of the moral superiority of the red armies. The red soldiers were fighting "in a crusading spirit for a definite ideal," and the brutal and unintelligent behavior of many of the officers of the white armies turned the civilian population and the soldiers of the white armies into sympathizers with the reds.

Of the real horrors of war and civil war little is to be found in the book. But the years were full of excitement and of stirring events. Prince Lobanov served on the Russian-German front from 1914 to 1917, came at the beginning of the revolution to Petrograd, went in the autumn of 1917 via England to Salonika, fought then with the Russian units in France, joined the army of Denikin in southern Russia, and escaped in January, 1920, to Constantinople and Paris. Of all these events the author talks in an interesting, vivid, and intelligent way which will win many readers. And he succeeds in bringing out how life adjusts itself to horrors and upheavals and how everyday routine makes people quickly forget past miseries. Prince Lobanov is an ardent Russian nationalist who finally accepts the Russian Revolution in the faith that it will bring new life and a new civilization to Russia.

HANS KOHN

Shorter Notices

Redder than the Rose. By Robert Forsythe. Covici-Friede. $2.

The formula for the regular contributor to the New Masses who signs himself Robert Forsythe is that he is at once a Communist and a humorist. Yet even this not so astounding paradox does not quite cover the case. More precisely, Mr. Forsythe's method is to use some of the most cherished devices of bourgeois humor to persuade a bourgeois audience of the rightness of his convictions. The reference is so clearly to the wearily sophisticated background of middle-class culture that it is doubtful whether this writer's doctrinal bedfellows will find his book as hilariously funny as those who, like himself, were born to that culture. In brief, these little essays on current American asininities are by and for someone who has been until quite recently taken in by them. One has the feeling that Mr. Forsythe chastises such personages as Mae West, H. L. Mencken, Alexander Woollcott, and J. P. Morgan with such jubilant ardor because he recognizes how narrowly he has escaped their influence. In the case of Mencken, to whom he devotes a full-length obituary, he does not actually escape the influence. Menckenisms abound in his style, as do also the subtler cuckoo notes of Thurber, Frank Sullivan, and the other unregenerate harlequins admonished in the Lardner article. But the difference between this book and most of the products of recent American humor is nevertheless profound. Communism gives not only a point but a kind of salubrious glow to the best pieces—those on Hearst, Ernest Hemingway, the Vanderbilts and their rats, the president of the College of the City of New York. Those that adopt the more serious, the haranguing note are less effective. Mr. Forsythe's real gift is for making the American public aware of itself by using one of its own best self-protective weapons against it. He should leave the proselytizing to those less inhibited by a sense of humor. At present he must be about the only humorist in this country writing out of a fixed social point of view, and to sacrifice this position would be a loss both to humor and the country.

They Shoot Horses, Don't They? By Horace McCoy. Simon and Schuster. $2.

This unpretentious novel of the hard-boiled school tells of a dance marathon and a mercy murder that marked its close. While neither the style nor the point of view is original, the milieu is, and Mr. McCoy writes with the authority of one who has himself been a bouncer in a marathon on the California coast. Unlike the earlier "tough" novelists from whom he inherited his staccato prose, Mr. McCoy is not solely occupied with the presentation of horror for its own sake. Though the titillation of the reader's nerves is his chief objective, he does, by implication at least, condemn the economic set-up which is responsible for the brutalized human beings he puts on exhibit. The book is full of an inverted romanticism: it is hardly possible that all the contestants in dance marathons are such sensational characters as Mr. McCoy suggests. Were it not in its physical details so carefully documented, it would be lurid beyond belief.

The Land of Shvambrania. By Leo Kassil. The Viking Press. $2.

Any one of the millions of Americans who nurture the belief that the Russian of today is a dull-witted, serious fellow, dedicated to the threshing machine and the tractor, would do well to investigate this curious hybrid fantasy, "The Land of Shvambrania." The first thing of its kind to come out of the U. S. S. R., it is a strange but satisfactory compound of truth and fancy, satire and revolutionary feeling. Shvambrania, a mythical island with the contours of an enormous tooth, was first imagined by two sons of a Jewish provincial doctor in the year 1914. Though Shvambrania was a dream kingdom, it was not altogether out of touch with reality. The events of the world at large had their burlesque parallels in Shvambranian history. When the revolution came to Russia, the imaginary kingdom dethroned its king, and the occupation of its people was changed from war to athletics. However, as the revolution gained in stability, and the energies of the boys were diverted more and more into the building of a new state, the spell of Shvambrania lost its potency. Less and less often the boys played the game, until at last they abolished it with public festivities. The story of the growth and decline of Shvambrania, here reconstructed by Leo Kassil, the elder of the doctor's sons, is alternated with the account of the upheaval that shook their provincial town as it was shaking all Russia. Reality is as outlandish as the fairy tale, and both are accepted by the children with unquestioning enthusiasm. This sprightly novel, witty and exaggerated and learned, tells the human, day-to-day truth about the revolution more perspicaciously than a dozen factual studies.

Four Roads to Death. By Benjamin Appel. Alfred Knopf. $2.

This story of an expedition into the Taklamakan desert of Chinese Turkestan is rather heavily reminiscent of James Hilton's "Lost Horizon." It contains a similar unsynthesized mixture of mystery, adventure, mysticism, and parlor philosophy. Four persons, backed by a New York millionaire, set out to find gold in the buried cities of the Chinese desert. A beautiful woman, a novelist, a go-getting business man, and a pseudo-Buddhist explorer—they represent respectively the lust for adventure, fame, money, and power. The effect of the unsuccessful expedition upon each of these carefully pigeonholed characters makes up the novel, which, except for two splendid chapters, is an uninspired, repetitious piece of nonsense. These chapters, which deal with the crazy, despairing trek toward water across endless stretches of unchanging desert, occur unfortunately at the end of the book, and only the most tenacious reader will win through to them.

PLANNED SAFETY

THE same meticulous planning that has promoted and governed the extraordinary growth of the Soviet Union, that has made possible the balancing of the nation's budget year after year; that has enabled it to provide economic security for its 170 million people; has been applied to the creation of a strikingly safe medium of investment—

SOVIET UNION 7% GOLD BONDS

These bonds incorporate the principle of "planned safety". A summation of the special safeguards behind these bonds will be sent upon request.

Ask for Circular N 11

Soviet American Securities Corp.
30 Broad Street Tel. HAnover 2-5330 New York

The Voice of Bugle Ann. By MacKinlay Kantor. Coward-McCann. $1.25.

"The Voice of Bugle Ann" is a dog story. A dreamy, crooning tale, it has not even the spirit of its foxhound heroine. It has a thin mystery plot, a soporific cadenced prose, and a fine melancholy reverence for the spirit of the Old South. Its setting is the Missouri hill country, its time the present, its author a more or less distinguished novelist. Yet with its vague sense of characterization, regional, temporal, or human, it might have been written by any senescent, dog-fancying Southern colonel a hundred years ago.

The Poems of W. H. Davies. Oxford University Press. $3.
Love Poems. By W. H. Davies. Oxford University Press. $1.25.

The world of literary journalism has its major mysteries, and one of them is how Mr. Davies's outpourings could have elicited praise from a variety of people ranging from Sir John Squire to Bernard Shaw. The jacket of this new collection of his poems contains excerpts from three leading English journals, the Observer, the Daily Telegraph, and the Times Literary Supplement, hailing him as the poet who has kept the springs of English poesy free from contamination. One is forced to conclude that the current state of criticism is somewhat lower in England than in America. Mr. Davies sometimes pleases by a deftness in the manipulation of tinkling rhymes and a naive astonishment in the presence of nature, but his work is all surface, everything that he says has been much better said long ago, and he is emotionally and intellectually sub-adolescent. Most objectionable of all is the naughty snigger with which he steals a kiss or takes a drink of ale, acts which in certain quarters have given him a reputation for boldness.

A History of Europe: Ancient and Mediaeval. Volume I. By H. A. L. Fisher. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

Mr. Fisher covers the period from Neolithic man down to the end of the Middle Ages in not much more than four hundred pages. This feat of compression he accomplishes by ignoring—except in occasional paragraphs—economic and cultural developments and concentrating on the activities of such politically prominent individuals as Augustus, Charlemagne, Barbarossa, and the like. Mr. Fisher confesses himself unable to discern in history "a plot, a rhythm, a predetermined pattern," and believes that the chief part in "the development of human destinies" is played by "the contingent and the unforeseen." He is a historian in the eighteenth-century manner, for whom the various schools of historical interpretation which developed in the nineteenth century might never have existed. Unfortunately he is lacking in the intellectual passion and the verbal skill of a Gibbon or a Voltaire. He endeavors to be picturesque and epigrammatic but succeeds only in being stilted and rhetorical. This book may have some use as a textbook or a work of reference—Mr. Fisher has made use of the most recent scholarship and seems to be generally accurate—but it has little value as literature, and it is of intellectual interest only because it provokes one to ask why a man of Mr. Fisher's eminence should have devoted himself to a study which, if taken at his own valuation, is so wholly meaningless.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1935 No. 3662

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 281
EDITORIALS:
  Can Italy Defy Sanctions? 283
  Behind America's Note to the U.S.S.R. 284
  Will Borah Run? 285
  Nancy and Her Father 285
  Is This America? 286
ISSUES AND MEN. WAR IN ETHIOPIA. By Oswald Garrison Villard 287
RACKETEERING IN THE A. F. OF L. I. THE POULTRY RACKET. By Isidor Feinstein 288
THE MEANING OF THE MODERN DRAMA. II. THE SHAVIAN DILEMMA. By Joseph Wood Krutch 291
ROOSEVELT'S HOLLOW TRIUMPH. By Paul W. Ward . . . 293
CORRESPONDENCE 297
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
  An Assist for William Green. By Heywood Broun 299
  Fort Peck: An American Siberia. By James Rorty 300
  Contributors to this Issue 301
  The Nation's Index of Labor Welfare 302
BOOKS:
  The Pathos of Liberalism. By Reinhold Niebuhr 303
  Between Two Worlds. By William Troy 304
  Soviet Prison. By Joseph Barnes 305
  Mary of Scotland. By Clara Gruening Stillman 306
  Synthesis by Will Durant. By W. Norman Brown 307
  Voodoo Nonsense. By Melville J. Herskovits 308

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING CHARLES ANGOFF

ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional. THREE WEEKS' NOTICE AND THE OLD ADDRESS AS WELL AS THE NEW ARE REQUIRED FOR CHANGE OF SUBSCRIBER'S ADDRESS.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by the Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

HAILE SELASSIE'S dramatic gesture of leasing the oil and mineral rights of half his kingdom to an Anglo-American syndicate may not prevent Mussolini from seizing Ethiopia, but it has introduced an element of uncertainty into the situation which cannot but cause Italy much embarrassment. Almost overnight Mussolini finds himself robbed of the principal objective of his African campaign. He finds himself involved not only with Britain and France, whose reaction he can count on, but potentially with the United States, whose policies he cannot fathom. It is true that the agreement makes it difficult for England to base its plea at Geneva on high moral grounds, but there was never any real prospect that such a plea would be backed up by a demand for sanctions. The final outcome depends, of course, primarily on the attitude of the British government toward the Emperor's concessions. The British disclaimer of interest and its reference to its obligations under the 1906 treaty were inevitable under any circumstances. If the British government is actually behind the deal, as is charged in many quarters, we may expect its attitude toward Italy to stiffen materially. The same will be true if any important British interests are involved. Thus we may be treated to the spectacle of a British policy more conciliatory toward Italy on the surface but in reality more intransigent. While this enhances the danger of a general world conflict, it raises new hope that hostilities may be averted altogether. At least one must admire the courage and realism of the Ethiopian emperor at a time when the rest of the world appears hopelessly supine.

ITALY'S CONTENTION that the League of Nations cannot legally close the Suez Canal to troops and supplies destined for Ethiopia is called into question by a recent study made for the Geneva Research Center by Raymond Leslie Buell, president of the Foreign Policy Association. Mr. Buell finds the entire issue so clouded with uncertainties that a final conclusion is likely to be dependent on the relative will of the parties engaged in the dispute. It is an open question, for example, whether the convention of 1888, providing that the canal shall be "free and open in time of war to every vessel of commerce or war," is still in force today. The Constantinople convention containing this provision also specified that the canal's defense should, in the last instance, be referred to the concert of European nations. But in 1914 the British government established a protectorate over Egypt and closed the canal to enemy warships. This protectorate was legally ended in 1922, subject to a reservation leaving the defense of the canal in British hands. The canal is now under the territorial jurisdiction of Egypt, which is not a member of the League and which did not accede to the convention of 1888. Should Britain take unilateral action to close the canal, it might find itself in a very embarrassing position if Italy appealed to the World Court challenging its right to control the canal. If, on the other hand, the canal were closed following a unanimous vote of the League Council, excluding the interested parties, it could be argued that the sanctions of the League against a nation engaging in war in violation of the Covenant took precedence over regulations drawn up when neutrality was legally possible. The very existence of machinery for the enforcement of peace is dependent upon this interpretation.

THE PRESENCE of a representative of Finland at the recent meeting of Scandinavia's foreign ministers at Oslo suggests that Hitler's attempt to build a German-Polish-Finnish bloc to offset the Franco-Soviet alliance is encountering heavy going. Five months ago, when a similar meeting of the Scandinavian countries was called to consider the adoption of a common policy in the face of German rearmament, Finland did not attend, largely because of strong anti-Swedish feeling. Since then both Germany and Poland have renewed their efforts to bring it definitely into the proposed anti-Soviet bloc. Traditionally opposed to Russia and deeply indebted to Germany for its independence, Finland finds itself in a most difficult position. If it yields to the German-Polish importunities, it will not only face the hostility of France and the Soviet Union but will also isolate itself from the Scandinavian countries, which have made strict neutrality and loyalty to the League the foundation stones of their policy. On the other hand, not only the powerful Lapua movement, which maintains close contact with the Nazis through its militia, but also the so-called "genuine Finns," the anti-Swedish movement headed by Professor Leiviskä, are violently anti-Soviet. The situation is made more serious by the presence in Finland of a Japanese military mission which for months has been studying the Finnish fortifications on both the eastern and northeastern borders. Despite this tremendous pressure, the coolness shown on the occasion of Foreign Minister Beck's recent visit, together with Finnish cooperation at Oslo, points to a continuation of the traditional safe and sane policy of neutrality.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

JACOB GOULD SCHURMAN, JR., chief magistrate of New York, and the League of Women Shoppers both deserve credit for the institution of new methods in handling picketing cases in city courts. The league, organized to support the legitimate demand of workers in industrial disputes, helped recently to picket the offices of the American Mercury. Several members were arrested along with fifty other pickets, and according to custom were thrust into the detention pen in the night court to await trial. There they suffered the usual privations and discomforts, but added to these, on this occasion, was the presence in the cell of four drunken men who were deliberately thrust among the imprisoned pickets by Jacob Katz, court attendant. This indignity roused the league to action. It protested to the court with prompt results. Katz was summarily dismissed, and Chief Magistrate Schurman later ordered that women arrested for picketing should henceforth be detained in the court itself while awaiting trial and not be locked in cells. This ruling is important apart from the fact that it insures such prisoners a reasonable degree of comfort and decency. It clearly distinguishes picketing from ordinary crimes and misdemeanors and constitutes at least a short step toward the legal recognition of political offenders. Obviously the ruling should be applied to men as well as women.

THE MAGISTRATES' COURTS of New York City are not celebrated for the brilliance and humanity of their jurists, but there are exceptions among them. Magistrate Michael A. Ford's vigorous and forthright disposition of a recent case involving twenty-eight peddlers in the garment district is worthy of commendation. The West Side Association of Commerce had asked for police action against the peddlers, charging them with obstructing traffic. The police obligingly arrested them, herded them into an improvised pen, and then brought them before Magistrate Ford. The association suggested that a suitable penalty for each peddler would be "$10 or ten days." The judge replied that he could see no sense in fining people for trying to earn an honest living. The association countered with the argument that the peddlers were interfering with its business and were besmirching the fair name of New York City. The magistrate snapped back: "So you are here for a selfish purpose. You want to protect investments. Are you the custodian of the good name and prestige of the city?" He added that in a time of national economic crisis a judge had a right to deal lightly with minor violations of the law by people who are trying to earn an honest dollar. The representative of the business men demanded that the magistrate do his "duty." Whereupon Magistrate Ford thundered: "Don't try to tell me what my duty is. I'm not going to be told my duty by a paid officer of a retailers' group." He gave the peddlers suspended sentences and warned one group to stay out of the garment district. The association has protested Magistrate Ford's action to Chief Magistrate Schurman but all decent people will hope that he will be upheld.

WE print herewith an original thought culled from the works of Walter Lippmann and dedicated—by us—to the unconquered Army of the Unemployed:

> What Mr. Roosevelt says or fails to say between the adjournment of Congress and its assembling in January will call for unusually careful scrutiny. For it will supply the evidence on which the people may judge whether the President now will return to them the extraordinary powers they granted him in a moment of grave danger for the single purpose of achieving recovery, or whether they must take these powers away from him.
>
> The people gave Mr. Roosevelt a sword to lead them in a particular battle. That battle is over [italics ours] and that sword now should be returned to its scabbard.

ALTHOUGH the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunction Act of 1932 was a step in the right direction, much of its force has been wasted by the failure of most state legislatures to place similar limitations on issuance of equity relief in labor disputes. When the Legislature of New York State recently empowered persons charged with contempt of court for violating labor injunctions to demand jury trials, it went a long way toward incorporating the essential spirit, if not the full legal technique, of the federal statute into the laws of that state. It is encouraging, therefore, to learn that Supreme Court Justice Meier Steinbrink has just upheld the constitutionality of the New York statute in the first test case that has arisen. The test developed out of a typical all-embracing injunction directed against Local 505 of the Bakery and Confectionery Workers' International, which Supreme Court Justice Leander Faber issued some months ago upon suit by the Standard Baking Company. Justice Steinbrink's ruling is as sound in judicial logic as it is cogent in social philosophy. He holds that it constitutes no invasion of judicial prerogatives for the legislature to redefine the procedure which shall be followed by those who seek to obtain equity relief. He throws out of court the argument that a plaintiff who obtains an injunction becomes vested with property rights which are immune to legislative curbing. He proclaims that the economic and social importance of the organized labor movement justifies the restriction of the use of the injunction by employers. It hardly seems probable that Justice Steinbrink will be reversed by the Court of Appeals. If he is upheld, the power of judges to break strikes will be materially curtailed.

ONE OF THE MINOR MISFORTUNES of the Italo-Ethiopian uproar is that it has diverted the attention of the world from the German madhouse. A series of "scientific" congresses was recently held in Berlin which portends further embarrassment for the intelligent people of the Third Reich. The penological congress was packed with Nazis, and the preposterous resolutions it passed in favor of crueler punishment for criminals misled not one of the foreigners present, as Warden Lawes of Sing Sing has pointed out. The so-called World Population Congress was an equally painful exhibition. It was opened by Dr. Wilhelm Frick, Minister of the Interior, and honorary president of the congress. His speech was a long hymn of thanks to the Almighty for blessing the people of Germany with Adolf Hitler, laying special emphasis on the Chancellor's anti-Semitic theories. The following day the Congress was graced with a speech by Dr. Clarence G. Campbell of New York, president of the Eugenics Research Association. He defended the "obviously biological realities" of the Nazi race doctrines, and warmly supported the totalitarian state. It need hardly be added that Professor Franz Boas was not present at the congress. Nazi science has little use for anthropologists of international reputation, especially if they happen to be Jews.

THE MORE ABUNDANT LIFE of the New Deal, according to figures issued by the Federal Bureau of Education, has been hard on the schools of the country. Reports from forty-one states show a decrease of 18.3 per cent in current expenses and of 68.4 per cent in capital expenditures in the school year 1933-34 as compared to 1931-32. There was a drop in the latter school year, but as compared to 1929-30 the respective percentage decreases were only 1.8 and 43.1. In 1934 these forty-one states spent $957,693,673 for running their schools, while in 1932 they spent $1,171,903,889, and the capital outlays in the same states dropped from $124,547,363 to $39,383,940. The report also points out, as might have been expected, that the schools in the South have been hit the hardest. In Arkansas, for example, the annual current cost per pupil in average daily attendance is $22.60, while in Nevada it is $117.90, and in New Jersey $102.53. Nothing could be more dangerous for the future of the country than the failure to maintain even our present inadequate educational standards.

HAVE YOU EVER WONDERED what a Vice-President of the United States thinks about? We hadn't either until we opened the New York Times of August 29. John N. Garner, it seems, thinks about Hearn's department store and its new Share-the-Profits plan. "The way to make things HUM," says Mr. Garner in an ad on page 9, "is to pay good wages and keep prices low. Add to that a Share of Profits, and the world won't just beat a pathway to your door—They'll Build a Concrete Highway!" But what Mr. Garner thinks of Hearn's is nothing to what Hearn's thinks of Mr. Garner.

> Long years spent with silent men of action—the plainsmen of his native Texas—have schooled this statesman in homespun to see clearly, think straight. . . . He is one of the most beloved figures in public life. . . . Now, as Hearn's steps forward once more to serve the people, Mr. Garner is again strongly in favor.

Some political observers saw in the Hearn announcement an attempt to capture the vice-presidency in 1936. Others saw nothing of the sort. William E. Borah, Al Smith, Huey Long, and other Presidential aspirants refused to comment. Left-wing commentators refused not to comment. "It's fascism," said one of these, "Mr. Garner hopes to get the basement-store vote by using radical slogans. But the masses in Macy's, Bloomingdale's, and Gimbel's will not be misled by such cheap demagoguery."

Can Italy Defy Sanctions?

AFTER the first Italian Cabinet "War Council" was held at Bolzano, under the chairmanship of Premier Mussolini, an official communiqué stated:

> The problem of sanctions has been studied by the highest authorities in all its aspects, and as far as sanctions of a military character are concerned, the necessary provisions and measures to resist them have long since been taken. In view of any future eventualities, and to guarantee economic resistance by Italy, the problem of supplies of the necessaries of life has been examined. The supply of food is sufficient, since the wheat and rice crops this year have been particularly ample. As for supplies of an industrial character, the Cabinet Council approved a measure providing that all civilian requirements shall give way to present and future military needs.

The facts, however, create a far more pessimistic impression of Italy's capacity to go it alone than does the Cabinet's cheery announcement. The Committee on Economic Sanctions of the Twentieth Century Fund made public in 1932 a report entitled "Boycotts and Peace" in which the relative dependency of the twelve leading powers on outside supplies and materials was reviewed. Apart from munitions themselves the chief essentials for waging war were listed as iron and steel, machinery, nitrogen, other chemicals for explosives and gas, coal, petroleum, iron ore, and foodstuffs. Of the twelve nations discussed in the report every one but Italy was shown to be self-sustaining in at least two of these essentials. Italy was self-sufficient in none. In contrast to the Cabinet's statement the figures show that in 1931 Italy imported from 18 to 20 per cent of its foodstuffs; in wheat and other cereals its deficiency was as great as 25 per cent. Undoubtedly wheat production has increased since then as the result of the intensive "battle of grain" which has been waged since 1925 to free Italy from dependence on foreign countries for its bread. But more recent figures give no support to Italy's claim to self-sufficiency in other crops or in foodstuffs generally. Aside from food, the report reveals the wide gaps in Mussolini's armor. Italy is partly dependent on outside sources of supply for its iron and steel and almost wholly for iron ore. It produces no coal, no oil, no cotton. It is partly dependent on its imports of machinery and of nitrogen and numerous other essential chemicals. It must buy from other countries its entire supply, or nearly so, of copper, rubber, tin, nickel, mineral nitrates, tungsten, chromite, mica.

The United States remains the largest source of Italy's imports. An application of economic sanctions to be effective would obviously require American cooperation. As we pointed out last week, a certain measure of cooperation is possible even under the limitations imposed by the recent neutrality legislation. An embargo on loans, credits, and essential war materials imposed by the League of Nations and supported as far as the law allows by the United States would check, if it did not prevent, Italy's aggression in Ethiopia and would end the immediate threat to the peace of Europe. Italy cannot fight the other nations of Europe unless they sell it the materials to fight with.

Behind America's Note to the U. S. S. R.

MANY explanations have been offered for the severe tone taken by the United States in its recent protest to the Soviet government on the activities of the Third International. The fact that few commentators took the American note at its face value is a rather convincing indication that the Administration was motivated by something other than a desire to call attention to a supposed infringement of the Roosevelt-Litvinov agreement. That the President was prompted chiefly by internal rather than international considerations is reasonably obvious, though the precise nature of the domestic pressure remains a matter for speculation. Certain liberal papers see the protest as an attempt to offset the campaign recently launched by Hamilton Fish, William Randolph Hearst, and other reactionaries to obtain a severance of diplomatic relations between this country and the Soviet Union. A more ingenious interpretation offered by the Republican press is that Roosevelt wished to disassociate himself as vigorously as possible from the proffer of Communist aid against fascism which was advanced by Georgi Dimitrov, new spokesman for the Third International. Others attribute the note and Secretary Hull's subsequent public statement to under-cover work on the part of anti-Soviet officials in the State Department, who grasped their opportunity when it became evident that the Administration resented the front-page publicity given to speeches of the American Communist leaders depicting the growth of radical sentiment in this country.

Whatever the motive, it must be admitted that the Administration seized upon a fairly convincing technicality upon which to base its protest. Taken in isolation from the known facts of the present-day world, paragraph 4 of the Litvinov letter, to which the State Department made special reference in its protest, would appear to support the American case. The Soviet Union specifically agreed "not to permit the . . . residence on its territory of any organization . . . and to prevent the activity on its territory of any organization . . . which has as its aim . . . the preparation for the overthrow . . . by force of . . . the political or social order within any part of the United States. . . ." By conservatives generally this has been hailed as a definite pledge on the part of Moscow to curb the activities of the Comintern in relation to the United States. But no one who possesses even the most elementary knowledge of the Soviet Union could believe for a moment that this statement could have been intended to ban the normal work of the Third International. For years capitalist governments had been protesting to Moscow against Comintern-supported agitation within their countries, and had invariably received the reply that the Comintern was an international agency regarding which the Soviet government could assume no responsibility. All the government could promise was that its officials would not participate, as they had in the past, in Comintern activity, and that it would not give shelter to avowed revolutionists seeking to overthrow the American government by force. These promises have been scrupulously kept. Soviet diplomatic representatives have never even been accused of participating in politics in this country, and there is no evidence that any of the American or foreign representatives at the Comintern planned or engaged in any activities that were inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States. No one has even questioned the legal right of the American Communist Party to join and participate in the Third International. Yet, paradoxically enough, the normal activities of the party are alleged to be illegal when they are conducted on foreign soil.

All of which merely goes to confirm the fact that the State Department had other and more pressing reasons for sending its sudden and provocative note to Moscow. In this connection much has been made of the fact that Soviet purchases in this country have fallen far short of expectations, and are no longer an inducement for continuing recognition. It is true that our exports to the U. S. S. R. in 1934 were only $15,000,000 as against $9,000,000 in 1933 and $114,000,000 at the peak in 1930. But responsibility for this low level of trade lies almost entirely at the door of the United States. While there was a change in Soviet trade policy toward the end of the first Five-Year Plan which accounted for the sharp drop in purchases in 1932 and 1933, the primary factor in keeping the Soviets from purchasing badly needed American goods has been our failure to advance the credit facilities that were virtually promised on the occasion of Litvinov's visit to Washington. The passage of the Johnson act and its application to the Soviet Union were the first blows struck at the prospective Soviet trade. The collapse of the debt negotiations under circumstances which reflected little credit upon the Administration and the subsequent dissolution of the Export-Import Bank definitely closed the door to trade on the scale which was envisioned at the time of recognition. Nevertheless, Soviet purchases in the first seven months of this year were approximately $25,000,000, or two and a half times as large as in the corresponding period of 1934, and with the signing of the recent commercial agreement guaranteeing the expenditure of $30,000,000 in the United States during the year, prospects for cash trade are better than at any period since the close of 1931. From this standpoint the recent controversy over the Third International is most untimely.

Another factor which played an important role at the time of Soviet recognition and has now receded in popular interest is the need for a common front against Japan. The danger of a Japanese attack on either the United States or Russia has apparently been postponed for at least several years. But in place of the Japanese menace there has appeared the immediate and tangible threat of a war in Europe. Since American recognition the Soviet Union has joined the League of Nations and is generally recognized as the bulwark of peace on the Continent. If the United States is to throw its forces with the League in a last-minute attempt to prevent the Italo-Ethiopian crisis from developing into a world conflagration, it needs the undivided and sympathetic support of the Soviets. Nothing could be more unfortunate than for the Administration to allow irrelevant domestic political issues to divert it from a courageous effort to prevent this catastrophe.

Will Borah Run?

THAT the nomination of William E. Borah by the Republicans next year would cause genuine alarm in the Roosevelt camp is evident. Mr. Roosevelt knows full well that Mr. Borah is the only man thus far mentioned to oppose him who would draw progressives and liberals in large numbers. Colonel Knox of the Chicago Daily News would repel them, Senator Vandenberg would not even interest them, but there still clings to Borah an aura of liberalism from the days when he really was progressive. That he is still a force in the Senate is true. As we have often pointed out, he is a great lawyer and a profound authority on the Constitution, and whenever he makes a long address he is eagerly listened to. He can still draw huge audiences when he speaks in public, and he would be an impressive and striking figure in the White House.

Years ago Mr. Borah could easily have made himself President had he decided once for all to break with the conservatives of his party, at least to the extent of leading the progressive group and starting a nation-wide fight against the reaction of Hoover and Coolidge. But Mr. Borah is not a bolter. He did not leave the party with Theodore Roosevelt in 1912, and although he begged and received and used in 1924 a letter of eulogy from Robert M. La Follette, he would not support the Wisconsin statesman in his remarkable political campaign. Every time he has faced the question of putting his independence above party loyalty Mr. Borah has preferred to remain upon the Republican reservation. More than that, throughout his later career there has seemed to rest upon him an inhibition that often makes it impossible for him to see things through to their logical conclusion. He will fight hard for a cause as long as it is on the first pages, but when it no longer ranks foremost in news value his interest in it unaccountably wanes. For all his great ability, his unceasing industry, and his never-ending devotion to the tasks of his office, he no longer ranks as high as he did some years ago.

That there has been a great change in Mr. Borah is proved by the fact that he is being seriously considered for the nomination by conservative Republicans. Only a few years ago his name was anathema to them and to big business men everywhere. He was the "wild man from Idaho," given to proposing radical and half-baked legislation. There were also times, it is true, when these men applauded him for standing firm against some dangerous fad or radicalism, but in the years when Mr. Borah was at the height of his power, when he should have been selected because of his great intellectual ability, those forces were sufficiently strong to keep him shelved. If they are turning to him now it is because of the dearth of other candidates of any stature, and because they no longer think of him as a wild man. Indeed, they are more and more drawn to him as an isolationist—that is, those among them who think that our national salvation lies in our hearing no trade, seeing no trade, and speaking no trade with the rest of the world. They recall with gratitude his intense and brilliant opposition to the Treaty of Versailles, the wickedness of which he was among the first to understand and appreciate. It must not, however, be forgotten in this connection that he has repeatedly stated that he favors any move "that will bring nations together, promote friendliness, and remove causes of friction." No one has fought harder than he for a decent and friendly American policy in the Caribbean. Opposing the use of American troops there, he once said at Yale University: "There is a higher and better and more peaceful and lawful method by which to protect our interests. God has made us neighbors—let justice make us friends." Not the least of his services has been, too, his steadfast demand that we recognize Russia and develop helpful trade relations with that country without regard to its political beliefs. Above all he has stood for the civil rights of the citizen, as to which Franklin Roosevelt has up to this time remained pitifully and lamentably silent. "We cannot afford to barter these rights or to sacrifice them to any purpose or under any circumstances," Mr. Borah once wrote in an article he contributed to The Nation.

There is one grave obstacle to Mr. Borah's candidacy. He has passed his seventieth birthday and will be well into his seventy-second year when the Presidential election takes place next year. Although a man of exemplary habits who has always taken the best care of himself, he has recently undergone a serious operation and is no longer the extraordinarily powerful man that he was. Not in our entire history has either party contemplated the nomination of a man who had passed three score and ten years. Yet if reports from Washington are to be trusted, Mr. Borah is really interested in the question of his nomination. If he should achieve it, Mr. Roosevelt would have distinct ground for anxiety, for he would have an opponent in some ways abler than himself, and one far more competent to deal with the constitutional issue, if that should prove to be the dominating one in the coming contest. It would be difficult, too, to make the public understand the weaknesses of Mr. Borah's character, his curious inability to understand economics, to carry a fight through to a final victory, how much of a "lone wolf" he is, and how completely without executive and administrative experience.

Nancy and Her Father

NANCY BEDFORD-JONES was eighteen years old, a sophomore in college, the daughter of a prosperous American who had always gratified most of Nancy's whims. She had a car of her own, and an allowance. Probably there never was a father who treated his children better than H. Bedford-Jones, one of the country's well-known pulp writers. He was very fond of her. And she was a bright girl who wanted to be a journalist and planned eventually to enter the Columbia School of Journalism. Afterward her father could probably get her a good job; he knew all the big men in the field—Hearst, Macfadden, and the others. Nancy had some foolish ideas, of course, but she'd get over them. After all she was only a child. Even he, H. Bedford-Jones, had thought he was a Socialist at eighteen. The best clubs are full of successful middle-aged Americans who chuckle occasionally to think that they were once Socialists.

In the early days of September, 1935, Nancy Bedford-Jones found it necessary to denounce her father publicly in a radical sheet called the New Masses, because she discovered that he had sold out, for money, his own daughter and her confidence in an article in one of the nation's most lurid pulp sheets called Liberty. The article was headed: Will the Communists Get Our Girls in College: One Father's Story. It was subtitled A Startling Record, from the Depths of a Profound Dismay, of How the Red Web of Moscow Is Entangling Today's Daughters. It was signed "J. G. Shaw," and in it the author divided his daughter Nancy into three American daughters and related how each one, separately, had been debauched by representatives of the Student League for Industrial Democracy. The reading time is thirteen minutes, five seconds; the article probably brought a good price; and it would be hard to match for misrepresentation, stupid as well as shrewd, designed to reveal the red danger which threatens American youth. According to Shaw all radicals are degenerates and crooks, and the bickerings between the Socialists and Communists are merely a screen to hide a solidarity for which the most fervid advocates of a united front would not dare to hope. There are hot climaxes in "one father's story":

> After she'd been lost a couple of nights, I looked up the lousy outfit, had a couple of cops handy, and you should see the gang! She wants to quit school and take a garment-worker's job.
>
> . . . She cried her heart out—and stuck to her guns. She says someone must stand up for their ideals. "Yes," I agreed, "my own daughter quotes Strachey at me. . . . Her brain's warped."
>
> When I proposed that she go to a certain far-removed university for her next year, that she might keep her pledge to me to abstain from further activities, she shook her head. "It wouldn't be a bit of use really. I'd be taken in by the bunch there and put to work; . . ." "Haven't you enough will power to leave them alone?" "It isn't that. I'd be afraid to. I'd be dumped—beaten up. Not once, but all the time." She was in actual physical fear. . . .
>
> In our state colleges and in the towns around them are shrewd gentry who have their eyes on your daughter. You can't afford to laugh at them . . . as Morgan did, and a thousand other fathers who see their daughters put on the road to hell—too late.

But Nancy Bedford-Jones, at eighteen, is a better journalist than her father. Her article, My Father Is a Liar, in the New Masses for September 3 is much the more convincing of the two. She asserts conclusively that "J. G. Shaw" is H. Bedford-Jones, and that the three girls in his story are all herself—distorted. And she answers her father in his own terms:

> Yes, there is a web of "moral and mental disintegration" but it is not spun by the progressive movement. It is woven from the sewage and filth of American reaction—Hearst, Macfadden, et al.
>
> [My father] has not and he cannot change my beliefs. Nor can he hurt the progressive student movement. No lies can, because that movement has truth and right on its side. . . . We call upon the youth of America once more to join in the struggle for a world of peace, freedom, and progress.

We are placing our bets on the side represented by Nancy.

Is This America?

THE tar-and-feather party in Santa Rosa, California, in the course of which 300 vigilantes wrecked the house of a citizen and his family with tear-gas bombs in order to make him surrender, was supposed to be the spontaneous outburst of farmers against Communist agitators. There is no doubt that farmers took part in the affair, but a correspondent whom we trust writes that the mob was led and backed by bankers, a head of the federal reemployment bureau, motor cops, a member of the state legislature, American legionnaires, petty politicians, and members of the chamber of commerce; and a suit brought by one of the victims of the raid named among others the mayor of the town, who is a banker. The crime of the radicals was organizing strikes among crop-pickers. "Ninety per cent of the farmers in this community," writes our informant," are bankrupt and their crops are selling below the cost of harvest. Practically every rancher must borrow money from the bank or packer to meet his harvest payroll. The mob could count with certainty upon the approval of the local press, the protection of the police, and the inertia of the people. The raids took place under the nose of the sheriff, and it is rumored that the tear-gas bombs came out of his office." We quote briefly from an eyewitness's account of the raid published in the Oakland Tribune.

> Green [one of the victims] was held until the occupants of the cars could get out and hide behind trees. . . . I was told that it was the home of Sol Nitzberg, one of the most active of the "reds." Then Green was told to go up to the door. . . . Green, instead of calling Nitzberg out, disappeared inside. There was a wild yell of rage from some of the waiting vigilantes, and a rush toward the house. Then I heard a window go up, and then came the blast of a shotgun. . . . "I'm shooting to kill!" Nitzberg yelled from time to time. He must have fired fifteen or twenty shots when I heard a commotion. Some of the vigilantes had gone away and got some tear-gas bombs. Now they crept as close to the house as they dared to go . . . and then someone tossed a bomb. . . . There was another yell from Nitzberg, and then another shot. Then there came the tinkling of glass from the other side of the house, where another bomb had gone through. One or two bombs hit the side of the house. And then came a cry from inside, in a woman's or a child's voice. The firing ceased. I heard the door open and Nitzberg and his wife and children and Green came out wiping their eyes. One of the children was crying. Several men closed in on them, grabbed Nitzberg and Green, and dragged them down to the road where the cars waited.

The attitude of the local press is clearly revealed by this quotation from the Santa Rosa Press Democrat: "Daybreak revealed no deaths from the wild orgy of mob action—but plenty of results that will herald to the world what Sonoma County means to do to Communist agitators." In Santa Rosa, on the night of August 21, 1935, a mob of vigilantes, with the connivance of officials sworn to support the Constitution, overthrew established government, instituted a reign of terror, and violated the most fundamental rights of citizens. Yet the attorney general of the state has refused to take action and the governor has barely noticed the affair. Is California a part of the United States or isn't it?

Issues and Men

War in Ethiopia

THERE are two schools of thought about the war in Ethiopia, if it should come. One is represented by a British veteran of many, many years of foreign service and personal knowledge of Abyssinian conditions. He makes the astounding statement—privately—that it will take Mussolini ten years and a million lives to win complete control of Ethiopia. The other school says that this officer must be thinking in terms of wars against native tribes prior to the World War; that tanks, and airplanes, and poison gas, and chemical warfare generally have so altered conditions of war as to make it impossible for the Ethiopians to hold out very long. They speak of the speed with which light railways can be built, of the ability of tanks to conquer any natural obstacles, and ask how barefooted troops without modern equipment of any kind, using guns left over from the last war with Italy in 1891, can possibly hold out any length of time against the overwhelming forces Mussolini can bring to bear against them. They point out that bombing from the air will have a greater effect upon the morale of a primitive people than it had on the troops of the leading participants in the World War. They recall the success of the British in holding desert tribes in check in Asia by means of a few squadrons of airplanes, and tell terrible tales of whole tribes driven in fear from their shelters to die of starvation or thirst in the desert. How can Abyssinia hold out against a well-worked-out military plan? Finally they ask whether Mussolini and all his generals must not be perfectly aware of all difficulties, and whether they have not in all likelihood thought out a new technique for their advance into Abyssinia, upon which they base their present high confidence of early success.

The only answer is, of course, that nature itself is the sole protection upon which the Abyssinians may count, plus a small force of men fanatically ready to die for their country. Great masses of briers and giant thorns "more plentiful than the most extravagant use of barbed wire on the Hindenburg line" will bar the invaders' way. A recent traveler has written that "for every gun that may be emplaced in this region it will be necessary to clear the earth first, then to work with pick and explosives to tear mountains apart to reduce the massive walls of a natural fortress." It will be the story of Thermopylae over again. The tactics of the Ethiopians must be those of Lawrence in Arabia, of appearing and disappearing, always in small bodies so as to offer the least possible target to airplanes and artillery, always keeping the invaders in a state of anxiety without giving them the satisfaction of anything approaching a drawn battle. As for the airplanes, Liddell Hart declares that as Addis Ababa is more than 400 miles distant from the nearest Italian base, and is 8,000 feet above sea level, it is well out of reach of any present air service as a bombing target.

It must be the warfare of irregulars in other words, and the farther the Italians advance into Abyssinia the more difficult their task will become, especially in the matter of supplying water to their men since the natives will hardly refrain from poisoning springs and rivers. Why should they? Are not all the war offices of the world talking quite freely of the possibility that they will add a war of bacteria to the war of poison gas in the next great struggle? Certainly Mussolini is not in a position to make much of the Ethiopian habit of mutilating the bodies of the dead and taking no captives. His press has boasted that chemicals will be spread on the ground in advance of the army so as to make it impossible for the barefooted enemy to approach his forces without terrible suffering, and I have seen a description of the Italian fire-throwers which makes the similar implements of torture of the World War seem mere toys.

How can the Red Cross refuse to aid the Abyssinians because they do not take prisoners and then approve the flame-throwers and the torturing chemicals of the Italians? The whole thing is so horrible that any effort to say what is civilized warfare and what is uncivilized, who are good fighters and who bad fighters, is utterly absurd. War is the sum of all infamies, and any effort to give it a few refinements or to define what is ethical and what unethical is utterly childish. One of the Emperor's governors solemnly assured Marcelle Prat recently that the mutilation of the Italian dead would be a proper reply to the use of poison gas by the Italians. As the New Statesman and Nation puts it, "One barbarism no doubt deserves another." A white crusade against black barbarism, such as Mussolini proclaims his holy war to be, will naturally call out black barbarism, and no sane man can declare one worse than the other.

The New Statesman and Nation, by the way, declares editorially that the war, if it comes, will be "long and terrible," with Mussolini's influence dwindling to nothing. "For our part," it writes, "we hazard a guess that prolonged war in Abyssinia will mean the end of Italian Fascism; what it will begin in Europe and Africa and Asia we cannot guess." The longer it continues the greater will be the unrest among colored peoples all over the world, and the greater will be the effort of Mussolini's publicity machine to keep not only Italy but the rest of the world from knowing what is actually happening. It will put all the news associations to their trumps to let us know what is really taking place. Of course the number of deaths from disease will be carefully concealed from the Italians and from us, but we already know that transports are coming back through the Suez with cargoes of 1,000 or 1,200 disabled, debilitated, and seriously ill men, and this is just the beginning.

Oswald Garrison Villard

Racketeering in the A. F. of L.

I. The Poultry Racket

By ISIDOR FEINSTEIN

IT should hardly be necessary at this date to stress the importance of unionization for the worker. The union is his one effective weapon in the competitive struggle. In our economy the bargaining power that organization in a union gives the workers represents the only possible hope of checking that maldistribution of income which lies at the bottom of our ills. Labor unions, Chief Justice Taft wrote in the American Steel Foundries case (257 U. S. 209), "were organized out of the necessities of the situation. A single employee was helpless in dealing with an employer."

Powerful and militant unions are made all the more necessary at present by the growing menace of fascism, but the unions will be neither powerful nor militant until they rid themselves of dictatorship and of the racketeering that dictatorship breeds and fosters. Most unions are fairly decent. Even bad unions are better than none at all. Some unions, like the Newspaper Guild, to which the writer belongs, are splendid organizations. But the dry rot of dictatorship and racketeering is widespread enough to weaken and corrupt the American Federation of Labor leadership and to endanger the development of unionization. It is suggested that the toll exacted by trade-union racketeers from workers and the public is pitifully small compared to the tolls gathered in by the big interests which command the various passes of our economic system. That is true. But the toll taken by the racketeers is far more serious than its amount in dollars and cents. For it represents the infiltration into the labor movement of criminal elements, the perversion of trade unionism into a device for maintaining business monopolies and prices, the terrorization of the workers, and the infection of the A. F. of L. hierarchy, which draws Peter's pence from the racketeers.

The crushing of democracy in the trade unions by racketeers and the labor politicians who support them is a grave matter for union members. It means not merely the loss of the right to vote as they please but often of the right to a livelihood. For in many cases the racketeers have the power to bar from work those who oppose them. In addition, racketeering and misgovernment in the unions provide the basis for a fascist campaign which would make trade unionism synonymous with racketeering and seek to impose government control on the unions in order to "protect" the workers. The responsibility for preventing such a development rests largely upon the leaders of the American Federation of Labor. Unfortunately they help rather than hinder the drift toward state control—that is, ultimately, big business control—of the unions. Some are close to being racketeers themselves. Most of the others are dependent for votes or revenue upon unions under racketeer control. They ought to be cleaning up. Instead, one finds them supporting the racketeers and playing into the hands of the fascist drive by raising the red scare against those who fight the racket. Thus they help to smear labor, and to divide it.

The current investigation into the long-standing poultry racket in New York City and the attitude of the A. F. of L. leadership toward the investigation illustrate the extent to which labor racketeering may develop and the lengths to which the A. F. of L. will go to shield it, rather than clean it out. The facts here presented are from the exhaustive report made for the Department of Public Markets by Philip B. Reister. The report provides not only a comprehensive survey of the poultry racket but a glimpse of the way in which labor racketeering often develops. It throws light on the struggle among competing business men for monopoly and price maintenance, the use of gangsters and violence in that struggle, the entrance of the gangsters into the unions and the perversion of the unions into instruments for the maintenance of monopoly and prices, and the final dominance of the gangsters over both business and labor in the interest of the victorious business monopolists and the protecting politicians behind them.

Conditions in the poultry market might have been cleaned up long ago had there been more honesty and courage in the top ranks of the American Federation of Labor. The so-called poultry racket is the domination of the poultry market by a triple-headed monopoly of which criminal trade-union leaders are a part. It is enforced and buttressed by their control of certain key unions plus their close relations with powerful figures of this and other years in the Tammany machine. The triple-headed monopoly is made up of the New Jersey Coop Company, which rents the coops in which live poultry is transported in the New York City area; the New York Live Poultry Trucking Company, which controls the cartage of live poultry in this area; and the Metropolitan Feed Company, which supplies feed for the live fowl to more than 90 per cent of the commission merchants and slaughterers. The key figures in the racket are Arthur ("Tootsie") Herbert, delegate of Local 167 of the International Brotherhood of Chauffeurs, Teamsters, Stablemen, and Helpers of America; Joseph Weiner, now in the federal penitentiary at Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, but prior to his incarceration delegate of Local 440 of the Official Orthodox Poultry Slaughterers of America; and Sidney Rosenstein, president and principal stockholder of the Metropolitan Feed Company, once coadjutor of Weiner, now a pal of "Tootsie." "Tootsie's" brother, Charlie Herbert, replaced Weiner as a delegate of Local 440. The Herberts and Rosenstein made their debut in the public records in the same way, for petty larceny; Weiner, for safe burglary. He was committed to the New Jersey State Reformatory on November 25, 1916. Mr. Rosenstein's police record begins in the same year with a $25 fine for petty larceny. Mr. Charles Herbert started somewhat earlier. He was sentenced to a year in the Rahway Reformatory for petty larceny in 1907. A veil was cast over Mr. "Tootsie" Herbert's first steps on the ladder to success by the removal of his record and fingerprints from the Police Department when investigators for the Department of Markets called. From other sources, however, the department learned that "Tootsie," too, started with petty larceny.

The poultry racket is an old story. There has been one investigation after another since 1911, but the racket reached new heights of efficiency during the past decade. Violence, arson, and murder kept the recalcitrant in line. Places of business were bombed. Gas bombs were used to destroy chickens. Poisoned feed was thrown into crates. Trucks were wrecked and their live cargoes set afire. Gangs in high-powered cars patroled highways and intercepted deliveries, and kidnapped or killed. Those who resisted or defied the leaders were broken by the ring and persecuted by the crooked politicians protecting the racket and sharing the spoils. The racket has been lucrative. Mr. "Tootsie" Herbert was making $3,925 a week in 1928, according to United States Commissioner Francis A. O'Neill, who brought "Toots" to trial in August of that year for violation of the Sherman anti-trust law. Business is worse now, but "Tootsie" has considerably increased his power and territory since then. The triple-headed monopoly does well, too. It costs $60 to unload, crate, and truck a car of poultry in Philadelphia. The Department of Markets estimates the cost in New York at as high as $183. One reason is that the shipper pays extortionate coop, truck, and unloading charges (like United States Steel's Pittsburgh Plus racket) whether these services are needed or not—even if the shipper trucks his poultry from a distant point to the door of the receiver in New York in his own coops. Eighty per cent of the poultry received at the terminals is hauled away by the buyers, but the shipper pays for the imaginary trucking service rendered in these cases.

City investigators figure that the coop company made 3,600 per cent on its capital in 1932. Profits of both truck and coop company were estimated at close to a million dollars in that year. Both companies are owned and operated by the same group of officials. It was during the ascendancy of Weiner as czar of the industry from 1923 to 1928, when "Tootsie's" star rose, that the racketeers increased their power in the business until they dictated its policies and rates. The Metropolitan Feed Company is a comparative newcomer in the field. In 1930 Weiner and Herbert forced its reorganization and began a reign of terror to compel dealers to buy from them at from 50 to 100 per cent above the market rate. Long-established food dealers were forced to make deliveries like bootleggers, in the dead of night, and purchasers in self-protection had to hide and disguise the "outlaw" feed. Charles Schaefer and Son sold or tried to sell corn for $1.25 a bag delivered; Metropolitan charged $2.30. Schaefer sold Farina for $1.65; Metropolitan for $3. The Metropolitan was enjoined by Federal Judge Caffey on December 19, 1931, from forcing the purchase of feed exclusively from itself, but 95 per cent of the dealers are still buying from the Met because they fear to buy elsewhere.

The racket has not hesitated even at murder. The first was that of Bernard Baff, an independent dealer. Defying repeated warnings and the attempt to bomb his summer home, Baff was called out of his store on 125th Street in 1914 and shot to death. The following year two eyewitnesses of the murder were killed. One of the slayers of Baff confessed that a purse of $4,200 was raised by 100 poultry men to divide among the slayers. Of the six men indicted, three were sentenced to death, but one was freed in 1918, another in 1921, and the third was given a full pardon by Al Smith in 1928. Of the other three, one was acquitted and two convicted of manslaughter. Moe Rosenstein, one of these two, the man who raised his hat as a signal to the killers, wasn't even taken into custody until December of 1918, four years after the slaying, and was shortly afterward paroled. The other man convicted of manslaughter was released in 1923. The racket chalked up three murders in 1934—Irving Bernstein, Abraham Cohen, and Max Livingston. Harry Baff, son of the Bernard Baff who was murdered in 1914, was one of the complaining witnesses against the Bronx racketeers who wrecked the S. S. and B. plant in 1933. Baff was a partner in the S. S. and B. It bought coops from "outsiders" rather than from the New Jersey Coop Company. Joseph Weiner threatened violence, and a strike of schochtim unless this practice was stopped. When these threats were ignored, stronger measures were adopted.

At 3 a.m. on April 6, 1933, police cruising in a radio car found a gunman, Jacob Roth, holding up a partner, a customer, and a night watchman while six gangsters were systematically wrecking the interior of the S. S. and B. plant. Although caught in the commission of the crime, the gangsters were released by Magistrate Edward J. Walsh on the ground that the grand jury had failed to indict. District Attorney Samuel F. Foley moved for indictments for conspiracy and in the meantime put Baff and three partners in the county jail for safekeeping, fixing bail at $25,000 each. Racket bondsmen appeared the next morning to get the witnesses out. The latter, realizing that none of their friends could raise that much money, refused to leave. Aggregate bail was increased to $1,050,000, and the racketeers sought a writ of habeas corpus to get the witnesses before trial. Three of the gangsters finally went to jail for from four to six months and four others for from six months to three years. Weiner was given three years for his part in the wrecking but served only 299 days before he was paroled. Weiner prevailed on a number of prominent social workers to go to Judge Francis Caffey with a plea for mercy on the ground that he had been giving $50,000 a year to Jewish, Catholic, and Protestant charitable institutions. Since Weiner had testified at his trial that his income was insignificant, Judge Caffey added two years in jail for perjury, terming Weiner "one of the most contemptible liars" he had ever met. Weiner is now serving that sentence in a federal penitentiary, out of reach of the Tammany-influenced parole board.

There are strong grounds for suspicion that just as the workers and decent business men of the market are tools in the hands of the racketeers, so the racketeers are but part of a criminal network that reaches high up into the Tammany organization. In 1926 the city health department refused licenses to eighteen independent dealers. Benjamin F. Schreiber, who had been campaign manager for Jimmy Walker, appeared as counsel in opposition to the granting of the licenses. In the investigation which followed, Health Commissioner Louis I. Harris declared that a well-organized graft ring had been collecting about $1,000,000 a year from furnishing poultry dealers with licenses to carry on their business. In 1929 the federal government obtained the indictment of ninety dealers in the poultry racket on charges of violating the anti-trust laws, and sixty-six were convicted. With all due respect to Judge John Knox who imposed the sentences, they seem to have been very light. Sidney Rosenstein was fined $500 and given four weeks in jail—and both fine and sentence were suspended. Charles Herbert got two weeks in jail. "Tootsie" Herbert was fined $500 and sentenced to eight weeks in jail. The sentence was suspended. Both Local 167 of the Teamsters and the Official Orthodox Poultry Slaughterers of America, Inc., were put on five years' probation at that time.

"Tootsie" has an interesting record as a labor leader. Dues in Local 167 were raised from $4 to $5 a month in 1933 and then, several months ago, to $10 a month. Workers get $47 a week for a forty-four-hour week but most of them work less than two weeks a month. During the conspiracy trial of 1929 every member was assessed $50 for legal costs and $25 for each of the several recent trials of "Tootsie." The delegates ("Tootsie" is one) have arbitrary power in the assignment of work, and the kickback is said to be widespread, although no one dares protest publicly. The Department of Markets estimates the union's revenues from dues and fines at $56,000 a year and its expenses at $6,000. Local 440 of the Slaughterers, dominated first by Weiner and now by Charles Herbert, has dues of $6 a month plus 3 per cent monthly for the unemployment fund. In both unions those who incur the displeasure of the delegates are victims of discrimination. Recently seventy-two members of Local 440 were expelled for "communistic activities," that is, for opposing Herbert. A court order reinstated them. When the Department of Markets began its investigation, Herbert offered his resignation to Local 440, expecting a vote of confidence. Unfortunately for him the rank and file moved for a secret ballot and won the motion. On the secret ballot Herbert's resignation was accepted by a vote of 144 to 118, and later Herbert's lieutenants were voted out of office. The ouster vote was made possible by the presence of detectives and Markets Department officials to protect those who wanted to vote against the Herbert slate. First Herbert announced that he would form a new union of his own. (The attorney for the rank and file informed the Markets Department that John J. Walsh, vice-president of the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of America, had promised Herbert a new charter within ten days.) Later, when newspaper publicity made it impossible for the International to give Herbert a new charter even if it had wanted to, Herbert's officers simply refused to recognize the validity of the election which voted them out. It may take months of court action to enable the new officers to take possession of the union's records and treasury. In the meantime the International has revoked the charter of 440, and Herbert is expected to get a charter for a new union he can control.

If the Butchers' International has hardly tried to help clean Charlie Herbert out of Local 440, at least one official of the Teamsters' International has actively given comfort to "Tootsie" Herbert. When the city appealed to Matthew Woll of the A. F. of L. for aid in ending the poultry racket, Mr. Woll arranged to have Michael J. Cashal, vice-president of the International Brotherhood of Chauffeurs, Teamsters, Stablemen, and Helpers of America, named as the A. F. of L.'s representative to cooperate with the city. Mr. Cashal began by making an address before Local 167, "Tootsie" Herbert's union, in which he advised the members to ignore the Commissioner's request that complaints be lodged with the Department of Markets, and termed the inquiry a "communistic plot." The chief "Communist" in this "communistic plot" is William Fellowes Morgan, Jr., Commissioner of Public Markets, Weights, and Measures. Another is Deputy Commissioner Alexander Hamilton, a collateral descendant of Alexander Hamilton and a nephew of J. P. Morgan. Edward W. Scully, an attorney for rank-and-file groups within the Teamsters, called the attention of William Green to Cashal's statements and to the record in two Labor Board cases that reflect on Cashal's own character as a labor leader. In one case, W. T. Cowan, Inc., discharged its drivers when they insisted that the terms of their union contract be enforced. Neither the officers of the local, 807, nor Cashal could be reached by the men or their attorney, Scully.

Finally one delegate was interviewed. He said the union contract with W. T. Cowan, Inc., could not be found. Independent rank-and-file action through the Regional Labor Board, despite the indifference of the leadership, forced the rehiring of the men. The other case illustrates even more graphically the widespread reports that Mr. Cashal's union makes very little effort to maintain and enforce its contracts once it has come to an agreement with the employer. This is the case of the Howard Trucking Company, Case No. 1571, heard by the New York Regional Labor Board on May 17 of this year with the decision handed down May 20. Teamsters employed by the company got tired of waiting for their shop steward to enforce their contract and on March 20 elected a new representative. On April 2 the regular shop steward called a meeting of men and management to discuss the contract. The secretary-treasurer of Local 807, McCrann, presided and gave a long-winded talk on how bad unemployment was. The employer made a pep talk. Then a vote was called for—on whether or not to enforce the terms of the contract. The employer won, by a majority of one. The rank and file charge intimidation in the vote. Two days later the man who had been newly elected shop steward by the rank and file was called in by the employer, told "this isn't Russia," and discharged. Later a second man was discharged after he was seen talking in a restaurant with the insurgent leader. Thereafter all union helpers were fired and replaced with "wagon boys" at a lower rate of pay. All Local 807 did was to advise the helpers to turn in their union cards and get back the money they had paid into the union. The NRA expired before the decision could be enforced and the men are still out.

Charges were filed with the International against officials of Local 807, but their only answer was to publish an "Important Notice" in the International's official magazine for June. The notice warned that any member joining any "club or organization, whether it be political, social, or religious, in which the affairs of our union are discussed" will be suspended by his local, and any local failing to suspend such a member will be suspended by the International. Members were warned against "such institutions and rackets. They are not only attempting to inject their serpentine fangs in our local unions in large cities, but they have done so in other unions of labor. Some are communistic but most of them are legal rackets. I might further state that the national government will not permit such movements to continue, especially if they contemplate interfering with interstate traffic. . . . Members, beware of false prophets who come to you dressed in sheep's clothing but who are in reality ravenous wolves."

William Green's reply was to forward the charges against Cashal to Cashal and Matthew Woll "for consideration and reply so that I can more intelligently and correctly make answer to the suggestions you offer and the recommendations you submit. I have always entertained a high regard for Mr. Cashal, vice-president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. For this reason I am reluctant to accept the complaint against him as well founded." Mr. Scully replied by requesting a full hearing and asking, "Does Mr. Cashal's charge that the city's drive is communistic have the approval of the federation?" Mr. Green has yet to answer that question.

[Part II of Mr. Feinstein's article, on the building-trades racket, will appear next week.]

The Meaning of the Modern Drama

II. The Shavian Dilemma

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IN the preceding article of this series it was suggested that a number of the plays written in America during the last ten or twelve years were not without a certain literary significance, even though they might seem to lack the definite socio-political implications characteristic of both the older "problem play" and the newer "revolutionary drama." To them we shall return later, but it seems obvious enough that much less can be said in favor of the Victorian theater against which Bernard Shaw conducted his relentless campaign. Notoriously it depended upon adaptations from the French for even semi-serious plays, and the literary as well as the sociological significance of the native drama was very nearly nil. There have been, as a matter of fact, only two or three periods during which the history of the English drama became a part of the history of English literature and this was decidedly not one of them.

Broadly speaking it may be said that between Sheridan and Oscar Wilde no successful writer for the English stage deserves to be ranked as a man of letters. It is true that the names of a few plays—"Richelieu" and "The Lady of Lyons," "The Two Orphans" and "The Bells"—are dimly remembered. It is also true of course that Byron and Shelley and Tennyson and Browning wrote sometimes in the dramatic form. But their plays either were not intended for the stage or were unsuccessful when acted, and one may safely make a sweeping generalization: during most of the nineteenth century in England the men of letters were not successful playwrights and the successful playwrights were not men of letters.

Of all the literary forms the acting drama is undoubtedly the one which seems to have the greatest difficulty in maintaining a connection with serious literature, and the lamentable unsuccess of the few eminent Victorians who attempted to reestablish the connection merely indicates how completely it has been broken.

In a sense, the theater flourished. It boasted actors who were reputed to be great and who with apparent insouciance alternated their interpretations of Shakespeare with declamations of the most dreadful drivel. It was also popular as a peculiar sort of diversion apparently relished by people who took for granted that they would not find in it any pretense at the intelligence or integrity which they expected in poetry or the novel. Through the Victorian novel runs the current of the best thought and the most acute sensibility of the time. But the age which produced and enjoyed Dickens, George Eliot, Thackeray, and Meredith seemed ready to assume that no attempt to reach a comparable level was to be expected in the theater.

The only explanation of both the barrenness of the Victorian theater and the complacency with which it was accepted seems to be that the drama had been completely given up as a form of serious expression. Though Tennyson, like Henry James somewhat later, happened to be taken with an odd ambition to write plays, the general feeling seems to have been that the acting drama was lost to literature and that it could no longer be used by the serious literary artist.

From this situation it could be rescued only by a kind of revolution, and that revolution—astonishingly successful in the end—was, of course, the one inspired by Ibsen and, in England, generated by Shaw. The revolution was, moreover, carried out by the boldest of possible methods, since it proposed to emphasize in dramatic writing the very virtues which had been the most completely non-existent in the current tradition, namely, the intellectual. The Victorian drama was unusually bad from almost every standpoint except, perhaps, that of pure mechanics. It made little effort in the direction of either any valid representation of character or the utilization of any except a distinctly sub-literary style. But in no respect was its lag more conspicuous than in the staleness of its moral and social ideas, which were not merely vulgar but also vulgar in a fashion distinctly behind the time. Yet "the new drama" as championed—and, as he himself admitted, to some extent merely imagined—by Shaw, was to be primarily intellectual. The drama was not merely to catch up with the best of current thought; it was to be ahead of it, and from having constituted a stagnant backwater it was to become a roaring torrent in which the most advanced and vertiginous ideas were to sweep onward.

To an amazing degree these ambitions were actually realized. Shaw himself might contemptuously announce that there was nothing original in his plays. His startled readers need not go even so far afield as Ibsen and Nietzsche.

They could find it all in their own neglected genius, Samuel Butler. And yet, though there is a good deal of truth in this, the fact remains that it was largely through the "new drama" that these "modern" and "advanced" ideas were actually popularized, that the premises of an Ibsen or a Shaw ceased to be the esoteric possession of a few and gradually came to constitute the general background of early twentieth-century thought.

It is true of course that the drama had no exclusive right to them; they passed either from the drama or from other original sources into general literature. It is also true that the drama as reading exercised far more influence than could have been exercised by the relatively infrequent performances of the best of the new plays. On the whole, moreover, printed volumes of Shaw and Ibsen and Strindberg and Hauptmann and the rest were read for the most part less because their audience was interested in the theater than because it was interested in ideas. The importance of the plays was only secondarily their importance as dramatic literature, and to that extent the intention to intellectualize the drama may be said to have overstepped itself. But however one may think of Ibsen and Shaw, the fact remains that their plays present in compact and vivid form the convictions and attitudes which were revolutionizing the intellectual background against which the literature of the whole of one generation was to be written. The drama had come back with a vengeance.

The peculiar, almost unique character of the plays consists in the fact that, to a degree nearly unprecedented in dramatic literature, their authors were fighting their audience. Shaw's central criticism of Shakespeare—that his point of view was merely that of the Elizabethan man in the street—is based upon an accurate observation. But, speaking broadly, much the same thing might be said of Sophocles or of Molière. That directness and simplicity which marks all the great works of literature and which gives them the air which is vaguely called "classic" is possible only when the author can take for granted the whole substratum of knowledge and belief, the whole system of values, by reference to which the story achieves its meaning. Such works are, in other words, the final flowers of an established and flourishing culture. Even when, as in the case of Molière, they included important critical elements, the criticism is rather corrective than revolutionary. It involves no fundamental readjustment of standards, and the determination to "transvaluate values" is so completely alien to the classic spirit that it is incompatible with the creation of a classic work.*

Much of the awkwardness, as well as much of the characteristic quality, of the drama stemming from Ibsen arises out of the fact that its authors were trying to tell stories the intended significance of which could not emerge unless the auditor could be made to revolutionize his moral and intellectual equipment. Ibsen, being somewhat more of an artist and somewhat less of a teacher than most of the rest, was content to leave in his plays a certain ambiguity inevitable in a story whose premises remained not wholly comprehended. Shaw, being the most voluble as well as, in certain respects, the most prosy of the lot, tried to get around the difficulty by the long prefatory sermons whose purpose was to implant in the mind of the prospective reader those ideas necessary for the correct comprehension of the play. But neither Ibsen's willingness to remain provocatively puzzling nor Shaw's interminable preliminary discourses relieved either of the necessity of a great deal of explanation and argumentation as he went along.

"Ghosts," to take a familiar example, is in its most "classic" aspect a tragedy of ineluctable fate taking the form of hereditary disease. On a different level it is also a story whose theme is the evil wrought by hypocrisy and concealment. But that is not all. When Molière wrote "Tartuffe" he could safely assume that his audience would recognize the hypocrisy of the central character as precisely that. Ibsen on the other hand knew that, to at least many in his audience, the hypocrisy of Parson Manders would appear not as hypocrisy at all but only as a form of decency which shrank from mentioning the unmentionable. He knew also that the parson's refusal to tell Oswald the truth about his disreputable father was based upon the conviction that children should be encouraged to follow the Biblical injunction, "Honor thy father and thy mother." On the whole, the audience would tend to agree rather with Parson Manders than with Ibsen, and it was accordingly necessary to introduce various debates upon this and other subjects, which debates—and this is the important point—were relevant not to the action but to the premises in terms of which the action could become meaningful.

One result of all this is that even such a play as "Ghosts," certainly one of the best of the school, must always have seemed slightly awkward. It could not move forward with the swift decisiveness of the popular melodrama, which takes for granted everything except the particular action itself, or of, say, a tragedy by Shakespeare, who could at least take for granted that his purely intellectual premises were near enough those of the Elizabethan man in the street to require no defense. Another result is that for us, some half a century later, most of the arguments have become mere boresome excrescences, for the simple reason that the issues with which they deal are no longer living.

Thus both Ibsen and Shaw have suffered from the fact that they argued too well. Their paradoxes have turned into platitudes, and it does little good to remind ourselves that it was they who made them platitudinous. Parson Manders asks Mrs. Alving if she feels any better for having read certain shocking books on her table, and when Mrs. Alving replies that she feels not better but "safer," she sounds uncomfortably like Mr. Marquis's Hermione, because Hermione is exactly a person who goes on repeating "advanced ideas" which are no longer advanced.

At its flattest—for example, in the plays of Brieux—"the new drama" was no more than a pamphlet in dialogue form upon some very limited and concrete topic. At its best—say, in "Hedda Gabler"—it very nearly transcends its own limitations. The problem there is a problem of character and cannot become platitudinous for the reason that a platitude must necessarily be statable as a simple proposition. In general, the most lasting work of the best "new dramatists" is that which is least specific, and plays like "A Doll's House" and "Widowers' Houses" are almost completely dead, while "The Wild Duck" and "Man and Superman" are still interesting, precisely because the two first prove a point which can be equally well argued in abstract intellectual terms.

---

* I am not, of course, forgetting that "Tartuffe" was the occasion of a scandal, but the scandal was not the result of any revolutionary definition of morality. It was due solely to the fact that the villain was a priest.

To say this is by no means to say that these dramatists should have written otherwise. The only culture or "ideology" which they could have taken for granted was one whose vitality was already exhausted, and their choice was probably limited to a choice between mere conventionality and the sort of pioneering work which they chose to do. The time was out of joint; but, as an artist, any one of them might have been forgiven for exclaiming, "Oh, cursed spite, that ever I was born to set it right." It was the necessity for doing just that which made it necessary for even Ibsen, surely the greatest of the group, to spend much of his time either in the effort to establish his premises or in the composition of works bound to lose their interest as soon as they should have accomplished their purpose.

Though he never, as far as I know, made any public profession of the fact, it is evident that Shaw came to realize at last that his pioneering work had been finished. However backward society may have continued to be, and however superficial the acceptance of "advanced ideas" may have remained, audiences were, nevertheless, ready to accept plays written from the Shavian point of view. The next step was obviously to abandon the effort to propagandize these ideas and actually to write the plays which their acceptance made possible. To Shaw's credit it must be said that from "Saint Joan" on that is exactly what he attempted to do. Perhaps most of the later plays were not very good. Perhaps they were conspicuously less successful in achieving their purpose than the early ones had been in achieving a different purpose. But the intention was admirable. The premises of a newer drama had been established and, logically, the next task of the dramatist was to create that drama.

Next week I shall discuss what the premises of the new drama were and also to what extent the American playwrights of the decade just past succeeded in building a significant literature upon them.

Roosevelt's Hollow Triumph

By PAUL W. WARD

Washington, August 29

THE first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress—which would have ended August 24 instead of two days later had not the President of the United States been caught trying to work both sides of the street in the cotton business—added at least a dozen items to Franklin D. Roosevelt's already long list of lost opportunities, hacked several cubits from his public stature, and left in its wake no clear-cut issues of its own devising to dominate the 1936 campaign.

